The German Penal Code contains several provisions penalizing illegal gambling, which appears in the Code under the name of "game of chance." They read as follows:

"Sec. 284. [Arranging Games of Chance].

"(1) Anybody who without permission of the authorities publicly arranges or carries on a game of chance or supplies accommodations for it, shall be punished by deprivation of liberty for a term not to exceed two years, or by a fine.

"(2) Games of chance in associations or societies with restricted membership in which it is customary to arrange games of chance shall also be considered publicly arranged.

"Sec. 284a. [Participating in Games of Chance].

"Anybody who participates in a public game of chance (Sec. 284) shall be punished by deprivation of liberty for a term not to exceed six months and a fine, or by a fine only.

"Sec. 285. [Professional Gambling]

"Anybody who pursues gambling professionally shall be punished by deprivation of liberty for a term not to exceed five years and a fine; under extenuating circumstances by deprivation of liberty for a term not to exceed one year or a fine, or both.

"Sec. 285a. [Police Surveillance].

"In the cases provided for by Sections 284, 284a, and 285, police surveillance may be permitted, in addition to deprivation of liberty.

"Sec. 285b. [Confiscation].

"In the cases specified in Section 284 to 285, the appliances used for gambling and the money found on the gambling table or in the [gambling] bank shall be confiscated, if they belong to a perpetrator or an accomplice at the time of the judgment. Otherwise they may be confiscated; Section 40a shall be applicable."

Furthermore, illegal public lotteries also subject their organizers to punishment. This is provided by Section 286 of the German Penal Code which reads as follows:

"Sec. 286. [Public Lotteries].

"(1) Anybody who without the permission of the authorities organizes public lotteries, shall be punished by deprivation of liberty for a term not to exceed two years or a fine.

"(2) Publicly organized raffles of movable and immovable property shall be deemed equivalent to lotteries.

"3. Prostitution

"Promoting or facilitating prostitution are punishable under Sections 180 (Pandering), 181 (Serious Pandering), and 181a (Pimping). The punishment is deprivation of liberty not to exceed five years.

"4. Obscenity

"Causing public annoyance by lewd acts is punished by deprivation of liberty not to exceed two years (Sec. 183), while dissemination of obscene writings is punished by deprivation of liberty for up to one year and a fine, or by either of these punishments.

"5. Homosexual Activity Between Consenting Adults

"Sodomy between men is punished by deprivation of liberty for a term not to exceed five years, but the court may, in its discretion, impose no punishment upon a participant who at the time of the offense has not yet reached the age of twenty-one years (Sec. 175). Serious sodomy between men, in particular sodomy for pecuniary gain entails the punishment of deprivation of liberty for a term of from one to ten years; but in case of extenuating circumstances the punishment is deprivation of liberty from six months up to five years (Sec. 176 of the German Penal Code)."

"Sec. 311. [Endangering by Means of Explosion].

"(1) Anybody who causes an explosion, particularly by use of explosives and thereby endangers life or limb of another or another's property of significant value, shall be punished by deprivation of liberty for not less than one year.

"(2) In especially serious cases the punishment shall be deprivation of liberty for not less than five years, in less serious cases—deprivation of liberty for a term of from six months up to five years.

"(3) A case as a rule may be considered especially serious, if the perpetrator by his [criminal] act has thoughtlessly caused the death of another.

"(4) Anybody who in the cases of paragraph 1 negligently causes the danger, shall be punished by deprivation of liberty for up to five years.

"(5) Anyone who in the cases of paragraph 1 acts negligently and negligently causes the danger, shall be punished by deprivation of liberty for up to two years or a fine.

"(6) The penal provisions of the Atomic [Energy] Law shall remain unaffected.

"Sec. 311a. [Preparation of a Crime Involving Explosives].

"(1) [In the Version of the First Criminal Law Reform Law of June 25, 1969]. Anyone who, for the purpose of preparing for an act punishable under Section 311, paragraph 1, which is to be perpetrated by means of explosives, produces, procures for himself or another, keeps, transfers to another, or imports into the territory on which this law is in effect, explosives or produces the special contrivances necessary to carry out the act, shall be punished by deprivation of liberty from six months to five years.

"(2) In less serious cases the punishment shall be deprivation of liberty for from three months up to three years.

"Sec. 311b. [Active Repentance].

"(1) [In the Version of the First Criminal Law Reform Law of June 25, 1969]. In the cases of Section 311, paragraphs 1–4, the court may mitigate, in its discretion, the punishment (Sec. 15) or abstain from [imposing] punishment under these provisions, if the perpetrator voluntarily averts the danger before serious damage occurs. Under the same preconditions the perpetrator shall not be punished under Section 311, paragraph 5. In the cases of Section 311a [the provision of] sentence 2 shall apply mutatis mutandis, if the perpetrator voluntarily abandons the further carrying out of the act, or otherwise averts the danger.

"(2) If the danger is averted without any contributing act of the perpetrator, his voluntary and earnest effort to attain such goal shall suffice."

While the Weimar Republic National Constitutional Assembly (by 153 against 128 votes) had in 1919 decided to preserve capital punishment,[50] originally provided by Section 13 of the Imperial German Criminal Code, it has now been abolished by Article 102 of the Basic Law (Constitution) for the Federal Republic of Germany promulgated by the Parliamentary Council on May 23, 1949.[51]

Of a certain interest is the following comment on the death penalty question in Germany, made by an authoritative German criminal law scholar a few years ago, inasmuch as it seems to be true also at the present time. To quote:[52]

"The Penal Reform Commission witnessed long and vigorous debates on the question of capital punishment, a problem on which opinions will remain divided. Of course, in my opinion, for Germany these debates have very little practical significance. Article 102 of the Constitution provides that capital punishment is abolished, and it would require a constitutional amendment to reinstate it. It is impossible to find a two-thirds majority in Parliament for such a purpose. Strangely enough, a national plebiscite would probably result in the reintroduction of capital punishment. But the German Constitution does not permit a plebiscite. Therefore, there is absolutely no possibility for the reintroduction of capital punishment."

Despite its federal political structure, the Federal Republic of Germany does not have a dual system of states (laender) and federal courts comparable to that of the United States. Both land and federal courts are integrated into a single hierarchy, with state courts on the lower levels and federal courts at the top. These federal courts are appellate courts of last resort to which an appeal lies from the state courts. Therefore the problem of multiple prosecutions and trials as a rule does not arise since the bulk of both the substantive and the adjective criminal law rules are incorporated in federal criminal, viz., criminal procedure codes. While the Penal Code includes uniform provisions on the multiplicity of offenses (Secs. 52–55 of the 1973 Code, or Secs. 73–77 of the present Code), the German Criminal Procedure Code in its Sections 2-6 provides rules for prosecution and trial of "interconnected criminal matters." They read as follows: [53]

"Sec. 2. [Joinder and Severance].

"(1) Interconnected criminal cases which individually would be under the jurisdiction of courts of different rank, may be brought jointly to the court of superior jurisdiction.

"(2) For reasons of expediency, this court may, by order provide for the severance of criminal cases so joined.

"Sec. 3. [Interconnection].

"Interconnection exists when one person is accused of several punishable acts, or if several persons are accused as principals, participants, [or] accessories after the fact or receivers [of stolen property], with respect to one punishable act.

"Sec. 4. [Subsequent Joinder or Severance].

"(1) A joinder of interconnected, or a severance of joined criminal cases may also be directed, by judicial order, after the opening of the preliminary judicial investigation or after the opening of the main proceedings, upon motion of the prosecution, or of the person against whom charges are brought or on the court's own motion.

"(2) The court to whose district the other courts belong shall be competent to make such order; if such court does not exist, the superior court common to all involved shall decide.

"Sec. 5. [Jurisdiction of the Court of Higher Rank].

"For the duration of the joinder, the criminal case, which belongs to the jurisdiction of the court of higher rank shall be determinative for the procedure.

"Sec. 6. [Examination on the Court's Own Motion].

"The court shall on its own motion examine its jurisdiction as to subject matter at every stage of the proceedings."

Furthermore, the German Criminal Procedure Code provides also for the possibility of a different kind of joinder: consisting in the simultaneous trial of several criminal cases pending before the same court. The pertinent provision is contained in its Section 237 which reads as follows: [54]

"Sec. 237. [Joinder of Interconnected Criminal Cases].

"If there is an interconnection between several criminal cases pending before it, the court may order their joinder for the purpose of simultaneous trial, even though this interconnection is not the one specified in Section 3."

In the 1973 version of the General Part of the German Criminal Code, the question of prosecution for multiple related offenses is dealt with in Title Three (Fixing Punishment in Case of Several Violations of Law) of the Third Division (Legal Consequences of the [Criminal] Act) consisting of Sections 52–55. They read as follows:

"Sec. 52. Compound Offense.

"(1) If the same criminal act violates several penal statutes or the same penal statute several times, only one punishment shall be imposed.

"(2) If several penal statutes are violated, punishment shall be determined in accordance with the statute which provides for the severest punishment. It may not be less severe than the other applicable statutory provisions permit.

"(3) The court may separately impose a fine in addition to the deprivation of liberty punishment if the conditions specified in Section 41 are met.

[54] Id. at 81.

"(4) Additional penalties (Nebenfolgen) and measures (Sec. 11, par. 1, No. 4) must or may be imposed where one of the applicable statutes prescribes or permits them.

"Sec. 53. Several Criminal Acts.

"(1) If anyone has perpetrated several criminal acts which are adjudicated simultaneously, and thereby incurred several terms of deprivation of liberty or several fines, one compound punishment shall be imposed.

"(2) If a term of deprivation of liberty coincides with a fine, a compound punishment shall be imposed. However, the court may also impose a fine separately; if in such cases a fine is to be imposed for several criminal acts, a compound fine shall be imposed to that extent.

"(3) Section 52, paragraphs 3 and 4 shall apply mutatis mutandis.

"Sec. 54. Fixing the Compound Punishment.

"(1) The compound punishment shall be fixed by increasing the highest punishment incurred, or where there are different kinds of punishment, by increasing the punishment severest in kind. In so doing the personal characteristics of the perpetrator and the individual criminal acts shall be comprehensively evaluated.

"(2) The compound punishment may not reach the sum of the individual punishments. It shall not exceed fifteen years in the case of a deprivation of liberty punishment and may not exceed seven hundred twenty per diem charges in case of fines.

"(3) If the compound punishment is to be computed from deprivation of liberty—and fine—punishments, in ascertaining the sum of the individual punishments one per diem charge shall correspond to one day of deprivation of liberty.

"Sec. 55. Subsequent Fixing of the Compound Punishment.

"(1) Sections 53 and 54 shall also apply if a person under final [judgment of] conviction before the punishment imposed upon him has been executed, barred by the statute of limitations or remitted, is convicted for another criminal act which he perpetrated prior to the earlier conviction. An earlier conviction shall be considered to be the judgment in such earlier proceedings in which the underlying established facts would be examined for the last time.

"(2) Collateral penalties, collateral consequences and measures (Sec. 11, par. 1., No. 4) imposed in the earlier sentence, shall be upheld to the extent they have not become irrelevant as a result of the new sentence."

IN THE NAME OF THE PEOPLE

In the criminal matter against Becker et al. charge: aggravated larceny, etc., the Magistrate's Court of Munich—Lay-Judge Court—delivers the following in the public session on April 27, 1961 in which the following persons participated:

(a) magistrate Dr. Reichert as presiding judge,
(b) lay-judges Schnell and Hauser as co-judges,
(c) prosecutor Mertens as official of the prosecution,
(d) referendar Mayer as deputy recording clerk.

(§ 260, subs. IV) [1] I. Becker, Fritz, auto-mechanic in Munich; married; born on July 4, 1930 in Augsburg is guilty of aggravated larceny (pronouncement) and is therefore sentenced to be confined in a prison for a period of ten months. Preliminary detention is credited against the sentence.

II. Hilger, Hans, clerk in Munich; unmarried; born on January 2, 1935 in Feldkirchen is guilty of receiving property unlawfully acquired, and is therefore sentenced to pay a fine of 300 Deutsche Marks in lieu of a prison term of one month.

III. The defendants bear the costs of the proceeding.

STATEMENT OF GROUNDS

(§ 267, subs.I 1) The injured party in this case, Joseph Schneider, occupies an apartment located on the fourth floor of 175 Schwabingerstrasse, Munich. Between 3.30 and 11.0 p.m. on March 31, 1961, the defendant Becker by force broke open the locked door leading into Schneider's apartment, intending at that time to commit larceny in the apartment. Having entered the apartment, he found a wrist-watch, make Omega, which belonged to Schneider. The watch had an approximate value of 150 Deutsche Marks. He took the watch with him, intending at that time to sell it.

At about 11.0 p.m. Becker proceeded to the Siegesgarten, a night club located on Siegesstrasse, in Munich, where he started a conversation with the defendant Hilger. The defendants had never met before. During the course of the conversation Becker offered to sell Hilger the watch for ten Deutsche Marks. When Hilger inquired as to whether Becker was the owner of the watch, Becker replied: "People who want to buy Swiss watches for ten Marks shouldn't worry about that." Thereupon, Hilger, without inquiring further, bought the watch for ten Deutsche Marks.

[1] All citations in the margin of this Appendix refer to the Code of Criminal Procedure.

The defendant Becker denied the commission of the act charged against him. He alleged that it was Hilger who had offered the watch to him and that he had rejected the offer. The findings with respect to Becker are, however, sufficiently supported by these facts: according to Schneider's testimony, the watch in question was stolen from his apartment in the afternoon or evening of March 31, 1961. Pinter, the detective, testified that the larceny was committed by breaking into Schneider's apartment by force. A fingerprint found on the inside of Schneider's apartment door was identical with Becker's fingerprint in five points. According to the opinion of the expert, Weise, identity in five points, while not conclusive, indicates a high degree of probability that the print was made by Becker. Hilger states that Becker sold him the watch at about 11.30 p.m. on March 31, 1961. Hilger's statement appeared credible on its face and there was no indication that Hilger had any reason to bear false witness against Becker. Furthermore, Becker's wife, when called by him as a witness to establish an alibi for the time here in question, refused to testify. Under the "free evaluation of evidence" rule (§ 261 of the Code of Criminal Procedure) the court is entitled to draw adverse inferences from her failure to testify in support of Becker's statement that he was in his home all evening on the day question until 11.0 p.m. Becker's intent to appropriate the watch to himself is apparent from his subsequent behavior.

The findings concerning the defendant Hilger are based on the defendant's statement in open court and on the credible testimony of Schneider.

(§ 267, subs. III 1) The act committed by the defendant Becker constitutes aggravated larceny pursuant to §§ 242, 243, subs. I, II, of the Criminal Code. The defendant took a movable thing, namely a wristwatch, by terminating the exclusive custody then exercised by Schneider, and by obtaining custody himself. The wrist-watch was the exclusive property of a person other than the defendant, namely Schneider. When taking the watch, the defendant intended to convert the watch for his own benefit by selling it. He took the watch from a building after breaking into it.

The act committed by the defendant Hilger constitutes receiving property unlawfully acquired pursuant to § 259 of the Criminal Code. He purchased a watch which had been obtained by means of an offense, that is, the larceny committed by Becker. He also acted for his own benefit, since he paid considerably less than the fair market value for the watch. Without deciding whether the defendant knew that the watch had been obtained by means of an offense, the court finds that he should have assumed under the circumstances that it had been so obtained. § 259 creates a rebuttable presumption according to which a person, who should have known of the unlawful origin of a certain thing in view of the attending circumstances, may be considered as having had actual knowledge thereof unless the contrary is shown.

The circumstances in light of which Hilger should have known that the watch was unlawfully obtained are these: he bought the watch from a perfect stranger who gave him an evasive answer when questioned about ownership of the watch. The watch cost only a fraction of the regular price. There was nothing in the evidence which would tend to rebut this presumption.

(§ 267, subs. III 1) As to the defendant Becker the court considered ten months confinement in a prison as an appropriate punishment. Although the code provides for a penitentiary sentence in case of aggravated larceny, unless there are mitigating circumstances, the court deemed a prison term sufficient.It (§ 267, subs. III 2) considered in mitigation that Becker has a wife and two children and that he is still rather young. On the other hand, the court had to bear in mind that the defendant had recently been given a suspended sentence which obviously had no effect on him.

The period between April 1, 1961 and today, which the defendant has spent in preliminary detention, will be credited against the sentence here imposed (§ 60 of the criminal Code).

GREECE

It has been pointed out that the purpose of a modern criminal code is to loosen the restrictions imposed upon the judges by the codes of the past, and at the same time, provide an effective instrumentality for the combating of crime.

In compliance with that concept, the Greek Criminal Code* identifies crimes as certain acts being directed against the rights of the individual and the society which the law regards as necessary to be protected. These cases are specified, but a case by case description of the punishable act is avoided to preserve the fundamental principle of "nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege" with the proper flexibility. In this way, the interest of the general public is protected just as the interest of the individual is safeguarded.

The Greek system follows the concept of the twofold purpose of punishment, that is, that of retribution and security. The penalties are understood as being expressions of disapproval on the part of society of what the perpetrator has done, and proceeding against him accordingly.

The security measures are a physical protection of society from the criminals. The penalties are imposed in pursuance of the general and specific preventative theories whereas the security measures are imposed in pursuance of the special preventive theory alone. Henceforth, the former must correspond to the gravity of the crime perpetrated, and the latter, to the personality of the perpetrator.

The Greek Criminal Code is divided into two parts. The first part contains general provisions and the second, specific offenses. The first part is further subdivided into eight chapters, and the second into twenty-seven.

First Part: General Provisions

The first chapter contains provisions with respect to the place and the time of the application of the Criminal Code.

The second deals with the punishable acts and includes provisions with respect to the factual elements of the crime.

The third provides for attempts to commit a crime and for the accessories to the crime.

The fourth includes provisions for penalties and security measures.

The fifth contains provisions about the imposition of the sentences.

The sixth provides for suspended sentences and the release of the convicted person once certain conditions are met.

The seventh provides for the waiving and extinguishing of the right to institute a criminal action.

The last one contains provisions about juveniles.

Second Part: Specific Offenses

This part consists of 27 chapters. The first and second chapters provide for crimes with respect to acts which are directed against the state. The third provides for those crimes which are committed against a country with whom Greece is at peace. The fourth for crimes against the free exercise of political rights. The fifth for crimes against the King, the heir, and the illegal release of prisoners.

The sixth and seventh pertain to crimes with respect to the public order. The eighth for crimes against the armed forces. The ninth and tenth for crimes against transactions, the currency, etc. The 11th for crimes with resepct to the administration of justice. The 12th for crimes with respect to the public services.

The 13th and 14th, for crimes known as "commonly dangerous" and for crimes against transportation. The 15th to 24th, for crimes against the individual (crimes against personal freedom, family life, morality, etc.). The 25th for crimes of begging and vagrancy. The 26th—for petty offenses, and the 27th contains provisions on infractions of administrative laws and ordinances.

The Code contains 474 articles, which run consecutively from 1 to 474. Blank numbers are unknown.

*One of the drafters of the penal code is Nicolaos Chorafas, a former professor in criminal law at the Athens University Law School. He is regarded as an outstanding top authority in the field of criminal law and it is due to his contribution that the Greek Criminal Code is a modern, complete, and effective piece of scientific legislative work.

There are two kinds of culpability: (a) intent and (b) negligence. Two kinds of intent are distinguished: (a) where the perpetrator intentionally and deliberately brings the factual elements into being which, according to the law, meet the definition of a punishable act (dolus directus) and (b) where the perpetrator, although he perceives the materialization of the factual elements of a crime to be possible by his act, commits the act nevertheless (dolus eventualis).

Negligence exists where a person does not pay such attention which, under certain circumstances, he is required and capable of mustering, and consequently, does not foresee the results of his act or he has foreseen the results as possible but believes that they can be averted. In both cases, the element of intent, that is, the will to bring forth the factual basis of a crime, is lacking. Article 26 of the Criminal Code specifies that the major and minor crimes must be punished only where committed intentionally. Minor crimes committed negligently must be punished only where the law expressly so provides.

According to the above, "mutatis mutandis" intentionally and knowingly compare with "intent" (dolus directus, and dolus eventualis), and recklessly and with negligence.

The defendant's state of mind is used to determine guilt. The accused is regarded as innocent until the pronouncement of the sentence.

QUESTION 4

Article 29 of the Criminal Code establishes the principle of "condicio sine qua non." According to this, the perpetrator must be held responsible if his act produced a certain result, and this result can be attributed to the acts of the perpetrator. Accordingly, there must be a close connection between the act and the result, so that it can be inferred that the result was the inevitable consequence of the act.

QUESTION 5

Insanity is a defense under Article 34 of the Criminal Code. The insane criminals are not legally responsible for their acts, but they are subject to security measures. These measures are part of the system of the criminal punishment and are understood as providing protection to society from the insane.

The court may appoint a psychiatrist if it appears necessary for investigation of the case. A psychiatrist may also be appointed at the request of the prosecution or the defense attorney. Each party has the right to call upon an expert advisor at his own expense.

The court may order commitment of the insane person to a mental institution only where it feels that the person is dangerous to the public security.

QUESTION 6

There are the following provisions with regard to the intoxicated defendant:

(a) If the person has been intoxicated involuntarily, that is, without his fault or privity, he may not be held responsible. In that case, Articles 34 and 36, paragraph 1, must apply.

(b) If a person has become intoxicated intentionally or negligently, he will be held responsible according to the provisions of Article 193 of the Criminal Code. Consequently, if the committed act is a major crime, he must be punished by imprisonment up to 2 years, or if it is a minor crime, up to 6 months. Furthermore, Article 35 provides that if a person contemplates committing a crime while in a normal mental situation but becomes intoxicated in order to accomplish it, such a crime must be regarded as committed intentionally.

Self-defense is discussed in Articles 22, 23, and 24 of the Criminal Code and is justified as a means of preserving justice. An act of self-defense requires three conditions to be met: (a) there must be an assault, (b) such an assault must be unlawful, and, (c) immediate.

The right to self-defense belongs not only to the person undergoing an attack, but to anyone who attempts to avert an unlawful act. This is in accordance with the concept that defense is an independent means of protecting legal rights. Consequently, a person who acts to protect another from an unlawful assault, acts in defense even though the other person does not defend himself or ask for help.

Excessive Defense

Self-defense is justified to the extent that it is necessary to avert an immediate assault. When it is excessive, it will be judged "in concreto" depending upon the type, the degree, and the nature of each case.

Article 25 provides that a person who exceeds the limits of self-defense or defense of another must be punished. If the excessive self-defense is intentional, the perpetrator must be punished according to the provisions of Article 83 of the Criminal Code (mitigated punishment). If it is negligent, it is judged according to the provision on negligence (Article 28 of the Criminal Code). But the perpetrator must not be punished if he exceeds the limits of self-defense through fear or confusion.

Where a person provokes an assault by another, in order to act under the pretense of self-defense, in such a case, the provisions about self-defense are not applicable.

The offenses are classified as major crimes, minor crimes, and petty offenses. The purpose of this classification is significant both in the substantive criminal law and in criminal procedure. In substantive criminal law, these are the major points:

(A) Major crimes are never punished if negligently committed. Minor crimes which are negligently committed must be punished only where the law expressly provides. The petty offenses are punishable regardless of whether they are committed intentionally or negligently unless the law expressly requires intent.

(B) An attempt to commit a crime is punishable only in the case of major or minor offenses, never in the case of petty offenses.

(C) The accessories before the fact are punished only with regard to major and minor crimes; in the case of petty offenses only where the law expressly so provides.

In criminal procedure: (a) the jurisdiction of a court over a crime will be determined according to the above-mentioned classification; (b) the arrest and detention of a defendant is always called for in major crimes whereas in the other cases, it will depend upon the specific offense.

QUESTION 9

A court may order the execution of a sentence to be suspended if the defendant has not been convicted for a major or minor offense before, and the sentence imposed is not more than of one year's duration. The judge must consider the circumstances under which the offense took place as well as the personality and the conduct of the perpetrator after the act (Art. 100 of the Greek Criminal Code, hereafter assumed unless specified otherwise). The length of the suspension may not be less than three or more than five years (Art. 99).

Suspension of the imposition of the sentence is unknown.

The person so released is under no supervision, but if he commits a major or minor offense during the period specified in the decision of the court, and is convicted therefor, the suspension will be revoked. In such a case, the offender must serve both sentences consecutively (Art. 102).

The Code, as a rule, provides for determinate sentences of imprisonment. The limits set therein are mandatory for the judge. Indeterminate sentences are provided for in the case of recidivist offenders (Art. 90). The judge is required to specify only the minimum of the sentence which may not be less than 3 years.

Term provisions are extended for special offenders. If such an offender is regarded as dangerous to the public, the court may impose an indeterminate imprisonment term (Arts. 89 and 92).

A convicted person may be released on parole under the conditions and procedure set out in Articles 104 to 110 of the Criminal Code. It is required that two-thirds of the sentence have been served and that the convicted person have demonstrated good behavior during the time of his confinement. The court must scrutinize the history and character of the defendant and if special circumstances indicate that the parolee will lead a law abiding life, a parole will be granted. It is provided that certain obligations may be imposed on the parolee with regard to the place of residence, way of life, etc. The parole will be revoked if the parolee commits a crime during the time specified in the decision of the court.

Legal entities are not subject to criminal prosecution, nor is there an article equivalent to Section 3003. Article 117 of the Constitution and Article 510 (d) of the Code of Criminal Procedure require that all the decisions of the courts must be duly supported by reasons and pronounced in public sessions.

The standards set for the review of the sentences by higher courts vary. They depend upon the timing and standing of the appellant in each particular case. An appellate court may not raise the sentence (Art. 470 of the Code of Criminal Procedure).

In the case of multiple offenses, the perpetrator must, at the determination of the punishment, be sentenced to a compound punishment, consisting of an augmentation of the severest concurrent punishments (Art. 94). If any of the convictions is reversed, then the compound punishment must consist of an augmentation of the severest of the remaining punishments (Art. 94, par. 3).

Where a court imposes imprisonment not to exceed 6 months, it may, at its discretion, convert such punishment to a pecuniary one. The personality and criminal record as well as the financial condition of the defendant must be considered before any conversion is realized. A condition for the release of the convicted person is the payment of the fine imposed. If such a condition is not met, the convicted person serves the sentence. The amount of the fine is a combined consideration of both the gravity of the offense and the financial condition of the defendant.

Mistake of fact is a defense under the circumstances specified in Article 30 of the Criminal Code. The first part provides that a person will not be responsible for an offense if he ignores or misunderstands the fact that his act constitutes the factual elements of a crime. The same provision applies in the case where a person mistakenly believes that the facts which constitute an affirmative defense exist, e.g., an impression that an assault is immediate. It is further specified that if such ignorance or misunderstanding is due to the person's negligence, he will be responsible according to the provisions thereof.

It is provided in the same article that the perpetrator will not be responsible with regard to an incident which increases the gravity of the crime if he ignores that incident or misunderstands it.

Mistake of law appears in two forms: (a) mistake as to whether an act is punishable, that is, whether a law exists and what the content of such law is, and (b) mistake as to the illegal character of an act.

As far as the first case is concerned, mistake of law is not a defense. In the second case, a distinction must be made as to whether the mistake is excusable or not. The mistake is excusable when the perpetrator not only does not know but cannot possibly know the illegal nature of his act. In that case, there is no responsibility. But if the person could have realized the illegal nature of his act, then that act is imputed as if intentionally committed.

QUESTIONS 11 AND 15

The Greek Criminal Code does not contain provisions analogous to the questions 11 and 15 due to the reason that there is only one jurisdiction over crimes committed within the country.

QUESTION 13

It is provided in Article 115 that if two or more persons commit a crime each one of them shall be deemed as a principal. Two elements are required for the make-up of the above crime: (a) common intent, and (b) common act. Common intent exists where all the participants want the factual elements of a crime to be perpetrated and also know that the other perpetrator, or perpetrators, have the intention of committing the same crime.

Common act exists where either the act of each participant constitutes the factual elements of a crime, or a crime is perpetrated by the convergence of the act of the participants.

Under the circumstances set out above, each participant will be subject to the same punishment. If a person assists another in the commission of an act but before the crime is committed, such person will not be deemed to be a principal but an accomplice and will be punished under the provisions of Article 47. The distinction between the two cases is that the act of the perpetrator is an act of commission whereas the act of an accomplice is an act of assistance before the commission of the crime. If a person has offered assistance at the time of the commission, such person shall be deemed to be an accomplice during the act and shall be punished as a perpetrator.

A rule similar to "felony-murder" does not exist in Greek criminal law.

QUESTION 16

Article 195 specifies that whoever, without authority, forms, supplies, or undertakes the leadership of an armed group, as well as anyone who participates therein, shall be punished by imprisonment for not less than 6 months.

QUESTION 17

Where the victim consents to certain acts, then either there is no crime, or there is a crime but it is not punishable.

The first occurs whenever an element of a crime is that it is perpetrated against the will of the victim, and such an element is lacking (consent is given). Here no crime exists (e.g., illegal detention) (Art. 325).

In the second case, the factual elements of a crime are perpetrated but the act is not punishable due to the victim's consent. This happens only where minor bodily injuries are involved which were caused with the consent of the victim in a way not contrary to good morals (Art. 308, par. 2).

Drugs are governed by the Law 5539/1932 and Law 3084/1954 in combination with Laws 6169/1934, 911/1937, 803/1948, and 1765/1951. It is spelled out therein what narcotic substances are, and that their possession or sale shall be punished by confinement in a penitentiary for up to 10 years and a fine of up to 10 million metallic drachmas. When the quantity of narcotics in the possession of the accused is trivial, the penalty shall be up to 2 years of imprisonment.[1]

Violation of the aforementioned laws is a major crime and therefore, shall be tried by a criminal court.[2] The factual element of the above crimes is the mere possession or sale of narcotics. It is irrelevant whether or not the victims consent or that they are customers of the defendant.

By virtue of Law 256/1939 as amended by Laws 621/1937, 2155/1943, and 1620/1951, gambling is permitted only where permission is given by a competent authority (Ministry of Public Security). The facual element of the crime of gambling is perpetrated if it is done without authorization. Consent is an element of the crime.

According to Law 3310/1955 which has replaced Law 3032/1922, a committee has been established with the objective of implementing the provision concerning prostitution. Generally, women engaging in prostitution are not prosecuted provided that the various regulations established by the committee are observed, mainly that women under 18 years of age are not involved or that two or more women do not practice the prostitution in joint enterprise.

Obscenity is regulated by Law 5060/1931 which was enacted in compliance with the international Geneva Agreement of December 19, 1923, as amended by Law 2306/1953, enacted to implement a protocol agreement signed by the members of the United Nations at Lake Success on December 11, 1947.

According to the provisions of the above laws, the judge must decide whether material is obscene or not, taking into consideration the personality of the author, the purpose of the document and the effect which it may have on the public. If the court decides that the material is obscene, it is confiscated and destroyed.

[2] Supreme Court (Areios pagos) 330/1957.

The above-mentioned laws are not contained in the Criminal Code.

According to Article 34, sexual activities between males is punished by imprisonment for not less than 3 months, if one of the parties is an adult and the other a minor, or such activities are the result of an abuse of a position of authority in any public or private office, or if it is perpetrated for any kind of gain. It seems that "a contrario" homosexuality between consenting adults is not punishable.[3]

The Penal Code does not contain provisions about firearms and explosives. This matter is governed by special laws such as Law 286/1914 and Law 2218/1952.

QUESTION 19

Capital punishment is provided for the following cases: (1) an assassination attempt against the King or against a person substituting for him in his offical duties (Art. 134); (2) where a Greek citizen serves in the army of another country with whom Greece is at war (Art. 143); (3) where a person acts in a way that may assist the enemy in connection with a war which is imminent or has already broken out against Greece (Art. 144); (4) espionage against Greece in time of war (Art. 148); (5) where a person intentionally kills another (Art. 299); (6) where a person kills another by willfully violating the rules agreed upon for dueling; (7) in the case of heavily bodily injuries or death caused in connection with a robbery (Art. 380); (8) in the case where a person, in order to derive illegal property benefit, extorts another by threatening his limb or life.

With regard to the above cases, the judge shall impose the death penalty, if the type or means of commission is extraordinarily odious or if the perpetrator is dangerous to the public.

By virtue of Law 1608/1952, Article 1, the death penalty may be imposed in the case of Articles 216, 218, 242, 256, 258, 372, and 376 of the Criminal Code, where the person continued perpetrating the crimes described therein for a long time or where the profit derived therefrom is particularly high. All of the above articles are referred to as abuses against public property.

The death penalty is imposed by a jury and in some instances by the court of appeals. No separate proceedings are provided.

QUESTION 20

A distinction is made in Article 94 between the case where the perpetrator commits several offenses by independent acts and the case where several offenses are committed by the same act. The perpetrator shall be subject to one trial if these offenses are committed at one time or successively (Supreme Court 384/1953), and the imposed sentence shall be, in the first case, a compound one consisting of an augmentation of the severest concurrent punishments. In the second case, the court shall increase, at its discretion, the severest of the concurrent punishments, but not to exceed the maximum provided.

Article 57 of the Code of Criminal Procedure defines that the prosecution is barred by former prosecution of the same offense.

Only one jurisdiction exists in Greece. Therefore, there are no provisions equivalent to Sections 707, 708, and 709.

I. General Remarks

A State may claim jurisdiction over an offense on the ground that a crime affects the national interests, although it has been committed abroad. In regulating this matter, some principles have been developed which have been followed by most of the European countries. These principles (universality, territoriality, personality and the protective principle) are often referred to as "principles of international law" and the group of criminal laws which governs these cases as "international criminal law." These terms are misused because each State, when enacting such laws, does not act to regulate its relations with other States, but acts as a sovereign (imperium) in stipulating under which circumstances its criminal law should apply to offenses which have been committed abroad but nevertheless effect its legal order.

According to the principle of universality, a country may apply its law to any crime, regardless of the place where the crime was committed, the nationality of the perpetrator or whether its national interests are affected or not. It stems from the necessity for international cooperation in combating crime, but it lacks legal realism and has been criticized as extremely broad and difficult to apply. More particularly, its application by a State may be in the nature of a violation of the sovereignty of the other States, and the difficulty in collecting the evidence necessary for the prosecution, especially when the crime has been committed in a remote country, is apparent. In addition, the difference between the laws of different States may lead to injustices, for an act may not be regarded as an offense according to the law of one country, whereas the same act constitutes a crime in another State.

However, the necessity for cooperation in the field of criminal law is unquestionable. International agreements with the objective of combating some crimes, such as the agreements of 1910 and 1923 on obscene literature, and the agreement of 1925 and 1931 on narcotics, is an expression of that need.

Under the territoriality principle, a country may claim jurisdiction over offenses which have occurred only within its own territory. No distinction is made as to the nationality of the perpetrator.

This system although advocated by many prominent authors, has been abandoned as an exclusive concept. It postulates that each State must preserve the existing legal order and secure the rights of its own citizens. Therefore, any deed violating those interests must be punished by its laws, even if it is committed by an alien within the territory.

This principle ignores the fact that such acts may occur within as well as outside the State. Therefore, it does not provide for those acts which are committed abroad and which affect the national interests, or its nationals.

Under the personality principle, the criminal laws of a State are personal and must apply to citizens wherever they commit a wrongful act. The concept is based upon an inner relationship between the State and its citizens. On the one hand, it prevents a State from extraditing its nationals for crimes which they have committed abroad and on the other hand, it enables the State to punish them for each acts. For aliens who violate the laws, the principle creates a "fictio juris" by virtue of which aliens living in a country are regarded as its citizens (subditus temporarius). Thus, the laws apply to them not because the wrongful act was committed within the legislating State, but because under a fictio juris, they are regarded as nationals.

The personality principle does not offer complete protection because, besides the fact that the creation of a "fictio juris" is out of place here, it does not provide for crimes which are committed by aliens abroad and affect the national interests.

The basis of the protective principle is that each State has the right to secure its national interests. These interests can be affected not only by acts committed within its territory but also by acts which take place abroad. The means of safguarding the State's interests rests in the criminal laws, consequently, those laws must protect :

(a) all rights which are enjoyed within the State by nationals or aliens ;

(b) all rights which belong to the State or to its citizens and are exercised abroad. The offense against those rights must be punished wherever it is committed and regardless of by whom because it is an inherent right of any State to safeguard such rights.

(c) those rights which two or more countries are interested in securing. These are known as "common" or "international" rights, e.g., the security of international trade, currency, etc.

II. The Greek Criminal System

The Greek Criminal Code deals with territorial jurisdiction in Articles 5 to 11. Article 5 provides that all offenses committed within the State shall be punished according to its provisions regardless of the nationality of the perpetrator and the gravity of the offense. This provision is an expression of the territorial principle. Offenses committed within territorial waters or in Greek space are to be considered to have occurred on the country's territory. Furthermore, paragraph two of the same Article provides that Greek ships and planes are to be regarded as Greek territory even when they are abroad unless there is an exception in accordance with international law.

Article 6 is an expression of the principle of personality. It is designed to secure the punishment of those who commit crimes abroad. Without this provision, perpetrators would remain unpunished in the event that they returned to Greece, because extradition of Greek citizens is not provided for under Greek law. A condition for the applicability of this Article is that the act must be a major or a minor crime according to the laws of the country where the offense was perpetrated as well as according to Greek law. If the place of the crime is not subject to any criminal jurisdiction, Greek law is applicable.

Paragraph two of the same Article provides that the perpetrator shall be punishable if at the time of the commission of the act, he was Greek but rejected his nationality afterwards, or if he was an alien at that time but assumed Greek nationality afterwards.

The wording of Article 6 may lead to difficulties in its application because it does not make clear whether or not it applies exclusively to major or minor crimes. It simply implies that it must be illegal. Some authors contend that an offense is punishable if it is a petty offense. The opinion that the act must be a major or minor crime seems to be in accord with the whole spirit of Article 6.

Also, there is the question of what the applicable penalty shall be in the event that the law of the country where the act took place provides for a milder punishment than the law of Greece. It appears that the Greek law applies even when the penalty which it requires is severer.

If the offense committed abroad is a minor crime, prosecution must be requested either by the victim or the country where the act took place (paragraph 3). Petty offenses are punishable only where the law expressly so provides (paragraph 4).

Article 7 has its roots in the protective principle and is designated to protect Greeks against whom an offense may be perpetrated abroad by aliens. It provides that the offense must be a major or minor crime according to the law of the country where it occurred as well as to Greek law. The injured party must be a Greek citizen at the time of the commission of the crime and it is irrelevant if he acquired another citizenship subsequently.

Article 8 specifies that Greek criminal law shall apply to the crimes without restriction, specified in Articles 5 to 7, to wit, without respect to the nationality of the perpetrator, to the place of commission, and to the gravity of the crime. The enumeration of the crimes in Article 8 is exhaustive, hence, any crime not mentioned therein shall be tried under Articles 5 to 7, provided that the conditions set out therein are met. Those crimes are :

(a) Acts of high treason or treason against Greece ;

(b) Offenses against the national defense ;

(c) Offenses committed by a Greek holding a public office ;

(d) Acts against Greek public officials during the performance of their official duties, or with relation to such duties ;

(e) Perjury in a proceeding pending before a Greek authority ;

(f) Piracy ;

(g) Offenses against the currency;
(h) Unlawful traffic in narcotics;
(i) Commerce in obscene literature;
(j) Any offense for which the application of Greek law is provided by international agreement.

Articles 9, 10, and 11 specify that if the perpetrator has committed a crime abroad and was convicted or acquitted, or if the prosecution of the act has been barred for lapse of time, or pardoned, or if prosecution has not been requested by the foreign country, it may not be prosecuted in Greece. If the perpetrator has served part of the sentence, that time shall be deducted from a punishment subsequently imposed by the Greek court for the same offense (Article 10). If a Greek national has been convicted abroad for a crime which entails additional punishment according to Greek law, the Greek court may impose such punishment. Likewise, the Greek court may impose security measures, if they are provided for by the Greek law. A translation of the above-mentioned Articles follows in the Appendix.

APPENDIX: TRANSLATION FROM THE GREEK

Articles 5–11, Greek Criminal Code

Art. 5, par. 1. Greek criminal laws shall apply to all offenses committed within the State, even if the offender is an alien.

Par. 2. Greek ships and planes shall be regarded as Greek territory, wherever they are, unless subject to alien jurisdiction, in accordance with international law.

Art. 6. par. 1. Greek criminal laws shall apply to major and minor crimes committed abroad by Greek citizens if such acts are punishable according to the law of the place of the commission, or if that place is not subject to the sovereignty of any State.

Par. 2. Prosecution may be instituted against an alien who was a Greek at the time of the commission of the crime as well as against anyone who acquired Greek citizenship after the commission of the act.

Par. 3. In the case of minor crimes, it is necessary for the application of paragraphs 1 and 2 that either the injured party or the country where the act occurs, requests the prosecution of the perpetrator.

Par. 4. Petty offenses committed abroad are punished only where the law expressly provides therefor.

Art. 7, par. 1. The Greek criminal law shall apply to acts committed by aliens abroad against Greek nationals if such acts are major or minor crimes under Greek law and are also offences where committed or if the place of commission is not subject to the sovereignty of any State.

Par. 2. The provisions of paragraphs 3 and 4 of Article 6 shall be applicable to this Article.

Art. 8. The Greek criminal laws shall apply to the following acts regardless of the nationality of the perpetrator and the place of commission:
(1) High treason or treason against the Greek State;
(2) Offenses against the national defense;
(3) Offenses committed by Greek officials;
(4) Acts against Greek officials during the performance of their duties or in relation to such duties;
(5) Perjury in proceedings pending before Greek authorities;
(6) Piracy;
(7) Offenses against the currency;
(8) Slave traffic;
(9) Unlawful traffic in narcotics;
(10) Commerce in obscene literature;
(11) Any other case where the application of Greek law is provided for by international agreements.

Art. 9, par. 1. Prosecution for an act committed abroad may not be instituted:
(a) If the perpetrator was tried abroad and acquitted or has served the penalty imposed;
(b) If the prosecution of the act or the penalty imposed has been barred for lapse of time;
(c) If no prosecution was requested, although required by the law of the place of commission.

Par. 2. These provisions do not apply to the acts specified in Article 5.

Art. 10. A punishment executed abroad shall be deducted from a punishment subsequently imposed for the same offense by the Greek courts.

Art. 11, par. 1. If a Greek national was convicted abroad of an act which entails additional punishment according to Greek law, the Greek court may impose such punishment.

Par. 2. Likewise, the Greek court may impose security measures upon a Greek citizen who has been convicted or acquitted by foreign courts, if such measures are provided for by the Greek law.

INDIA

1. The Indian Penal Code 1860 [1] does not follow the tripartite division, as suggested by the proposed code. However, the Penal Code is divided into twenty three chapters each having grouped into it a number of similar offenses on the same subject. Thus, there is a subject division of the offenses in the Indian Penal Code. A reference to the contents in the attached Xerox copy will show how divisions are made.

Chapter I is formal, relating to the title and extent of operation of the Code. Chapter II contains an explanation of the terms used in the Code while Chapter III has the punishments provided in the Code. Those acts, commission of which constitutes no offense, are given in Chapter IV; abetment and abettor are dealt with in Chapter V, while the shortest Chapter V–A has the punishments for criminal conspiracy. Chapter VI through Chapter XXIII each deal with separate offenses, e.g., offenses against the State; offenses relating to the Army, Navy and Air Force; and offenses against the public tranquility, etc.

2. The Indian Penal Code has a continuous numbering system from section 1 through section 511. There are no blank numbers. Amendments in the future are likely to be either in the form of an addition to a section or by the substitution of a section. In the case of a substitution, the old section disappears from the Code; when a section is added, which is rather rare, a letter is added to the chapter number, e.g., chapter V–A and section 120–A, 120–B. Since the enactment of the Code in 1860, the amendments have been few and far between.

3. The Indian Code has no section corresponding to section 302(1) of the proposed code. The different kinds of culpability, not separately defined but included within various sections of the code, are intentionally, knowingly, voluntarily, rashly, fraudulently and dishonestly. Of these, the expressions dishonestly, fraudulently and voluntarily are defined in sections 24, 25 and 39 respectively.

The principle of mens rea, as enunciated by the English law, is inapplicable to the Indian law since the Indian Penal Code and each of its sections provide all the ingredients required to be proved for bringing home the guilt of the defendant. According to Mayne: [2]

"Every offense is defined, and the definition states not only what the accused must have done, but the state of his mind with regard to the act when he was doing it. It must have been done knowingly, voluntarily, fraudulently, dishonestly, or the like. And when it is stated that the act must be done with a particular knowledge or intention, the definition goes on to state what he must have known, or what he must have intended."

[2] John Dawson Mayne, Mayne's Criminal Law of India 9, (4th ed. 1914).

For instance, theft must be committed dishonestly, cheating must be committed fraudulently, murder must be committed either intentionally or knowingly.

Every man is presumed to intend the natural consequences of his act or acts, and intention has to be inferred from the facts and attending circumstances of each case. The Supreme Court of India, in the case of Bhikari v. the State of Uttar Pradesh [3] observed as follows:

"The burden of proving an offence is always on the prosecution; it never shifts. Intention when it is an essential ingredient of an offence, has also to be established by the prosecution. But the state of mind of a person can ordinarily only be inferred from circumstances."

By virtue of section 32, the expression "act" includes also illegal omissions. The defendant's state of mind determines the guilt and not the degree of guilt or the sentence. All that the prosecution has to do in India is to prove that a particular act committed by the accused answers the various ingredients of the offense in the particular section of the Indian Penal Code.

4. There is no section in the Indian Penal Code corresponding to section 305 in the proposed draft. Of course, participation of the defendant has to be established either alone or jointly with another or others.

Section 39 of the Code defines the expression "voluntarily" which, in fact, has reference to causation of effects and not to the doing of the acts from which those effects follow. The Indian Code makes no distinction between cases in which a man causes an effect designedly and cases in which he causes it knowingly or having reason to believe that he is likely to cause it. If the effect is a probable consequence of the means used by him, he causes it "voluntarily" whether he really meant to cause it or not.[4]

Writing about the causal relationship between the doer and the deed to be established, Gour says: [5]

"The question whether the effect produced was premeditated or known to be probable by the author is, therefore, always a question of fact to be determined according to the particular circumstances of each case. But whatever the facts, the prosecution have to prove them with sufficient clearness so as to establish a causal relationship between the doer and the deed * * *."

5. The defense of insanity is contained in section 84 of the Code (Xerox copy attached).

There are four kinds of persons who may be said to be non compos mentis (not of sound mind) under the defense of insanity in the Indian Code: (1) an idiot; (2) one made non compos by illness; (3) a lunatic or a madman; and (4) one who is drunk. Under the section, if a defense of insanity is established by a defendant, he is exonerated from liability for his criminal act and no provision is made in the Code for giving him medical care.

(1) An idiot is one who is of non-sane memory from his birth, by a perpetual infirmity and without lucid interval. Those are said to be idiots who cannot count twenty, or tell the days of the week, or who do not know their father or mothers, or the like.

(2) A person made non compos mentis by illness is excused in criminal cases from such acts as are committed by him while under the influence of his disorder. Several causes may be assigned to the disorder; sometimes from the distemper of the humours of the body; sometimes from the violence of a disease, as a fever; sometimes from a concussion or harm to the brain; and, as it is more or less violent, it is distinguishable in kind or degree, from total alienation of the mind, or from complete madness.

(3) A lunatic is one who is, as described by English writers, afflicted by mental disorder only at certain periods and vicissitudes, having intervals of reason. Such persons during their frenzy are criminally as irresponsible as those whose disorder is fixed and permanent.

(4) Insanity as a defense to criminal conduct, when caused by drunkenness, is as much a defense for exoneration as lunacy, etc. Insanity by drunkenness in fact operates in this section as an exception to the rule contained in section

85 of the Indian Code. Section 85 says drunkenness when voluntary will not be a defense to any criminal act of a defendant. However, under section 84 herein, if drunkenness causes a disease which produces such incapacity as to result in the defendant's mind failing to appreciate his actions, the defense of insanity by drunkenness, even though voluntary, is provided to the defendant. Such drunkenness creates intemperance as to lead to a total deprivation of self-control, or creation of delusions, as in delirium tremens. Insanity in such cases may have been caused by any means such as excessive drinking, habitual drinking, drugs, etc. It remains a question of fact for determination in each case.

The defendant must establish insanity and to obtain acquittal he must not only prove insanity but also the additional fact that at the time of the commission of the act, he was, in consequence of the insanity, incapable of knowing the nature of the act or that what he was doing was either wrong or contrary to law. This principle, adopted by the law, was based on the well known McNaughten case.[6]

A plea of insanity under the Indian Code entitles the defendant to acquittal. As for the burden of proof, the onus on prosecution is to prove guilt beyond a reasonable doubt and it is then for the defendant to establish, by adducing evidence, his defense of insanity. Under section 45 of the Indian Evidence Act 1872,[7] the opinion of an expert will be relevant in determining the question of the insanity of a defendant. Though such an opinion is neither conclusive nor binding on the court, it cannot be brushed aside lightly. The defendant's onus in proving his insanity plea is not as heavy as that of the prosecution to prove guilt since the burden is light and no more than the requirement in civil matters of proving the probabilities of the insanity. For onus of proof the Supreme Court of India in the case of Bhikari v. The State of Uttar Pradesh [8] observed as follows:

"The burden of proving an offence is always on the prosecution; it never shifts. Intention, when it is an essential ingredient of an offence, has also to be established by the prosecution. But the state of mind of a person can ordinarily only be inferred from circumstances. For example, if a person deliberately strikes another with a deadly weapon, which according to the common experience of mankind is likely to cause an injury and sometimes even a fatal injury depending upon the nature of the weapon and the part of the body on which it is struck, it would be reasonable to infer that what the accused did was accompanied by the intention to cause a kind of injury which in fact resulted from the act. In such a case the prosecution must be deemed to have discharged the burden resting upon it to establish an essential ingredient of the offence, namely the intention of the accused inflicting a blow with a deadly weapon.

"Section 84, Penal Code, can be invoked by the accused for nullifying the evidence produced by the prosecution. This he can do by establishing that he was at the relevant time incapable of knowing the nature of the act or that what he was doing was either wrong or contrary to law. The prosecution need not establish that a person who strikes another with a deadly weapon was incapable of knowing the nature of the act or of knowing that what he was doing was either wrong or contrary to law. Every person is presumed to know the natural consequences of his act. Similarly every person is also presumed to know the law. The prosecution has not to establish these facts. It is for this reason that S. 105 of the Evidence Act places upon the accused person the burden of proving the exception relied upon by him."

As is evident from reasoning in the aforesaid decision, the Court does not attempt to prove the defense of the defendant by calling a psychiatrist on its own for an examination. It is not for the courts to assist the defendant or make up for his deficiencies in ascertaining the plea of insanity by calling its own witnesses.

6. The law with regard to intoxication as a defense, though not similarly worded as section 503 of the proposed draft is included in section 84 of the Indian Penal Code. Section 502 of the proposed code corresponds to section 85 read with 86 of the Indian Penal Code.

[6] 4 State Trials (N.S.) 847 (Central Criminal Court 1843).
[7] IV India Code, Government of India, Ministry of Law, Delhi, 1965.
[8] 72 India Crim. L.J.R. 63, 65 (1965).

Under the Indian law, voluntarily getting intoxicated and then committing a crime would be no defense to criminal conduct. However, where such voluntary intoxication created a failure of the mind to discriminate between lawful conduct and criminal conduct, intoxication even though voluntary would operate as a defense of insanity provided the moment of insanity coincided with actual criminality. In certain cases drunkenness produces a frenzy of madness and it is then only when the mind gets diseased (as in the case of most habitual addicts) that drunkenness affords the defense of insanity.

Sections 85 and 86 crystallize the law relating to intoxication or drunkenness as a defense or plea in mitigation of a criminal offense. Section 85 gives the same protection as section 84 does to a person of unsound mind, who is by reason of intoxication "incapable" of knowing the nature of the act or that he is doing what is either wrong or contrary to law, provided that the thing which intoxicated him was administered without his knowledge or against his will. A person who gets into a state of intoxication voluntarily is, under section 86, presumed to have the same knowledge as he would have had if he had not been intoxicated, when the state of intoxication is such as to make him incapable of knowing the nature of the act or that he is doing what is either wrong or contrary to law, he can only be punished on the basis of knowledge and not for any particular intention.

The foundation of the law in sections 85 and 86 is based on the principle that criminal liability follows criminal intention and that a person who is drunk is in the same predicament as a person temporarily insane. Indeed, such a state has been termed dementia affectata—a form of lunacy in which the functions of the mind are temporarily suspended. But since no man can be permitted to wear the cloak of immunity by getting drunk, the rule justly excludes cases of voluntary drunkenness. But while such drunkenness is never a defense to a crime, it is relevant in determining the question of intention and for that purpose it is permissible to prove as a defense that the prisoner was suffering from a habitual and fixed frenzy brought on by drunkenness.

The Supreme Court of India is summing up the law on the subject in the case of Basdev v. The State of Pepsu [9] observed as follows:

"So far as knowledge is concerned the court must attribute to the intoxicated man the same knowledge as if he was quite sober but so far as intent or intention is concerned, the court must gather it from the attending circumstances of the case paying due regard to the degree of intoxication. If the man was beside his mind altogether for the time being, it would not be possible to fix him with the requisite intention. But if he had not gone so deep in drinking and from the facts it could be found that he knew what he was about the court will apply the rule that a man is presumed to intend the natural consequence of his act or acts."

The rule of law is well settled:

"1. That insanity, whether produced by drunkeness or otherwise, is a defence to the crime charged;

"2. The evidence of drunkenness which renders the accused incapable of forming the specific intent essential to constitute the crime should be taken into consideration with the other facts proved in order to determine whether or not he had this intent;

"3. That evidence of drunkenness falling short of a proved incapacity in the accused to form the intent necessary to constitute the crime, and merely establishing that his mind was affected by drink so that he more readily gave way to some violent passion, does not rebut the presumption that a man intends the natural consequences of his acts."

7. Right of self-defense is known as the right of private defense under the Indian law. The law with regard to the private defense of the body and other persons, and defense of property is contained in sections 96 to 106 of the Indian Penal Code (kindly refer to Xerox copy). Limits of the right are contained in sections 97 and 99; the extent of right in sections 100, 101, 103, 104 and 106; and the commencement and continuance are dealt with by section 105.

The first clause of section 97 provides for the defense of the body, one's own or of any other person, irrespective of any relationship, against any offense affecting the human body. The second clause provides for the defense of property against an act which amounts to the commission of certain offenses involving theft, robbery, mischief or criminal trespass, or attempted theft, robbery, mischief or criminal trespass under the Indian Penal Code. So that in matters of self defense, one may do for himself as he may do for anyone else under similar circumstances. This right is not dependent upon the actual criminality of the person resisted; it depends solely on the wrongful or apparently wrongful character of the act attempted. It is lawful to kill a lunatic who attacks a man, though the lunatic is not punishable for the act under section 98. If the apprehension is real and reasonable, it makes no difference that it is mistaken. It is even lawful under section 106 to run the risk of injuring an innocent person, where that risk is inseparable from the proper exercise of the right of resisting a criminal act.

Section 98 states that for the purpose of exercising the right of self defense, physical or mental capacity of the person against whom the right is exercised is no bar. In other words, the right of defense of the body exists against all attackers—whether with or without mens rea. The two statutory illustrations within the section itself further elaborate the explanation.

Section 99 states two acts against which the right of private defense of the body cannot be exercised. There is no right of private defense of the body:

(a) Against an act which does not reasonably cause the apprehension of death or of grievous hurt if done, or attempted to be done, by (or by the direction of) a public servant acting in good faith under color of his office, though that act (or direction) may not be strictly justifiable by law.

By virtue of explanation 1, such defense will prevail if the person exercising it did not know nor have any reason to believe that the attacker was such a public servant.

The right of private defense will also prevail when the act is done by the direction of a public servant who does not state his authority for so acting, when it is so demanded. This is evident from explanation 2 of the section.

The right of private defense against a public servant can be exercised in the following cases:

(i) when the act of the public servant reasonably causes apprehension of death or grevious hurt;

(ii) when the public servant does not act in good faith under color of his office;

(iii) when the person exercising the right does not know or have any reason to believe that the attacker is a public servant or acts by the direction of a public servant.

(b) There is no right of private defense of the body in cases in which there is time to have recourse to the protection of the public authorities.

Section 99 then proceeds to prescribe the extent to which the right of private defense of the body may be exercised. It says:

"The right of private defence of the body in no case extends to the inflicting of more harm than it is necessary to inflict for the purpose of defence."

Thus, the measure of the right of private defense of the body must be judged in proportion to the force used by the attacker. In the case of Mammun & others v. Emperor[10] the defendants, five in number, went out on a moonlit night armed with clubs and assaulted a man who was cutting rice in their field in such a manner that he received six distinct wounds and he died on the spot. The defendants pleaded the right of private defense and defense of property. It was held that the defendants failed in their duty to have recourse to the protection of public authorities when there was time for the same and moreover the force used by the defendants was disproportionate to the force necessary to counter the attack.

Section 102 says the right begins as soon as a reasonable apprehension of danger to the body arises from an attempt or threat to commit the offense, though the offense may not have been committed. The right continues so long as such apprehension of danger to the body continues.

Section 100 gives the extent to which the right of private defense of the body can be extended to the causing of the death of the assailant. There are seven situations when the defendant has a right to cause the death of the assailant. They are: When the assailant causes reasonable apprehension of (i) death; (ii) grievous hurt; (iii) rape; (iv) unnatural offense; (v) kidnapping; (vi) abduction; or (vii) wrongful confinement.

Any harm short of death can be inflicted in exercising the right of private defense in any case which does not fall in any of the preceding seven situations.

Every person has a right to defend the property (whether movable or immovable) of himself or of any other:

(a) against the offense of theft, robbery, mischief or criminal trespass (section 97).

(b) against the act of a lunatic, a minor, or an intoxicated person, or a person acting under a misconception of fact (section 98).

The limitations to the right of private defense of property are stated in section 99. There are two acts stated in section 99 against which the right of private defense of property cannot be exercised—

(i) Against an act which does not reasonably cause apprehension of death or grievous hurt, if done, or attempted to be done, by (or by the direction of) a public servant acting in good faith under color of his office, though that act (or direction) may not be strictly justifiable by law (section 99).

Such a defense will prevail if the person exercising the right did not know nor had any reason to believe that the assailant was a public servant (explanation 1 to section 99). Such right also exists when the act is done by the direction of public servant who does not state or produce his authority for so acting, after the same has been demanded (explanation 2 to section 99);

(ii) if the defendant had time to have recourse to the intervention of the public authorities (section 99).

Section 99 also describes the limit to which the defendant can go in the right of private defense of property by saying that the right in no case extends to the infliction of more harm than is necessary to inflict for the purposes of defense.

Section 103 enumerates the cases when the right of private defense of property extends to the causing of death in defense of property. Section 104 enumerates cases in which the right extends to the causing of harm other than and short of death. The right commences when a reasonable apprehension of danger to property begins (section 105); and by virtue of the same section the right continues:

(i) In case of theft, till the offender has effected his retreat with the property or either the assistance of the public authorities is obtained or the property is recovered;

(ii) In case of robbery, as long as the offender causes to any person death, or hurt or wrongful restraint, or the fear of instant death, or of instant hurt, or instant personal restraint continues;

(iii) In case of criminal trespass or mischief, as long as the offender continues in the commission;

(iv) In case of housebreaking by night, as long as the house-trespass continues.

A person employed to guard the property of his employer is protected by sections 97, 99, 103 and 105 if he causes death in safe-guarding his employer's property when there is reason to apprehend that the person whose death has been caused was about to commit one of the offenses mentioned in this section or to attempt one of those offenses. A person whose duty it is to guard a public building is in the same position, that is to say, it is his duty to protect the property of his employer and he may take such steps for this purpose as the law permits. The fact that the property to be guarded is public property does not extend the protection given to a guard. Therefore, a police constable on guard duty at a magazine or other public building is not entitled to fire at a person merely because the latter does not answer his challenge.[11]

8. The criminal law does not lay down any classification of offenses based on punishments or otherwise.

Under the Code of Criminal Procedure,[12] which governs criminal trials before the criminal courts, offenses are, under section 4 of that code, described either as cognizable or noncognizable, or bailable and non-bailable. These expressions are defined thus:

[12] III India Code, Delhi, Government of India, Ministry of Law, 1965.

"4. (f) Cognizable offence means an offence for, and cognizable case means a case in which a police-officer, within or without the presidency-towns, may, in accordance with the second schedule or under any law for the time being in force, arrest without warrant;

"(n) Non-cognizable offence means an offence for, and non-cognizable case means a case in. which a police-officer, within or without a presidency-town, may not arrest without warrant."

In a cognizable case, the police officer can take cognizance without a warrant. He can also investigate and search without an order of the Magistrate's court.

"4. (b) Bailable offence means an offence shown as bailable in the second schedule, or which is made bailable by any other law for the time being in force; and non-bailable offence means any other offence."

9. The law of punishments under the criminal law is contained in chapter V (sections 53 to 75) of the Indian Penal Code. There are four kinds of punishments prescribed by law: (1) Sentence of death; (2) Sentence of imprisonment; (3) forfeiture of property; and (4) fines.

(1) Sentence of death may be awarded in any of seven offenses: waging or attempting to wage war or abetting waging of war against the Government of India (section 121); abetting of mutiny, if mutiny is committed in consequence thereof (section 132); murder (section 302); abetment of suicide of child or insane person (section 305); dacoity (robbery) with murder (section 396); and attempt to murder (section 307).

(2) Sections 55, 60 and 73 to 74 describe three types of imprisonment, namely rigorous, i.e., with hard work, simple and solitary. The first two are most commonly awarded. The maximum sentence that can be awarded is 14 years under section 55 and the minimum would be a day's imprisonment.

Solitary imprisonment under sections 73 and 74 are rarely inflicted since they cause mental derangement, and limits have thus been placed for imposing such a sentence. The limitations are that: (i) It can be inflicted for offenses which are punishable with rigorous imprisonment only; (ii) the total number of months of solitary confinement cannot exceed a total of three months. These three months cannot be served all at one time; (iii) it shall not exceed one month where the term of imprisonment is six months, etc.

(3) Forfeiture of property is one of the punishments inflicted for the offenses of—(i) committing depredation on territories of any power at peace with the State (section 126); knowingly receiving property taken as above-mentioned or in waging war against any Asiatic Power at peace with the State (section 127); improperly purchasing property which, by virtue of his office, a pubic servant is legally prohibited from purchasing (section 169).

(4) Fines are covered in sections 63 to 70. Where no sum is specified, the amount is unlimited but shall not be excessive (section 63). Where a sentence of imprisonment, in addition to a fine is imposed, the sentence of imprisonment that may be ordered to be served in default of the payment of the fine, shall be in addition to the sentence of imprisonment already ordered. The measure of imprisonment that can be awarded in default of the payment of the fine is described in sections 65 to 70. Under sections 65–66, if the offense is punishable with imprisonment as well as a fine, then the imprisonment in default of the fine shall not exceed one-forth of the term of imprisonment that can be awarded for the offense. If the offense charged may be punishable with a fine only, then the scale of imprisonment in default of payment of the fine is as follows: (i) 2 months when the fine is up to Rs. 50; (ii) 4 months when the fine is up to Rs. 100; (iii) any term not exceeding 6 months in any other case (section 67).

If the fine is paid during the time when imprisonment in default of the fine is being served, sections 68 and 69 state that such imprisonment shall terminate on payment of the fine. Section 70 declares that the fine or any part of it which is unpaid may be realized within six years of the passing of the sentence.

Suspension of execution of the sentence is provided in section 382 whereby execution of a capital sentence on pregnant women is postponed. Section 388 provides for suspension of execution of the sentence of imprisonment when punishment is in the form of a fine only; and section 401 deals with the power of the appropriate government to suspend the execution of the sentence of imprisonment or remit such sentence conditionally or unconditionally. A Xerox copy of the aforesaid sections of the Criminal Procedure Code is attached for reference.

Apart from section 401 of the Code of Criminal Procedure [13] there is no law of parole in India. However, to mitigate the rigors and penalties of criminal law, particularly in respect to its application to youthful and juvenile offenders, the Central Government of India enacted the Probation of Offenders Act, 1958.[14] In the case of probation, a convict can be released by the court conditionally or unconditionally under supervision of the Probation Officer appointed under section 13 of the Act. A Xerox copy of the Act is enclosed.

Section 75 deals with enhanced punishment for a subsequent offense. By virtue of this section hardened criminals, who have no respect for law and are incorrigible, are given long term sentences of imprisonment, in the hope that society will have long periods of relief by such long internments of these convicts. The section in effect states that an offender already convicted by a Court, of an offense against coin, stamp or property, punishable with three years or more, on a subsequent conviction of any such offense, is liable to imprisonment up to 10 years or imprisonment for life. (Refer to the attached Xerox copy.)

There is no section parallel to section 3007 of the proposed code in the Indian law. However, the expression "person" defined in the Indian Penal Code (section 11) states "the word 'person' includes any Company or Association, or body of persons, whether incorporated or not." Regarding conviction and proceedings against a company, the Court in the case of Anath Bandhu Samanta v. Corporation of Calcutta [15] observed as follows:

"In a case of conviction under s. 497 read with s. 488 of the Calcutta Municipal Act and a sentence of a fine of Rupees five hundred only, of a person as a proprietor of a limited liability company, dealing with adulterated mustard oil, against which a complaint was also filed, the contention was that there could not be a proprietor of such a company and the person in charge of the said company should have been proceeded against, the question for decision arose whether under the Indian law a limited liability company could be proceeded against under the Criminal law or whether the person in charge of the said company is to be charged with the abetment of the substantive offence by the company.

"Held, If there is anything in the definition or content of a particular section in the statute, which will prevent the application of the section to a limited company, certainly a limited company cannot be proceeded against.

"Under the Indian Penal Code, where it is physically impossible for a limited company to commit offences or where "Mens rea" is essential or where the only punishment is imprisonment the limited company cannot be proceeded against.

"There is nothing in the Indian law which precludes the trial of a limited company where it is possible. The expression committed for trial has got different meanings under the English and Indian laws.

"In England according to the explanation under the Interpretation Act 1889 (52 and 53 Vic. C. 63) committed for trial in relation to a person, shall, unless the contrary intention appears, mean, committed to prison with a view to being tried before a judge or jury.

"But in the Indian law, there is no such definition as committed for trial. So the words committed for trial or being prosecuted do not mean being actually detained in prison.

"The reasons given in English decisions, therefore, so not apply to the trial of a case of a limited company in India."

The Indian law has no equivalent to the proposed section 3003—Persistent Misdemeanant.

Regarding the giving of reasons in a judgment, it is a mandatory provision of law that the court must deal with each point of difference, i.e., issue and consider the evidence and give conclusions with reasons thereof. Section 367 of the Code of Criminal Procedure [16] reads as follows:

"367. (1) Every such judgment shall, except as otherwise expressly provided by this Code, be written by the presiding officer of the Court [or from the dictation of such presiding officer] in the language of the Court, or in English; and shall contain the point or points for determination, the decision thereon and the reasons for the decision; and shall be dated and signed by the presiding officer in open Court at the time of pronouncing it [and where it is not written by the presiding officer with his own hand, every page of such judgment shall be signed by him].

"(2) It shall specify the offence (if any) of which, and the section of the Indian Penal Code or other law under which, the accused is convicted, and the punishment to which he is sentenced."

Sentence forms part of the judgment and the reasons given in the judgment will apply to the sentence as well. However, there is no particular section enjoining on a judge giving reasons for the quantum of sentence inflicted. Conventionally, however, the judges do explain, by reasoning, their exercise of discretion for the quantum of sentence.

Higher courts in India have powers under sections 435 and 439 of the Code of Criminal Procedure [17] to revise sentences and enhance them. The sections read as follows:

"435. (1) The High Court or any Sessions Judge or District Magistrate, or any Sub-divisional Magistrate empowered by the State Government in this behalf, may call for and examine the record of any proceeding before any inferior Criminal Court situate within the local limits of its or his jurisdiction for the purpose of satisfying itself or himself as to the correctness, legality or propriety of any finding, sentence or order recorded or passed, and as to the regularity of any proceedings of such inferior Court [and may, when calling for such record, direct that the execution of any sentence [or order] be suspended and, if the accused is in confinement, that he be released on bail or on his own bond pending the examination of the record.

"Explanation.—All Magistrates, whether exercising original or appellate jurisdiction, shall be deemed to be inferior to the Sessions Judge for the purposes of this subsection and of section 437.]

"(2) If any Sub-divisional Magistrate acting under sub-section (1) considers that any such finding, sentence or order is illegal or improper, or that any such proceedings are irregular, he shall forward the record, with such remarks thereon as he thinks fit, to the District Magistrate.

"(4) If an application under this section has been made either to the Sessions Judge or District Magistrate, no further application shall be entertained by the other of them.

"439. (1) In the case of any proceeding the record of which has been called for by itself or which has been reported for orders, or which otherwise comes to its knowledge, the High Court may, in its decretion, exercise any of the powers conferred on a Court of appeal by sections 423, 426, 427 and 428 or on a Court by section 338, and may enhance the sentence; and, when the Judges composing the Court of revision are equally divided in opinion, the case shall be disposed of in manner provided in section 429.

"(2) No order under this section shall be made to the prejudice of the accused unless he has had an opportunity of being heard either personally or by pleader in his own defence."

So that the court's powers in revision and appeal enable it to enhance a sentence. The power of the court in appeal is contained in section 423 fo the Code of Criminal Procedure [18] which reads as follows:

"423. Powers of Appellate Court in disposing of appeal. (1) The Appellate Court shall then send for the record of the case, if such record is not already in Court. After perusing such record, and hearing the appellant or his pleader, if he appears, and the Public Prosecutor, if he appears, and, in case of an appeal under [section 411A, sub-section (2), or section 417], the accused, if he appears, the Court may, if it considers that there is no sufficient ground for interfering, dismiss the appeal, or may—(a) in an appeal from an order of acquittal, reverse such order and direct that further inquiry be made, or that the accused be retried or committed for trial, as the case may be, or find him guilty and pass sentence on him according to law; (b) in an appeal from a conviction, (1) reverse the finding and sentence, and acquit or discharge the accused, or order him to be retried by a Court of competent jurisdiction subordinate to such Appellate Court or committed for trial, or (2) alter the finding, maintaining the sentence, or, with or without altering the finding, reduce the sentence, or, (3) with or without such reduction and with or without altering the finding, alter the nature of the sentence but, subject to the provisions of section 106, sub-section (3), not so as to enhance the same;

"[(1A) Where an appeal from a conviction lies to the High Court, it may enhance the sentence, notwithstanding anything inconsistent herewith contained in clause (b) of subsection (1) : * * *]"

The Indian criminal law follows the system of concurrent or consecutive sentences and not joint sentences. Section 35 of the Code of Criminal Procedure [19] relevant for the purpose reads as follows:

"35. Sentence in cases of conviction of several offences at one trial. (1) [When a person is convicted at one trial of two or more offences, the Court may, subject to the provisions of section 71 of the Indian Penal Code,] sentence him, for such offences, to the several punishments prescribed therefor which such Court is competent to inflict; such punishments, when consisting of imprisonment to commence the one after the expiration of the other in such order as the Court may direct, unless the Court directs that such punishments shall run concurrently."

Consequently the sentences, in the absence of an order that they shall run concurrently, shall be deemed to run consecutively.

The courts at the time of passing a sentence of fine only, or a sentence of imprisonment and fine, order that in case of non-payment of the fine, an additional sentence in lieu of or in default of payment of fine, shall be served.

10. Sections 76 and 79 (refer to attached Xerox copies) of the Indian Penal Code lay down that mistake of fact is sometimes a good defense. However, it must be mistake of fact and not of law. Section 76 therefore says that nothing is an offense which is done by a person who, owing to a mistake of fact and not a mistake of law, in good faith, believes himself to be bound by law to do that act. Under the Indian law, mistake of law is no defense. Everybody is bound to know the law of the land.

Although mistake of fact is a defense, it is no defense if the act itself is illegal. One cannot do an illegal act and then plead ignorance of a fact.

Illustration.—If, while intending to kill A, I kill B by mistake, the plea of mistake of fact cannot apply to me because the act itself is illegal and cannot be pleaded as a defense (section 76).

Whereas under section 76, a defendant has a good defense of mistake of fact if, in the commission of the act which was initially lawful, he is a person bound by law to do that act; under section 79, however, a defendant is protected if he, in good faith, believed himself to be justified by law in doing that act. (See illustration with the attached Xerox copy.)

11. There is no such jurisdictional separation, as suggested in the proposed code. The matter of jurisdiction and trial of defendants and others for crimes is governed by chapter XV of the Code of Criminal Procedure [20] and a Xerox copy of the same is enclosed for easy reference. The offenses are triable by the machinery of courts established under the jurisdiction of each State and the Central Government of India has no separate criminal court to try other offenses. The place of trial and jurisdiction of a court is to be found by a reference to this chapter of the Code of Criminal Procedure. As it may be found, the usual rule is to try an offense at a place where the offense was committed.

12. Sections 3 and 4 of the Indian Penal Code, read with section 188, indicate the extra-territorial operaton of the code.

The words of this section postulate the existence of a law that an act constituting an offense in India shall also be an offense when committed outside India. This section, as held in the case of Haider v. Issa Syed,[21] is operative only so far as offenses punishable under the Penal Code are concerned, since the explanation in section 4 also indicates that the word "offense" included every act, which, if committed in India, would be punishable under this Code.

[19] III India Code, Delhi, Government of India, Ministry of Law, 1965.
[20] III India Code, Delhi, Government of India, Ministry of Law, 1965.
[21] [1938] India Crim. L.J.R. 651 (1937).

Section 4 lays down that where an offense is committed beyond the limits of India but the offender is found within its limits, then:

(i) he may be given up for trial in the country where the offense was committed (extradition), or

(ii) he may be tried in India (extra-territorial jurisdiction). Section 188 gives the jurisdiction to the court for the trial of the offense.

13. The law of criminal conspiracy is contained in sections 120-A and 120-B of the Indian Penal Code (refer to attached Xerox copy). Definition of the offense of criminal conspiracy is given in section 120-A and it says that to constitute an offense under it, there must be an agreement between two or more persons to do an act which is illegal or which is to be done by illegal means. Punishment for the offense is given in section 120-B. In this section, a distinction is drawn between an agreement to commit an offense, and an agreement of which either the object or the methods employed are illegal but do not constitute an offense. In the case of the former, the criminal conspiracy is completed by the act of agreement; in the case of the latter, there must be some act done by one or more of the parties to the agreement to effect the object thereof, that is, there must be an overt act.

14. The offense of murder or culpable homicide amounting to murder is described in section 300. Section 302 of the Indian Code provides the punishment for the offense (refer to attached Xerox copy). The definition requires that to constitute the offense of murder, the act which causes death should be done intentionally, or with the knowledge or means of knowing that death is a natural consequence of the act. An offense cannot amount to murder unless it falls with the definition of culpable homicide, and this section points out the cases in which culpable homicide is murder. But an offense may amount of culpable homicide without amounting to murder.

It does not follow that a case of culpable homicide is murder, because it does not fall within any of the exceptions to section 300. To render culpable homicide murder the case must come within the provisions of clauses 1, 2, 3, or 4 of section 300.

This section states that culpable homicide is murder if the act by which the death is caused is done: (1) With the intention of causing death; or (2) with the intention of causing such bodily injury as the offender knows to be likely to cause the death of the person to whom the harm is caused; or (3) with the intention of causing bodily injury to any person and bodily injury intended to be inflicted is sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death; or if the person committing the act knows that it is so imminently dangerous that it must, in all probability, cause death or such bodily injury as is likely to cause death, and commits such act without any excuse for incurring the risk thereof.

So that murder includes culpable homicide but all culpable homicide is not murder. Culpable homicide will become murder under the circumstances mentioned in the aforesaid cases. Statutory illustrations in the section itself will further exemplify.

Section 300 then proceeds to give five different circumstances under which the offense of murder is reduced to that of culpable homicide not amounting to murder. Of course, these are five defenses which an accused person has to prove if he is charged with the offense of murder. They are not exactly defenses, but they are in the nature of extenuating circumstances, which will reduce the offense of murder to that of culpable homicide not amounting to murder. As described herein before, the real defenses, to any charge under the Indian Penal Code are laid down in the general exceptions like insanity, etc., in Chapter IV.

The circumstances which reduce the offense of murder to that of culpable homicide not amounting to murder are:

(1) provocation;

(2) right of private defense;

(3) public servant exceeding his powers;

(4) sudden fight, and

(5) consent.

If the defendant proves any one of these five circumstances he will not be entitled to an acquittal. He will only be guilty of culpable homicide not amounting to murder, a lesser offense.

15. The first part of the question does not apply since all offenses in India are triable by courts established by the State Governments. The Central Government of India (federal in nature) does not control prosecution and exercises no exclusive jurisdiction over crimes, as suggested in the first part of the question.

As for the second part relating to Rioting, for a comparison, refer to the Xerox copy of sections 107, 141-143, 146 and 147 of the Indian Penal Code.

As the definition in section 146 suggests, riot is an unlawful assembly in a particular state of activity, which activity is accompanied by the use of force or violence. Since the use of force or violence allegedly is by an unlawful assembly, a reference to section 141 would be useful as the same defines the "unlawful assembly." Therefore, construing section 146 and 141 together, a riot implies the use of force or violence by five or more persons if their common object was:

(1) To overthrow by criminal force: (a) The Central Government, or (b) The State Government, or (c) The Legislature, or (d) any public servant in the exercise of lawful power.

(2) To resist the execution of law or legal process.

(3) To commit mischief, criminal trespass, or any other offense.

(4) By criminal force: (a) To take or obtain possesion of any property, or (b) To deprive any person of any incorporeal right, or (c) to enforce any right or supposed right.

(5) By criminal force to compel any person: (a) To do what he is not legally bound to do, or (b) to omit what he is legally entitled to do.

A riot therefore must be preceded by the formation of an unlawful assembly with an unlawful purpose as defined in section 141 and the assembly must use force. It is the use of force that distinguishes unlawful assembly from a riot. If the assembly which is allegedly unlawful does not have an object as provided in section 141, even its use of force would not constitute a riot.

When anyone is found to induce people to riot, it is usual to associate section 107 in the offense and charge him under the offense of abetment, which includes inducement and incitement.

16. There is no offense under the head "para-military activities" in the Indian Penal Code. However, since the offense suggested is against the State, it is assumed that section 122 of the Indian Penal Code will come nearest to it. (Refer to attached Xerox copy.)

Under this section even preparation to wage war with an intention of either waging war or being prepared to wage war against the State constitutes an offense. Under the Indian criminal law, it is the commission of an offense or an attempt to commit an offense which is chargeable. In this case, however, even preparation for the offense, under section 122, is penal. This is intended to put down with a heavy hand any preparation to wage war against the State.

17. Sections 274, 275 and 276 deal with the offenses for adulteration, sale of adulterated drugs and sale of drugs as a different drug, respectively, On comparison, it may be found that there was not much similarity between the aforesaid sections and sections 1821-1829 of the proposed criminal code. This may be due to the fact that the legislators in India did not foresee the present situation.

Section 274 is enacted to preserve the purity of drugs sold for medicinal purposes. To support a conviction under this section, it is sufficient to show that the efficacy of a drug is lessened; it need not necessarily become noxious to life. Section 275 prohibits selling, or offering, or exposing for sale, or issuing from any dispensary, an adulterated drug as unadulterated. Under section 276, however, a chemist is chargeable for an offense if he sells a drug which in fact it does not purport to be.

Causing miscarriage (or abortion) of a women is dealt with in sections 312, 313 and 314 of the Indian Penal Code.

When the consent of the woman is not given the offense comes under section 313; and if consent of the woman is given, the offense falls under section 312.

The elements essential to be established for completion of the offense are: (i) Voluntarily causing a woman with child to miscarry; (ii) such miscarriage should not have been caused in good faith for the purpose of saving the life of the woman.

Section 314 provides for the case where death of the woman has occurred in causing miscarriage. A person who does an act, with the intention of thereby preventing that child from being born alive or causing it to die after its birth, would be punishable under section 315.

Gambling, as such, under the Penal Code does not exist as a separate offense. However, since gambling, at times causes inconvenience and annoyance to the public at large, it is dealt with under the offense of Public Nuisance section (268). Under this section, any act or illegal omission which causes injury or annoyance to the public has to be dealt with as public nuisance. Gambling (or sometimes in vernacular form "satta") in a public place is treated under section 268. In the case of Hapoor Mal v. Emperor,[22] defendants, while gambling created an obstruction in the public way and were convicted under section 290. Some of the other High Courts have, however, held that gambling is not such an offense as is defined in this section. In fact, as a result of the confusion, some of the State Governments in India have promulgated gambling acts separately.

The law against prostitution is contained in sections 372 and 373 of the Indian Penal Code. These sections together punish both the giver as well as the receiver of a person, under eighteen years, for an immoral purpose. Both the sections relate to the same subject-matter. The former contemplates an offense committed by the person who sells, lets to hire, or otherwise disposes of any person under the age of eighteen years, with the requisite intent or knowledge. The first section charges any defendant who sells a person under the age of eighteen and the latter charges any one who buys such a person.

Section 372 requires: (1) Selling, or letting to hire, or other disposal of person; (2) Such person should be under the age of eighteen years; (3) The selling, letting to hire, or other disposal must be with intent or knowledge or likelihood that the person shall at any age be employed or used for, (i) prostitution, or (ii) illicit intercourse with any person, or (iii) any unlawful and immoral purpose.

This section applies to males or females under eighteen years of age. It applies to a married or an unmarried female, even where such female, prior to sale or purchase, was leading an immoral life.

Section 373 deals with the sale of such a person while the subject matter remains the same as described in the preceding section.

Section 294 defines and provides punishment for the offense of obscenity providing that any annoyance caused to others by an act or word in a public place shall constitute the offense of obscenity.

Homosexuality under the Indian criminal law is termed as an unnatural offense contained in section 377. It is meant to punish the offense of sodomy and bestiality. The offense consists in a carnal knowledge committed against the order of nature by a person with a man, or in the same unnatural manner with a woman, or by a man or woman in any manner with an animal.

18. There are no provisions in the Indian Penal Code analogous to those contained in sections 1811-1814 of the proposed code. For security purposes, however, the Central Government of India has enacted the Arms Act 1959.[23]

This comprehensive legislation, as its preamble states its purpose as to consolidate and amend the law relating to the arms and ammunition, controls the possession, acquisition, sale and production of arms and ammunition. Under this law, any one found in possession of arms without a license, etc., shall be charged and punished. Since the Act is long extending to 46 sections, a Xerox copy if it is attached. Section 25, which is the penal section, declares penalties for possession, carrying, importing and manufacturing of arms and ammunition in contravention of the provisions of the Arms Act 1959. A licensed dealer is required to maintain, further under this law, a strict record of his dealings of sale and purchase of the arms, etc., which is subject to inspection by the authorities. Non-compliance of this section is also declared an offense.

19. The penalty of capital punishment was dealt with in the answer to question 9.

There is no provision in the Code of Criminal Procedure warranting a separate hearing for the infliction of capital punishment, and it would seem superfluous in the absence of a jury trial.

20. The analogous law, relating to the multiple related offenses, is dealt with under the heading "joinder of charges" in sections 233 to 240 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.[24] A Xerox copy is attached.

Section 233 states that every defendant should be separately charged and separately tried for every distinct offense. The object of this section is to see that the defendant is not bewildered in his defense by having to meet several charges in no way connected with one another. The illustration to this section elaborates the same point.

Sections 234 and 235 would seem to be exceptions to the rule enunciated in section 233, inasmuch as these sections postulate trial of several offenses at one time. The object of these sections is to avoid the necessity of the same witnesses giving the same evidence two or three times over in different trials and to join in one trial those offenses with regard to which the evidence would overlap. Section 234 limits the trial to three offenses and not three charges nor does it imply that the prisoner cannot be charged and tried separately in one day for more than three distinct offenses of the same kind committed during the year. The question of applicability of section 235 arises only where separate offenses, that is, offenses of a different nature, may form part of the same transaction and not where the question of different offenses of the same nature is under consideration. Sub-section (1) of section 235 and section 236 are mutually exclusive and if a case is governed by one of them, it cannot be governed by the other.

Sections 236 and 237 state that a defendant cannot be charged with one offense and convicted for another. The basis is that, when there is no difficulty about the facts and it is alleged that the defendant has done a single act or series of acts but they are of such a nature that it is doubtful which of the several offenses the defendant has committed on those facts, he may be convicted for an offense different from that one for which he was charged. Section 238 states that when a defendant has been charged for a serious offense but the facts proved constitute a minor offense, he may be convicted of the latter even though not charged for the same. Section 239 deals with the defendants who can be tried together.

The basic principle of English law "autrefois acquit and autrefois convict" is contained in section 403 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.[25] A Xerox copy is attached. The principle rests upon the rule of common law that a man may not be put twice in peril for the same offense In view of the provisions of this section, a defendant, who was once tried and convicted or acquitted by a court of competent jurisdiction, shall not, while the conviction or acquittal holds good, be tried again for the same or a different charge on the same facts (in case a charge for a different offense could have been brought earlier but was not brought). Sub-sections (2), (3), (4) and (5) are exceptions to this rule.

Under the Indian criminal law, there is no separate federal and state jurisdiction.

PART VI. PROCEEDINGS IN PROSECUTIONS

Chapter XV. Of the Jurisdiction of the Criminal Courts in Inquiries and Trials

A.—Place of inquiry or trial

177. Every offence shall ordinarily be inquired into and tried by a Court within the local limits of whose jurisdiction it was committed.

178. Notwithstanding anything contained in section 177, the State Government may direct that any cases or class of cases committed for trial in any district may be tried in any sessions division:

Provided, That such direction is not repugnant to any direction previously issued by the High Court under section 15 of the Indian High Courts Act, 1861,[1] [or section 107 of the Government of India Act, 1915],[2] [or section 224 of the Government of India Act, 1935],[3] [or Article 227 of the Constitution] or under this Code, section 526.

179. When a person is accused of the commission of any offence by reason of anything which has been done, and of any consequence which has ensued, such offence may be inquired into or tried by a Court within the local limits of whose jurisdiction any such thing has been done, or any such consequence has ensued.

(a) A is wounded within the local limits of the jurisdiction of Court X, and dies within the local limits of the jurisdiction of Court Z. The offence of the culpable homicide of A may be inquired into or tried either by X or Z.

(b) A is wounded within the local limits of the jurisdiction of Court X, and is, during ten days within the local limits of the jurisdiction of Court Y, and during ten days more within the local limits of the jurisdiction of Court Z, unable in the local limits of the jurisdiction of either Court Y or Court Z to follow his ordinary pursuits. The offence of causing grievous hurt to A may be inquired into or tried by X, Y or Z.

(c) A is put in fear of injury within the local limits of the jurisdiction of Court X, and is thereby induced, within the local limits of the jurisdiction of Court Y, to deliver property to the person who put him in fear. The offence of extortion committed on A may be inquired into or tried either by X or Y.

(d) A is wounded in[4] [the State of[5] [Madras]], and dies of his wounds in Poona. The offence of causing A's death may be inquired into and tried in Poona.

180. When an act is an offence by reason of its relation to any other act which is also an offence or which would be an offence if the doer were capable of committing an offence, a charge of the first-mentioned offence may be inquired into or tried by a Court within the local limits of whose jurisdiction either act was done.

Illustrations

(a) A charge of abetment may be inquired into or tried either by the Court within the local limits of whose jurisdiction the abetment was committed, or by the Court within the local limits of whose jurisdiction the offence abetted was committed.

(b) A charge of receiving or retaining stolen goods may be inquired into or tried either by the Court within the local limits of whose jurisdiction the goods were stolen, or by any Court within the local limits of whose jurisdiction any of them were at any time dishonestly received or retained.

(c) A charge of wrongfully concealing a person known to have been kidnapped may be inquired into or tried by the Court within the local limits of whose jurisdiction the wrongful concealing, or by the Court within the local limits of whose jurisdiction the kidnapping, took place.

181. (1) The offence of being a thug, of being a thug and committing murder, of dacoity, of dacoity with murder, of having belonged to a gang of dacoits, or of having escaped from custody, may be inquired into or tried by a Court within the local limits of whose jurisdiction the person charged is.

(2) The offence of criminal misappropriation or of criminal breach of trust may be inquired into or tried by a Court within the local limits of whose jurisdiction any part of the property which is the subject of the offence was received or retained by the accused person, or the offence was committed.

[(3)[6] The offence of theft, or any offence which includes theft or the possession of stolen property, may be inquired into or tried by a Court within the local limits of whose jurisdiction such offence was committed or the property stolen was possessed by the thief or by any person who received or retained the same knowing or having reason to believe it to be stolen.]

(4) The offence of kidnapping or abduction may be inquired into or tried by a Court within the local limits of whose jurisdiction the person kidnapped or abducted was kidnapped or abducted or was conveyed or concealed or detained.

182. When it is uncertain in which of several local areas an offence was committed, or where an offence is committed partly in one local area and partly in another, or where an offence is a continuing one, and continues to be committed in more local areas than one, or where it consists of several acts done in different local areas, it may be inquired into or tried by a Court having jurisdiction over any of such local areas.

183. An offence committed whilst the offender is in the course of performing a journey or voyage may be inquired into or tried by a Court through or into the local limits of whose jurisdiction the offender, or the person against whom, or the thing in respect of which, the offence was committed, passed in the course of that journey or voyage.

184. All offences against the provisions of any law for the time being in force relating to Railways,[1] Telegraphs,[2] the Post-office[3] or Arms and Ammunition[4] may be inquired into or tried in a presidency-town, whether the offence is stated to have been committed within such town or not:

Provided that the offender and all the witnesses necessary for his prosecution are to be found within such town.

[185.[5] (1) Whenever a question arises as to which of two or more Courts subordinate to the same High Court ought to inquire into or try any offence, it shall be decided by that High Court.

(2) Where two or more Courts not subordinate to the same High Court have taken cognizance of the same offence, the High Court within the local limits of whose appellate criminal jurisdiction the proceedings were first commenced may direct the trial of such offender to be held in any Court subordinate to it, and if it so decides all other proceedings against such person in respect of such offence shall be discontinued. If such High Court, upon the matter having been brought to its notice, does not so decide, any other High Court, within the local limits of whose appellate criminal jurisdiction such proceedings are pending may give a like direction, and upon its so doing all other such proceedings shall be discontinued.]

186. (1) When a Presidency Magistrate, a District Magistrate, a Sub-divisional Magistrate, or, if he is specially empowered in this behalf by the State Government, a Magistrate of the first class, sees reason to believe that any person within the local limits of his jurisdiction has committed without such limits (whether within or without[6] [India]) an offence which cannot, under the provisions of sections 177 to 184 (both inclusive), or any other law for the time being in force, be inquired into or tried within such local limits, but is under some law for the time being in force triable in[6] [India], such Magistrate may inquire into the offence as if it had been committed within such local limits and compel such person in manner hereinbefore provided to appear before him, and send such person to the Magistrate having jurisdiction to inquire into or try such offence, or, if such offence is bailable, take a bond with or without sureties for his appearance before such Magistrate.

(2) When there are more Magistrates than one having such jurisdiction and the Magistrate acting under this section cannot satisfy himself as to the Magistrate to or before whom such person should be sent or bound to appear, the case shall be reported for the orders of the High Court.

187. (1) If the person has been arrested under a warrant issued under section 186 by a Magistrate other than a Presidency Magistrate or District Magistrate, such Magistrate shall send the person arrested to the District or Sub-divisional Magistrate to whom he is subordinate, unless the Magistrate having jurisdiction to inquire into or try such offence issues his warrant for the arrest of such person, in which case the person arrested shall be delivered to the police-officer executing such warrant or shall be sent to the Magistrate by whom such warrant was issued.

(2) If the offence which the person arrested is alleged or suspected to have committed is one which may be inquired into or tried by any Criminal Court

188.[1] [When an offence is committed by—(a) any citizen of India in any place without and beyond India; or (b) any person on any ship or aircraft registered in India, wherever it may be]; he may be dealt with in respect of such offence as if it had been committed at any place within[2] [India] at which he may be found:

Provided, That[3] [notwithstanding anything in any of the preceding sections of this Chapter] no charge as to any such offence shall be inquired into in[2] [India] unless the Political Agent, if there is one, for the territory in which the offence is alleged to have been committed, certifies that, in his opinion, the charge ought to be inquired into in[2] [India]; and, where there is no Political Agent, the sanction of the State Government shall be required:

Provided also, That any proceedings taken against any person under this section which would be a bar to subsequent proceedings against such person for the same offence if such offence had been committed in[2] [India] shall be a bar to further proceedings against him under[1] [the Indian Extradition Act, 1903], in respect of the same offence in any territory beyond the limits of[2] [India].

189. Whenever any such offence as is referred to in section 188 is being inquired into or tried, the State Government may, if it thinks fit, direct that copies of depositions made or exhibits produced before the Political Agent or a judicial officer in or for the territory in which such offence is alleged to have been committed shall be received as evidence by the Court holding such inquiry or trial in any case in which such Court might issue a commission for taking evidence as to the matters to which such depositions or exhibits relate.

B.—Conditions requisite for initiation of proceedings

190. (1) Except as hereinafter provided, any Presidency Magistrate, District Magistrate or Sub-divisional Magistrate, and any other Magistrate specially empowered in this behalf, may take cognizance of any offence—(a) upon receiving a complaint of facts which constitute such offence; [(b)[3] upon a report in writing of such facts made by any police-officer;] (c) upon information received from any person other than a police-officer, or upon his own knowledge or suspicion, that such offence has been committed.

(2) The State Government, or the District Magistrate subject to the general or special orders of the State Government, may empower the case shall not be proceeded with until such sanction is obtained, unless sanction has been already obtained for a prosecution on the same facts as those on which the new or altered charge is founded.

231. Whenever a charge is altered or added to by the Court after the commencement of the trial, the prosecutor and the accused shall be allowed to recall or re-summon, and examine with reference to such alteration or addition, any witness who may have been examined, and also to call any further witness whom the Court may think to be material.

232 (1) If any Appellate Court, or the High Court in the exercise of its powers of revision or of its powers under Chapter XXVII, is of opinion that any person convicted of an offence was misled in his defence by the absence of a charge or by an error in the charge, it shall direct a new trial to be had upon a charge framed in whatever manner it thinks fit.

(2) If the Court is of opinion that the facts of the case are such that no valid charge could be preferred against the accused in respect of the facts proved, it shall quash the conviction.

Joinder of charges

233. For every distinct offence of which any person is accused there shall be a separate charge, and every such charge shall be tried separately, except in the cases mentioned in sections 234, 235, 236, and 239.

Illustration

A is accused of a theft on one occasion, and of causing grievous hurt on another occasion. A must be separately charged and separately tried for the theft and causing grievous hurt.

234. (1) When a person is accused of more offences than one of the same kind committed within the space of twelve months from the first to the last of such offences,[1] [whether in respect of the same person or not], he may be charged with, and tried at one trial for, any number of them not exceeding three.

(2) Offences are of the same kind when they are punishable with the same amount of punishment under the same section of the Indian Penal Code or of any special or local law:

[Provided, That, for the purpose of this section, an offence punishable under section 379 of the Indian Penal Code shall be deemed to be an offence of the same kind as an offence punishable under section 380 of the said Code, and that an offence punishable under any section of the Indian Penal Code, or of any special or local law, shall be deemed to be an offence of the same kind as an attempt to commit such offence, when such an attempt is an offence.] [1]

235. (1) If, in one series of acts so connected together as to form the same transaction, more offences than one are committed by the same person, he may be charged with, and tried at one trial for, every such offence.

(2) If the acts alleged constitute an offence falling within two or more separate definitions of any law in force for the time being by which offences are defined or punished, the person accused of them may be charged with, and tried at one trial for, each of such offences.

(3) If several acts, of which one or more than one would by itself or themselves constitute an offence, constitute when combined a different offence, the person accused of them may be charged with, and tried at one trial for, the offence constituted by such acts when combined, and for any offence constituted by any one, or more of such acts.

(4) Nothing contained in this section shall affect the Indian Penal Code, section 71.

(e) With intent to cause injury to B, A institutes a criminal proceeding against him, knowing that there is no just or lawful ground for such proceeding; and also falsely accuses B of having committed an offence, knowing that there is no just or lawful ground for such charges. A may be separately charged with, and convicted of, two offences under section 211 of the Indian Penal Code.

(f) A, with intent to cause injury to B, falsely accuses him of having committed an offence, knowing that there is no just or lawful ground for such charge. On the trial, A gives false evidence against B, intending thereby to cause B to be convicted of a capital offence. A may be separately charged with, and convicted of, offences under sections 211 and 194 of the Indian Penal Code.

(g) A, with six others, commits the offences of rioting, grievous hurt and assaulting a public servant endeavouring in the discharge of his duty as such to suppress the riot. A may be separately charged with, and convicted of, offences under sections 147, 325 and 152 of the Indian Penal Code.

(h) A threatens B, C and D at the same time with injury to their persons with intent to cause alarm to them. A may be separately charged with, and convicted of, each of the three offences under section 506 of the Indian Penal Code.

The separate charges referred to in Illustrations (a) to (h) respectively may be tried at the same time.

(i) A wrongfully strikes B with a cane. A may be separately charged with, and convicted of, offences under sections 352 and 323 of the Indian Penal Code.

(j) Several stolen sacks of corn are made over to A and B, who know they are stolen property, for the purpose of concealing them. A and B thereupon voluntarily assist each other to conceal the sacks at the bottom of a grain-pit. A and B may be separately charged with, and convicted of, offences under sections 411 and 414 of the Indian Penal Code.

(k) A exposes her child with the knowledge that she is thereby likely to cause its death. The child dies in consequence of such exposure. A may be separately charged with, and convicted of, offences under sections 317 and 304 of the Indian Penal Code.

(l) A dishonestly uses a forged document as genuine evidence, in order to convict B, a public servant, of an offence under section 167 of the Indian Penal Code. A may be separately charged with, and convicted of, offences under sections 471 (read with 466) and 196 of the same Code.

(m) A commits robbery on B, and in doing so voluntarily causes hurt to him. A may be separately charged with, and convicted of, offences under sections, 323, 392 and 394 of the Indian Penal Code.

236. If a single act or series of acts is of such a nature that it is doubtful which of several offences the facts which can be proved will constitute, the accused may be charged with having committed all or any of such offences, and any number of such charges may be tried at once; or he may be charged in the alternative with having committed some one of the said offences.

(a) A is accused of an act which may amount to theft, or receiving stolen property, or criminal breach of trust or cheating. He may be charged with theft, receiving stolen property, criminal breach of trust and cheating, or he may be charged with having committed theft, or receiving stolen property, or criminal breach of trust or cheating.

(b) A states on oath before the Magistrate that he saw B hit C with a club. Before the Sessions Court A states on oath that B never hit C. A may be charged in the alternative and convicted of intentionally giving false evidence, although it cannot be proved which of these contradictory statements was false.

237. (1) If, in the case mentioned in section 236, the accused is charged with one offence, and it appears in evidence that he committed a different offence for which he might have been charged under the provisions of that section, he may be convicted of the offence which he is shown to have committed, although he was not charged with it.[1]

[1] Sub-section (2) was rep. by Act 18 of 1923, s. 63.

Illustration

A is charged with theft. It appears that he committed the offence of criminal breach of trust, or that of receiving stolen goods. He may be convicted of criminal breach of trust or of receiving stolen goods (as the case may be), though he was not charged with such offence.

238. (1) When a person is charged with an offence consisting of several particulars, a combination of some only of which constitutes a complete minor offence, and such combination is proved, but the remaining particulars are not proved, he may be convicted of the minor offence, though he was not charged with it.

(2) When a person is charged with an offence and facts are proved which reduce it to a minor offence, he may be convicted of the minor offence, although he is not charged with it.

[(2A) [1] When a person is charged with an offence, he may be convicted of an attempt to commit such offence although the attempt is not separately charged.]

(3) Nothing in this section shall be deemed to authorise a conviction of any offence referred to in section 198 or section 199 when no complaint has been made as required by that section.

Illustrations

(a) A is charged, under section 407 of the Indian Penal Code, with criminal breach of trust in respect of property entrusted to him as a carrier. It appears that he did commit criminal breach of trust under section 406 in respect of the property, but that it was not entrusted to him as a carrier. He may be convicted of criminal breach of trust under section 406.

(b) A is charged, under section 325 of the Indian Penal Code, with causing grievous hurt. He proves that he acted on grave and sudden provocation. He may be convicted under section 335 of that Code.

[239.[2] The following persons may be charged and tried together, namely:

(a) Persons accused of the same offence committed in the course of the same transaction;

(b) Persons accused of an offence and persons accused of abetment, or of an attempt to commit such offence:

(c) Persons accused of more than one offence of the same kind within the meaning of section 234 committed by them jointly within the period of twelve months;

(d) Persons accused of different offences committed in the course of the same transaction;

(e) Persons accused of an offence which includes theft, extortion, or criminal misappropriation, and persons accused of receiving or retaining, or assisting in the disposal or concealment of, property possession of which is alleged to have been transferred by any such offence committed by the first-named persons, or of abetment of or attempting to commit any such last-named offence;

(f) Persons accused of offences under sections 411 and 414 of the Indian Penal Code or either of those sections in respect of stolen property the possession of which has been transferred by one offence; and

(g) Persons accused of any offence under Chapter XII of the Indian Penal Code relating to counterfeit coin, and persons accused of any other offence under the said Chapter relating to the same coin, or of abetment of or attempting to commit any such offence; and the provisions contained in the former part of this Chapter shall, so far as may be, apply to all such charges.]

240. When a charge containing more heads than one is framed against the same person, and when a conviction has been had on one or more of them, the complainant, or the officer conducting the prosecution, may, with the consent of the Court, withdraw the remaining charge or charges, or the Court of its own accord may stay the inquiry into, or trial of, such charge or charges. Such withdrawal shall have the effect of an acquittal on such charge or charges, unless the conviction be set aside, in which case the said Court (subject to the order of the Court setting aside the conviction) may proceed with the inquiry into or trial of the charge or charges so withdrawn.

[2] Subs. by s. 65, ibid., for the original s. 239.

Chapter XXX. Of Previous Acquittals or Convictions

403. (1) A person who has once been tried by a Court of competent jurisdiction for an offence and convicted or acquitted of such offence shall, while such conviction or acquittal remains in force, not be liable to be tried again for the same offence, nor on the same facts for any other offence for which a different charge from the one made against him might have been made under section 236, or for which he might have been convicted under section 237.

(2) A person acquitted or convicted of any offence may be afterwards tried for any distinct offence for which a separate charge might have been made against him on the former trial under section 235, sub-section (1).

(3) A person convicted of any offence constituted by any act causing consequences which, together with such act constituted a different offence from that of which he was convicted, may be afterwards tried for such last-mentioned offence, if the consequences had not happened, or were not known to the Court to have happened, at the time when he was convicted.

(4) A person acquitted or convicted of any offence constituted by any acts may, notwithstanding such acquittal or conviction, be subsequently charged with, and tried for, any other offence constituted by the same acts which he may have committed if the Court by which he was first tried was not competent to try the offence with which he is subsequently charged.

(5) Nothing in this section shall affect the provisions of section 26 of the General Clauses Act, 1897, or of section 188 of this Code.

Explanation.—The dismissal of a complaint, the stopping of proceedings under section 249, the discharge of the accused or any entry made upon a charge under secton 273, is not an acquittal for the purposes of this section.

Illustrations

(a) A is tried upon a charge of theft as a servant and acquitted. He cannot afterwards, while the acquittal remains in force, be charged with theft as a servant, or, upon the same facts, with theft simply, or with criminal breach of trust.

(b) A is tried upon a charge of murder and acquitted. There is no charge of robbery; but it appears from the facts that A committed robbery at the time when the murder was committed; he may afterwards be charged with, and tried for, robbery.

(c) A is tried for causing grievous hurt and convicted. The person injured afterwards dies. A may be tried again for culpable homicide.

(d) A is charged before the Court of Session and convicted of the culpable homicide of B. A may not afterwards be tried on the same facts for the murder of B.

(e) A is charged by a Magistrate of the first class with, and convicted by him of, voluntarily causing hurt to B. A may not afterwards be tried for voluntarily causing grievous hurt to B on the same facts, unless the case comes within paragraph 3 of the section.

(f) A is charged by a Magistrate of the second class with, and convicted by him of, theft of property from the person of B. A may be subsequently charged with, and tried for, robbery on the same facts.

(g) A, B and C are charged by a Magistrate of the first class with, and convicted by him of, robbing D. A, B and C may afterwards be charged with, and tried for, dacoity on the same facts.

GOVERNMENT OF INDIA, MINISTRY OF LAW, ACTS OF PARLIAMENT, 1958

THE PROBATION OF OFFENDERS ACT, 1958

AN ACT to provide for the release of offenders on probation or after due admonition and for matters connected therewith.

Be it enacted by Parliament in the Ninth Year of the Republic of India as follows:

1. (1) This Act may be called the Probation of Offenders Act, 1958.

(2) It extends to the whole of India except the State of Jammu and Kashmir.

(3) It shall come into force in a State on such date as the State Government may, by notification in the Official Gazette, appoint, and different dates may be appointed for different parts of the State.

2. In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires, (a) "Code" means the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898; (b) "probation officer" means an officer appointed to be a probation officer or recognised as such under section 13; (c) "prescribed" means prescribed by rules made under this Act; (d) words and expressions used but not defined in this Act and defined in the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, shall have the meanings respectively assigned to them in that Code.

3. When any person is found guilty of having committed an offence punishable under section 379 or section 380 or section 381 or section 404 or section 420 of the Indian Penal Code or any offence punishable with imprisonment for not more than two years, or with fine, or with both, under the Indian Penal Code or any other law, and no previous conviction is proved against him and the court by which the person is found guilty is of opinion that having regard to the circumstances of the case including the nature of the offence and the character of the offender, it is expedient so to do, then, notwithstanding anything contained in any other law for the time being in force, the court may, instead of sentencing him to any punishment or releasing him on probation of good conduct under section 4, release him after due admonition.

Explanation.—For the purposes of this section, previous conviction against a person shall include any previous order made against him under this section or section 4.

4. (1) When any person is found guilty of having committed an offence not punishable with death or imprisonment for life and the court by which the person is found guilty is of opinion that, having regard to the circumstances of the case including the nature of the offence and the character of the offender, it is expedient to release him on probation of good conduct, then, notwithstanding anything contained in any other law for the time being in force, the court may, instead of sentencing him at once to any punishment, direct that he be released on his entering into a bond, with or without sureties, to appear and receive sentence when called upon during such period, not exceeding three years, as the court may direct, and in the meantime to keep the peace and be of good behaviour:

Provided, That the court shall not direct such release of an offender unless it is satisfied that the offender or his surety, if any, has a fixed place of abode or regular occupation in the place over which the court exercises jurisdiction or in which the offender is likely to live during the period for which he enters into the bond.

(2) Before making any order under sub-section (1), the court shall take into consideration the report, if any, of the probation officer concerned in relation to the case.

(3) When an order under sub-section (1) is made, the court may if it is of opinion that in the interests of the offender and of the public it is expedient so to do, in addition pass a supervision order directing that the offender shall remain under the supervision of a probation officer named in the order during such period, not being less than one year, as may be specified therein, and may in such supervision order impose such conditions as it deems necessary for due supervision of the offender.

(4) The court making a supervision order under sub-section (3) shall require the offender, before he is released, to enter into a bond, with or without sureties, to observe the conditions specified in such order and such additional conditions with respect to residence, abstention from intoxicants or any other matter as the court may, having regard to the particular circumstances, consider fit to impose for preventing a repetition of the same offence or a commission of other offences by the offender.

(5) The court making a supervision order under sub-section (3) shall explain to the offender the terms and conditions of the order and shall forthwith furnish one copy of the supervision order to each of the offenders, the sureties, if any, and the probation officer concerned.

5. (1) The court directing the release of an offender under section 3 or section 4, may, if it thinks fit, make at the same time a further order directing him to pay—

(a) Such compensation as the court thinks reasonable for loss or injury caused to any person by the commission of the offence; and

(b) Such costs of the proceedings as the court thinks reasonable.

(2) The amount ordered to be paid under sub-section (1) may be recovered as a fine in accordance with the provisions of sections 386 and 387 of the Code.

(3) A civil court trying may suit, arising out of the same matter for which the offender is prosecuted, shall take into account any amount paid or recovered as compensation under sub-section (1) in awarding damages.

6. (1) When any person under twenty-one years of age is found guilty of having committed an offence punishable with imprisonment (but not with imprisonment for life), the court by which the person is found guilty shall not sentence him to imprisonment unless it is satisfied that, having regard to the circumstances of the case including the nature of the offence and the character of the offender, it would not be desirable to deal with him under section 3 or section 4, and if the court passes any sentence of imprisonment on the offender, it shall record its reasons for doing so.

(2) For the purpose of satisfying itself whether it would not be desirable to deal under section 3 or section 4 with an offender referred to in sub-section (1), the court shall call for a report from the probation officer and consider the report, if any, and any other information available to it relating to the character and physical and mental condition of the offender.

7. The report of a probation officer referred to in sub-section (2) of section 4 or sub-section (2) of section 6 shall be treated as confidential:

Provided, That the court may, if it so thinks fit, communicate the substance thereof to the offender and may give him an opportunity of producing such evidence as may be relevant to the matter stated in the report.

8. (1) If, on the application of a probation officer, any court which passes an order under section 4 in respect of an offender is of opinion that in the interests of the offender and the public it is expedient or necessary to vary the conditions of any bond entered into by the offender, it may, at any time during the period when the bond is effective, vary the bond by extending or diminishing the duration thereof so, however, that it shall not exceed three years from the date of the original order or by altering the conditions thereof or by inserting additional conditions therein:

Provided, That no such variation shall be made without giving the offender and the surety or sureties mentioned in the bond an opportunity of being heard.

(2) If any surety refuses to consent to any variation proposed to be made under sub-section (1), the court may require the offender to enter into a fresh bond and if the offender refuses or fails to do so, the court may sentence him for the offence of which he was found guilty.

(3) Notwithstanding anything hereinbefore contained, the court which passes an order under section 4 in respect of an offender may, if it is satisfied on an application made by the probation officer, that the conduct of the offender has been such as to make it unnecessary that he should be kept any longer under supervision, discharge the bond or bonds entered into by him.

9. (1) If the court which passes an order under section 4 in respect of an offender or any court which could have dealt with the offender in respect of his original offence has reason to believe, on the report of a probation officer or otherwise, that the offender has failed to observe any of the conditions of the bond or bonds entered into by him, it may issue a warrant for his arrest or may, if it thinks fit, issue a summons to him and his sureties, if any, requiring him or them to attend before it at such time as may be specified in the summons.

(2) The court before which an offender is so brought or appears may either remand him to custody until the case is concluded or it may grant him bail, with or without surety, to appear on the date which it may fix for hearing.

(3) If the court, after hearing the case, is satisfied that the offender has failed to observe any of the conditions of the bond or bonds entered into by him, it may forthwith—

(a) sentence him for the original offence; or

(b) Where the failure is for the first time, then, without prejudice to the continuance in force of the bond, impose upon him a penalty not exceeding fifty rupees.

(4) If a penalty imposed under clause (b) of sub-section (3) is not paid within such period as the court may fix, the court may sentence the offender for the original offence.

10. The provisions of sections 122, 126, 126A, 406A, 514, 514A, 514B and 515 of the Code shall, so far as may be, apply in the case of bonds and sureties given under this Act.

11. (1) Notwithstanding anything contained in the Code or any other law, an order under this Act may be made by any court empowered to try and sentence the offender to imprisonment and also by the High Court or any other court when the case comes before it on appeal or in revision.

(2) Notwithstanding anything contained in the Code, where an order under section 3 or section 4 is made by any court trying the offender (other than a High Court), an appeal shall lie to the court to which appeals ordinarily lie from the sentences of the former court.

(3) In any case where any person under twenty-one years of age is found guilty of having committed an offence and the court by which he is found guilty declines to deal with him under section 3 or section 4, and passes against him any sentence of imprisonment with or without fine from which no appeal lies or is preferred, then, notwithstanding anything contained in the Code or any other law, the court to which appeals ordinarily lie from the sentences of the former court may, either of its own motion or on an application made to it by the convicted person or the probation officer, call for and examine the record of the case and pass such order thereon as it thinks fit.

(4) When an order has been made under section 3 or section 4 in respect of an offender, the Appellate Court or the High Court in the exercise of its power of revision may set aside such order and in lieu thereof pass sentence on such offender according to law:

Provided, That the Appellate Court or the High Court in revision shall not inflict a greater punishment than might have been inflicted by the court by which the offender was found guilty.

12. Notwithstanding anything contained in any other law, a person found guilty of an offence and dealt with under the provisions of section 3 or section 4 shall not suffer disqualification, if any, attaching to a conviction of an offence under such law:

Provided, That nothing in this section shall apply to a person who, after his release under section 4, is subsequently sentenced for the original offence.

13. (1) A probation officer under this Act shall be—

(a) A person appointed to be a probation officer by the State Government or recognised as such by the State Government; or

(b) A person provided for this purpose by a society recognised in this behalf by the State Government; or

(c) In any exceptional case, any other person who, in the opinion of the court, is fit to act as a probation officer in the special circumstances of the case.

(2) A court which passes an order under section 4 or the district magistrate of the district in which the offender for the time being resides may, at any time, appoint any probation officer in the place of the person named in the supervision order.

Explanation.—For the purposes of this section, a presidency town shall be deemed to be a district and chief presidency magistrate shall be deemed to be the district magistrate of that district.

(3) A probation officer, in the exercise of his duties under this Act, shall be subject to the control of the district magistrate of the district in which the offender for the time being resides.

14. A probation officer shall, subject to such conditions and restrictions, as may be prescribed—

(a) Inquire, in accordance with any directions of a court, into the circumstances or home surroundings of any person accused of an offence with a view to assist the court in determining the most suitable method of dealing with him and submit reports to the court;

(b) Supervise probationers and other persons placed under his supervision and, where necessary, endeavour to find them suitable employment;

(c) Advise and assist offenders in the payment of compensation or costs ordered by the court;

(d) Advise and assist, in such cases and in such manner as may be prescribed, persons who have been released under section 4; and

(e) Perform such other duties as may be prescribed.

15. Every probation officer and every other officer appointed in pursuance of this Act shall be deemed to be public servants within the meaning of section 21 of the Indian Penal Code.

16. No suit or other legal proceeding shall lie against the State Government or any probation officer or any other appointed under this Act in respect of anything which is in good faith done or intended to be done in pursuance of this Act or of any rules or orders made thereunder.

17. (1) The State Government may, with the approval of the Central Government, by notification in the Official Gazette, make rules to carry out the purposes of this Act.

(2) In particular, and without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing power, such rules may provide for all or any of the following matters namely:

(a) Appointment of probation officers, the terms and conditions of their service and the area within which they are to exercise jurisdiction;

(b) Duties of probation officers under this Act and the submission of reports by them;

(c) The conditions on which societies may be recognised for the purposes of clause (b) of sub-section (1) of section 13;

(d) The payment of remuneration and expenses to probation officers or of a subsidy to any society which provides probation officers; and

(e) Any other matter which is to be, or may be, prescribed.

(3) All rules made under this section shall be subject to the condition of previous publication and shall, as soon as may be after they are made, be laid before the State Legislature.

18. Nothing in this Act shall affect the provisions of section 31 of the Reformatory Schools Act, 1897, or sub-section (2) of section 5 of the Prevention of Corruption Act, 1947 or the Suppression of Immoral Traffic in Women and Girls Act, 1956, or of any law in force in any State relating to juvenile offenders or borstal schools.

19. Subject to the provisions of section 18, section 562 of the Code shall cease to apply to the States or parts thereof in which this Act is brought into force.

THE ARMS ACT, 1959

AN ACT to consolidate and amend the law relating to arms and ammunition.

Be it enacted by Parliament in the Tenth Year of the Republic of India as follows:

Chapter I. Preliminary

1. (1) This Act may be called the Arms Act, 1959.

(2) It extends to the whole of India.

(3) It shall come into force on such date as the Central Government may, by notification in the Official Gazette, appoint.

2. (1) In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires—

(a) "Acquisition", with its grammatical variations and cognate expressions, includes hiring, borrowing, or accepting as a gift;

(b) "Ammunition" means ammunition for any firearm, and includes—

(i) Rockets, bombs, grenades, shells and other like missiles,

(ii) Articles designed for torpedo service and submarine mining,

(iii) Other articles containing, or designed or adapted to contain, explosive, fulminating or fissionable material or noxious liquid, gas or other such thing, whether capable of use with firearms or not,

(iv) Charges for firearms and accessories for such charges,

(v) Fuses and friction tubes,

(vi) Parts of, and machinery for manufacturing, ammunition, and

(vii) Such ingredients of ammunition as the Central Government may, by notification in the Official Gazette, specify in this behalf;

(c) "Arms" means articles of any description designed or adapted as weapons for offence or defence and includes firearms, sharpedged and other deadly weapons, and parts of, and machinery for manufacturing, arms, but does not include articles designed solely for domestic or agricultural uses such as a lathi or an ordinary walking stick and weapons incapable of being used otherwise than as toys or of being converted into serviceable weapons;

(d) "District magistrate", in relation to a presidency-town or the city of Hyderabad, means the Commissioner of Police thereof;

(e) "Firearms" means arms of any description designed or adapted to discharge a projectile or projectiles of any kind by the action of any explosive or other forms of energy, and includes—

(i) Artillery, hand-grenades, riot-pistols or weapons of any kind designed or adapted for the dischrge of any noxious liquid, gas or other such thing,

(ii) Accessories for any such firearm designed or adapted to diminish the noise or flash caused by the firing thereof,

(iii) Parts of, and machinery for manufacturing, firearms, and

(iv) Carriages, platforms and appliances for mounting, transporting and serving artillery;

(f) "Licensing authority" means an officer or authority empowered to grant or renew licences under rules made under this Act, and includes the Government;

(g) "Prescribed" means prescribed by rules made under this Act;

(h) "Prohibited ammunition" means any ammunition containing, or designed or adapted to contain, any noxious liquid, gas or other such thing, and includes rockets, bombs, grenades, shells, articles designed for torpedo service and submarine mining and such other articles as the Central Government may, by notification in the Official Gazette, specify to be prohibited ammunition;

(i) "Prohibited arms" means—(i) firearms so designed or adapted that, if pressure is applied to the trigger, missiles continue to be discharged until pressure is removed from the trigger or the magazine containing the missiles is empty, or (ii) Weapons of any description designed or adapted for the discharge of any noxious liquid, gas or other such thing—and includes artillery, anti-aircraft and anti-tank firearms and such other arms as the Central Government may, by notification in the Official Gazette, specify to be prohibited arms;

(j) "Public servant" has the same meaning as in section 21 of the Indian Penal Code;

(k) "Transfer", with its grammatical variations and cognate expressions, includes letting on hire, lending, giving and parting with possession.

(2) For the purposes of this Act, the length of the barrel of a firearm shall be measured from the muzzle to the point at which the charge is exploded on firing.

(3) Any reference in this Act of any law which is not in force in any area shall, in relation to that area, be construed as a reference to the corresponding law, if any, in force in that area.

(4) Any reference in this Act to any officer or authority shall, in relation to any area in which there is no officer or authority with the same designation, be construed as a reference to such officer or authority as may be specified by the Central Government by notification in the Official Gazette.

Chapter II. Acquisition, Possession, Manufacture, Sale, Import, Export and Transport of Arms and Ammunition

3. No person shall acquire, have in his possession, or carry any firearm or ammunition unless he holds in this behalf a licence issued in accordance with the provisions of this Act and the rules made thereunder:

Provided, That a person may, without himself holding a licence, carry any firearm or ammunition in the presence, or under the written authority, of the holder of the licence for repair or for renewal of the licence or for use by such holder.

4. If the Central Government is of opinion that having regard to the circumstances prevailing in any area it is necessary or expedient in the public interest that the acquisition, possession or carrying of arms other than firearms should also be regulated, it may, by notification in the Official Gazette, direct that this section shall apply to the area specified in the notification, and thereupon no person shall acquire, have in his possession or carry in that area arms of such class or description as may be specified in that notification unless he holds in this behalf a licence issued in accordance with the provisions of this Act and the rules made thereunder.

5. No person shall—(a) manufacture, sell, transfer, convert, repair, test or prove, or (b) expose or offer for sale or transfer or have in his possesssion for sale, transfer, conversion, repair, test or proof—any firearm or any other arms of such class or description as may be prescribed or any ammunition, unless he holds in this behalf a licence issued in accordance with the provisions of this Act and the rules made thereunder:

Provided, That a person may, without holding a licence in this behalf, sell or transfer any arms or ammunition which he lawfully possesses for his own private use to another person who is entitled by virtue of this Act or any other law for the time being in force to have, or is not prohibited by this Act or such other law from having, in his possession, such arms or ammunition; but the person who has sold or transferred any firearm or ammunition in respect of which a licence is required under section 3 or any arms in respect of which a licence is required under section 4, shall, immediately after the sale or transfer, inform in writing the district magistrate having jurisdiction or the officer in charge of the nearest police station, of such sale or transfer and the name and address of the other person to whom the firearm, ammunition or other arms has or have been sold or transferred.

6. No person shall shorten the barrel of a firearm or convert an imitation firearm into a firearm unless he holds in this behalf a licence issued in accordance with the provisions of this Act and the rules made thereunder.

Explanation.—In this section, the expression "imitation firearm" means anything which has the appearance of being a firearm, whether it is capable of discharging any shot, bullet or other missile or not.

7. No person shall—(a) Acquire, have in his possession or carry; or (b) Manufacture, sell, transfer, convert, repair, test or prove; or (c) Expose or offer for sale or transfer or have in his possession for sale, transfer, conversion, repair, test or proof—any prohibited arms or prohibited ammunition unless he has been specially authorised by the Central Government in this behalf.

8. (1) No person shall obliterate, remove, alter or forge any name, number or other identification mark stamped or otherwise shown on a firearm.

(2) No person shall sell or transfer any firearm which does not bear the name of the maker, manufacturer's number or other identification mark stamped or otherwise shown thereon in a manner approved by the Central Government.

(3) Whenever any person has in his possession any firearm without such name, number or other identification mark or on which such name, number or other identification mark has been obliterated, removed, altered or forged, it shall be presumed unless the contrary is proved, that he has obliterated, removed, altered or forged that name, number or other identification mark:

Provided, That in relation to a person who has in his possession at the commencement of this Act any firearm without such name, number or other identification mark stamped or otherwise shown thereon, the provisions of this sub-section shall not take effect until after the expiration of one year from such commencement.

9. (1) Notwithstanding anything in the foregoing provisions of this Act—

(a) No person—(i) who has not completed the age of sixteen years, or (ii) who has been sentenced on conviction of any offence involving violence or moral turpitude to imprisonment for a term of not less than six months, at any time during a period of five years after the expiration of the sentence, or (iii) who has been ordered to execute under Chapter VIII of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, a bond for keeping the peace or for good behaviour, at any time during the term of the bond—shall acquire, have in his possession or carry any firearm or ammunition:

(b) No person shall sell or transfer any firearm or ammunition to, or convert, repair, test or prove any firearm or ammunition for, any other person whom he knows, or has reason to believe—(i) to be prohibited under clause (a) from acquiring, having in his possession or carrying any firearm or ammunition, or (ii) to be of unsound mind at the time of such sale or transfer, or such conversion, repair, test or proof.

(2) Notwithstanding anything in sub-clause (i) of clause (a) of sub-section (1), a person who has attained the prescribed age-limit may use under prescribed conditions such firearms as may be prescribed in the course of his training in the use of such firearms:

Provided, That different age-limits may be prescribed in relation to different types of firearms.

10. (1) No person shall bring into, or take out of, India by sea, land or air any arms or ammunition unless he holds in this behalf a licence issued in accordance with the provisions of this Act and the rules made thereunder:

Provided, That—

(a) A person who is entitled by virtue of this Act or any other law for the time being in force to have, or is not prohibited by this Act or such other law from having, in his possession any arms or ammunition, may without a licence in this behalf bring into, or take out of, India such arms or ammunition in reasonable quantities for his own private use;

(b) A person being a bona fide tourist belonging to any such country as the Central Government may, by notification in the Official Gazette, specify, who is not prohibited by the laws of that country from having in his possession any arms or ammunition, may, without a licence under this section but in accordance with such conditions as may be prescribed, bring with him into India arms and ammunition in reasonable quantities for use by him for purposes only of sport and for no other purpose;

Explanation.—For the purposes of clause (b) of this proviso, the word "tourist" means a person who not being a citizen of India visits India for a period not exceeding six months with no other object than recreation, sight-seeing, or participation in a representative capacity in meetings convened by the Central Government or in international conferences, associations or other bodies.

(2) Notwithstanding anything contained in the proviso to subsection (1), where the collector of customs or any other officer empowered by the Central Government in this behalf has any doubt as to the applicability of clause (a) or clause (b) of that proviso to any person who claims that such clause is applicable to him, or as to the reasonableness of the quantities of arms or ammunition in the possession of any person referred to in such clause, or as to the use to which such arms or ammunition may be put by such person, may detain the arms or ammunition in the possession of such person until he receives the order of the Central Government in relation thereto.

(3) Arms and ammunition taken from one part of India to another by sea or air or across any intervening territory not forming part of India, are taken out of, and brought into, India within the meaning of this section.

11. The Central Government may, by notification in the Official Gazette, prohibit the bringing into, or the taking out of, India, arms or ammunition of such classes and descriptions as may be specified in the notification.

12. (1) The Central Government may by notification in the Official Gazette—(a) direct that no person shall transport over India or any part thereof arms or ammunition of such classes and descriptions as may be specified in the notification unless he holds in this behalf a licence issued in accordance with the provisions of this Act and the rules made thereunder; or (b) prohibit such transport altogether.

(2) Arms or ammunition trans-shipped at a seaport or an airport in India are transported within the meaning of this section.

Chapter III. Provisions Relating to Licenses

13. (1) An application for the grant of a licence under Chapter II shall be made to the licensing authority and shall be in such form, contain such particulars and be accompanied by such fee, if any, as may be prescribed.

(2) On receipt of an application, the licensing authority, after making such inquiry, if any, as it may consider necessary, shall, subject to the other provisions of this Chapter, by order in writing either grant the licence or refuse to grant the same.

(3) The licensing authority shall grant—

(a) A licence under section 3 where the licence is required—(i) by a citizen of India in respect of a smooth bore gun having a barrel of not less than twenty inches in length to be used for protection or sport or in respect of a muzzle loading gun to be used for bona fide crop protection: Provided, That where having regard to the circumstances of any case, the licensing authority is satisfied that a muzzle loading gun will not be sufficient for crop protection, the licensing authority may grant a licence in respect of any other smooth bore gun as aforesaid for such protection, or (ii) in respect of a point 22 bore rifle or an air rifle to be used for target practice by a member of a rifle club or rifle association licensed or recognised by the Central Government;

(b) A licence under section 3 in any other case or a licence under section 4, section 5, section 6, section 10 or section 12, if the licensing authority is satisfied that the person by whom the licence is required has a good reason for obtaining the same.

14. (1) Notwithstanding anything in section 13, the licensing authority shall refuse to grant—

(a) A licence under section 3, section 4, or section 5 where such licence is required in respect of any prohibited arms or prohibited ammunition;

(b) A licence in any other case under Chapter II—(i) where such licence is required by a person whom the licensing authority has reason to believe (1) to be prohibited by this Act or by any other law for the time being in force from acquiring, having in his possession or carrying any arms or ammunition, or (2) to be of unsound mind, or (3) to be for any reason unfit for a licence under this Act; or (ii) where the licensing authority deems it necessary for the security of the public peace for public safety to refuse to grant such licence.

(2) The licensing authority shall not refuse to grant any license to any person merely on the ground that such person does not own or possess sufficient property.

(3) Where the licensing authority refuses to grant a licence to any person it shall record in writing the reasons for such refusal and furnish to that person on demand a brief statement of the same unless in any case the licensing authority is of the opinion that it will not be in the public interest to furnish such statement.

15. (1) A licence under section 3 shall, unless revoked earlier, continue in force for a period of three years from the date on which it is granted:

Provided, That such a licence may be granted for a shorter period if the person by whom the licence is required so desires or if the licensing authority for reasons to be recorded in writing considers in any case that the licence should be granted for a shorter period.

(2) A licence under any other provision of Chapter II shall, unless revoked earlier, continue in force for such period from the date on which it is granted as the licensing authority may in each case determine.

(3) Every licence shall, unless the licensing authority for reasons to be recorded in writing otherwise decides in any case, be renewable for the same period for which the licence was originally granted and shall be so renewable from time to time, and the provisions of sections 13 and 14 shall apply to the renewal of a licence as they apply to the grant thereof.

16. The fees on payment of which, the conditions subject to which and the form in which a licence shall be granted or renewed shall be such as may be prescribed:

Provided, That different fees, different conditions and different forms may be prescribed for different types of licences:

Provided further, That a licence may contain in addition to prescribed conditions such other conditions as may be considered necessary by the licensing authority in any particular case.

17. (1) The licensing authority may vary the conditions subject to which a licence has been granted except such of them as have been prescribed and may for that purpose require the licence-holder by notice in writing to deliver-up the licence to it within such time as may be specified in the notice.

(2) The licensing authority may, on the application of the holder of a license, also vary the conditions of the license except such of them as have been prescribed.

(3) The licensing authority may by order in writing suspend a licence for such period as it thinks fit or revoke a licence—

(a) If the licensing authority is satisfied that the holder of the licence is prohibited by this Act or by any other law for the time being in force, from acquiring, having in his possession or carrying any arms or ammunition, or is of unsound mind, or is for any reason unfit for a licence under this Act; or

(b) If the licensing authority deems it necessary for the security of the public peace or for public safety to suspend or revoke the licence; or

(c) If the licence was obtained by the suppression of material information or on the basis of wrong information provided by the holder of the licence or any other person on his behalf at the time of applying for it; or

(d) If any of the conditions of the licence has been contravened; or

(e) If the holder of the licence has failed to comply with a notice under sub-section (1) requiring him to deliver-up the licence.

(4) The licensing authority may also revoke a licence on the application of the holder thereof.

(5) Where the licensing authority makes an order varying a licence under sub-section (1) or an order suspending or revoking a licence under sub-section (3), it shall record in writing the reasons therefor and furnish to the holder of the licence on demand a brief statement of the same unless in any case the licensing authority is of the opinion that it will not be in the public interest to furnish such statement.

(6) The authority to whom the licensing authority is subordinate may by order in writing suspend or revoke a licence on any ground on which it may be suspended or revoked by the licensing authority; and the foregoing provisions of this section shall, as far as may be, apply in relation to the suspension or revocation of a licence by such authority.

(7) A court convicting the holder of a licence of any offence under this Act or the rules made thereunder may also suspend or revoke the licence:

Provided, That if the conviction is set aside on appeal or otherwise, the suspension or revocation shall become void.

(8) An order of suspension or revocation under sub-section (7) may also be made by an appellate court or by the High Court when exercising its powers of revision.

(9) The Central Government may, by order in the Official Gazette, suspend or revoke or direct any licensing authority to suspend or revoke all or any licences granted under this Act throughout India or any part thereof.

(10) On the suspension or revocation of a licence under this section the holder thereof shall without delay surrender the licence to the authority by whom it has been suspended or revoked or to such other authority as may be specified in this behalf in the order of suspension or revocation.

18. (1) Any person aggrieved by an order of the licensing authority refusing to grant a licence or varying the conditions of a licence or by an order of the licensing authority or the authority to whom the licensing authority is subordinate, suspending or revoking a license may prefer an appeal against that order to such authority (hereinafter referred to as the appelate authority) and within such period as may be prescribed:

Provided, That no appeal shall lie against any order made by, or under the direction of, the Government.

(2) No appeal shall be admitted if it is preferred after the expiry of the period prescribed therefor:

Provided, That an appeal may be admitted after the expiry of the period prescribed therefor if the appellant satisfies the appellate authority that he had sufficient cause for not preferring the appeal within that period.

(3) The period prescribed for an appeal shall be computed in accordance with the provision of the Indian Limitation Act, 1908, with respect to the computation of periods of limitation thereunder.

(4) Every appeal under this section shall be made by a petition in writing and shall be accompanied by a brief statement of the reasons for the order appealed against where such statement has been furnished to the appellant and by such fee as may be prescribed.

(5) In disposing of an appeal the appellate authority shall follow such procedure as may be prescribed:

Provided, That no appeal shall be disposed of unless the appellant has been given a reasonable opportunity of being heard.

(6) The order appealed against shall, unless the appellate authority conditionally or unconditionally directs otherwise, be in force pending the disposal of the appeal against such order.

(7) Every order of the appellate authority confirming, modifying or reversing the order appealed against shall be final.

Chapter IV. Powers and procedure

19. (1) Any police officer or any other officer specially empowered in this behalf by the Central Government may demand the production of his licence from any person who is carrying any arms or ammunition.

(2) If the person upon whom a demand is made refuses or fails to produce the licence or to show that he is entitled by virtue of this Act or any other law for the time being in force to carry such arms or ammunition without a license, the officer concerned may require him to give his name and address and if such officer considers it necessary, seize from that person the arms or ammunition which he is carrying.

(3) If that person refuses to give his name and address or if the officer concerned suspects that person of giving a false name or address or of intending to abscond, such officer may arrest him without warrant.

20. Where any person is found carrying or conveying any arms or ammunition whether covered by a licence or not, in such manner or under such circumstances as to afford just grounds of suspicion that the same are or is being carried by him with intent to use them, or that the same may be used, for any unlawful purpose, any magistrate, any police officer or any other public servant or any person employed or working upon a railway, aircraft, vessel, vehicle or any other means of conveyance, may arrest him without warrant and seize from him such arms or ammunition.

21. (1) Any person having in his possession any arms or ammunition the possession whereof has, in consequence of the expiration of the duration of a licence or of the suspension or revocation of a licence or by the issue of a notification under section 4 or by any reason whatever, ceased to be lawful, shall without unnecessary delay deposit the same either with the officer in charge of the nearest police station or subject to such conditions as may be prescribed, with a licensed dealer or where such person is a member of the armed forces of the Union, in a unit armoury.

Explanation.—In this sub-section "unit armoury" includes an armoury in a ship or establishment of the Indian Navy.

(2) Where arms or ammunition have or has been deposited under sub-section (1), the depositor or in the case of his death, his legal representative, shall, at any time before the expiry of such period as may be prescribed, be entitled—

(a) To receive back anything so deposited on his becoming entitled by virtue of this Act or any other law for the time being in force to have the same in his possession, or

(b) To dispose, or authorise the disposal, of anything so deposited by sale or otherwise to any person entitled by virtue of this Act or any other law for the time being in force to have, or not prohibited by this Act or such other law from having, the same in his possession and to receive the proceeds of any such disposal:

Provided, That nothing in this sub-section shall be deemed to authorise the return or disposal of anything of which confiscation has been directed under section 32.

(3) All things deposited and not received back or disposed of under sub-section (2) within the period therein referred to shall be forfeited to Government by order of the district magistrate:

Provided, That in the case of suspension of a license no such forfeiture shall be ordered in respect of a thing covered by the licence during the period of suspension.

(4) Before making an order under sub-section (3) the district magistrate shall, by notice in writing to be served upon the depositor or in the case of his death, upon his legal representative, in the prescribed manner, require him to show cause within thirty days from the service of the notice why the things specified in the notice shall not be forfeited.

(5) After considering the cause, if any, shown by the depositor or, as the case may be, his legal representative, the district magistrate shall pass such order as he thinks fit.

(6) The Government may at any time return to the depositor or his legal representative things forfeited to it or the proceeds of disposal thereof wholly or in part.

22. (1) Whenever any magistrate has reason to believe—(a) That any person residing within the local limits of his jurisdiction has in his possession any arms or ammunition for any unlawful purpose, or (b) That such person cannot be left in the possession of any arms or ammunition without danger to the public peace or safety—the magistrate may, after having recorded the reasons for his belief, cause a search to be made of the house or premises occupied by such person or in which the magistrate has reason to believe that such arms or ammunition are or is to be found and may have such arms or ammunition, if any, seized and detain the same in safe custody for such period as he thinks necessary, although that person may be entitled by virtue of this Act or any other law for the time being in force to have the same in his possession.

(2) Every search under this section shall be conducted by or in the presence of a magistrate or by or in the presence of some officer specially empowered in this behalf by the Central Government.

23. Any magistrate, any police officer or any other officer specially empowered in this behalf by the Central Government, may for the purpose of ascertaining whether any contravention of this Act or the rules made thereunder is being or is likely to be committed, stop and search any vessel, vehicle or other means of conveyance and seize any arms or ammunition that may be found therein along with such vessel, vehicle or other means of conveyance.

24. The Central Government may at any time order the seizure of any arms or ammunition in the possession of any person, notwithstanding that such person is entitled by virtue of this Act or any other law for the time being in force to have the same in his possession, and may detain the same for such period as it thinks necessary for the public peace and safety.

Chapter V. Offences and Penalties

25. (1) Whoever—

(a) Acquires, has in his possession or carries any firearm or ammunition in contravention of section 3; or

(b) Acquires, has in his possession or carries in any place specified by notification under section 4 any arms of such class or description as has been specified in that notification, in contravention of that section; or

(c) Manufactures, sells, transfers, converts, repairs, tests or proves, or exposes or offers for sale or transfer, or has in his possession for sale, transfer, conversion, repair, test or proof, any arms or ammunition in contravention of section 5; or

(d) Shortens the barrel of a firearm or converts an imitation firearm into a firearm in contravention of section 6; or

(e) Acquires, has in his possession or carries, or manufactures, sells, transfers, converts, repairs, tests or proves, or exposes or offers for sale or transfer, or has in his possession for sale, transfer, conversion, repair, test or proof, any prohibited arms or prohibited ammunition in contravention of section 7; or

(f) Sells or transfers any firearm which does not bear the name of the maker, manufacturer's number or other identification mark stamped or otherwise shown thereon as required by sub-section (2) of section 8 or does any act in contravention of sub-section (1) of that section; or

(g) Being a person to whom sub-clause (ii) or sub-clause (iii) of clause (a) of sub-section (1) of section 9 applies, acquires, has in his possession or carries any firearm or ammunition in contravention of that section; or

(h) Sells or transfers, or converts, repairs, tests or proves any firearm or ammunition in contravention of clause (b) of sub-section (1) of section 9; or

(i) Brings into, or takes out of, India, any arms or ammunition in contravention of section 10; or

(j) Brings into, or takes out of, India, arms or ammunition of any class or description in contravention of section 11; or

(k) Transports any arms or ammunition in contravention of section 12; or

(l) Fails to deposit arms or ammunition as required by sub-section (1) of section 21; or

(m) Being a manufacturer of, or dealer in, arms or ammunition, fails, on being required to do so by rules made under section 44, to maintain a record or account or to make therein all such entries as are required by such rules or intentionally makes a false entry therein or prevents or obstructs the inspection of such record or account or the making of copies of entries therefrom or prevents or obstructs the entry into any premises or other place where arms or ammunition are or is manufactured or kept or intentionally fails to exhibit or conceals such arms or ammunition or refuses to point out where the same are or is manufactured or kept; shall be punishable with imprisonment for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

(2) Whoever being a person to whom sub-clause (i) of clause (a) of sub-section (1) of section 9 applies, acquires, has in his possession or carries any firearm or ammunition in contravention of that section shall be punishable with imprisonment for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

(3) Whoever having sold or transferred any firearms or ammunition or other arms under the proviso to section 5 fails to inform the district magistrate having jurisdiction or the officer in charge of the nearest police station, of such sale or transfer shall be punishable with imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine of an amount which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both.

(4) Whoever fails to deliver-up a licence when so required by the licensing authority under sub-section (1) of section 17 for the purpose of varying the conditions specified in the licence or fails to surrender a licence to the appropriate authority under sub-section (10) of that section on its suspension or revocation shall be punishable with imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine of an amount which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both.

(5) Whoever, when required under section 19 to give his name and address, refuses to give such name and address or gives a name or address which subsequently transpires to be false shall be punishable with imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine of an amount which may extend to two hundred rupees, or with both.

26. Whoever—

(a) Does any act in contravention of any of the provisions of sections 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 10, 11 or 12 in such manner as to indicate an intention that such act may not be known to any public servant or to any person employed or working upon a railway, aircraft, vessel, vehicle or any other means of conveyance; or

(b) On any search being made under section 22 conceals or attempts to conceal any arms or ammunition; shall be punishable with imprisonment for a term which may extend to seven years, or with fine, or with both.

27. Whoever has in his possession any arms or ammunition with intent to use the same for any unlawful purpose or to enable any other person to use the same for any unlawful purpose shall, whether such unlawful purpose has been carried into effect or not, be punishable with imprisonment for a term which may extend to seven years, or with fine, or with both.

28. Whoever makes or attempts to make any use whatsoever of a firearm or an imitation firearm with intent to resist or prevent the lawful arrest or detention of himself or any other person shall be punishable with imprisonment for a term which may extend to seven years, or with fine, or with both.

Explanation.—In this section the expression "imitation firearm" has the same meaning as in section 6.

29. Whoever—

(a) Purchases any firearms or any other arms of such class or description as may be prescribed or any ammunition from any other person knowing that such other person is not licensed or authorised under section 5; or

(b) Delivers any arms or ammunition into the possession of another person without previously ascertaining that such other person is entitled by virtue of this Act or any other law for the time being in force to have, and is not prohibited by this Act or such other law from having, in his possession the same; shall be punishable with imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine of an amount which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both.

30. Whoever contravenes any condition of a licence or any provision of this Act or any rule made thereunder, for which no punishment is provided elsewhere in this Act shall be punishable with imprisonment for a term which may extend to three months, or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both.

31. Whoever having been convicted of an offence under this Act is again convicted of an offence under this Act shall be punishable with double the penalty provided for the latter offence.

32. (1) When any person is convicted under this Act of any offence committed by him in respect of any arms or ammunition, it shall be in the discretion of the convicting court further to direct that the whole or any portion of such arms or ammunition, and any vessel, vehicle or other means of conveyance and any receptacle or thing containing, or used to conceal, the arms or ammunition shall be confiscated:

Provided, That if the conviction is set aside on appeal or otherwise, the order of confiscation shall become void.

(2) An order of confiscation may also be made by the appellate court or by the High Court when exercising its powers of revision.

33. (1) Whenever an offence under this Act has been committed by a company, every person who at the time the offence was committed was in the charge of, or was responsible to the company for the conduct of, the business of the company, as well as the company, shall be deemed to be guilty of the offence and shall be liable to be proceeded against and punished accordingly:

Provided, That nothing contained in this sub-section shall render any such person liable to any punishment under this Act if he proves that the offence was committed without his knowledge and that he exercised all due diligence to prevent the commission of such offence.

(2) Notwithstanding anything contained in sub-section (1), where an offence under this Act has been committed by a company and it is proved that the offence has been committed with the consent or connivance of, or is attributable to any neglect on the part of, any director, manager, secretary or other officer of the company, such director manager, secretary or other officer shall also be deemed to be guilty of that offence and shall be liable to be proceeded against and punished accordingly.

Explanation.—For the purposes of this section—(a) "company" means any body corporate, and includes a firm or other association of individuals; and (b) "director", in relation to a firm, means a partner in the firm.

Chapter VI. Miscellaneous

34. Notwithstanding anything contained in the Sea Customs Act, 1878, no arms or ammunition shall be deposited in any warehouse licensed under section 16 of that Act without the sanction of the Central Government.

35. Where any arms or ammunition in respect of which any offence under this Act has been or is being committed are or is found in any premises, vehicle or other place in the joint occupation or under the joint control of several persons, each of such persons in respect of whom there is reason to believe that he was aware of the existence of the arms or ammunition in the premises, vehicle or other place shall, unless the contrary is proved, be liable for that offence in the same manner as if it has been or is being committed by him alone.

36. (1) Every person aware of the commission of any offence under this Act shall, in the absence of reasonable excuse the burden of proving which shall lie upon such person, give information of the same to the officer in charge of the nearest police station or the magistrate having jurisdiction.

(2) Every person employed or working upon any railway, aircraft, vessel, vehicle or other means of conveyance shall, in the absence of reasonable excuse the burden of proving which shall lie upon such person, give information to the officer in charge of the nearest police station regarding any box, package or bale in transit which he may have reason to suspect contains arms or ammunition in respect of which an offence under this Act has been or is being committed.

37. Save as otherwise provided in this Act,—

(a) All arrests and searches made under this Act or under any rules made thereunder shall be carried out in accordance with the provisions of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, relating respectively to arrests and searches made under that Code;

(b) Any person arrested and any arms or ammunition seized under this Act by a person not being a magistrate or a police officer shall be delivered without delay to the officer in charge of the nearest police station and that officer shall—(i) either release that person on his executing a bond with or without sureties to appear before a magistrate and keep the things seized in his custody till the appearance of that person before the magistrate, or (ii) should that person fail to execute the bond and to furnish, if so required, sufficient sureties, produce that person and those things without delay before the magistrate.

38. Every offence under this Act shall be cognizable within the meaning of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898.

39. No prosecution shall be instituted against any person in respect of any offence under section 3 without the previous sanction of the district magistrate.

40. No suit, prosecution or other legal proceeding shall lie against any person for anything which is in good faith done or intended to be done under this Act.

41. Where the Central Government is of the opinion that it is necessary or expedient in the public interest so to do, it may, by notification in the Official Gazette and subject to such conditions, if any, as it may specify in the notification—

(a) Exempt any person or class of persons, or exclude any description of arms or ammunition, or withdraw any part of India, from the operation of all or any of the provisions of this Act; and

(b) As often as may be, cancel any such notification and again subject, by a like notification, the person or class of persons or the description of arms and ammunition or the part of India to the operation of such provisions.

42. (1) The Central Government may, by notification in the Official Gazette, direct a census to be taken of all firearms in any area and empower any officer of Government to take such census.

(2) On the issue of any such notification all persons having in their possession any firearm in that area shall furnish to the officer concerned such information as he may require in relation thereto and shall produce before him such firearms if he so requires.

43. (1) The Central Government may, by notification in the Official Gazette, direct that any power or function which may be exercised or performed by it under this Act other than the power under section 41 or the power under section 44 may, in relation to such matters and subject to such conditions, if any, as it may specify in the notification, be exercised or performed also by—(a) such officer or authority subordinate to the Central Government, or (b) such State Government or such officer or authority subordinate to the State Government; as may be specified in the notification.

(2) Any rules made by the Central Government under this Act may confer powers or impose duties or authorise the conferring of powers or imposition of duties upon any State Government or any officer or authority subordinate thereto.

44. (1) The Central Government may, by notification in the Official Gazette, make rules for carrying out the purposes of this Act.

(2) In particular, and without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing power, such rules may provide for all or any of the following matters, namely:

(a) The appointment, jurisdiction, control and functions of licensing authorities;

(b) The form and particulars of application for the grant or renewal of a licence and where the application is for the renewal of a licence, the time within which it shall be made;

(c) The form in which and the conditions subject to which any licence may be granted or refused, renewed, varied, suspended or revoked;

(d) Where no period has been specified in this Act, the period for which any licence shall continue to be in force;

(e) The fees payable in respect of any application for the grant or renewal of a licence and in respect of any licence granted or renewed and the manner of paying the same;

(f) The manner in which the maker's name, the manufacturer's number or other identification mark of a firearm shall be stamped or otherwise shown thereon;

(g) The procedure for the test or proof of any firearms;

(h) The firearms that may be used in the course of training, the age-limits of persons who may use them and the conditions for their use by such persons;

(i) The authority to whom appeals may be preferred under section 18, the procedure to be followed by such authority and the period within which appeals shall be preferred, the fees to be paid in respect of such appeals and the refund of such fees;

(j) The maintenance of records or accounts of anything done under a licence other than a licence under section 3 or section 4, the form of, and the entires to be made in, such records or accounts and the exhibition of such records or accounts to any police officer or to any officer of Government empowered in this behalf;

(k) The entry and inspection by any police officer or by any officer of Government empowered in this behalf of any premises or other place in which arms or ammunition are or is manufactured or in which arms or ammunition are or is kept by a manufacturer of or dealer in such arms or ammunition and the exhibition of the same to such officer;

(l) The conditions subject to which arms or ammunition may be deposited with a licensed dealer or in a unit armoury as required by sub-section (1) of section 21 and the period on the expiry of which the things so deposited may be forfeited;

(m) Any other matter which is to be, or may be, prescribed.

(3) Every rule made under this section shall be laid as soon as may be after it is made before each House of Parliament while it is in session for a total period of thirty days which may be comprised in one session or in two successive sessions, and if before the expiry of the session in which it is so laid or the session immediately following, both Houses agree in making any modification in the rule or both Houses agree that the rule should not be made, the rule shall thereafter have effect only in such modified form or be of no effect, as the case may be, so however that any such modification or annulment shall be without prejudice to the validity of anything previously done under that rule.

45. Nothing in this Act shall apply to—

(a) Arms or ammunition on board any sea-going vessel or any aircraft and forming part of the ordinary armament or equipment of such vessel or aircraft;

THE INDIAN PENAL CODE, 1860

ACT NO. 45 OF 1060

Chapter I

Introduction

WHEREAS it is expedient to provide a general Penal Code for [1] [India] ;

It is enacted as follows :—

1. This Act shall be called the Indian Penal Code, and shall [2] [extend to the whole of India [3] [except the State of Jammu and Kashmir]].

2. Every person shall be liable to punishment under this Code and not otherwise for every act or omission contrary to the provisions thereof, of which he shall be guilty within [4] [India] [5] * * *.

3. Any person liable, by any [6] [Indian law], to be tried for an offence committed beyond [4] [India] shall be dealt with according to the provisions of this Code for any act committed beyond [4] [India] in the same manner as if such act had been committed within [4] [India].

[7] [4. The provisions of this Code apply also to any offence committed by—

[8] [(1) any citizen of India in any place without and beyond India ;

(2) any person on any ship or aircraft registered in India wherever it may be.]

Explanation.—In this section the word "offence" includes every act committed outside [4] [India] which, if committed in [4] [India] would be punishable under this Code.

[10] * * * A, [11] [who is [12] [a citizen of India]], commits a murder in Uganda. He can be tried and convicted of murder in any place in [13] [India] in which he may be found.

[14] * * * * * * *

[15] [5. Nothing in this Act shall affect the provisions of any Act for punishing mutiny and desertion of officers, soldiers, sailors or airmen in the service of the Government of India or the provision of any special or local law.]

Chapter II

General Explanations

6. Throughout this Code every definition of an offence, every penal provision and every illustration of every such definition or penal provision, shall be understood subject ot the exceptions contained in the Chapter entitled "General Exceptions", though those exceptions are not repeated in such definition, penal provision or illustration.

[1] Subs. by Act 3 of 1951 for "the whole of India except Part B States".
[2] Subs. by the A.O. 1948 for "take effect * * * throughout British India". The words and figures "on and from the first day of May, 1861" occuring between the words "effect" and "throughout" were rep. by Act 12 of 1891.
[3] Subs. by Act 3 of 1951 for "except Part B States".
[4] Subs., ibid., for "the States".
[5] The words and figures "on or after the said first day of May, 1861" omitted by Act 12 of 1891.
[6] Subs. by the A. O. 1937 for "law passed by the Governor-General of India in Council".
[7] Subs. by Act 4 of 1898, s. 2, for the original s. 4.
[8] Subs. by the A. O. 1950 for the original clauses (1) to (4).
[9] Subs. by Act 36 of 1957, s. 3 and Sch. II, for "Illustrations".
[10] The brackets and letter '(a)' omitted by s. 3 and Sch. II, ibid.
[11] Subs. by the A. O. 1948 for "a coolie, who is a Native Indian subject".
[12] Subs. by the A. O. 1950 for "a British subject of Indian domicile".
[13] Subs. by Act 3 of 1951 for "the States".
[14] Illustrations (b), (c) and (d) were rep. by the A. O. 1950.
[15] Subs., ibid., for the former s. 5.

Illustrations

(a) The sections, in this Code, which contain definitions of offences, do not express that a child under seven years of age cannot commit such offences; but the definitions are to be understood subject to the general exception which provides that nothing shall be an offence which is done by a child under seven years of age.

(b) A, a police-officer, without warrant, apprehends Z who has committed murder. Here A is not guilty of the offence of wrongful confinement; for he was bound by law to apprehend Z, and therefore the case falls within the general exception which provides that "nothing is an offence which is done by a person who is bound by law to do it".

7. Every expression which is explained in any part of this Code, is used in every part of this Code in conformity with the explanation.

8. The pronoun "he" and its derivatives are used of any person, whether male or female.

9. Unless the contrary appears from the context, words importing the singular number include the plural number, and words importing the plural number include the singular number.

10. The word "man" denotes a male human being of any age: the word "woman" denotes a female human being of any age.

11. The word "person" includes any Company or Association, or body of persons, whether incorporated or not.

12. The word "public" includes any class of the public or any community.

13. ["Queen".] Rep. by the A. O. 1950.

[1] [14. The words "servant of Government" denote any officer or servant continued, appointed or employed in India by or under the authority of Government.]

15. [Definition of "British India".] Rep. by the A. O. 1937.

16. [Definition of "Government of India".] Rep., ibid.

[2] [17. The word "Government" denotes the Central Government or the Government of a [3]* * * State.]

[4] [18. "India" means the territory of India excluding the State of Jammu and Kashmir.]

19. The word "Judge" denotes not only every person who is officially designated as a Judge, but also every person who is empowered by law to give, in any legal proceeding, civil or criminal, a definitive judgment, or a judgment which, if not appealed against, would be definitive, or a judgment which, if confirmed by some other authority, would be definitive, or who is one of a body of persons, which body of persons is empowered by law to give such a judgment.

Illustrations

(a) A collector exercising jurisdiction in a suit under Act 10 of 1859 is a Judge.

(b) A Magistrate exercising jurisdiction in respect of a charge on which he has power to sentence to fine or imprisonment with or without appeal, is a Judge.

(c) A member of a panchayat which has power, under [5] Regulation VII, 1816, of the Madras Code, to try and determine suits, is a Judge.

(d) A Magistrate exercising jurisdiction in respect of a charge on which he has power only to commit for trial to another Court, is not a Judge.

20. The words "Court of Justice" denote a Judge who is empowered by law to act judicially alone, or a body of Judges which is empowered by law to act judicially as a body, when such Judge or body of Judges is acting judicially.

Illustration

A Panchayat acting under [5] Regulation VII, 1816, of the Madras Code, having power to try and determine suits, is a Court of Justice.

21. The words "public servant" denote a person falling under any of the descriptions hereinafter following, namely:—

[1] Subs. by the A.O. 1950, for s. 14.
[2] Subs., ibid., for s. 17.
[3] The words "Part A" omitted by Act 3 of 1951.
[4] Subs., ibid., for s. 18.
[5] Rep. by the Madras Civil Courts Act, 1873 (3 of 1873).
[6] Cl. First omitted by the A. O. 1950.

Second.—Every Commissioned Officer in the Military, [1] [Naval or Air] Forces [2] [[3]* * * of India] ;

[1] [Third.—Every Judge including any person empowered by law to discharge, whether by himself or as a member of any body of persons, any adjudicatory functions ;]

Fourth.—Every officer of a Court of Justice [5] [(including a liquidator, receiver or commissioner)] whose duty it is, as such officer, to investigate or report on any matter of law or fact, or to make, authenticate, or keep any document, or to take charge or dispose of any property, or to execute any judicial process, or to administer any oath, or to interpret, or to preserve order in the Court, and every person specially authorized by a Court of Justice to perform any of such duties ;

Fifth.—Every juryman, assessor, or member of a panchayat assisting a Court of Justice or public servant ;

Sixth.—Every arbitrator or other person to whom any cause or matter has been referred for decision or report by any Court of Justice, or by any other competent public authority ;

Seventh.—Every person who holds any office by virtue of which he is empowered to place or keep any person in confinement.

Eighth.—Every officer of the [7][Government] whose duty it is, as such officer, to prevent offences, to give information of offences, to bring offenders to justice, or to protect the public health, safety or convenience ;

Ninth.—Every officer whose duty it is, as such officer, to take, receive, keep or expend any property on behalf of the [5] [Government], or to make any survey, assessment or contract on behalf of the [5] [Government], or to execute any revenue-process, or to investigate, or to report, on any matter affecting the pecuniary interests of the [5] [Government], or to prevent the infraction of any law for the protection of the pecuniary interests of the [5] [Government], and every officer in the service or pay of the [5] [Government] or remunerated by fees or commission for the performance of any public duty ;

Tenth.—Every officer whose duty it is, as such officer, to take, receive, keep or expend any property, to make any survey or assessment or to levy any rate or tax for any secular common purpose, of any village, town or district, or to make, authenticate or keep any document for the ascertaining of the rights of the people of any village, town or district ;

Eleventh.—Every person who holds any office in virtue of which he is empowered to prepare, publish, maintain or revise an electoral roll or to conduct an election or part of an election.

[1] Subs. by Act 10 of 1927, s. 2 and Sch. I, for "or Naval".
[2] Subs. by the A. O. 1948, for "of the Queen while serving under any Government in British India or the Crown Representative".
[3] The words "of the Dominion" omitted by the A. O. 1950.
[4] Subs. by Act 40 of 1964, s. 2, for cl. Third.
[5] Ins. by s. 2, ibid.
[7] Explanation 4 ins. by Act 2 of 1958, s. 2, omitted by Act 40 of 1964, s. 2.

A person is said to gain wrongfully when such person retains wrongfully, as well as when such person acquires wrongfully. A person is said to lose wrongfully when such person is wrongfully kept out of any property, as well as when such person is wrongfully deprived of property.

24. Whoever does anything with the intention of causing wrongful gain to one person or wrongful loss to another person, is said to do that thing "dishonestly."

25. A person is said to do a thing fraudulently if he does that thing with intent to defraud but not otherwise.

26. A person is said to have "reason to believe" a thing if he has sufficient cause to believe that thing but not otherwise.

27. When property is in the possession of a person's wife, clerk or servant, on account of that person, it is in that person's possession within the meaning of this Code.

Explanation.—A person employed temporarily or on a particular occasion in the capacity of a clerk, or servant, is a clerk or servant within the meaning of this section.

28. A person is said to "counterfeit" who causes one thing to resemble another thing, intending by means of that resemblance to practise deception, or knowing it to be likely that deception will thereby be practised.

[1] [Explanation 1.—It is not essential to counterfeiting that the imitation should be exact.

Explanation 2.—When a person causes one thing to resemble another thing, and the resemblance is such that a person might be deceived thereby, it shall be presumed, until the contrary is proved, that the person so causing the one thing to resemble the other thing intended by means of that resemblance to practise deception or knew it to be likely that deception would thereby be practised.]

29. The word "document" denotes any matter expressed or described upon any substance by means of letters, figures or marks, or by more than one of those means, intended to be used, or which may be used, as evidence of that matter.

Explanation 1.—It is immaterial by what means or upon what substance the letters, figures or marks are formed, or whether the evidence is intended for, or may be used in, a Court of Justice, or not.

Illustrations

A writing expressing the terms of a contract, which may be used as evidence of the contract, is a document.

A cheque upon a banker is a document.

A power-of-attorney is a document.

A map or plan which is intended to be used or which may be used as evidence, is a document.

A writing containing directions or instructions is a document.

Explanation 2.—Whatever is expressed by means of letters, figures or marks as explained by merchantile or other usage, shall be deemed to be expressed by such letters, figures or marks within the meaning of this section, although the same may not be actually expressed.

Illustration

A writes his name on the back of a bill of exchange payable to his order. The meaning of the endorsement, as explained by merchantile usage, is that the bill is to be paid to the holder. The endorsement is a document, and must be construed in the same manner as if the words "pay to the holder" or words to that effect had been written over the signature.

30. The words "valuable security" denote a document which is, or purports to be, a document whereby any legal right is created, extended, transferred, restricted, extinguished or released, or whereby any person acknowledges that he lies under legal liability, or has not a certain legal right.

Illustration

A writes his name on the back of a bill of exchange. As the effect of this endorsement is to transfer the right to the bill to any person who may become the lawful holder of it, the endorsement is a "valuable security".

31. The words "a will" denote any testamentary document.

32. In every part of this Code, except where a contrary intention appears from the context, words which refer to acts done extend also to illegal omissions.

[1] Subs. by Act 1 of 1889, s. 9, for the original Explanations.

33. The word "act" denotes as well a series of acts as a single act: the word "omission" denotes as well a series of omissions as a single omission.

[1] [34. When a criminal act is done by several persons, in furtherance of the common intention of all, each of such persons is liable for that act in the same manner as if it were done by him alone.]

35. Whenever an act, which is criminal only by reason of its being done with a criminal knowledge or intention, is done by several persons, each of such persons who joins in the act with such knowledge or intention is liable for the act in the same manner as if the act were done by him alone with that knowledge or intention.

36. Wherever the causing of a certain effect, or an attempt to cause that effect, by an act or by an omission, is an offence, it is to be understood that the causing of that effect partly by an act and partly by an omission is the same offence.

Illustration

A intentionally causes Z's death, partly by illegally omitting to give Z food, and partly by beating Z. A has committed murder.

37. When an offence is committed by means of several acts, whoever intentionally co-operates in the commission of that offence by doing any one of those acts, either singly or jointly with any other person, commits that offence.

Illustrations

(a) A and B agree to murder Z by severally and at different times giving him small doses of poison. A and B administer the poison according to the agreement with intent to murder Z. Z dies from the effects of the several doses of poison so administered to him. Here A and B intentionally co-operate in the commission of murder and as each of them does an act by which the death is caused, they are both guilty of the offence though their acts are separate.

(b) A and B are joint jailors, and as such, have the charge of Z, a prisoner, alternatively for six hours at a time. A and B, intending to cause Z's death, knowingly co-operate in causing that effect by illegally omitting, each during the time of his attendance, to furnish Z with food supplied to them for that purpose. Z dies of hunger. A and B are guilty of the murder of Z.

(c) A, a jailor, has the charge of Z, a prisoner. A intending to cause Z's death, illegally omits to supply Z with food; in consequence of which Z is much reduced in strength, but the starvation is not sufficient to cause his death. A is dismissed from his office, and B succeeds him. B, without collusion or co-operation with A, illegally omits to supply Z with food, knowing that he is likely thereby to cause Z's death. Z dies of hunger. B is guilty of murder, but, as A did not co-operate with B, A is guilty only of an attempt to commit murder.

38. Where several persons are engaged or concerned in the commission of a criminal act, they may be guilty of different offences by means of that act.

Illustration

A attacks Z under such circumstances of grave provocation that his killing of Z would be only culpable homicide not amounting to murder. B having ill-will towards Z and intending to kill him, and not having been subject to the provocation, assists A in killing Z. Here though A and B are both engaged in causing Z's death, B is guilty of murder, and A is guilty only of culpable homicide.

39. A person is said to cause an effect "voluntarily" when he causes it by means whereby he intended to cause it, or by means which, at the time of employing those means, he knew or had reason to believe to be likely to cause it.

Illustration

A sets fire, by night, to an inhabited house in a large town, for the purpose of facilitating robbery and thus causes the death of a person. Here, A may not have intended to cause death, and may even be sorry that death has been caused by his act: yet, if he knew that he was likely to cause death, he has caused death voluntarily.

[2] [40. Except in the [3] [Chapters] and sections mentioned in clauses 2 and 3 of this section, the word "offence" denotes a thing made punishable by this Code.]

[1][64, 65, 66, [2][67], 71], 109, 110, 112, 114, 115, 116, 117, 187, 194, 195, 203, 211, 213, 214, 221, 222, 223, 224, 225, 327, 328, 329, 330, 331, 347, 348, 388, 389 and 445, the word "offence" denotes a thing punishable under this Code or under any special or local law as hereinafter defined.

And in sections 141, 176, 177, 201, 202, 212, 216 and 441, the word "offence" has the same meaning when the thing punishable under the special or local law is punishable under such law with imprisonment for a term of six months or upwards, whether with or without fine.]

41. A "special law" is a law applicable to a particular subject.

42. A "local law" is a law applicable only to a particular part of [3][[4]* * * [5][India]].

43. The word "illegal" is applicable to everything which is an offence or which is prohibited by law, or which furnishes ground for a civil action: and a person is said to be "legally bound to do" whatever it is illegal in him to omit.

44. The word "injury" denotes any harm whatever illegally caused to any person, in body, mind, reputation or property.

45. The word "life" denotes the life of a human being, unless the contrary appears from the context.

46. The word "death" denotes the death of a human being unless the contrary appears from the context.

47. The word "animal" denotes any living creature, other than a human being.

48. The word "vessel" denotes anything made for the conveyance by water of human beings or of property.

49. Wherever the word "year" or the word "month" is used, it is to be understood that the year or the month is to be reckoned according to the British calendar.

50. The word "section" denotes one of those portions of a Chapter of this Code which are distinguished by prefixed numeral figures.

51. The word "oath" includes a solemn affirmation substituted by law for an oath, and any declaration required or authorized by law to be made before a public servant or to be used for the purpose of proof, whether in a Court of Justice or not.

52. Nothing is said to be done or believed in "good faith" which is done or believed without due care and attention.

[6][52A. Except in section 157, and in section 130 in the case in which the harbour is given by the wife or husband of the person harboured, the word "harbour" includes the supplying a person with shelter, food, drink, money, clothes, arms, ammunition or means of conveyance, or the assisting a person by any means, whether of the same kind as those enumerated in this section or not, to evade apprehension.]

Of Punishments

53. The punishment to which offenders are liable under the provisions of this Code are,—

First.—Death;

[7][Secondly.—Imprisonment for life;]

[8]* * * * * * *

Fourthly.—Imprisonment, which is of two descriptions, namely:—

(1) Rigorous, that is with hard labour;

(2) Simple;

Fifthly.—Forfeiture of property;

Sixthly.—Fine.

(2) In every case in which a sentence of transportation for a term has been passed before the commencement of the Code of Criminal Procedure (Amendment) Act, [1] [1955], the offender shall be dealt with in the same manner as if sentenced to rigorous imprisonment for the same term.

(3) Any reference to transportation for a term or to transportation for any shorter term (by whatever name called) in any other law for the time being in force shall be deemed to have been omitted.

(4) Any reference to "transportation" in any law for the time being in force shall,—

(a) if the expression means transportation for life, be construed as a reference to imprisonment for life;

(b) if the expression means transportation for any shorter term, be deemed to have been omitted.]

54. In every case in which sentence of death shall have been passed [2] [the appropriate Government] may, without the consent of the offender, commute the punishment for any other punishment provided by this Code.

55. In every case in which sentence of [3] [imprisonment] for life shall have been passed, [4] [the appropriate Government] may, without the consent of the offender, commute the punishment for imprisonment of either description for a term not exceeding fourteen years.

[5] [55A. In sections fifty-four and fifty-five the expression "appropriate Government" means—

(a) in cases where the sentence is a sentence of death or is for an offence against any law relating to a matter to which the executive power of the Union extends, the Central Government; and

(b) in cases where the sentence (whether of death or not) is for an offence against any law relating to a matter to which the executive power of the State extends, the Government of the State within which the offender is sentenced.]

56. [Sentence of Europeans and Americans to penal servitude. Proviso as to sentence for term exceeding ten years but not for life.] Rep. by the Criminal Law (Removal of Racial Discriminations) Act, 1949 (17 of 1949) (with effect from 6-4-1949).

57. In calculating fractions of terms of punishment, [1] [imprisonment] for life shall be reckoned as equivalent to [6] [imprisonment] for twenty years.

58. [Offenders sentenced to transportation how dealt with until transported.] Rep. by the Code of Criminal Procedure (Amendment) Act, 1955 (26 of 1955 s. 117 and Sch.

59. [Transportation instead of imprisonment.] Rep., ibid.

60. In every case in which an offender is punishable with imprisonment which may be of either description, it shall be competent to the Court which sentences such offender to direct in the sentence that such imprisonment shall be wholly rigorous, or that such imprisonment shall be wholly simple or that any part of such imprisonment shall be rigorous and the rest simple.

61. [Sentence of forfeiture of property.] Rep. by the Indian Penal Code (Amendment) Act, 1921 (16 of 1921), s. 4.

62. [Forfeiture of property, in respect of offenders punishable with death, transportation or imprisonment.] Rep., ibid.

63. Where no sum is expressed to which a fine may extend, the amount of fine to which the offender is liable is unlimited, but shall not be excessive.

and in every case of an offence punishable [1][with imprisonment or fine, or] with fine only, in which the offenders is sentenced to a fine,] it shall be competent to the Court which sentences such offender to direct by the sentence that, in default of payment of the fine, the offender shall suffer imprisonment for a certain term, which imprisonment shall be in excess of any other imprisonment to which he may have been sentenced or to which he may be liable under a commutation of a sentence.

65. The term for which the Court directs the offender to be imprisoned in default of payment of a fine shall not exceed one-fourth of the term of imprisonment which is the maximum fixed for the offence, if the offence be punishable with imprisonment as well as fine.

66. The imprisonment which the Court imposes in default of payment of a fine may be of any description to which the offender might have been sentenced for the offence.

67. If the offence be punishable with fine only, [2][the imprisonment which the Court imposes in default of payment of the fine shall be simple, and] the term for which the Court directs the offender to be imprisoned, in default of payment of fine, shall not exceed the following scale, that is to say, for any term not exceeding two months when the amount of the fine shall not exceed fifty rupees, and for any term not exceeding four months when the amount shall not exceed one hundred rupees, and for any term not exceeding six months in any other case.

68. The imprisonment which is imposed in default of payment of a fine shall terminate whenever that fine is either paid or levied by process of law.

69. If, before the expiration of the term of imprisonment fixed in default of payment, such a proportion of the fine be paid or levied that the term of imprisonment suffered in default of payment is not less than proportional to the part of the fine still unpaid, the imprisonment shall terminate.

Chapter IV

General Exceptions

76. Nothing is an offence which is done by a person who is, or who by reason of a mistake of fact and not by reason of a mistake of law in good faith believes himself to be, bound by law to do it.

Illustrations

(a) A, a soldier, fires on a mob by the order of his superior officer, in conformity with the commands of the law. A has committed no offence.

(b) A, an officer of a Court of Justice, being ordered by that Court to arrest Y, and, after due enquiry, believing Z to be Y, arrests Z. A has committed no offence.

77. Nothing is an offence which is done by a Judge when acting judicially in the exercise of any power which is, or which in good faith he believes to be, given to him by law.

78. Nothing which is done in pursuance of, or which is warranted by the judgment or order of, a Court of Justice, if done whilst such judgment or order remains in force, is an offence, notwithstanding the Court may have had no jurisdiction to pass such judgment of order, provided the person doing the act in good faith believes that the Court had such jurisdiction.

79. Nothing is an offence which is done by any person who is justified by law, or who by reason of a mistake of fact and not by reason of a mistake of law in good faith, believes himself to be justified by law, in doing it.

Illustration

A sees Z commit what appears to A to be a murder. A, in the exercise, to the best of his judgment exerted in good faith, of the power which the law gives to all persons of apprehending murderers in the fact, seizes Z, in order to bring Z before the proper authorities. A has committed no offence, though it may turn out that Z was acting in self-defence.

80. Nothing is an offence which is done by accident or misfortune, and without any criminal intention or knowledge in the doing of a lawful act in a lawful manner by lawful means and with proper care and caution.

[2] Ins. by Act 8 of 1882, s. 3.

Illustration

A is at work with a hatchet; the head flies off and kills a man who is standing by. Here, if there was no want of proper caution on the part of A, his act is excusable and not an offence.

81. Nothing is an offence merely by reason of its being done with the knowledge that it is likely to cause harm, if it be done without any criminal intention to cause harm, and in good faith for the purpose of preventing or avoiding other harm to person or property.

Explanation.—It is a question of fact in such a case whether the harm to be prevented or avoided was of such a nature and so imminent as to justify or excuse the risk of doing the act with the knowledge that it was likely to cause harm.

Illustrations

(a) A, the captain of a steam vessel, suddenly and without any fault or negligence on his part, finds himself in such a position that, before he can stop his vessel, he must inevitably run down a boat B, with twenty or thirty passengers on board, unless he changes the course of his vessel, and that, by changing his course, he must incur risk of running down a boat C with only two passengers on board, which he may possibly clear. Here, if A alters his course without any intention to run down the boat C and in good faith for the purpose of avoiding the danger to the passengers in the boat B, he is not guilty of an offence, though he may run down the boat C by doing an act which he knew was likely to cause that effect, if it be found as a matter of fact that the danger which he intended to avoid was such as to excuse him in incurring the risk of running down C.

(b) A, in a great fire, pulls down houses in order to prevent the conflagration from spreading. He does this with the intention in good faith of saving human life or property. Here, if it be found that the harm to be prevented was of such a nature and so imminent as to excuse A's act, A is not guilty of the offence.

82. Nothing is an offence which is done by a child under seven years of age.

83. Nothing is an offence which is done by a child above seven years of age and under twelve, who has not attained sufficient maturity of understanding to judge of the nature and consequences of his conduct on that occasion.

84. Nothing is an offence which is done by a person who, at the time of doing it, by reason of unsoundness of mind, is incapable of knowing the nature of the act, or that he is doing what is either wrong or contrary to law.

85. Nothing is an offense which is done by a person who, at the time of doing it, is, by reason of intoxication, incapable of knowing the nature of the act, or that he is doing what is either wrong, or contrary to law: provided that the thing which intoxicated him was administered to him without his knowledge or against his will.

86. In cases where an act done is not an offence unless done with a particular knowledge or intent, a person who does the act in a state of intoxication shall be liable to be dealt with as if he had the same knowledge as he would have had if he had not been intoxicated, unless the thing which intoxicated him was administered to him without his knowledge or against his will.

87. Nothing which is not intended to cause death, or grievous hurt, and which is not known by the doer to be likely to cause death or grievous hurt, is an offence by reason of any harm which it may cause, or be intended by the doer to cause, to any person, above eighteen years of age, who has given consent, whether express or implied, to suffer that harm; or by reason of any harm which it may be known by the doer to be likely to cause to any such person who has consented to take the risk of that harm.

Illustration

A and Z agree to fence with each other for amusement. This agreement implies the consent of each to suffer any harm which in the course of such fencing, may be caused without foul play; and if A, while playing fairly, hurts Z, A commits no offence.

88. Nothing, which is not intended to cause death, is an offence by reason of any harm which it may cause, or be intended by the doer to cause, or be known by the doer to be likely to cause, to any person for whose benefit it is done in good faith, and who has given a consent, whether express or implied, to suffer that harm, or to take the risk of that harm.

Illustration

A, a surgeon, knowing that a particular operation is likely to cause the death of Z, who suffers under the painful complaint, but not intending to cause Z's death, and intending, in good faith Z's benefit, performs that operation on Z, with Z's consent. A has committed no offence.

89. Nothing which is done in good faith for the benefit of a person under twelve years of age, or of unsound mind, by or by consent, either express or implied, of the guardian or other person having lawful charge of that person, is an offence by reason of any harm which it may cause, or be intended by the doer to cause or be known by the doer to be likely to cause to that person: Provided—

First.—That this exception shall not extend to the intentional causing of death, or to the attempting to cause death;

Secondly.—That this exception shall not extend to the doing of anything which the person doing it knows to be likely to cause death, for any purpose other than the preventing of death or grievous hurt; or the curing of any grievous disease or infirmity;

Thirdly.—That this exception shall not extend to the voluntary causing of grievous hurt, or to the attempting to cause grievous hurt, unless it be for the purpose of preventing death or grievous hurt, or the curing of any grievous disease or infirmity;

Fourthly.—That this exception shall not extend to the abetment of any offence, to the committing of which offence it would not extend.

A, in good faith, for his child's benefit without his child's consent, has his child cut for the stone by a surgeon, knowing it to be likely that the operation will cause the child's death, but not intending to cause the child's death. A is within the exception, inasmuch as his object was the cure of the child.

90. A consent is not such a consent as is intended by any section of this Code, if the consent is given by a person under fear of injury, or under a misconception of fact, and if the person doing the act knows, or has reason to believe, that the consent was given in consequence of such fear or misconception; or if the consent is given by a person who, from unsoundness of mind, or intoxication, is unable to understand the nature and consequence of that to which he gives his consent; or unless the contrary appears from the context, if the consent is given by a person who is under twelve years of age.

91. The exceptions in sections 87, 88 and 89 do not extend to acts which are offences independently of any harm which they may cause, or be intended to cause, or be known to be likely to cause, to the person giving the consent, or on whose behalf the consent is given.

Causing miscarriage (unless caused in good faith for the purpose of saving the life of the woman) is an offence independently of any harm which it may cause or be intended to cause to the woman. Therefore, it is not an offence "by reason of such harm"; and the consent of the woman or of her guardian to the causing of such miscarriage does not justify the act.

92. Nothing is an offence by reason of any harm which it may cause to a person for whose benefit it is done in good faith, even without that person's consent, if the circumstances are such that it is impossible for that person to signify consent, or if that person is incapable of giving consent, and has no guardian or other person in lawful charge of him from whom it is possible to obtain consent in time for the thing to be done with benefit: Provided—

First.—That this exception shall not extend to the intentional causing of death, or the attempting to cause death;

Secondly.—That this exception shall not extend to the doing of anything which the person doing it knows to be likely to cause death, for any purpose other than the preventing of death or grievous hurt, or the curing of any grievous disease or infirmity;

Thirdly.—That this exception shall not extend to the voluntary causing of hurt, or to the attempting to cause hurt, for any purpose other than the preventing of death or hurt;

Fourthly.—That this exception shall not extend to the abetment of any offence, to the committing of which offence it would not extend.

Illustrations

(a) Z is thrown from his horse, and is insensible. A, a surgeon, finds that Z requires to be trepanned. A, not intending Z's death, but in good faith, for Z's benefit, performs the trepan before Z recovers his power of judging for himself. A has committed no offence.

(b) Z is carried off by a tiger. A fires at the tiger knowing it to be likely that the shot may kill Z, but not intending to kill Z, and in good faith intending Z's benefit. A's ball gives Z a mortal wound. A has committed no offence.

(c) A, a surgeon, sees a child suffer an accident which is likely to prove fatal unless an operation be immediately performed. There is not time to apply to the child's guardian. A performs the operation in spite of the entreaties of the child, intending, in good faith, the child's benefit. A has committed no offence.

(d) A is in a house which is on fire, with Z, a child. People below hold out a blanket. A drops the child from the house-top, knowing it to be likely that the fall may kill the child, but not intending to kill the child, and intending, in good faith, the child's benefit. Here, even if the child is killed by the fall, A has committed no offence.

Explanation.—Mere pecuniary benefit is not benefit within the meaning of sections 88, 89 and 92.

93. No communication made in good faith is an offence by reason of any harm to the person to whom it is made, if it is made for the benefit of that person.

Illustration

A, a surgeon, in good faith, communicates to a patient his opinion that he cannot live. The patient dies in consequence of the shock. A has committed no offence, though he knew it to be likely that the communication might cause the patient's death.

94. Except murder, and offences against the State punishable with death, nothing is an offence which is done by a person who is compelled to do it by threats, which, at the time of doing it, reasonably cause the apprehension that instant death to that person will otherwise be the consequence: Provided the person doing the act did not of his own accord, or from a reasonable apprehension of harm to himself short of instant death, place himself in the situation by which he became subject to such constraint.

Explanation 1.—A person who, of his own accord, or by reason of a threat of being beaten, joins a gang of dacoits, knowing their character, is not entitled to the benefit of this exception, on the ground of his having been compelled by his associates to do anything that is an offence by law.

Explanation 2.—A person seized by a gang of dacoits, and forced, by threat of instant death, to do a thing which is an offence by law; for example, a smith compelled to take his tools and to force the door of a house for the dacoits to enter and plunder it, is entitled to the benefit of this exception.

95. Nothing is an offence by reason that it causes, or that it is intended to cause, or that it is known to be likely to cause, any harm, if that harm is so slight that no person of ordinary sense and temper would complain of such harm.

Of the Right of Private Defence

96. Nothing is an offence which is done in the exercise of the right of private defence.

97. Every person has a right, subject to the restrictions contained in section 99, to defend—

First.—His own body, and the body of any other person, against any offence affecting the human body;

Secondly.—The property, whether movable or immovable, of himself or of any other person, against any act which is an offence falling under the definition of theft, robbery, mischief or criminal trespass, or which is an attempt to commit theft, robbery, mischief or criminal trespass.

98. When an act, which would otherwise be a certain offence, is not that offence, by reason of the youth, the want of maturity of understanding, the unsoundness of mind or the intoxication of the person doing that act, or by reason of any misconception on the part of that person, every person has the same right of private defence against that act which he would have if the act were that offence.

Illustrations

(a) Z, under the influence of madness, attempts to kill A; Z is guilty of no offence. But A has the same right of private defence which he would have if Z were sane.

(b) A enters by night a house which he is legally entitled to enter. Z, in good faith, taking A for a house-breaker, attacks A. Here Z, by attacking A under this misconception, commits no offence. But A has the same right of private defence against Z, which he would have if Z were not acting under that misconception.

99. There is no right of private defence against an act which does not reasonably cause the apprehension of death or of grievous hurt, if done, or attempted to be done by a public servant acting in good faith under colour of his office, though that act may not be strictly justifiable by law.

There is no right of private defence against an act which does not reasonably cause the apprehension of death or of grievous hurt, if done, or attempted to be done, by the direction of a public servant acting in good faith under colour of his office though that direction may not be strictly justifiable by law.

There is no right of private defence in cases in which there is time to have recourse to the protection of the public authorities.

The right of private defence in no case extends to the inflicting of more harm than it is necessary to inflict for the purpose of defence.

Explanation 1.—A person is not deprived of the right of private defence against an act done, or attempted to be done, by a public servant, as such, unless he knows or has reason to believe, that the person doing the act is such public servant.

Explanation 2.—A person is not deprived of the right of private defence against an act done, or attempted to be done, by the direction of a public servant, unless he knows, or has reason to believe, that the person doing the act is acting by such direction, or unless such person states the authority under which he acts, or if he has authority in writing, unless he produces such authority, if demanded.

100. The right of private defence of the body extends, under the restrictions mentioned in the last preceding section, to the voluntary causing of death or of any other harm to the assailant, if the offence which occasions the exercise of the right be of any of the descriptions hereinafter enumerated, namely:—

First.—Such an assault as may reasonably cause the apprehension that death will otherwise be the consequence of such assault;

Secondly.—Such an assault as may reasonably cause the apprehension that grievous hurt will otherwise be the consequence of such assault;

Thirdly.—An assault with the intention of committing rape;

Fourthly.—An assault with the intention of gratifying unnatural lust;

Fifthly.—An assault with the intention of kidnapping or abducting;

Sixthly.—An assault with the intention of wrongfully confining a person, under circumstances which may reasonably cause him to apprehend that he will be unable to have recourse to the public authorities for his release.

101. If the offence be not of any of the descriptions enumerated in the last preceding section, the right of private defence of the body does not extend to the voluntary causing of death to the assailant, but does extend, under the restrictions mentioned in section 99 to the voluntary causing to the assailant of any harm other than death.

102. The right of private defence of the body commences as soon as a reasonable apprehension of danger to the body arises from an attempt or threat to commit the offence though the offence may not have been committed; and it continues as long as such apprehension of danger to the body continues.

103. The right of private defence of property extends, under the restrictions mentioned in section 99, to the voluntary causing of death or of any other harm to the wrong-doer, if the offence, the committing of which, or the attempting to commit which, occasions the exercise of the right, be an offence of any of the descriptions hereinafter enumerated, namely:—

First.—Robbery;

Secondly.—House-breaking by night;

Thirdly.—Mischief by fire committed on any building, tent or vessel, which building, tent or vessel is used as a human dwelling, or as a place for the custody of property;

Fourthly.—Theft, mischief or house-trespass, under such circumstances as may reasonably cause apprehension that death or grievous hurt will be the consequence, if such right of private defence is not exercised.

104. If the offence, the committing of which, or the attempting to commit which occasions the exercise of the right of private defence, be theft, mischief, or criminal trespass, not of any of the descriptions enumerated in the last preceding section, that right does not extend to the voluntary causing of death, but does extend, subject to the restrictions mentioned in section 99, to the voluntary causing to the wrong-doer of any harm other than death.

105. The right of private defence of property commences when a reasonable apprehension of danger to the property commences.

The right of private defence of property against theft continues till the offender has effected his retreat with the property or either the assistance of the public authorities is obtained, or the property has been recovered.

The right of private defence of property against robbery continues as long as the offender causes or attempts to cause to any person death or hurt or wrongful restraint or as long as the fear of instant death or of instant hurt or of instant personal restraint continues.

The right of private defence of property against criminal trespass or mischief continues as long as the offender continues in the commission of criminal trespass or mischief.

The right of private defence of property against house-breaking by night continues as long as the house-trespass which has been begun by such house-breaking continues.

106. If in the exercise of the right of private defence against an assault which reasonably causes the apprehension of death, the defender be so situated that he cannot effectually exercise that right without risk of harm to an innocent person, his right of private defence extends to the running of that risk.

Illustration

A is attacked by a mob who attempt to murder him. He cannot effectually exercise his right of private defence without firing on the mob, and he cannot fire without risk of harming young children who are mingled with the mob. A commits no offence if by so firing he harms any of the children.

Chapter V

Of Abetment

107. A person abets the doing of a thing, who—

First.—Instigates any person to do that thing; or,

Secondly.—Engages with one or more other person or persons in any conspiracy for the doing of that thing, if an act or illegal omission takes place in pursuance of that conspiracy, and in order to the doing of that thing; or Thirdly.—Intentionally aids, by any act or illegal omission, the doing of that thing.

Explanation 1.—A person who, by wilful misrepresentation, or by wilful concealment of a material fact which he is bound to disclose, voluntarily causes or procures, or attempts to cause or procure, a thing to be done, is said to instigate the doing of that thing.

Illustration

A, a public officer, is authorized by a warrant from a Court of Justice to apprehend Z. B, knowing that fact and also that C is not Z, wilfully represents to A that C is Z, and thereby intentionally causes A to apprehend C. Here B abets by instigation the apprehension of C.

Explanation 2.—Whoever, either prior to or at the time of the commission of an act, does anything in order to facilitate the commission of that act, and thereby facilitates the commission thereof, is said to aid the doing of that act.

108. A person abets an offence, who abets either the commission of an offence, or the commission of an act which would be an offence, if committed by a person capable by law of committing an offence with the same intention or knowledge as that of the abettor.

Explanation 1.—The abetment of the illegal omission of an act may amount to an offence although the abettor may not himself be bound to do that act.

Explanation 2.—To constitute the offence of abetment it is not necessary that the act abetted should be committed, or that the effect requisite to constitute the offence should be caused.

Illustrations

(a) A instigates B to murder C. B refuses to do so. A is guilty of abetting B to commit murder.

(b) A instigates B to murder D. B in pursuance of the instigation stabs D. D recovers from the wound. A is guilty of instigating B to commit murder.

Explanation 3.—It is not necessary that the person abetted should be capable by law of committing an offence, or that he should have the same guilty intention or knowledge as that of the abettor or any guilty intention or knowledge.

Illustrations

(a) A, with a guilty intention, abets a child or a lunatic to commit an act which would be an offence, if committed by a person capable by law of committing an offence, and having the same intention as A. Here A, whether the act be committed or not, is guilty of abetting an offence.

(b) A, with the intention of murdering Z, instigates B, a child under seven years of age, to do an act which causes Z's death. B, in consequence of the abetment, does the act in the absence of A and thereby causes Z's death. Here, though B was not capable by law of committing an offence, A is liable to be punished in the same manner as if B had been capable by law of committing an offence, and had committed murder, and he is therefore subject to the punishment of death.

(c) A instigates B to set fire to a dwelling-house. B, in consequence of the unsoundness of his mind, being incapable of knowing the nature of the act, or that he is doing what is wrong or contrary to law, sets fire to the house in consequence of A's instigation. B has committed no offence, but A is guilty of abetting the offence of setting fire to a dwelling-house, and is liable to the punishment provided for that offence.

(d) A intending to cause a theft to be committed, instigates B to take property belonging to Z out of Z's possession. A induces B to believe that the property belongs to A. B takes the property out of Z's possession, in good faith, believing it to be A's property. B, acting under this misconception, does not take dishonestly, and therefore does not commit theft. But A is guilty of abetting theft, and is liable to the same punishment as if B had committed theft.

Explanation 4.—The abetment of an offence being an offence the abetment of such an abetment is also an offence.

Illustration

A instigates B to instigate C to murder Z. B accordingly instigates C to murder Z, and C commits that offence in consequence of B's instigation. B is liable to be punished for his offence with the punishment for murder; and, as A instigated B to commit the offence, A is also liable to the same punishment.

Explanation 5.—It is not necessary to the commission of the offence of abetment by conspiracy that the abettor should concert the offence with the person who commits it. It is sufficient if he engages in the conspiracy in pursuance of which the offence is committed.

Illustration

A concerts with B a plan for poisoning Z. It is agreed that A shall administer the poison. B then explains the plan to C mentioning that a third person is to administer the poison, but without mentioning A's name. C agrees to procure the poison, and procures and delivers it to B for the purpose of its being used in the manner explained. A administers the poison; Z dies in consequence. Here, though A and C have not conspired together, yet C has been engaged in the conspiracy in pursuance of which Z has been murdered. C has therefore committed the offence defined in this section and is liable to the punishment for murder.

[1] [108A. A person abets an offence within the meaning of this Code who, in [2] [India], abets the commission of any act without and beyond [2] [India] which would constitute an offence if committed in [2] [India].

Illustration

A, in [2] [India], instigates B, a foreigner in Goa, to commit a murder in Goa A is guilty of abetting murder.]

109. Whoever abets any offence shall, if the act abetted is committed in consequence of the abetment, and no express provision is made by this Code for the punishment of such abetment, be punished with the punishment provided for the offence.

Explanation.—An act or offence is said to be committed in consequence of abetment, when it is committed in consequence of the instigation, or in pursuance of the conspiracy, or with the aid which constitutes the abetment.

Illustrations

(a) A offers a bribe to B, a public servant, as a reward for showing A some favour in the exercise of B's official functions. B accepts the bribe. A has abetted the offence defined in section 161.

(b) A instigates B to give false evidence. B, in consequence of the instigation, commits that offence. A is guilty of abetting that offence, and is liable to the same punishment as B.

(c) A and B conspire to poison Z. A, in pursuance of the conspiracy, procures the poison and delivers it to B in order that he may administer it to Z. B, in pursuance of the conspiracy, administers the poison to Z in A's absence and thereby causes Z's death. Here B is guilty of murder. A is guilty of abetting that offence by conspiracy, and is liable to the punishment for murder.

110. Whoever abets the commission of an offence shall, if the person abetted does the act with a different intention or knowledge from that of the abettor, be punished with the punishment provided for the offence which would have been committed if the act had been done with the intention or knowledge of the abettor and with no other.

111. When an act is abetted and a different act is done, the abettor is liable for the act done, in the same manner and to the same extent as if he had directly abetted it:

Provided the act done was a probable consequence of the abetment, and was committed under the influence of the instigation, or with the aid or in pursuance of the conspiracy which constituted the abetment.

Illustrations

(a) A instigates a child to put poison into the food of Z, and gives him poison for that purpose. The child, in consequence of the instigation, by mistake puts the poison into the food of Y, which is by the side of that of Z. Here if the child was acting under the influence of A's instigation, and the act done was under the circumstances a probable consequence of the abetment, A is liable in the same manner and to the same extent as if he had instigated the child to put the poison into the food of Y.

(b) A instigates B to burn Z's house. B sets fire to the house and at the same time commits theft of property there. A, though guilty of abetting the burning of the house, is not guilty of abetting the theft; for the theft was a distinct act, and not a probable consequence of the burning.

(c) A instigates B and C to break into an inhabited house at midnight for the purpose of robbery, and provides them with arms for that purpose. B and C break into the house, and being resisted by Z, one of the inmates, murder Z. Here, if that murder was the probable consequence of the abetment, A is liable to the punishment provided for murder.

112. If the act for which the abettor is liable under the last preceding section is committed in addition to the act abetted, and constitute a distinct offence, the abettor is liable to punishment for each of the offences.

Illustration

A instigates B to resist by force a distress made by a public servant. B, in consequence resists that distress. In offering the resistance, B voluntarily causes grievous hurt to the officer executing the distress. As B has committed both the offence of resisting the distress, and the offence of voluntarily causing grievous hurt, B is liable to punishment for both these offences; and, if A knew that B was likely voluntarily to cause grievous hurt in resisting the distress A will also be liable to punishment for each of the offences.

113. When an act is abetted with the intention on the part of the abettor of causing a particular effect, and an act for which the abettor is liable in consequence of the abetment, causes a different effect from that intended by the abettor, the abettor is liable for the effect caused, in the same manner and to the same extent as if he had abetted the act with the intention of causing that effect, provided he knew that the act abetted was likely to cause that effect.

Illustration

A instigates B to cause grievous hurt to Z. B, in consequence of the instigation, causes grievous hurt to Z. Z dies in consequence. Here, if A knew that the grievous hurt abetted was likely to cause death, A is liable to be punished with the punishment provided for murder.

114. Whenever any person who if absent would be liable to be punished as an abettor, is present when the act or offence for which he would be punishable in consequence of the abetment is committed, he shall be deemed to have committed such act or offence.

115. Whoever abets the commission of an offence punishable with death or [1][imprisonment for life], shall, if that offence be not committed in consequence of the abetment, and no express provision is made by this Code for the punishment of such abetment, be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine; and if any act for which the abettor is liable in consequence of the abetment, and which causes hurt to any person, is done, the abettor shall be liable to imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to fourteen years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Illustration

A instigates B to murder Z. The offence is not committed. If B had murdered Z, he would have been subject to the punishment of death or [1][imprisonment for life]. Therefore A is liable to imprisonment for a term which may extend to seven years and also to a fine; and, if any hurt be done to Z in consequence of the abetment, he will be liable to imprisonment for a term which may extend to fourteen years, and to fine.

116. Whoever abets an offence punishable with imprisonment shall, if that offence be not committed in consequence of the abetment, and no express provision is made by this Code for the punishment of such abetment, be punished with imprisonment of any description provided for that offence for a term which may extend to one-fourth part of the longest term provided for that offence; or with such fine as is provided for that offence, or with both;

and if the abettor or the person abetted is a public servant whose duty it is to prevent the commission of such offence, the abettor shall be punished with imprisonment of any description provided for that offence, for a term which may extend to one-half of the longest term provided for that offence, or with such fine as is provided for the offence, or with both.

Illustrations

(a) A offers a bribe to B, a public servant, as a reward for showing A some favour in the exercise of B's official functions. B refuses to accept the bribe. A is punishable under this section.

(b) A instigates B to give false evidence. Here, if B does not give false evidence, A has nevertheless committed the offence defined in this section, and is punishable accordingly.

[1] Subs. by Act 26 of 1955, s. 117 and Sch., for "transportation for life".

(c) A, a police-officer, whose duty it is to prevent robbery, abets the commission of robbery. Here, though the robbery be not committed, A is liable to one-half of the longest term of imprisonment provided for that offence, and also to fine.

(d) B abets the commission of a robbery by A, a police-officer, whose duty it is to prevent that offence. Here though the robbery be not committed, B is liable to one-half of the longest term of imprisonment provided for the offence of robbery, and also to fine.

117. Whoever abets the commission of an offence by the public generally or by any number or class of persons exceeding ten, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

Illustration

A affixes in a public place a placard instigating a sect consisting of more than ten members to meet at a certain time and place, for the purpose of attacking the members of an adverse sect, while engaged in a procession. A has committed the offence defined in this section.

118. Whoever intending to facilitate or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby facilitate the commission of an offence punishable with death or [1][imprisonment for life], voluntarily conceals, by any act or illegal omission, the existence of a design to commit such offence or makes any representation which he knows to be false respecting such design, shall, if that offence be committed, be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, or, if the offence be not committed, with imprisonment of either description, for a term which may extend to three years; and in either case shall also be liable to fine.

Illustration

A, knowing that dacoity is about to be committed at B, falsely informs the Magistrate that a dacoity is about to be committed at C, a place in an opposite direction, and thereby misleads the Magistrate with intent to facilitate the commission of the offence. The dacoity is committed at B in pursuance of the design. A is punishable under this section.

119. Whoever, being a public servant intending to facilitate or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby facilitate the commission of an offence which it is his duty as such public servant to prevent, voluntarily conceals, by any act or illegal omission, the existence of a design to commit such offence, or makes any representation which he knows to be false respecting such design, shall, if the offence be committed, be punished with imprisonment of any description provided for the offence, for a term which may extend to one-half of the longest term of such imprisonment, or with such fine as is provided for that offence, or with both;

or, if the offence be punishable with death or [1] [imprisonment for life], with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years; or, if the offence be not committed, shall be punished with imprisonment of any description provided for the offence for a term which may extend to one-fourth part of the longest term of such imprisonment or with such fine as is provided for the offence, or with both.

Illustration

A, an officer of police, being legally bound to give information of all designs to commit robbery which may come to his knowledge, and knowing that B designs to commit robbery, omits to give such information, with intent to facilitate the commission of that offence. Here A has by an illegal omission concealed the existence of B's design and is liable to punishment according to the provision of this section.

120. Whoever, intending to facilitate or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby facilitate the commission of an offence punishable with imprisonment, voluntarily conceals, by any act or illegal omission, the existence of a design to commit such offence, or makes any representation which he knows to be false respecting such design, shall, if the offence be committed, be punished with imprisonment of the description provided for the offence, for a term which may extend to one-fourth, and, if the offence be not committed, to one-eighth, of the longest term of such imprisonment, or with such fine as is provided for the offence, or with both.

Criminal Conspiracy

120A. When two or more persons agree to do, or cause to be done,—

(1) an illegal act, or

(2) an act which is not illegal by illegal means, such an agreement is designated a criminal conspiracy:

Provided that no agreement except an agreement to commit an offence shall amount to a criminal conspiracy unless some act besides the agreement is done by one or more parties to such agreement in pursuance thereof.

Explanation.—It is immaterial whether the illegal act is the ultimate object of such agreement, or is merely incidental to that object.

120B. (1) Whoever is a party to a criminal conspiracy to commit an offence punishable with death, [2] [imprisonment for life] or rigorous imprisonment for a term of two years or upwards, shall, where no express provision is made in this Code for the punishment of such a conspiracy, be punished in the same manner as if he had abetted such offence.

(2) Whoever is a party to a criminal conspiracy other than a criminal conspiracy to commit an offence punishable as aforesaid shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term not exceeding six months, or with fine or with both.]

the commission of any of the offences mentioned in sections 125 and 126, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine and to forfeiture of the property so received.

128. Whoever, being a public servant and having the custody of any State prisoner or prisoner of war, voluntarily allows such prisoner to escape from any place in which such prisoner is confined, shall be punished with [1] [imprisonment for life], or imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

129. Whoever, being a public servant and having the custody of any State prisoner or prisoner of war, negligently suffers such prisoner to escape from any place of confinement in which such prisoner is confined, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine.

130. Whoever knowingly aids or assists any State prisoner or prisoner of war in escaping from lawful custody, or rescues or attempts to rescue any such prisoner, or harbours or conceals any such prisoner who has escaped from lawful custody, or offers or attempts to offer any resistance to the recapture of such prisoner shall be punished with [1] [imprisonment for life], or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Explanation.—A State prisoner of prisoner of war, who is permitted to be at large on his parole within certain limits in [2] [India], is said to escape from lawful custody if he goes beyond the limits within which he is allowed to be at large.

Chapter VII

Of Offences Relatng to the Army, [3] [Navy and Air Force]

131. Whoever abets the committing of mutiny by an officer, soldier, [4] [sailor or airman], in the Army, [5] [Navy or Air Force] of the [6] [Government of India] or attempts to seduce any such officer, soldier, [4] [Sailor or airman] from his allegiance or his duty, shall be punished with [1] [imprisonment for life], or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

abetment be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

135. Whoever abets the desertion of any officer, soldier, [1][sailor or airman], in the Army, [2][Navy or Air Force] of the [3][Government of India], shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

136. Whoever, except as hereinafter excepted, knowing or having reason to believe that an officer, soldier, [1][sailor or airman], in the Army, [2][Navy or Air Force] of the [3][Government of India], has deserted, harbours such officer, soldier, [3][sailor or airman], shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine or with both.

Exception.—This provision does not extend to the case in which the harbour is given by a wife to her husband.

137. The master or person in charge of a merchant vessel, on board of which any deserter from the Army, [2][Navy or Air Force] of the [3][Government of India] is concealed, shall, though ignorant of such concealment, be liable to a penalty not exceeding five hundred rupees, if he might have known of such concealment but for some neglect of his duty as such master or person in charge, or but for some want of discipline on board of the vessel.

138. Whoever abets what he knows to be an act of insubordination by an officer, soldier, [1][sailor or airman], in the Army, [2][Navy or Air Force], of the [3][Government of India], shall, if such act of insubordination be committed in consequence of that abetment, be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine, or with both.

138A. [Application of foregoing sections to the Indian Marine Service.] Rep. by the Amending Act, 1934 (35 of 1934), s. 2 and Sch. Sch.

139. No person subject to [4][the Army Act, [5][the Army Act, 1950], the Naval Discipline Act, [6][[7]* * * the Indian Navy (Discipline) Act, 1934,] [8][the Air Force Act or [9][the Air Force Act, 1950]]], is subject to punishment under this Code for any of the offences defined in this Chapter.

140. Whoever, not being a soldier, [10][sailor or airman] in the Military, [11][Naval or Air] service of the [3][Government of India], wears any garb or carries any token resembling any garb or token used by such a soldier, [10][sailor or airman] with the intention that it may be believed that he is such a soldier, [10][sailor or airman], shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three months, or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both.

Of Offenses Against the Public Tranquillity

141. An assembly of five or more persons is designated an "unlawful assembly", if the common object of the persons composing that assembly is—

First.—To overawe by criminal force, or show of criminal force, [12][the Central or any State Government or Parliament or the Legislature of any State], or any public servant in the exercise of the lawful power of such public servant; or

Second.—To resist the execution of any law, or of any legal process; or Third.—To commit any mischief or criminal trespass, or other offence; or Fourth.—By means of criminal force, or show of criminal force, to any person to take or obtain possession of any property, or to deprive any person of the enjoyment of a right of way, or of the use of water or other incorporeal right of which he is in possession or enjoyment, or to enforce any right or supposed right; or

Fifth.—By means of criminal force, or show of criminal force, to compel any person to do what he is not legally bound to do, or to omit to do what he is legally entitled to do.

Explanation.—An assembly which was not unlawful when it assembled, may subsequently become an unlawful assembly.

142. Whoever, being aware of facts which render any assembly an unlawful assembly, intentionally joins that assembly, or continues in it, is said to be a member of an unlawful assembly.

143. Whoever is a member of an unlawful assembly, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine or with both.

144. Whoever, being armed with any deadly weapon, or with anything which, used as a weapon of offence, is likely to cause death, is a member of an unlawful assembly, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

145. Whoever joins or continues in an unlawful assembly, knowing that such unlawful assembly has been commanded in the manner prescribed by law to disperse, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

146. Whenever force or violence is used by an unlawful assembly, or by any member thereof, in prosecution of the common object of such assembly, every member of such assembly is guilty of the offence of rioting.

147. Whover is guilty of rioting, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

148. Whover is guilty of rioting, being armed with a deadly weapon or with anything which, used as a weapon of offence, is likely to cause death, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

149. If an offence is committed by any member of an unlawful assembly in prosecution of the common object of that assembly, or such as the members of that assembly knew to be likely to be committed in prosecution of that object, every person who, at the time of the committing of that offence, is a member of the same assembly, is guilty of that offence.

150. Whover hires or engages, or employs, or promotes, or connives at the hiring, engagement or employment of any person to join or become a member of any unlawful assembly, shall be punishable as a member of such unlawful assembly, and for any offence which may be committed by any such person as a member of such unlawful assembly in pursuance of such hiring, engagement or employment, in the same manner as if he had been a member of such unlawful assembly, or himself had committed such offence.

151. Whover knowingly joins or continues in any assembly of five or more persons likely to cause a disturbance of the public peace, after such assembly has been lawfully commanded to disperse, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine, or with both.

Exploration.—If the assembly is an unlawful assembly within the meaning of section 141, the offender will be punishable under section 145.

152. Whoever assaults or threatens to assault, or obstructs or attempts to obstruct, any public servant in the discharge of his duty as such public servant, in endeavouring to disperse an unlawful assembly, or to suppress a riot or affray, or uses, or threatens, or attempts to use criminal force to such public servant, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

153. Whoever malignantly, or wantonly, by doing anything which is illegal, gives provocation to any person intending or knowing it to be likely that such provocation will cause the offence of rioting to be committed, shall, if the offence of rioting be committed in consequence of such provocation, be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both; and if the offence of rioting be not committed, with Imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine, or with both.

[1] [153A. Whoever—

(a) by words, either spoken or written, or by signs or by visible representations or otherwise, promotes, or attempts to promote, on grounds of religion, race, language, caste or community or any other ground whatsoever, feelings of enmity or hatred between different religious, racial or language groups or castes or communities, or

(b) commits any act which is prejudicial to the maintenance of harmony between different religious, racial or language groups or castes or communities and which disturbs or is likely to disturb the public tranquillity, shall be punished with imprisonment which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.]

154. Whenever any unlawful assembly or riot takes place, the owner or occupier of the land upon which such unlawful assembly is held, or such riot is committed, and any person having or claiming an interest in such land, shall be punishable with fine not exceeding one thousand rupees, if he or his agent or manager, knowing that such offence is being or has been committed, or having reason to believe it is likely to be committed, do not give the earliest notice thereof in his or their power to the principal officer at the nearest police-station, and do not, in the case of his or their having reason to believe that it was about to be committed, use all lawful means in his or their power to prevent it and, in the event of its taking place, do not use all lawful means in his or their power to disperse or suppress the riot or unlawful assembly.

155. Whenever a riot is committed for the benefit or on behalf of any person who is the owner or occupier of any land respecting which such riot takes place or who claims any interest in such land, or in the subject of any dispute which gave rise to the riot, or who has accepted or derived any benefit therefrom, such person shall be punishable with fine, if he or his agent or manager, having reason to believe that such riot was likely to be committed or that the unlawful assembly by which such riot was committed was likely to be held, shall not respectively use all lawful means in his or their power to prevent such assembly or riot from taking place, and for suppressing and dispersing the same.

156. Whenever a riot is committed for the benefit or on behalf of any person who is the owner or occupier of any land respecting which such riot takes place, or who claims any interest in such land, or in the subject of any dispute which gave rise to the riot, or who has accepted or derived any benefit therefrom, the agent or manager of such person shall be punishable with fine, if such agent or manager, having reason to believe that such riot was likely to be committed, or that the unlawful assembly by which such riot was committed was likely to be held, shall not use all lawful means in his power to prevent such riot or assembly from taking place and for suppressing and dispersing the same.

157. Whosoever harbours, receives or assembles, in any house or premises in his occupation or charge, or under his control any persons knowing that such persons have been hired, engaged or employed, or are about to be hired, engaged or employed, to join or become members of an unlawful assembly, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine, or with both.

158. Whoever is engaged, or hired, or offers or attempts to be hired or engaged, to do or assist in doing any of the acts specified in section 141, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine, or with both, and whoever, being so engaged or hired as aforesaid, goes armed or engages or offers to go armed, with any deadly weapon or with anything which used as a weapon of offence is likely to cause death, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

159. When two or more persons, by fighting in a public place, disturb the public peace, they are said to "commit an affray".

160. Whoever commits an affray, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one month, or with fine which may extend to one hundred rupees, or with both.

Chapter IX

Of Offenses by or Relating to Public Servants

161. Whoever, being or expecting to be a public servant, accepts or obtains, or agrees to accept, or attempts to obtain from any person, for himself or for any other person, any gratification whatever, other than legal remuneration, as a motive or reward for doing or forbearing to do any official act or for showing or forbearing to show, in the exercise of his official functions, favour or disfavour to any person, or for rendering or attempting to render any service or disservice to any person, with [1] [the Central or any State Government or Parliament or the Legislature of any State] [2] [or with any local authority, corporation or Government company referred to in section 21], or with any public servant, as such, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

Explanations.—"Expecting to be a public servant." If a person not expecting to be in office obtains a gratification by deceiving others into a belief that he is about to be in office, and that he will then serve them, he may be guilty of cheating, but he is not guilty of the offense defined in this section.

"Gratification." The word "gratification" is not restricted to pecuniary gratifications, or to gratifications estimable in money.

"Legal remuneration." The words "legal remuneration" are not restricted to remuneration which a public servant can lawfully demand, but include all remuneration which he is permitted by the Government, which he serves, to accept.

"A motive or reward for doing." A person who receives a gratification as a motive for doing what he does not intend to do, or as a reward for doing what he has not done, comes within these words.

Illustrations

(a) A, munsif, obtains from Z, a banker, a situation in Z's bank for A's brother, as a reward to A for deciding a cause in favour of Z. A has committed the offence defined in this section.

(b) A, holding the office of [3] [Consul in a Foreign State], accepts a lakh of rupees from the Minister of [4] [that State]. It does not appear that A accepted this sum as a motive or reward for doing or forbearing to do any particular official act, or for rendering or attempting to render any particular service to [4] [that State] with the [5] [Government of India]. But it does appear that A accepted the sum as a motive or reward for generally showing favour in the exercise of his official functions to [4] [that State]. A has committed the offence defined in this section.

(c) A, a public servant, induces Z erroneously to believe that A's influence with the Government has obtained a title for Z and thus induces Z to give A money as a reward for this service. A has committed the offence defined in this section.

162. Whoever accepts or obtains, or agrees to accept, or attempts to obtain, from any person, for himself or for any other person, any gratification whatever as a motive or reward for inducing, by corrupt or illegal means, any public servant to do or to forbear to do any official act, or in the exercise of the official functions of such public servant to show favour or disfavour to any person, or to render or attempt to render any service or disservice to any persons, with [6] [the Central or Any State Government or Parliament or the Legislature of any State] [7] [or with any local authority, corporation or Government company referred to in section 21], or with any public servant, as such, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

163. Whoever accepts or obtains, or agrees to accept or attempts to obtain, from any person, for himself or for any other person, any gratification whatever, as a motive or reward for inducing, by the exercise of personal influence, any public servant to do or to forbear to do any official act, or in the exercise of the offi-

An advocate who receives a fee for arguing a case before a Judge; a person who receives pay for arranging and correcting a memorial addressed to Government, setting forth the services and claims of the memorialist; a paid agent for condemned criminal, who lays before the Government statements tending to show that the condemnation was unjust,—are not within this section, inasmuch as they do not exercise or profess to exercise personal influence.

164. Whoever, being a public servant, in respect of whom either of the offences defined in the last two preceding sections is committed, abets the offence, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

Illustration

A is a public servant. B, A's wife, receives a present as a motive for soliciting A to give an office to a particular person. A abets her doing so. B is punishable with imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year, or with fine, or with both. A is punishable with imprisonment for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

165. Whoever, being a public servant, accepts or obtains, or agrees to accept or attempts to obtain, for himself, or for any other person, any valuable thing without consideration, or for a consideration which he knows to be inadequate, from any person whom he knows to have been, or to be, or to be likely to be concerned in any proceeding or business transacted or about to be transacted by such public servant, or having any connection with the official functions of himself or of any public servant to whom he is subordinate, or from any person whom he knows to be interested in or related to the person so concerned, shall be punished with [3][imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years], or with fine, or with both.

Illustrations

(a) A, a Collector, hires a house of Z, who has a settlement case pending before him. It is agreed that A shall pay fifty rupees a month, the house being such that, if the bargain were made in goodfaith, A would be required to pay two hundred rupees a month. A has obtained a valuable thing from Z without adequate consideration.

(b) A, a Judge, buys of Z, who has a cause pending in A's Court, Government promissory notes at a discount, when they are selling in the market at a premium. A has obtained a valuable thing from Z without adequate consideration.

(c) Z's brother is apprehended and taken before A, a Magistrate, on a charge of perjury. A sells to Z shares in a bank at a premium, when they are selling in the market at a discount. Z pays A for the shares accordingly. The money so obtained by A is a valuable thing obtained by him without adequate consideration.

[4][165A. Whoever, abets any office punishable under section 161 or section 165, whether or not that offence is committed in consequence of the abetment, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.]

166. Whoever, being a public servant, knowingly disobeys any direction of the law as to the way in which he is to conduct himself as such public servant, intending to cause, or knowing it to be likely that he will, by such disobedience, cause injury to any person, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

A, being an officer directed by law to take property in execution, in order to satisfy a decree pronounced in Z's favour by a Court of Justice, knowingly disobeys that direction of law, with the knowledge that he is likely thereby to cause injury to Z. A has committed the offence defined in this section.

167. Whoever, being a public servant, and being, as such public servant, charged with the preparation or translation of any document, frames or translates that document in a manner which he knows or believes to be incorrect, intending thereby to cause or knowing it to be likely that he may thereby cause injury to any person, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

168. Whoever, being a public servant, and being legally bound as such public servant not to engage in trade, engages in trade, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

169. Whoever, being a public servant, and being legally bound as such public servant, not to purchase or bid for certain property, purchases or bids for that property, either in his own name or in the name of another, or jointly, or in shares with others, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both; and the property, if purchased, shall be confiscated.

170. Whoever pretends to hold any particular office as a public servant, knowing that he does not hold such office or falsely personates any other person holding such office, and in such assumed character does or attempts to do any act under colour of such office, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description, for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

171. Whoever, not belonging to a certain class of public servants wears any garb or carries any token resembling any garb or token used by that class of public servants, with the intention that it may be believed, or with the knowledge that it is likely to be believed, that he belongs to that class of public servants, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description, for a term which may extend to three months, or with fine which may extend to two hundred rupees, or with both.

[1] [*Chapter IX*A

Of Offences Relating to Elections

171A. For the purposes of this Chapter—

(a) "candidate" means a person who has been nominated as a candidate at any election and includes a person who, when an election is in contemplation, holds himself out as a prospective candidate thereat: provided that he is subsequently nominated as a candidate at such election;

(b) "electoral right" means the right of a person to stand, or not to stand as, or to withdraw from being, a candidate or to vote or refrain from voting at an election.

171B. (1) Whoever—

(i) gives a gratification to any person with the object of inducing him or any other person to exercise any electoral right or of rewarding any person for having exercised any such right; or

(ii) accepts either for himself or for any other person any gratification as a reward for exercising any such right or for inducing or attempting to induce any other person to exercise any such right, commits the offence of bribery:

Provided that a declaration of public policy or a promise of public action shall not be an offence under this section.

(2) A person who offers, or agrees to give, or offers or attempts to procure, a gratification shall be deemed to give a gratification.

(3) A person who obtains or agrees to accept or attempts to obtain a gratification shall be deemed to accept a gratification, and a person who accepts a gratification as a motive for doing what he does not intend to do, or as a reward for doing what he has not done, shall be deemed to have accepted the gratification as a reward.

[1] Chapter IXA was ins. by Act 39 of 1920, s. 2.

171C. (1) Whoever voluntarily interferes or attempts to interfere with the free exercise of any electoral right commits the offense of undue influence at an election.

(2) Without prejudice to the generality of the provisions of subsection (1), whoever—

(a) threatens any candidate or voter, or any person in whom a candidate or voter is interested, with injury of any kind, or

(b) induces or attempts to induce a candidate or voter to believe that he or any person in whom he is interested will become or will be rendered an object of Divine displeasure or of spiritual censure, shall be deemed to interfere with the free exercise of the electoral right of such candidate or voter, within the meaning of sub-section (1).

(3) A declaration of public policy or a promise of public action, or the mere exercise of a legal right without intent to interfere with an electoral right, shall not be deemed to be interference within the meaning of this section.

171D. Whoever at an election applies for a voting paper or votes in the name of any other person, whether living or dead, or in a fictitious name, or who having voted once at such election applies at the same election for a voting paper in his own name, and whoever abets, procures or attempts to procure the voting by any person in any such way, commits the offence of personation at an election.

171E. Whoever commits the offence of bribery shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both:

Provided that bribery by treating shall be punished with fine only.

Explanation.—"Treating" means that form of bribery where the gratification consists in food, drink, entertainment, or provision.

171F. Whoever commits the offence of undue influence or personation at an election shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year or with fine, or with both.

171G. Whoever with intent to affect the result of an election makes or publishes any statement purporting to be a statement of fact which is false and which he either knows or believes to be false or does not believe to be true, in relation to the personal character or conduct of any candidate shall be punished with fine.

171H. Whoever without the general or special authority in writing of a candidate incurs or authorizes expenses on account of the holding of any public meeting or upon any advertisement, circular or publication, or in any other way whatsoever for the purpose of promoting or procuring the election of such candidate, shall be punished with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees:

Provided that if any person having incurred any such expenses not exceeding the amount of ten rupees without authority obtains within ten days from the date on which such expenses were incurred the approval in writing of the candidate, he shall be deemed to have incurred such expenses with the authority of the candidate.

171I. Whoever being required by any law for the time being in force or any rule having the force of law to keep accounts of expenses incurred at or in connection with an election fails to keep such accounts shall be punished with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees.]

Chapter X

Of Contempts of the Lawful Authority of Public Servants

172. Whoever absconds in order to avoid being served with a summons, notice or order proceeding from any public servant legally competent, as such public servant, to issue such summons, notice or order, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to one month, or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both;

or, if the summons or notice or order is to attend in person or by agent, or to produce a document in a Court of Justice, with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

173. Whoever in any manner intentionally prevents the serving on himself, or on any other person, of any summons, notice or order proceeding from any public servant legally competent, as such public servant, to issue such summons, notice or order, or intentionally prevents the lawful affixing to any place of any such summons, notice or order, or intentionally removes any such summons, notice or order from any place to which it is lawfully affixed, or intentionally prevents the lawful making of any proclamation, under the authority of any public servant legally competent, as such public servant, to direct such proclamation to be made,

shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to one month, or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both, or, if the summons, notice, order or proclamation is to attend in person or by agent, or to produce a document in a Court of Justice, with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

174. Whoever, being legally bound to attend in person or by an agent at a certain place and time in obedience to a summons, notice, order or proclamation proceeding from any public servant legally competent, as such public servant, to issue the same, intentionally omits to attend at that place or time, or departs from the place where he is bound to attend before the time at which it is lawful for him to depart, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to one month, or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both;

or, if the summons, notice, order or proclamation is to attend in person or by agent in a Court of Justice, with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

(a) A, being legally bound to appear before the [1] [High Court] at Calcutta in obedience to a subpoena issuing from that Court, intentionally omits to appear. A has committed the offence defined in this section.

(b) A, being legally bound to appear before a [2] [District Judge], as a witness, in obedience to a summons issued by that [3] [District Judge] intentionally omits to appear. A has committed the offence defined in this section.

175. Whoever, being legally bound to produce or deliver up any document to any public servant, as such, intentionally omits so to produce or deliver up the same, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to one month, or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both;

or, if the document is to be produced or delivered up to a Court of Justice, with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

Illustration

A, being legally bound to produce a document before a [3] [District Court], intentionally omits to produce the same. A has committed the offence defined in this section.

176. Whoever, being legally bound to give any notice or to furnish information on any subject to any public servant, as such, intentionally omits to give such notice or to furnish such information in the manner and at the time required by law, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to one month, or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both;

or, if the notice or information required to be given respects the commission of an offence, or is required for the purpose of preventing the commission of an offence, or in order to the apprehension of an offender, with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both;

[4] [or, if the notice or information required to be given is required by an order passed under sub-section (1) of section 565 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend

177. Whoever, being legally bound to furnish information on any subject to any public servant, as such, furnishes, as true, information on the subject which he knows or has reason to believe to be false shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both;

or, if the information which he is legally bound to give respects the commission of an offence, or is required for the purpose of preventing the commission of an offence, or in order to the apprehension of an offender, with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

(a) A, a landholder, knowing of the commisison of a murder within the limits of his estate, wilfully misinforms the Magistrate of the district that the death has occurred by accident in consequence of the bite of a snake. A is guilty of the offence defined in this section.

(b) A, a village watchman, knowing that a considerable body of strangers has passed through his village in order to commit a dacoity in the house of Z, a wealthy merchant residing in a neighbouring place, and being bound under clause 5, section VII, [1] Regulation III, 1821, of the Bengal Code, to give early and punctual information of the above fact to the officer of the nearest police-station, wilfully misinforms the police-officer that a body of suspicious characters passed through the village with a view to commit dacoity in a certain distant place in a different direction. Here A is guilty of the offence defined in the latter part of this section.

[2] [Explanation.—In section 176 and in this section the word "offence" includes any act committed at any place out of [3] [India], which, if committed in [3] [India], would be punishable under any of the following sections, namely, 302, 304, 382, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 402, 435, 436, 449, 450, 457, 458, 459 and 460; and the word "offender" includes any person who is alleged to have been guilty of any such act.]

178. Whoever refuses to bind himself by an oath [4] [or affirmation] to state the truth, when required so to bind himself by a public servant legally competent to require that he shall so bind himself, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

179. Whoever, being legally bound to state the truth on any subject to any pjublic servant, refuses to answer any question demanded of him touching that subject by such public servant in the exercise of the legal powers of such public servant, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

180. Whoever refuses to sign any statement made by him, when required to sign that statement by a public servant legally competent to require that he shall sign that statement, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to three months, or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both.

181. Whoever, being legally bound by an oath [4] [or affirmation] to state the truth on any subject to any public servant or other person authorized by law to administer such oath [1] [or affirmation], makes, to such public servant or other person as aforesaid, touching that subject, any statement which is false, and which he either knows or believes to be false or does not believe to be true, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine.

[5] [182. Whoever gives to any public servant any information which he knows or believes to be false, intending thereby to cause, or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby cause, such public servant—

(a) A informs a Magistrate that Z, a police-officer, subordinate to such Magistrate, has been guilty of neglect of duty or misconduct, knowing such information to be false, and knowing it to be likely that the information will cause the Magistrate to dismiss Z. A has committed the offence defined in this section.

(b) A falsely informs a public servant that Z has contraband salt in a secret place, knowing such information to be false, and knowing that it is likely that the consequence of the information will be a search of Z's premises, attended with annoyance to Z. A has committed the offence defined in this section.

(c) A falsely informs a policeman that he has been assaulted and robbed in the neighborhod of a particular village. He does not mention the name of any person as one of his assailants, but knows it to be likely that in consequence of this information the police will make enquiries and institute searches in the village to the annoyance of the villagers or some of them. A has committed an offence under this section.]

183. Whoever offers any resistance to the taking of any property by the lawful authority of any public servant, knowing or having reason to believe that he is such public servant, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

184. Whoever intentionally obstructs any sale of property offered for sale by the lawful authority of any public servant, as such, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one month, or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both.

185. Whoever, at any sale of property held by the lawful authority of a public servant, as such, purchases or bids for any property on account of any person, whether himself or any other, whom he knows to be under a legal incapacity to purchase that property at that sale, or bids for such property not intending to perform the obligations under which he lays himself by such bidding, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one month, or with fine which may extend to two hundred rupees, or with both.

186. Whoever voluntarily obstructs any public servant in the discharge of his public functions, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three months, or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both.

187. Whoever, being bound by law to render or furnish assistance to any public servant in the execution of his public duty, intentionally omits to give such assistance, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to one month, or with fine which may extend to two hundred rupees, or with both;

and if such assistance be demanded of him by a public servant legally competent to make such demand for the purposes of executing any process lawfully issued by a Court of Justice, or of preventing the commission of an offence, or suppressing a riot, or affray, or of apprehending a person charged with or guilty of an offence, or of having escaped from lawful custody, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both.

188. Whoever, knowing that, by an order promulgated by a public servant lawfully empowered to promulgate such order, he is directed to abstain from a certain act, or to take certain order with certain property in his possession or under his management, disobeys such direction, shall, if such disobedience causes or tends to cause obstruction, annoyance or injury, or risk of obstruction, annoyance or injury, to any persons lawfully employed, be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to one month or with fine which may extend to two hundred rupees, or with both :

and if such disobedience causes or tends to cause danger to human life, health or safety, or causes or tends to cause a riot or affray, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

Explanation.—It is not necessary that the offender should intend to produce harm, or contemplate his disobedience as likely to produce harm. It is sufficient that he knows of the order which he disobeys, and that his disobedience produces, or is likely to produce, harm.

An order is promulgated by a public servant lawfully empowered to promulgate such order, directing that a religious procession shall not pass down a certain street. A knowingly disobeys the order, and thereby causes danger of riot. A has committed the offence defined in this section.

189. Whoever holds out any threat of injury to any public servant, or to any person in whom he believes that public servant to be interested, for the purpose of inducing that public servant to do any act, or to forbear or delay to do any act, connected with the exercise of the public functions of such public servant, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or both.

190. Whoever holds out any threat of injury to any person for the purpose of inducing that person to refrain or desist from making a legal application for protection against any injury to any public servant legally empowered as such to give such protection, or to cause such protection to be given, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Chapter XI

Of False Evidence and Offences Against Public Justice

191. Whoever being legally bound by an oath or by an express provision of law to state the truth, or being bound by law to make a declaration upon any subject, makes any statement which is false, and which he either knows or believes to be false or does not believe to be true, is said to give false evidence.

Explanation 1.—A statement is within the meaning of this section whether it is made verbally or otherwise.

Explanation 2.—A false statement as to the belief of the person attesting is within the meaning of this section, and a person may be guilty of giving false evidence by stating that he believes a thing which he does not believe, as well as by stating that he knows a thing which he does not know.

Illustrations

(a) A, in support of a just claim which B has against Z for one thousand rupees, falsely swears on a trial that he heard Z admit the justice of B's claim. A has given false evidence.

(b) A, being bound by an oath to state the truth, states that he believes a certain signature to be the handwriting of Z, when he does not believe it to be the handwriting of Z. Here A states that which he knows to be false, and therefore gives false evidence.

(c) A, knowing the general character of Z's handwriting, states that he believes a certain signature to be the handwriting of Z; A in good faith believing it to be so. Here A's statement is merely as to his belief, and is true as to his belief, and therefore, although the signature may not be the handwriting of Z, A has not given false evidence.

(d) A, being bound by an oath to state the truth, states that he knows that Z was at a particular place on a particular day, not knowing anything upon the subject. A gives false evidence whether Z was at that place on the day named or not.

(e) A, an interpretor or translator, gives or certifies as a true interpretation or translation of a statement or document, which he is bound by oath to interpret or translate truly, that which is not and which he does not believe to be a true interpretation or translation. A has given false evidence.

192. Whoever causes any circumstances to exist or makes any false entry in any book or record, or makes any document containing a false statement, intending that such circumstance, false entry or false statement may appear in evidence in a judicial proceeding, or in a proceeding taken by law before a public servant as such, or before an arbitrator, and that such circumstance, false entry or false statement, so appearing in evidence, may cause any person who in such proceeding is to form an opinion upon the evidence, to entertain an erroneous opinion touching any point material to the result of such proceeding is said "to fabricate false evidence."

Illustrations

(a) A puts jewels into a box belonging to Z, with the intention that they may be found in that box, and that this circumstance may cause Z to be convicted of theft. A has fabricated false evidence.

(b) A makes a false entry in his shop-book for the purpose of using it as corroborative evidence in a Court of Justice. A has fabricated false evidence.

(c) A, with the intention of causing Z to be convicted of a criminal conspiracy, writes a letter in imitation of Z's handwriting, purporting to be addressed to an accomplice in such criminal conspiracy, and puts the letter in a place which he knows that the officers of the police are likely to search. A has fabricated false evidence.

193. Whoever intentionally gives false evidence in any stage of a judical proceeding, or fabricates false evidence for the purpose of being used in any stage of a judicial proceeding, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine; and whoever intentionally gives or fabricates false evidence in any other case, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Explanation 1.—A trial before a court-martial [1] * * * is a judicial proceeding.

Explanation 2.—An investigation directed by law preliminary to a proceeding before a Court of Justice, is a stage of a judicial proceeding, though that investigation may not take place before a Court of Justice.

Illustration

A, in an enquiry before a Magistrate for the purpose of ascertaining whether Z ought to be committed for trial, makes on oath a statement which he knows to be false. As this enquiry is a stage of a judicial proceeding, A has given false evidence.

Explanation 3.—An investigation directed by a Court of Justice according to law, and conducted under the authority of a Court of Justice, is a stage of a judicial proceeding, though that investigation may not take place before a Court of Justice.

Illustration

A, in an enquiry before an officer deputed by a Court of Justice to ascertain on the spot the boundaries of land, makes on oath a statement which he knows to be false. As this enquiry is a stage of a judicial proceeding, A has given false evidence.

194. Whoever gives or fabricates false evidence, intending thereby to cause, or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby cause, any person to be convicted of an offence which is capital [2] [by the laws for the time being in force in [3] [India]] shall be punished with [4] [imprisonment for life], or with rigorous imprisonment for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine; and if an innocent person be convicted and executed in consequence of such false evidence, the person who gives such false evidence shall be punished either with death or the punishment hereinbefore described.

195. Whoever gives or fabricates false evidence intending thereby to cause, or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby cause, any person to be convicted of an offence which [3] [by the law for the time being in force in [2] [India]] is not capital, but punishable with [1] [imprisonment for life], or imprisonment for a term of seven years or upwards, shall be punished as a person convicted of that offence would be liable to be punished.

Illustration

A gives false evidence before a Court of Justice, intending thereby to cause Z to be convicted of a dacoity. The punishment of dacoity is [2] [imprisonment for life], or rigorous imprisonment for a term which may extend to ten years, with or without fine. A, therefore, is liable to [2] [imprisonment for life] or imprisonment, with or without fine.

196. Whoever corruptly uses or attempts to use as true or genuine evidence any evidence which he knows to be false or fabricated, shall be punished in the same manner as if he gave or fabricated false evidence.

197. Whoever issues or signs any certificate required by law to be given or signed, or relating to any fact of which such certificate is by law admissible in evidence, knowing or believing that such certificate is false in any material point, shall be punished in the same manner as if he gave false evidence.

198. Whoever corruptly uses or attempts to use any such certificate as a true certificate, knowing the same to be false in any material point, shall be punished in the same manner as if he gave false evidence.

199. Whoever, in any declaration made or subscribed by him, which declaration any Court of Justice, or any public servant or other person, is bound or authorized by law to receive as evidence of any fact, makes any statement which is false, and which he either knows or believes to be false or does not believe to be true, touching any point material to the object for which the declaration is made or used, shall be punished in the same manner as if he gave false evidence.

200. Whoever corruptly uses or attempts to use as true any such declaration, knowing the same to be false in any material point, shall be punished in the same manner as if he gave false evidence.

Explanation.—A declaration which is inadmissible merely upon the ground of some informality, is a declaration within the meaning of sections 199 and 200.

201. Whoever, knowing or having reason to believe that an offence has been committed, causes any evidence of the commission of that offence to disappear, with the intention of screening the offender from legal punishment, or with that intention gives any information respecting the offence which he knows or believes to be false, shall, if the offence which he knows or believes to have been committed is punishable with death, be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine;

and if the offence is punishable with [1] [imprisonment for life], or with imprisonment which may extend to ten years, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine;

and if the offence is punishable with imprisonment for any term not extending to ten years, shall be punished with imprisonment of the description provided for the offence, for a term which may extend to one-fourth part of the longest term of the imprisonment provided for the offence, or with fine, or with both.

Illustration

A, knowing that B has murdered Z, assists B to hide the body with the intention of screening B from punishment. A is liable to imprisonment of either description for seven years, and also to fine.

202. Whoever, knowing or having reason to believe that an offence has been committed, intentionally omits to give any information respecting that offence which he is legally bound to give, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine, or with both.

203. Whoever, knowing or having reason to believe that an offense has been committed, gives any information respecting that offence which he knows or believes to be false, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

[1] [Explanation.—In sections 201 and 202 and in this section the word "offence" includes any act committed at any place out of [2] [India], which, if committed in [2] [India], would be punishable under any of the following sections, namely, 302, 304, 382, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 402, 435, 436, 449, 450, 457, 458, 459 and 460.]

204. Whoever secrets or destroys any document which he may be lawfully compelled to produce as evidence in a Court of Justice, or in any proceeding lawfully held before a public servant, as such, or obliterates or renders illegible the whole or any part of such document with the intention of preventing the same from being produced or used as evidence before such Court or public servant as aforesaid, or after he shall have been lawfully summoned or required to produce the same for that purpose, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

205. Whoever falsely personates another, and in such assumed character makes any admission or statement, or confesses judgment, or causes any process to be issued or becomes bail or security, or does any other act in any suit or criminal prosecution, shall be punished with imprisonment or either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

206. Whoever fraudulently removes, conceals, transfers or delivers to any person any property or any interest therein, intending thereby to prevent that property or interest therein from being taken as a forfeiture or in satisfaction of a fine, under a sentence which has been pronounced, or which he knows to be likely to be pronounced, by a Court of Justice or other competent authority, or from being taken in execution of a decree or order which has been made, or which he knows to be likely to be made by a Court of Justice in a civil suit, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

207. Whoever fraudulently accepts, receives or claims any property or any interest therein, knowing that he has no right or rightful claim to such property or interest, or practices any deception touching any right to any property or any interest therein, intending thereby to prevent that property or interest therein from being taken as a forfeiture or in satisfaction of a fine, under a sentence which has been pronounced, or which he knows to be likely to be pronounced by a Court of Justice or other competent authority, or from being taken in execution of a decree or order which has been made, or which he knows to be likely to be made by a Court of Justice in a civil suit, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

208. Whoever fraudulently causes or suffers a decree or order to be passed against him at the suit of any person for a sum not due or for a larger sum than is due to such person or for any property or interest in property to which such person is not entitled, or fraudulently causes or suffers a decree or order to be executed against him after it has been satisfied, or for anything in respect of which it has been satisfied, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Illustration

A institutes a suit against Z. Z, knowing that A is likely to obtain a decree against him fraudulently suffers a judgment to pass against him for a larger amount at the suit of B, who has no just claim against him, in order that B, either on his own account or for the benefit of Z, may share in the proceeds of any sale of Z's property which may be made under A's decree. Z has committed an offense under this section.

209. Whoever fraudulently or dishonestly, or with intent to injure or annoy any person, makes in a Court of Justice any claim which he knows to be false, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, and shall also be liable to fine.

210. Whoever fraudulently obtains a decree or order against any person for a sum not due, or for a larger sum than is due, or for any property or interest in property to which he is not entitled, or fraudulently causes a decree or order to be executed against any person after it has been satisfied or for anything in respect of which it has been satisfied, or fraudulently suffers or permits any such act to be done in his name, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

[2] Subs. by Act 3 of 1951 for "the States".

211. Whoever, with intent to cause injury to any person, institutes or causes to be instituted any criminal proceedings against that person, or falsely charges any person with having committed an offence, knowing that there is no just or lawful ground for such proceeding or charge against that person, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both;

and if such criminal proceeding be instituted on a false charge of an offense punishable with death, [1] [imprisonment for life], or imprisonment for seven years or upwards, shall be punishable with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

212. Whenever an offence has been committed, whoever harbours or conceals a person whom he knows or has reason to believe to be the offender, with the intention of screening him from legal punishment, shall, if the offence is punishable with death, be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to five years, and also be liable to fine.

and if the offence is punishable with [1] [imprisonment for life], or with imprisonment which may extend to ten years, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine;

and if the offence is punishable with imprisonment which may extend to one year, and not to ten years, shall be punishable with imprisonment of the description provided for the offence for a term which may extend to one-fourth part of the longest term of imprisonment provided for the offence, or with fine, or with both.

[2] ["Offence" in this section includes any act committed at any place out of [3] [India], which, if committed in [3] [India], would be punishable under any of the following sections, namely 302, 304, 382, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 402, 435, 436, 449, 450, 457, 458, 459 and 460; and every such act shall, for the purposes of this section, be deemed to be punishable as if the accused person had been guilty if it in [4] [India].]

Exception.—This provision shall not extend to any case in which the harbour or concealment is by the husband or wife of the offender.

Illustration

A, knowing that B has committed dacoity, knowingly conceals B in order to screen him from legal punishment. Here, as B is liable to [1] [imprisonment for life], A is liable to imprisonment of either description for a term not exceeding three years, and is also liable to fine.

213. Whoever accepts or attempts to obtain, or agrees to accept, any gratification for himself or any other person, or any restitution of property to himself or any other person, in consideration of his concealing an offence or his screening any person from legal punishment for any offence, or of his not proceeding against any person for the purpose of bringing him to legal punishment, shall if the offence is punishable with death, be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine:

and if the offence is punishable with [1] [imprisonment for life], or with imprisonment which may extend to ten years, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine; and if the offence is punishable with imprisonment not extending to ten years, shall be punished with imprisonment of the description provided for the offence for a term which may extend to one-fourth part of the longest term of imprisonment provided for the offence, or with fine, or with both.

214. Whoever gives or causes, or offers or agrees to give or cause, any gratification to any person, or [4] [restores or causes the restoration of] any property to any person, in consideration of that person's concealing an offence, or of his screening any person from legal punishment for any offence, or of his not proceeding against any person for the purpose of bringing him to legal punishment, shall, if the offence is punishable with death, be punished with imprisonment

215. Whoever takes or agrees or consents to take any gratification under pretence or on account of helping any person to recover any movable property of which he shall have been deprived by any offence punishable under this Code, shall, unless he uses all means in his power to cause the offender to be apprehended and convicted of the offence, be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

216. Whenever any person convicted of or charged with an offence, being in lawful custody for that offence, escapes from such custody, or whenever a public servant, in the exercise of the lawful powers of such public servant, orders a certain person to be apprehended for an offence, whoever, knowing of such escape or order for apprehension, harbours or conceals that person with the intention of preventing him from being apprehended, shall be punished in the manner following, that is to say,

If the offence for which the person was in custody or is ordered to be apprehended is punishable with death, he shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine:

If the offence is punishable with [3] [imprisonment for life] or imprisonment for ten years, he shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, with or without fine;

and if the offence is punishable with imprisonment which may extend to one year and not to ten years, he shall be punished with imprisonment of the description provided for the offence for a term which may extend to one-fourth part of the longest term of the imprisonment provided for such offence or with fine, or with both.

[3] ["Offence" in this section includes also any act or omission of which a person is alleged to have been guilty of [4] [India] which if he had been guilty he is, [4] [India] would have been punishable as an offence, and for which he is, under any law relating to extradition, [5] * * *, or otherwise liable to be apprehended or detained in custody in [4] [India], and every such act or omission shall, for the purposes of this section, be deemed to be punishable as if the accused person had been guilty of it in [4] [India].]

Exception.—The provision does not extend to the case in which the harbour or concealment is by the husband or wife of the person to be apprehended.

[6] [216A. Whoever, knowing or having reason to believe that any persons are about to commit or have recently committed robbery or dacoity, harbours them or any of them, with the intention of facilitating the commission of such robbery or dacoity, or of screening them or any of them from punishment, shall be punished with rigorous imprisonment for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Explanation.—For the purposes of this section it is immaterial whether the robbery or dacoity is intended to be committed, or has been committed, within or without [4] [India].

Exception.—This provision does not extend to the case in which the harbour is by the husband or wife of the offender.]

217. Whoever, being a public servant, knowingly disobeys any direction of the law as to the way in which he is to conduct himself as such public servant, intending thereby to save, or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby save, any person from legal punishment, or subject him to a less punishment than that to which he is liable, or with intent to save, or knowing that he is likely thereby to save, any property from forfeiture or any charge to which it is liable by law, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

218. Whoever, being a public servant, and being as such public servant, charged with the preparation of any record or other writing, frames that record or writing in a manner which he knows to be incorrect, with intent to cause, or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby cause, loss or injury to the public or to any person, or with intent thereby to save, or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby save, any person from legal punishment, or with intent to save, or knowing that he is likely thereby to save, any property from forfeiture or other charge to which it is liable by law, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

219. Whoever, being a public servant, corruptly or maliciously makes or pronounces in any stage of a judicial proceeding, any report, order, verdict, or decision which he knows to be contrary to law, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, or with fine, or with both.

220. Whoever, being in any office which gives him legal authority to commit persons for trial or to confinement, or to keep persons in confinement, corruptly or maliciously commits any person for trial or confinement, or keeps any person in confinement, in the exercise of that authority, knowing that in so doing he is acting contrary to law, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, or with fine, or with both.

221. Whoever, being a public servant, legally bound as such public servant to apprehend or to keep in confinement any person charged with or liable to be apprehended for an offence, intentionally omits to apprehend such person, or intentionally suffers such person to escape, or intentionally aids such person in escaping or attempting to escape from such confinement, shall be punished as follows, that is to say :—

with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, with or without fine, if the person in confinement, or who ought to have been apprehended, was charged with, or liable to be apprehended for, an offence punishable with death ; or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, with or without fine, if the person in confinement, or who ought to have been apprehended, was charged with, or liable to be apprehended for, an offence punishable with [1] [imprisonment for life] or imprisonment for a term which may extend to ten years ; or

With imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, with or without fine, if the person in confinement, or who ought to have been apprehended, was charged with, or liable to be apprehended for, an offence punishable with imprisonment for a term less than ten years.

222. 287. Whoever does, with any machinery, any act so rashly or negligently as to endanger human life or to be likely to cause hurt or injury to any other person, or knowingly or negligently omits to take such order with any machinery in his possession or under his care as is sufficient to guard against any probable danger to human life from such machinery, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

288. Whoever, in pulling down or repairing any building, knowingly or negligently omits to take such order with that building as is sufficient to guard against any probable danger to human life from the fall of that building, or of any part thereof, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

289. Whoever knowingly or negligently omits to take such order with any animal in his possession as is sufficient to guard against any probable danger to human life, or any probable danger of grievous hurt from such animal, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

290. Whoever commits a public nuisance in any case not otherwise punishable by this Code, shall be punished with fine which may extend to two hundred rupees.

291. Whoever repeats or continues a public nuisance, having been enjoined by any public servant who has lawful authority to issue such injunction not to repeat or continue such nuisance, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine, or with both.

(a) sells, lets to hire, distributes, publicly exhibits or in any manner puts into circulation, or for purposes of sale, hire, distribution, public exhibition or circulation, makes, produces or has in his possession any obscene book, pamphlet, paper, drawing, painting, representation or figure or any other obscene object whatsoever, or

(b) imports, exports or conveys any obscene object for any of the purposes aforesaid, or knowing or having reason to believe that such object will be sold, let to hire, distributed or publicly exhibited or in any manner put into circulation, or

(c) takes part in or receives profits from any business in the course of which he knows or has reason to believe that any such obscene objects are, for any of the purposes aforesaid, made, produced, purchased, kept, imported, exported, conveyed, publicly exhibited or in any manner put into circulation, or

(d) advertises or makes known by any means whatsoever that any person is engaged or is ready to engage in any act which is an offence under this section, or that any such obscene object can be procured from or through any person, or shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three months, or with fine, or with both.

Exception.—This section does not extend to any book, pamphlet, writing, drawing or painting kept or used bonâ fide for religious purposes or any representation sculptured, engraved, painted or otherwise represented on or in any temple, or on any car used for the conveyance of idols, or kept or used for any religious purpose.]

[1] [293. Whoever sells, lets to hire, distributes, exhibits or circulates to any person under the age of twenty years any such obscene object as is referred to in the last preceding section, or offers or attempts so to do, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine, or with both.]

[2] [294. Whoever, to the annoyance of others,

(a) does any obscene act in any public place, or

(b) sings, recites or utters any obscene songs, ballad or words, in or near any public place, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three months, or with fine, or with both.]

[3] [294A. Whoever keeps any office or place for the purpose of drawing any lottery [4] [not being [5] [a State lottery] or a lottery authorized by the State Government] shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine, or with both.

And whoever publishes any proposal to pay any sum, or to deliver any goods, or to do or forbear doing anything for the benefit of any person, on any event or contingency relative or applicable to the drawing of any ticket, lot, number or figure in any such lottery shall be punished with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees.]

Chapter XV

Of Offences Relating to Religion

295. Whoever destroys, damages or defiles any place of worship, or any object held sacred by any class of persons with the intention of thereby insulting the religion of any class of persons or with the knowledge that any class of persons is likely to consider such destruction, damage or defilement as an insult to their religion, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

[6] [295A. Whoever, with deliberate and malicious intention of outraging the religious feelings of any class of [7] [citizens of India],[8] [by words, either spoken or written, or by signs or by visible representations or otherwise] insults or attempts to insult the religion or the religious beliefs of that class, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to [9] [three years], or with fine, or with both.]

296. Whoever voluntarily causes disturbance to any assembly lawfully engaged in the performance of religious worship, or religious ceremonies, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

297. Whoever, with the intention of wounding the feelings of any person, or of insulting the religion of any person, or with the knowledge that the feelings of any person are likely to be wounded, or that the religion of any person is likely to be insulted thereby, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

298. Whoever, with the deliberate intention of wounding the religious feelings of any person, utters any word or makes any sound in the hearing of that person or makes any gesture in the sight of that person or places any object in the sight of that person, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

Chapter XVI

Of Offences Affecting the Human Body

Of offences affecting life

299. Whoever causes death by doing an act with the intention of causing death, or with the intention of causing such bodily injury as is likely to cause death, or with the knowledge that he is likely by such act to cause death, commits the offence of culpable homicide.

Illustrations

(a) A lay sticks and turf over a pit, with the intention of thereby causing death, or with the knowledge that death is likely to be thereby caused. Z, believing the ground to be firm, treads on it, falls in and is killed. A has committed the offence of culpable homicide.

(b) A knows Z to be behind a bush. B does not know it. A, intending to cause, or knowing it to be likely to cause Z's death induces B to fire at the bush. B fires and kills Z. Here B may be guilty of no offence; but A has committed the offence of culpable homicide.

(c) A, by shooting at a fowl with intent to kill and steal it, kills B, who is behind a bush; A not knowing that he was there. Here, although A was doing an unlawful act, he was not guilty of culpable homicide, as he did not intend to kill B or to cause death by doing an act that he knew was likely to cause death.

Explanation 1.—A person who causes bodily injury to another who is labouring under a disorder, disease or bodily infirmity, and thereby accelerates the death of that other, shall be deemed to have caused his death.

Explanation 2.—Where death is caused by bodily injury, the person who causes such bodily injury shall be deemed to have caused the death, although by resorting to proper remedies and skillful treatment the death might have been prevented.

Explanation 3.—The causing of the death of a child in the mother's womb is not homicide. But it may amount to culpable homicide to cause the death of a living child, if any part of that child has been brought forth, though the child may not have breathed or been completely born.

300. Except in the cases hereinafter excepted, culpable homicide is murder, if the act by which the death is caused is done with the intention of causing death, or—

2ndly.—If it is done with the intention of causing such bodily injury as the offender knows to be likely to cause the death of the person to whom the harm is caused, or—

3rdly.—If it is done with the intention of causing bodily injury to any person and the bodily injury intended to be inflicted is sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause death, or—

4thly.—If the person committing the act knows that it is so imminently dangerous that it must, in all probability, cause death, or such bodily injury as is likely to cause death, and commits such act without any excuse for incurring the risk of causing death or such injury as aforesaid.

Illustrations

(a) A shoots Z with the intention of killing him. Z dies in consequence. A commits murder.

(b) A, knowing that Z is labouring under such a disease that a blow is likely to cause his death, strikes him with the intention of causing bodily injury. Z dies in consequence of the blow. A is guilty of murder, although the blow might not have been sufficient in the ordinary course of nature to cause the death of a person in a sound state of health. But if A, not knowing that Z is labouring under any disease, gives him such a blow as would not in the ordinary course of nature kill a person in a sound state of health, here A, although he may intend to cause bodily injury, is not guilty of murder, if he did not intend to cause death or such bodily injury as in the ordinary course of nature would cause death.

(c) A intentionally gives Z a sword-cut or club-wound sufficient to cause the death of a man in the ordinary course of nature. Z dies in consequence. Here A is guilty of murder, although he may not have intended to cause Z's death.

(d) A without any excuse fires a loaded cannon into a crowd of persons and kills one of them. A is guilty of murder, although he may not have had a premeditated design to kill any particular individual.

Exception 1.—Culpable homicide is not murder if the offender, whilst deprived of the power of self-control by grave and sudden provocation, causes the death of the person who gave the provocation or causes the death of any other person by mistake or accident.

The above exception is subject to the following provisos:—

First.—That the provocation is not sought or voluntarily provoked by the offender as an excuse for killing or doing harm to any person.

Secondly.—That the provocation is not given by anything done in obedience to the law, or by a public servant in the lawful exercise of the powers of such public servant.

Thirdly.—That the provocation is not given by anything done in the lawful exercise of the right of private defence.

Explanation.—Whether the provocation was grave and sudden enought to prevent the offence from amounting to murder is a question of fact.

Illustrations

(a) A, under the influence of passion excited by a provocation given by Z, intentionally kills Y, Z's child. This is murder, inasmuch as the provocation was not given by the child, and the death of the child was not caused by accident or misfortune in doing an act caused by the provocation.

(b) Y gives grave and sudden provocation to A. A, on this provocation, fires a pistol at Y, neither intending nor knowing himself to be likely to kill Z, who is near him, but out of sight. A kills Z. Here A has not committed murder, but merely culpable homicide.

(c) A is lawfully arrested by Z, a bailiff. A is excited to sudden and violent passion by the arrest, and kills Z. This is murder, inasmuch as the provocation was given by a thing done by a public servant in the exercise of his powers.

(d) A appears as a witness before Z, a Magistrate. Z says that he does not believe a word of A's deposition, and that A has perjured himself. A is moved to sudden passion by these words, and kills Z. This is murder.

(e) A attempts to pull Z's nose. Z, in the exercise of the right of private defence, lays hold of A to prevent him from doing so. A is moved to sudden and violent passion in consequence, and kills Z. This is murder, inasmuch as the provocation was given by a thing done in the exercise of the right of private defence.

(f) Z strikes B. B is by this provocation excited to violent rage. A, a by-stander, intending to take advantage of B's rage, and to cause him to kill Z, puts a knife into B's hand for that purpose. B kills Z with the knife. Here B may have committed only culpable homicide, but A is guilty of murder.

Exception 2.—Culpable homicide is not murder if the offender, in the exercise in good faith of the right of private defence or person or property, exceeds the power given to him by law and causes the death of the person against whom he is exercising such right of defence without premeditation, and without any intention of doing more harm than is necessary for the purpose of such defence.

Z attempts to horsewhip A, not in such a manner as to cause grievous hurt to A. A draws out a pistol. Z persists in the assault. A believing in good faith that he can by no other means prevent himself from being horsewhipped, shoots Z dead. A has not committed murder, but only culpable homicide.

Exception 3.—Culpable homicide is not murder if the offender, being a public servant or aiding a public servant acting for the advancement of public justice, exceeds the powers given to him by law, and causes death by doing an act which he, in good faith, believes to be lawful and necessary for the due discharge of his duty as such public servant and without ill-will towards the person whose death is caused.

Exception 4.—Culpable homicide is not murder if it is committed without premeditation in a sudden fight in the heat of passion upon a sudden quarrel and without the offender's having taken undue advantage or acted in a cruel or unusual manner.

Explanation.—It is immaterial in such cases which party offers the provocation or commits the first assault.

Exception 5.—Culpable homicide is not murder when the person whose death is caused, being above the age of eighteen years, suffers death or takes the risk of death with his own consent.

Illustration

A, by instigation, voluntarily causes Z, a person under eighteen years of age, to commit suicide. Here, on account of Z's youth, he was incapable of giving consent to his own death; A has therefore abetted murder.

301. If a person, by doing anything which he intends or knows to be likely to cause death, commits culpable homicide by causing the death of any person, whose death he neither intends nor knows himself to be likely to cause, the culpable homicide committed by the offender is of the description of which it would have been if he had caused the death of the person whose death he intended or knew himself to be likely to cause.

302. Whoever commits murder shall be punished with death, or [1][imprisonment for life], and shall also be liable to fine.

303. Whoever, being under sentence of [1][imprisonment for life], commits murder, shall be punished with death.

304. Whoever commits culpable homicide not amounting to murder shall be punished with [1] [imprisonment for life], or imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine, if the act by which the death is caused is done with the intention of causing death, or of causing such bodily injury as is likely to cause death; or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, or with fine, or with both, if the act is done with the knowledge that it is likely to cause death, but without any intention to cause death or to cause such bodily injury as is likely to cause death.

[2] [304A. Whoever causes the death of any person by doing any rash or negligent act not amounting to culpable homicide shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.]

305. If any person under eighteen years of age, any insane person, any delirious person, any idiot, or any person in a state of intoxication commits suicide, whoever abets the commission of such suicide shall be punished with death or [1] [imprisonment for life], or imprisonment for a term not exceeding ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

306. If any person commits suicide, whoever abets the commission of such suicide, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

307. Whoever does any act with such intention or knowledge, and under such circumstances that, if he by that act caused death, he would be guilty of murder, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine; and, if hurt is caused to any person by such act, the offender shall be liable either to [1] [imprisonment for life], or to such punishment as is hereinbefore mentioned.

[3] [When any person offending under this section is under sentence of [1] [imprisonment for life], he may, if hurt is caused, be punished with death.]

Illustrations

(a) A shoots at Z with intention to kill him, under such circumstances that, if death ensued, A would be guilty of murder. A is liable to punishment under this section.

(b) A with the intention of causing the death of a child of tender years exposes it in a desert place. A has committed the offence defined by this section, though the death of the child does not ensue.

(c) A, intending to murder Z, buys a gun and loads it. A has not yet committed the offence. A fires the gun at Z. He has committed the offence defined in this section, and, if by such firing he wounds Z, he is liable to the punishment provided by the latter part of [1] [the first paragraph of] this section.

(d) A, intending to murder Z, by poison, purchases poison and mixes the same with food which remains in A's keeping; A has not yet committed the offence in this section. A places the food on Z's table or delivers it to Z's servants to place it on Z's table. A has committed the offence defined in this section.

308. Whoever does any act with such intention or knowledge and under such circumstances that, if he by that act caused death, he would be guilty of culpable homicide not amounting to murder, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both; and, if hurt is caused to any person by such act, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, or with fine, or with both.

Illustration

A, on grave and sudden provocation, fires a pistol at Z, under such circumstances that if he thereby caused death he would be guilty of culpable homicide not amounting to murder. A has committed the offence defined in this section.

309. Whoever attempts to commit suicide and does any act towards the commission of such offence, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to one year [2] [or with fine, or with both].

310. Whoever, at any time after the passing of this Act, shall have been habitually associated with any other or others for the purpose of committing robbery or child-stealing by means of or accompanied with murder, is a thug.

311. Whoever is a thug, shall be punished with [3] [imprisonment for life], and shall also be liable to fine.

Of the causing of miscarriage, of injuries to unborn children, of the exposure of infants, and of the concealment of births.

312. Whoever voluntarily causes a woman with child to miscarry shall, if such miscarriage be not caused in good faith for the purpose of saving the life of the woman, be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both; and if the woman be quick with child, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Explanation.—A woman who causes herself to miscarry, is within the meaning of this section.

313. Whoever commits the offence defined in the last preceding section without the consent of the woman, whether the woman is quick with child or not, shall be punished with [3] [imprisonment for life], or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

314. Whoever, with intent to cause the miscarriage of a woman with child, does any act which causes the death of such woman, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine; and if the act is done without the consent of the woman, shall be punished either with [3] [imprisonment for life], or with the punishment above mentioned.

Explanation.—It is not essential to this offence that the offender should know that the act is likely to cause death.

315. Whoever before the birth of any child does any act with the intention of thereby preventing that child from being born alive or causing it to die after its birth, and does by such act prevent that child from being born alive, or causes it to die after its birth, shall, if such act be not caused in good faith for the purpose of saving the life of the mother, be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, or with fine, or with both.

316. Whoever does any act under such circumstances, that if he thereby caused death he would be guilty of culpable homicide, and does by such act cause the death of a quick unborn child, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Illustration

A, knowing that he is likely to cause the death of a pregnant woman, does an act which, if it caused the death of the woman, would amount to culpable homicide. The woman is injured but does not die; but the death of an unborn quick child with which she is pregnant is thereby caused. A is guilty of the offence defined in this section.

317. Whoever being the father or mother of a child under the age of twelve years, or having the care of such child, shall expose or leave such child in any place with the intention of wholly abandoning such child, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, or with fine, or with both.

Explanation.—This section is not intended to prevent the trial of the offender for murder or culpable homicide, as the case may be, if the child die inconsequence of the exposure.

318. Whoever, by secretly burying or otherwise disposing of the dead body of a child whether such child die before or after or during its birth, intentionally conceals or endeavours to conceal the birth of such child, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Of hurt

319. Whoever causes bodily pain, disease or infirmity to any person is said to cause hurt.

320. The following kinds of hurt only are designated as "grievous":—

First.—Emasculation.

Secondly.—Permanent privation of the sight of either eye.

Thirdly.—Permanent privation of the hearing of either ear.

Fourthly.—Privation of any member or joint.

Fifthly.—Destruction or permanent impairing of the powers of any member or joint.

Sixthly.—Permanent disfiguration of the head or face.

Seventhly.—Fracture or dislocation of a bone or tooth.

Eighthly.—Any hurt which endangers life or which causes the sufferer to be during the space of twenty days in severe bodily pain, or unable to follow his ordinary pursuits.

321. Whoever does any act with the intention of thereby causing hurt to any person, or with the knowledge that he is likely thereby to cause hurt to any person, and does thereby cause hurt to any person, is said "voluntarily to cause hurt".

322. Whoever voluntarily causes hurt, if the hurt which he intends to cause or knows himself to be likely to cause is grievous hurt, and if the hurt which he causes is grievous hurt, is said "voluntarily to cause grievous hurt".

Explanation.—A person is not said voluntarily to cause grievous hurt except when he both causes grievous hurt and intends or knows himself to be likely to cause grievous hurt. But he is said voluntarily to cause grievous hurt, if intending or knowing himself to be likely to cause grievous hurt of one kind, he actually causes grievous hurt of another kind.

Illustration

A, intending or knowing himself to be likely permanently to disfigure Z's face, gives Z a blow which does not permanently disfigure Z's face, but which causes Z to suffer severe bodily pain for the space of twenty days. A his voluntarily caused grievous hurt.

323. Whoever, except in the case provided for by section 334, voluntarily causes hurt, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

324. Whoever, except in the case provided for by section 334, voluntarily causes hurt be means of any instrument for shooting, stabbing or cutting, or any instrument which, used as a weapon of offence, is likely to cause death, or by means of fire or any heated substance, or by means of any poison or any corrosive substance, or by means of explosive substance or by means of any substance which it is deleterious to the human body to inhale, to swallow, or to receive into the blood, or by means of any animal, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

325. Whoever, except in the case provided for by section 335, voluntarily causes grievous hurt, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

326. Whoever, except in the case provided for by section 335, voluntarily causes grievous hurt by means of any instrument for shooting, stabbing or cutting, or any instrument which, used as a weapon of offence, is likely to cause death, or by means of fire or any heated substances, or by means of any poison or any corrosive substance, or by means of any explosive substance, or by means of any substance which it is deleterious to the human body to inhale, to swallow, or to receive into the blood, or by means of any animal, shall be punished with [1] [imprisonment for life], or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

327. Whoever voluntarily causes hurt, for the purpose of extorting from the sufferer, or from any person interested in the sufferer, any property or valuable security, or constraining the sufferer or any person interested in such sufferer to do anything which is illegal or which may facilitate the commission of an offence, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

328. Whoever administers to or causes to be taken by any person any poison or any stupefying intoxicating or unwholesome drug, or other thing with intent to cause hurt to such person, or with intent to commit or to facilitate the commission of an offence or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby cause hurt, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

329. Whoever voluntarily causes grievous hurt for the purpose of extorting from the sufferer or from any person interested in the sufferer any property or valuable security, or of constraining the sufferer or any person interested in such sufferer to do anything that is illegal or which may facilitate the commission of an offence, shall be punished with [1] [imprisonment for life], or imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

330. Whoever voluntarily causes hurt, for the purpose of extorting from the sufferer or any person interested in the sufferer, any confession or any information which may lead to the detection of an offence or misconduct, or for the purpose of constraining the sufferer or any person interested in the sufferer to restore or to cause the restoration of any property or valuable security or to satisfy any claim or demand, or to give information which may lead to the restoration of any property or valuable security, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Illustrations

(a) A, a police-officer, tortures Z in order to induce Z to confess that he committed a crime. A is guilty of an offence under this section.

(b) A, a police-officer, tortures B to induce him to point out where certain stolen property is deposited. A is guilty of an offence under this section.

(c) A, a revenue officer, tortures Z in order to compel him to pay certain arrears of revenue due from Z. A is guilty of an offence under this section.

(d) A, a zamindar, tortures a raiyat in order to compel him to pay his rent. A is guilty of an offence under this section.

331. Whoever voluntarily causes grievous hurt for the purpose of extorting from the sufferer or any person interested in the sufferer any confession or any information which may lead to the detection of an offense or misconduct, or for the purpose of constraining the sufferer or any person interested in the sufferer to restore or to cause the restoration of any property or valuable security, or to satisfy any claim or demand or to give information which may lead to the restoration of any property or valuable security shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

332. Whoever voluntarily causes hurt to any person being a public servant in the discharge of his duty as such public servant, or with intent to prevent or deter that person or any other public servant from discharging his duty as such public servant, or in consequence of anything done or attempted to be done by that person in the lawful discharge of his duty as such public servant, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

333. Whoever voluntarily causes grievous hurt to any person being a public servant in the discharge of his duty as such public servant, or with intent to prevent or deter that person or any other public servant from discharging his duty as such public servant, or in consequence of anything done or attempted to be done by that person in the lawful discharge of his duty as such public servant, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

334. Whoever voluntarily causes hurt on grave and sudden provocation, if he neither intends nor knows himself to be likely to cause hurt to any person other than the person who gave the provocation shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one month, or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both.

335. Whoever [1] [voluntarily] causes grievous hurt on grave and sudden provocation, if he neither intends nor knows himself to be likely to cause grievous hurt to any person other than the person who gave the provocation shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to four years, or with fine which may extend to two thousand rupees, or with both.

Explanation.—The last two sections are subject to the same provisos as Exception 1, section 300.

336. Whoever does any act so rashly or negligently as to endanger human life or the personal safety of others, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three months, or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both.

337. Whoever causes hurt to any person by doing any act so rashly or negligently as to endanger human life, or the personal safety of others shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both.

338. Whoever causes grievous hurt to any person by doing any act so rashly or negligently as to endanger human life, or the personal safety of others, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

Of wrongful restraint and wrongful confinement.

339. Whoever voluntarily obstructs any person so as to prevent that person from proceeding in any direction in which that person has a right to proceed, is said wrongfully to restrain that person.

Exception.—The obstruction of a private way over land or water which a person in good faith believes himself to have a lawful right to obstruct, is not an offence within the meaning of this section.

Illustration

A obstructs a path along which Z has a right to pass, A not believing in good faith that he has a right to stop the path. Z is thereby prevented from passing. A wrongfully restrains Z.

340. Whoever wrongfully restrains any person in such a manner as to prevent that person from proceeding beyond certain circumscribing limits, is said "wrongfully to confine" that person.

Illustrations

(a) A causes Z to go within a walled space, and locks Z in. Z is thus prevented from proceeding in any direction beyond the circumscribing line of wall. A wrongfully confines Z.

(b) A places men with firearms at the outlets of a building, and tells Z that they will fire at Z if Z attempts to leave the building. A wrongfully confines Z.

341. Whoever wrongfully restrains any person, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to one month, or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both.

342. Whoever wrongfully confines any person, shall be punished with imprisonment or either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

[1] Ins. by Act of 1882, s. 8.

343. Whoever wrongfully confines any person for three days or more, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

344. Whoever wrongfully confines any person for ten days, or more, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine.

345. Whoever keeps any person in wrongful confinement, knowing that a writ for the liberation of that person has been duly issued, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years in addition to any term of imprisonment to which he may be liable under any other section of this Chapter.

346. Whoever wrongfully confines any person in such manner as to indicate an intention that the confinement of such person may not be known to any person interested in the person so confined, or to any public servant, or that the place of such confinement may not be known to or discovered by any such person or public servant as hereinbefore mentioned, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years in addition to any other punishment to which he may be liable for such wrongful confinement.

347. Whoever wrongfully confines any person for the purpose of extorting from the person confined, or from any person interested in the person confined, any property or valuable security or of constraining the person confined or any person interested in such person to do anything illegal or to give any information which may facilitate the commission of an offence, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine.

348. Whoever wrongfully confines any person for the purpose of extorting from the person confined or any person interested in the person confined any confession or any information which may lead to the detection of an offence or misconduct, or for the purpose of constraining the person confined or any person interested in the person confined to restore or to cause the restoration of any property or valuable security or to satisfy any claim or demand, or to give information which may lead to the restoration of any property or valuable security, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Of criminal force and assault

349. A person is said to use force to another if he causes motion, change of motion, or cessation of motion to that other, or if he causes to any substance such motion, or change of motion, or cessation of motion as brings that substance into contact with any part of that other's body, or with anything which that other is wearing or carrying, or with anything so situated that such contact affects that other's sense of feeling: Provided that the person causing the motion, or change of motion, or cessation of motion, causes that motion, change of motion, or cessation of motion in one of the three ways hereinafter described:

First.—By his own bodily power.

Secondly.—By disposing any substance in such a manner that the motion or change or cessation of motion takes place without any further act on his part, or on the part of any other person.

Thirdly.—By inducing any animal to move, to change its motion, or to cease to move.

350. Whoever intentionally uses force to any person, without that person's consent, in order to the committing of any offence, or intending by the use of such force to cause, or knowing it to be likely that by the use of such force he will cause injury, fear or annoyance to the person to whom the force is used, is said to use criminal force to that other.

Illustrations

(a) Z is sitting in a moored boat on a river. A unfastens the moorings, and thus intentionally causes the boat to drift down the stream. Here A intentionally causes motion to Z, and he does this by disposing substances in such a manner that the motion is produced without any other action on any person's part. A has therefore intentionally used force to Z; and if he has done so without Z's consent, in order to the committing of any offence, or intending or knowing it to be likely that this use of force will cause injury, fear or annoyance to Z, A has used criminal force to Z.

(b) Z is riding in a chariot. A lashes Z's horses, and thereby causes them to quicken their pace. Here A has caused change of motion to Z by inducing the animals to change their motion. A has therefore used force to Z; and if A has done this without Z's consent, intending or knowing it to be likely that he may thereby injure, frighten or annoy Z, A has used criminal force to Z.

(c) Z is riding in a palanquin. A, intending to rob Z, seizes the pole and stops the palanquin. Here A has caused cessation of motion to Z, and he has done this by his own bodily power. A has therefore used force to Z; and as A has acted thus intentionally, without Z's consent, in order to the commission of an offence, A has used criminal force to Z.

(d) A intentionally pushes against Z in the street. Here A has by his own bodily power moved his own person so as to bring it into contact with Z. He has therefore intentionally used force to Z; and if he has done so without Z's consent, intending or knowing it to be likely that he may thereby injure, frighten or annoy Z, he has used criminal force to Z.

(e) A throws a stone, intending or knowing it to be likely that the stone will be thus brought into contact with Z, or with Z's clothes, or with something carried by Z, or that it will strike water, and dash up the water against Z's clothes or something carried by Z. Here, if the throwing of the stone produce the effect of causing any substance to come into contact with Z, or Z's clothes, A has used force to Z; and if he did so without Z's consent, intending thereby to injure, frighten or annoy Z, he has used criminal force to Z.

(f) A intentionally pulls up a woman's veil. Here A intentionally uses force to her, and if he does so without her consent intending or knowing it to be likely that he may thereby injure, frighten or annoy her, he has used criminal force to her.

(g) Z is bathing. A pours into the bath water which he knows to be boiling. Here A intentionally by his own bodily power causes such motion in the boiling water as brings that water into contact with Z, or with other water so situated that such contact must affect Z's sense of feeling. A has therefore intentionally used force to Z; and if he has done this without Z's consent intending or knowing it to be likely that he may thereby cause injury, fear or annoyance to Z, A has used criminal force.

(h) A incites a dog to spring upon Z, without Z's consent. Here, if A intends to cause injury, fear or annoyance to Z, he uses criminal force to Z.

351. Whoever makes any gesture, or any preparation intending or knowing it to be likely that such gesture or preparation will cause any person present to apprehend that he who makes that gesture or preparation is about to use criminal force to that person, is said to commit an assault.

Explanation.—Mere words do not amount to an assault. But the words which a person uses may give to his gestures or preparation such a meaning as may make those gestures or preparations amount to an assault.

Illustrations

(a) A shakes his fist at Z, intending or knowing it to be likely that he may thereby cause Z to believe that A is about to strike Z. A has committed an assault.

(b) A begins to unloose the muzzle of a ferocious dog, intending or knowing it to be likely that he may thereby cause Z to believe that he is about to cause the dog to attack Z. A has committed an assault upon Z.

(c) A takes up a stick, saying to Z, "I will give you a beating". Here, though the words used by A could in no case amount to an assault, and though the mere gesture, unaccompanied by any other circumstances, might not amount to an assault, the gesture explained by the words may amount to an assault.

352. Whoever assaults or uses criminal force to any person otherwise than on grave and sudden provocation given by that person, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three months, or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both.

Explanation.—Grave and sudden provocation will not mitigate the punishment for an offence under this section, if the provocation is sought or voluntarily provoked by the offender as an excuse for the offence, or if the provocation is given by anything done in obedience to the law, or by a public servant, in the lawful exercise of the powers of such public servant, or if the provocation is given by anything done in the lawful exercise of the right of private defence.

Whether the provocation was grave and sudden enough to mitigate the offence, is a question of fact.

353. Whoever assaults or uses criminal force to any person being a public servant in the execution of his duty as such public servant, or with intent to prevent or deter that person from discharging his duty as such public servant, or in consequence of anything done or attempted to be done by such person in the lawful discharge of his duty as such public servant, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or both.

354. Whoever assaults or uses criminal force to any woman, intending to outrage or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby outrage her modesty, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

355. Whoever assaults or uses criminal force to any person, intending thereby to dishonour that person, otherwise than on grave and sudden provocation given by that person, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or wtih fine, or with both.

356. Whoever assaults or uses criminal force to any person in attempting to commit theft on any property which that person is then wearing or carrying shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

357. Whoever assaults or uses criminal force to any person, in attempting wrongfully to confine that person, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

358. Whoever assaults or uses criminal force to any person on grave and sudden provocation given by that person, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to one month, or with fine which may extend to two hundred rupees, or with both.

Explanation.—The last section is subject to the same explanation as section 352.

Of Kidnapping, Abduction, Slavery and Forced Labour

359. Kidnapping is of two kinds: kidnapping from [1] [India], and kidnapping from lawful guardianship.

360. Whoever conveys any person beyond the limits of [1][India] without the consent of that person, or of some person legally authorized to consent on behalf of that person, is said to kidnap that person from [1] [India].

361. Whoever takes or entices any minor under [2] [sixteen] years of age if a male, or under [3] [eighteen] years of age if a female, or any person of unsound mind, out of the keeping of the lawful guardian of such minor or person of unsound mind, without the consent of such guardian, is said to kidnap such minor or person from lawful guardianship.

Explanation.—The words "lawful guardian" in this section include any person lawfully entrusted with the care or custody of such minor or other person.

Exception.—This section does not extend to the act of any person who in good faith believes himself to be the father of an illegitimate child, or who in good faith believes himself to be entitled to the lawful custody of such child, unless such act is committed for an immoral or unlawful purpose.

362. Whoever by force compels, or by any deceitful means induces any person to go from any place, is said to abduct that person.

363. Whoever kidnaps any person from [1] [India] or from lawful guardianship, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

[4] [363A. (1) Whoever kidnaps any minor, or, not being the lawful guardian of a minor, obtains the custody of the minor, in order that such minor may be employed or used for the purposes of begging shall be punishable with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

(2) Whoever maims any minor in order that such minor may be employed or used for the purposes of begging shall be punishable with imprisonment for life, and shall also be liable to fine.

(3) Where any person, not being the lawful guardian of a minor, employs or uses such minor for the purposes of begging, it shall be presumed, unless the contrary is proved, that he kidnapped or otherwise obtained the custody of that minor in order that the minor might be employed or used for the purposes of begging.

(4) In this section,—

(a) "begging" means—

(i) soliciting or receiving alms in a public place, whether under the pretence of singing, dancing, fortune-telling, performing tricks or selling articles or otherwise;

(ii) entering on any private premises for the purpose of soliciting or receiving alms;

(iii) exposing or exhibiting, with the object of obtaining or extorting alms, any sore, wound, injury, deformity or disease, whether of himself or of any other person or of an animal;

(iv) using a minor as an exhibit for the purpose of soliciting or receiving alms;

(b) "minor" means—

(i) in the case of a male, a person under sixteen years of age; and

(ii) in the case of a female, a person under eighteen years of age]

364. Whoever kidnaps or abducts any persons in order that such person may be murdered or may be so disposed of as to put in danger of being murdered, shall be punished with [1] [imprisonment for life] or rigorous imprisonment for a term which may be extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Illustrations

(a) A kidnaps Z from [2] [India], intending or knowing it to be likely that Z may be sacrificed to an idol. A has committed the offence defined in this section.

(b) A forcibly carries or entices B away from his home in order that B may be murdered. A has committed the offence defined in this section.

365. Whoever kidnaps or abducts any person with intent to cause that person to be secretly and wrongfully confined, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

366. Whoever kidnaps or abducts any woman with intent that she mey be compelled, or knowing it to be likely that she will be compelled, to marry any person against her will, or in order that she may be forced or seduced to illicit intercourse, or knowing it to be likely that she will be forced or seduced to illicit intercourse, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine; [3][and whoever, by means of criminal intimidation as defined in this Code or of abuse of authority or any other method of compulsion, induces any woman to go from any place with intent that she may be, or knowing that it is likely that she will be, forced or seduced to illicit intercourse with another person shall also be punishable as aforesaid].

[4] [336A. Whoever, by any means whatsoever, induces any minor girl under the age of eighteen years to go from any place or to do any act with intent that such girl may be, or knowing that it is likely that she will be, forced or seduced to illicit intercourse with another person shall be punishable with imprisonment which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

336B. Whoever imports into [2] [India] from any country outside India [5] [or from the State of Jammu and Kashmir] any girl under the age of twenty-one years with intent that she may be, or knowing it to be likely that she will be, forced or seduced to illicit intercourse with another person, shall be punishable with imprisonment which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.]

367. Whoever kidnaps or abducts any person in order that such person may be subjected, or may be so disposed of as to be put in danger of being subjected to grievous hurt, or slavery, or to the unnatural lust of any person, or knowing it to be likely that such person will be so subjected or disposed of, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

368. Whoever, knowing that any person has been kidnapped or has been abducted, wrongfully conceals or confines such person, shall be punished in the same manner as if he had kiddnapped or abducted such person with the same intention or knowledge, or for the same purpose as that with or for which he conceals or detains such person in confinement.

369. Whoever kidnaps or abducts any child under the age of ten years with the intention of taking dishonestly any movable property from the person of such child, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

370. Whoever imports, exports, removes, buys, sells or disposes of any person as a slave, or accepts, receives or detains against his will any person as a slave shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

371. Whoever habitually imports, exports, removes, buys, sells, traffics or deals in slaves, shall be punished with [1][imprisonment for life], or with imprisonment of either description for a term not exceedng ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

372. Whoever sells, lets to hire or otherwise disposes of any [2][person under the age of eighteen years with intent that such person shall at any age be employed or used for the purpose of prostitution or illicit intercourse with any person or for any unlawful and immoral purpose or knowing it to be likely that such person will at any age be] employed or used for any such purpose shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years and shall also be liable to fine.

[3][Explanation I.—When a female under the age of eighteen years is sold, let for hire, or otherwise disposed of to a prostitute or to any person who keeps or manages a brothel, the person so disposing of such female shall until the contrary is proved, be presumed to have disposed of her with the intent that she shall be used for the purpose of prostitution.

Explanation II.—For the purposes of this section "illicit intercourse" means sexual intercourse between persons not united by marriage, or by any union or tie which, though not amounting to a marriage, is recognised by the personal law or custom of the community to which they belong or, where they belong to different communities, of both such communities, as constituting between them a quasi-marital relation.]

373. Whoever buys, hires or otherwise obtains possession of any [2][person under the age of eighteen years with intent that such person shall at any age be employed or used for the purpose of prostitution or illicit intercourse with any person or for any unlawful and immoral purpose, or knowing it to be likely that such person will at any age be] employed or used for any such purpose, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

[4][Explanation I.—Any prostitute or any person keeping or managing a brothel, who buys, hires or otherwise obtains possession of a female under the age of eighteen years shall, until the contrary is proved, be presumed to have obtained possession of such female with the intent that she shall be used for the purpose of prostitution.

Explanation II.—"Illicit intercourse" has the same meaning as in section 372.]

374. Whoever unlawfully compels any person to labour against the will of that person, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

Of rape

375. A man is said to commit "rape" who except in the case hereinafter excepted, has sexual intercourse with a woman under circumstances falling under any of the five following descriptions :—

First.—Against her will.

Secondly.—Without her consent.

Thirdly.—With her consent, when her consent has been obtained by putting her in fear of death, or of hurt.

Fourthly.—With her consent, when the man knows that he is not her husband, and that her consent is given because she believes that he is another man to whom she is or believes herself to be lawfully married.

Fifthly.—With or without her consent, when she is under [1] [sixteen] years of age.

Explanation.—Penetration is sufficient to constitute the sexual intercourse necessary to the offense of rape.

Exception.—Sexual intercourse by a man with his own wife, the wife not being under [1] [fifteen] years of age, is not rape.

376. Whoever commits rape shall be punished with [2] [imprisonment for life], or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine, [3] [unless the woman raped is his own wife, and is not under twelve years of age, in which case he shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, of with fine, or with both.]

Of Unnatural Offences

377. Whoever voluntarily has carnal intercourse against the order of nature with any man, woman, or animal, shall be punished with [2] [imprisonment for life], or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Explanation.—Penetration is sufficient to constitute the carnal intercourse necessary to the offence described in this section.

Chapter XVII

Of Offences Against Property

Of Theft

378. Whoever, intending to take dishonestly any movable property out of the possession of any person without that person's consent, moves that property in order to such taking, is said to commit theft.

Explanation 1.—A thing so long as it is attached to the earth, not being movable property, is not the subject of theft ; but it becomes capable of being the subject of theft as soon as it is severed from the earth.

Explanation 2.—A moving effected by the same act which effects the severance may be a theft.

Explanation 3.—A person is said to cause a thing to move by removing an obstacle which prevented it from moving or by separating it from any other thing, as well as by actually moving it.

Explanation 4.—A person, who by any means causes an animal to move, is said to move that animal, and to move everything which, in consequence of the motion so caused, is moved by that animal.

Explanation 5.—The consent mentioned in the definition may be express or implied, and may be given either by the person in possession, or by any person having for that purpose authority either express or implied.

Illustrations

(a) A cuts down a tree on Z's ground, with the intention of dishonestly taking the tree out of Z's possession without Z's consent. Here, as soon as A has severed the tree in order to such taking, he has committed theft.

(b) A puts a bait for dogs in his pocket, and thus induces Z's dog to follow it. Here, if A's intention be dishonestly to take the dog out of Z's possession

[1] The original word "ten" has successively been amended by Acts 10 of 1891, 29 of 1925 and Act 42 of 1949, s. 3, to read as above.

[2] Subs. by Act 26 of 1955, s. 117 and Sch., for "transportation for life".

[3] Ins. by Act 29 of 1925, s. 3.

without Z's consent, A has committed theft as soon as Z's dog has begun to follow A.

(c) A meets a bullock carrying a box of treasure. He drives the bullock in a certain direction, in order that he may dishonestly take the treasure. As soons as the bullock begins to move, A has committed theft of the treasure.

(d) A being Z's servant, and entrusted by Z with the care of Z's plate, dishonestly runs away with plate, without Z's consent. A has committed theft.

(e) Z, going on a journey, entrusts his plate to A, the keeper of a warehouse, till Z shall return. A carries the plate to a goldsmith and sells it. Here the plate was not in Z's possession. It could not therefore be taken out of Z's possession, and A has not committed theft, though he may have committed criminal breach of trust.

(f) A finds a ring belonging to Z on a table in the house which Z occupies. Here the ring is in Z's possession, and if A dishonestly removes it, A commits theft.

(g) A finds a ring lying on the high-road, not in the possession of any person. A, by taking it, commits no theft, though he may commit criminal misappropriation of property.

(h) A sees a ring belonging to Z lying on a table in Z's house. Not venturing to misappropriate the ring immediately for fear of search and detection, A hides the ring in a place where it is highly improbable that it will ever be found by Z, with the intention of taking the ring from the hiding place and selling it when the loss is forgotten. Here A, at the time of first moving the ring, commits theft.

(i) A delivers his watch to Z, a jeweller, to be regulated. Z carries it to his shop. A, not owing to the jeweller any debt for which the jeweller might lawfully detain the watch as a security, enters the shop openly, takes his watch by force out of Z's hand, and carries it away. Here A, though he may have committed criminal trespass and assault, has not committed theft, inasmuch as what he did was not done dishonestly.

(j) If A owes money to Z for repairing the watch, and if Z retains the watch lawfully as a security for the debt, and A takes the watch out of Z's possession, with the intention of depriving Z of the property as a security for his debt, he commits theft, inasmuch as he takes it dishonestly.

(k) Again, if A, having pawned his watch to Z, takes it out of Z's possession without Z's consent, not having paid what he borrowed on the watch, he commits theft, though the watch is his own property inasmuch as he takes it dishonestly.

(l) A takes an article belonging to Z out of Z's possession without Z's consent, with the intention of keeping it until he obtains money from Z as a reward for its restoration. Here A takes dishonestly; A has therefore committed theft.

(m) A, being an friendly terms with Z, goes into Z's library in Z's absence, and takes away a book without Z's express consent for the purpose merely of reading it, and with the intention of returning it. Here, it is probable that A may have conceived that he had Z's implied consent to use Z's book. If this was A's impression, A has not committed theft.

(n) A asks charity from Z's wife. She gives A money, food and clothes, which A knows to belong to Z her husband. Here it is probable that A may conceive that Z's wife is authorized to give away alms. If this was A's impression, A has not committed theft.

(o) A is the paramour of Z's wife. She gives a valuable property, which A knows to belong to her husband Z, and to be such property as she has not authority from Z to give. If A takes the property dishonestly, he commits theft.

(p) A, in good faith, believing property belonging to Z to be A's own property takes that property out of B's possession. Here, as A does not take dishonestly, he does not commit theft.

379. Whoever commits theft shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three year, or with fine, or with both.

380. Whoever commits theft in any building, tent or vessel, which building, tent or vessel is used as a human dwelling, or used for the custody of property, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

381. Whoever being a clerk or servant, or being employed in the capacity of a clerk or servant, commits theft in respect of any property in the possession of his master or employer, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

382. Whoever commits theft, having made preparation for causing death, or hurt, or restraint, or fear of death, or of hurt, or of restraint, to any person, in order to the committing of such theft, or in order to the effecting of his escape after the committing of such theft or in order to the retaining of property taken by such theft, shall be punished with rigorous imprisonment for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Illustrations

(a) A commits theft on property in Z's possession; and, while committing this theft, he has a loaded pistol under his garment having provided this pistol for the purpose of hurting Z in case Z should resist. A has committed the offence defined in this section.

(b) A picks Z's pocket, having posted several of his companions near him, in order that they may restrain Z, if Z should perceive what is passing and should resist, or should attempt to apprehend A. A has committed the offence defined in this section.

Of Extortion

383. Whoever intentionally puts any person in fear of any injury to that person, or to any other, and thereby dishonestly induces the person to put in fear to deliver to any person any property or valuable security or anything signed or sealed which may be converted into a valuable security, commits "extortion".

Illustrations

(a) A threatens to publish a dafamatory libel concerning Z unless Z gives him money. He thus induces Z to give him money. A has committed extortion.

(b) A threatens Z that he will keep Z's child in wrongful confinement, unless Z will sign and deliver to A a promissory note binding Z to pay certain money to A. Z signs and delivers the note. A has committed extortion.

(c) A threatens to send club-men to plough up Z's field unless Z will sign and deliver to B a bond binding Z under a penalty to deliver certain produce to B, and thereby induces Z to sign and deliver the bond. A has committed extortion.

(d) A, by putting Z in fear of grievous hurt, dishonestly induces Z to sign or affix his seal to a blank paper and deliver it to A. Z signs and delivers the paper to A. Here, as the paper so signed may be converted into a valuable security, A has committed extortion.

384. Whoever commits extortion shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

385. Whoever, in order to the committing of extortion, puts any person in fear, or attempts to put any person in fear, of any injury, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

386. Whoever commits extortion by putting any person in fear of death or of grievous hurt to that person or to any other, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

387. Whoever, in order to the committing of extortion, puts or attempts to put any person in fear of death or of grievous hurt to that person or to any other, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

388. Whoever commits extortion by putting any person in fear of an accusation against that person or any other, of having committed or attempted to commit any offence punishable with death, or with [1] [imprisonment for life], or with imprisonment for a term which may extend to ten years, or of having attempted to induce any other person to commit such offence, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine; and, if the offence to be punishable under section 377 of this Code, may be punished with [1] [imprisonment for life].

389. Whoever, in order to the committing of extortion, puts or attempts to put any person in fear of an accusation, against that person or any other, of having committed, or attempted to commit, an offence punishable with death or with

[1] [imprisonment for life], or with imprisonment for a term which may extend to ten years, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine; and, if the offence be punishable under section 377 of this Code, may be punished with [1] [imprisonment for life].

Of Robbery and Dacoity

390. In all robbery there is either theft or extortion.

Theft is "robbery" if, in order to the committing of the theft, or in committing the theft, or in carrying away or attempting to carry away property obtained by the theft, the offender, for that end, voluntarily causes or attempts to cause to any person death or hurt or wrongful restraint, or fear of instant death or of instant hurt, or of instant wrongful restraint.

Extortion is "robbery" if the offender, at the time of committing the extortion, is in the presence of the person put in fear, and commits the extortion by putting that person in fear of instant death, of instant hurt, or of instant wrongful restraint to that person, or to some other person, and, by so putting in fear, induces the person so put in fear then and there to deliver up the thing extorted.

Explanation.—The offender is said to be present if he is sufficiently near to put the other person in fear of instant death, of instant hurt, or of instant wrongful restraint.

Illustrations

(a) A holds Z down, and fraudulently takes Z's money and jewels from Z's clothes, without Z's consent. Here A has committed theft, and, in order to the committing of that theft, has voluntarily caused wrongful restraint to Z. A has therefore committed robbery.

(b) A meets B on the high road, shows a pistol, and demands Z's purse. Z, in consequence, surrenders his purse. Here A has extored the purse from Z by putting him in fear of instant hurt, and being at the time of committing the extortion in his presence. A has therefore committed robbery.

(c) A meets Z and Z's child on the high road. A takes the child, and threatens to fling it down a precipice, unless Z delivers his purse. Z, in consequence, delivers his purse. Here A has extorted the purse from Z, by causing Z to be in fear of instant hurt to the child who is there present. A has therefore committed robbery on Z.

(d) A obtains property from Z by saying—"Your child is in the hands of my gang, and will be put to death unless you send us ten thousand rupees". This is extortion, and punishable as such; but it is not robbery, unless Z is put in fear of the instant death of his child.

391. When five or more persons conjointly commit or attempt to commit a robbery, or where the whole number of persons conjointly committing or attempting to commit a robbery, and persons present and aiding such commission or attempt, amount to five or more, every person so committing, attempting or aiding, is said to commit "dacoity".

392. Whoever commits robbery shall be punished with rigorous imprisonment for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine; and, if the robbery be committed on the highway between sunset and sunrise, the imprisonment may be extended to fourteen years.

393. Whoever attempts to commit robbery shall be punished with rigorous imprisonment for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

394. If any person, in committing or in attempting to commit robbery, voluntarily causes hurt, such person, and any other person jointly concerned in committing or attempting to commit such robbery, shall be punished with [1] [imprisonment for life], or with rigorous imprisonment for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

395. Whoever commits dacoity shall be punished with [1] [imprisonment for life], or with rigorous imprisonment for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

396. If any one of five or more persons, who are conjointly committing dacoity, commits murder in so committing dacoity, every one of those persons shall be punished with death, or [1] [imprisonment for life], or rigorous imprisonment for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

[1] Subs. by Act 26 of 1955, s. 117 and Sch., for "transportation for life".

397. If, at the time of committing robbery or dacoity, the offender uses any deadly weapon, or causes grievous hurt to any person, or attempts to cause death or grievous hurt to any person, the imprisonment with which such offender shall be punished shall not be less than seven years.

398. If, at the time of attempting to commit robbery or dacoity, the offender is armed with any deadly weapon, the imprisonment with which such offender shall be punished shall not be less than seven years.

399. Whoever makes any preparation for committing dacoity, shall be punished with rigorous imprisonment for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

400. Whoever, at any time after the passing of this Act, shall belong to a gang of persons associated for the purpose of habitually committing dacoity, shall be punished with [1] [imprisonment for life], or with rigorous imprisonment for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

401. Whoever, at any time after the passing of this Act, shall belong to any wandering or other gang of persons associated for the purpose of habitually committing theft or robbery, and not being a gang of thugs or dacoits, shall be punished with rigorous imprisonment for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

402. Whoever, at any time after the passing of this Act, shall be one of five or more persons assembled for the purpose of committing dacoity, shall be punished with rigorous imprisonment for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Of Criminal Misappropriation of Property

403. Whoever dishonestly misappropriates or converts to his own use any movable property, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Illustrations

(a) A takes property belonging to Z out of Z's possession in good faith, believing, at the time when he takes it, that the property belongs to himself. A is not guilty of theft; but if A, after discovering his mistake, dishonestly appropriates the property to his own use, he is guilty of an offence under this section.

(b) A, being on friendly terms with Z, goes into Z's library in Z's absence, and takes away a book without Z's express consent. Here, if A was under the impression that he had Z's implied consent to take the book for the purpose of reading it, A has not committed theft. But, if A afterwards sells the book for his own benefit, he is guilty of an offence under this section.

(c) A and B being joint owners of a horse, A takes the horse out of B's possession, intending to use it. Here, as A has a right to use the horse, he does not dishonestly misappropriate it. But, if A sells the horse and appropriates the whole proceeds to his own use, he is guilty of an offence under this section.

Explanation 1.—A dishonest misappropriation for a time only is a misappropriation within the meaning of this section.

Illustration

A finds a Government promissory note belonging to Z, bearing a blank endorsement. A, knowing that the note belongs to Z, pledges it with a banker as a security for a loan, intending at a future time to restore it to Z. A has committed an offence under this section.

Explanation 2.—A person who finds property not in the possession of any other person, and takes such property for the purpose of protecting it for, or restoring it to, the owner, does not take or misappropriate it dishonestly, and is not guilty of his own use, when he knows or has the means of discovering the owner, or before he has used reasonable means to discover and give notice to the owner and has kept the property a reasonable time to enable the owner to claim it.

What are reasonable means or what is a reasonable time in such a case, is a question of fact.

It is not necessary that the finder should know who is the owner of the property, or that any particular person is the owner of it: it is sufficient if, at the time of appropriating it, he does not believe it to be his own property, or in good faith believes that the real owner cannot be found.

Illustrations

(a) A finds a rupee on the high-road, not knowing to whom the rupee belongs. A picks up the rupee. Here A has not committed the offence defined in this section.

---

[1] Subs. by Act 26 of 1955, s. 117 and Sch., for "transportation for life".

(b) A finds a letter on the road, containing a bank note. From the direction and contents of the letter he learns to whom the note belongs. He appropriates the note. He is guilty of an offence under this section.

(c) A finds a cheque payable to bearer. He can form no conjecture as to the person who has lost the cheque. But the name of the person, who has drawn the cheque, appears. A knows that this person can direct him to the person in whose favour the cheque was drawn. A appropriates the cheque without attempting to discover the owner. He is guilty of an offence under this section.

(d) A sees Z drop his purse with money in it. A picks up the purse with the intention of restoring it to Z, but afterwards appropriates it to his own use. A has committed an offence under this section.

(e) A finds a purse with money, not knowing to whom it belongs; he afterwards discovers that it belongs to Z, and appropriates it to his own use. A is guilty of an offence under this section.

(f) A finds a valuable ring, not knowing to whom it belongs. A sells it immediately without attempting to discover the owner. A is guilty of an offence under this section.

404. Whoever dishonestly misappropriates or converts to his own use property, knowing that such property was in the possession of a deceased person at the time of that person's decease, and has not since been in the possession of any person legally entitled to such possession, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years and shall also be liable to fine; and if the offender at the time of such person's decease was employed by him as a clerk or servant, the imprisonment may extend to seven years.

Illustration

Z dies in possession of furniture and money. His servant A, before the money comes into the possession of any person entitled to such possession, dishonestly misappropriates it. A has committed the offence defined in this section.

Of Criminal Breach of Trust

405. Whoever, being in any manner entrusted with property, or with any dominion over property, dishonestly misappropriates or converts to his own use that property, or dishonestly uses or disposes of that property in violation of any direction of law prescribing the mode in which such trust is to be discharged, or of any legal contract, express or implied, which he has made touching the discharge of such trust, or willfully suffers any other person so to do, commits "criminal breach of trust".

Illustrations

(a) A, being executor to the will of a deceased person, dishonestly disobeys the law which directs him to divide the effects according to the will, and appropriates them to his own use. A has committed criminal breach of trust.

(b) A is a warehouse-keeper. Z, going on a journey, entrusts his furniture to A, under a contract that it shall be returned on payment of a stipulated sum for warehouse-room. A dishonestly sells the goods. A has committed criminal breach of trust.

(c) A, residing in Calcutta, is agent for Z, residing at Delhi. There is an express or implied contract between A and Z, that all sums remitted by Z to A shall be invested by A, according to Z's direction. Z remits a lakh of rupees to A, with directions to A to invest the same in Company's paper. A dishonestly disobeys the directions and employs the money in his own business. A has committed criminal breach of trust.

(d) But if A, in the last illustration, not dishonestly but in good faith, believing that it will be more for Z's advantage to hold shares in the Bank of Bengal, disobeys Z's directions, and buys shares in the Bank of Bengal, for Z, instead of buying Company's paper, here, though Z should suffer loss, and should be entitled to bring a civil action against A, on account of that loss, yet A, not having acted dishonestly, has not committed criminal breach of trust.

(e) A, a revenue-officer, is entrusted with public money and is either directed by law, or bound by a contract, express or implied, with the Government, to pay into a certain treasury all the public money which he holds. A dishonestly appropriates the money. A has committed criminal breach of trust.

(f) A, a carrier, is entrusted by Z with property to be carried by land or by water. A dishonestly misappropriates the property. A has committed criminal breach of trust.

406. Whoever commits criminal breach of trust shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

407. Whoever, being entrusted with property as a carrier, wharfinger or warehouse-keeper, commits criminal breach of trust, in respect of such property, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

408. Whoever, being a clerk or servant or employed as a clerk or servant, and being in any manner entrusted in such capacity with property, or with any dominion over property, commits criminal breach of trust in respect of that property, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

409. Whoever, being in any manner entrusted with property, or with any dominion over property in his capacity of a public servant or in the way of his business as a banker, merchant, factor, broker, attorney or agent, commits criminal breach of trust in respect of that property, shall be punished with [1] [imprisonment for life], or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Of the receiving of stolen property

410. Property, the possession whereof has been transferred by theft, or by extortion, or by robbery, and property which has been criminally misappropriated or in respect of which [2] * * * criminal breach of trust has been committed, is designated as 'stolen property", [3] [whether the transfer has been made, or the misappropriation or breach of trust has been committed, within or without [4] [India]]. But, if such property subsequently comes into the possession of a person legally entitled to the possession thereof, it then ceases to be stolen property.

411. Whoever dishonestly receives or retains any stolen property, knowing or having reason to believe the same to be stolen property, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

412. Whoever dishonestly receives or retains any stolen property, the possession whereof he knows or has reason to believe to have been transferred by the commission of dacoity, or dishonestly receives from a person, whom he knows or has reason to believe to belong or to have belonged to a gang of dacoits, property which he knows or has reason to believe to have been stolen, shall be punished with [1][imprisonment for life], or with rigorous imprisonment for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

413. Whoever habitually receives or deals in property which he knows or has reason to believe to be stolen property, shall be punished with [1] [imprisonment for life], or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

414. Whoever voluntarily assists in concealing or disposing of or making away with property which he knows or has reason to believe to be stolen property, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

Of Cheating

415. Whoever, by deceiving any person, fraudulently or dishonestly induces the person so deceived to deliver any property to any person, or to consent that any person shall retain any property, or intentionally induces the person so deceived to do or omit to do anything which he would not do or omit if he were not so deceived, and which act or omission causes or is likely to cause damage or harm to that person in body, mind, reputation or property, is said to "cheat".

[2] The words "the" and "offence of" were rep. by Act 12 of 1891, and Act 8 of 1882, s. 9, respectively.
[3] Ins. by Act 8 of 1882, s. 9.
[4] Subs. by Act 3 of 1951 for "the States".

Explanation.—A dishonest concealment of facts is a deception within the meaning of this section.

Illustrations

(a) A, by falsely pretending to be in the Civil Service, intentionally deceives Z, and thus dishonestly induces Z to let him have on credit goods for which he does not mean to pay. A cheats.

(b) A, by putting a counterfeit mark on an article, intentially deceives Z into a belief that this article was made by a certain celebrated manufacturer, and thus dishonestly induces Z to buy and pay for the article. A cheats.

(c) A, by exhibiting to Z a false sample of an article, intentionally deceives Z into believing that the article corresponds with the sample, and thereby dishonestly induces Z to buy and pay for the article. A cheats.

(d) A, by tendering in payment for an article a bill on a house with which A keeps no money, and by which A expects that the bill will be dishonoured, intentionally deceives Z, and thereby dishonestly induces Z to deliver the article, intending not to pay for it. A cheats.

(e) A, by pledging as diamonds articles which he knows are not diamonds, intentionally deceives Z, and thereby dishonestly induces Z to lend money. A cheats.

(f) A intentionally deceives Z into a belief that A means to repay any money that Z may lend to him and thereby dishonestly induces Z to lend him money, A not intending to repay it. A cheats.

(g) A intentionally deceives Z into a belief that A means to deliver to Z a certain quantity of indigo plant which he does not intend to deliver, and thereby dishonestly induces Z to advance money upon the faith of such delivery. A cheats; but if A, at the time of obtaining the money, intends to deliver the indigo plant, and afterwards breaks his contract and does not deliver it, he does not cheat, but is liable only to a civil action for breach of contract.

(h) A intentionally deceives Z into a belief that A has performed A's part of a contract made with Z, which he has not performed, and thereby dishonestly induces Z to pay money. A cheats.

(i) A sells and conveys an estate to B. A, knowing that in consequence of such sale he has no right to the property, sells or mortgages the same to Z, without disclosing the fact of the previous sale and conveyance to B, and receives the purchase or mortgage money from Z. A cheats.

416. A person is said to "cheat by personation" if he cheats by pretending to be some other person, or by knowingly substituting one person for another, or representing that he or any other person is a person other than he or such other person really is.

Explanation.—The offence is committed whether the individual personated is a real or imaginary person.

Illustrations

(a) A cheats by pretending to be a certain rich banker of the same name. A cheats my personation.

(b) A cheats by pretending to be B, a person who is deceased. A cheats by personation.

417. Whoever cheats shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

418. Whoever cheats with the knowledge that he is likely thereby to cause wrongful loss to a person whose interest in the transaction to which the cheating relates, he was bound either by law, or by legal contract, to protect, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

419. Whoever cheats by personation shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

420. Whoever cheats and thereby dishonestly induces the person deceived to deliver any property to any person, or to make, alter or destroy the whole or any part of a valuable security, or anything which is signed or sealed, and which is capable of being converted into a valuable security, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Of Fraudulent Deeds and Dispositions of Property

421. Whoever dishonestly or fraudulently removes, conceals or delivers to any person, or transfers or causes to be transferred to any person, without adequate consideration, any property, intending thereby to prevent, or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby prevent, the distribution of that property according to law among his creditors or the creditors of any other person, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

422. Whoever dishonestly or fraudulently prevents any debt or demand due to himself or to any other person from being made available according to law for payment of his debts or the debts of such other person, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine or with both.

423. Whoever dishonestly or fraudulently signs, executes or becomes a party to any deed or instrument which purports to transfer or subject to any charge any property, or any interest therein, and which contains any false statement relating to the consideration for such transfer or charge, or relating to the person or persons for whose use or benefit it is really intended to operate, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

424. Whoever dishonestly or fraudulently conceals or removes any property of himself or any other person, or dishonestly or fraudulently assists in the concealment or removal thereof, or dishonestly releases any demand or claim to which he is entitled, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Of Mischief

425. Whoever, with intent to cause, or knowing that he is likely to cause, wrongful loss or damage to the public or to any person, causes the destruction of any property, or any such change in any property or in the situation thereof as destroys or diminishes its value or utility, or affects it injuriously, commits "mischief".

Explanation 1.—It is not essential to the offence of mischief that the offender should intend to cause loss or damage to the owner of theproperty injured or destroyed. It is sufficient if he intends to cause, or knows that he is likely to cause, wrongful loss or damage to any person by injuring any property, whether it belongs to that person or not.

Explanation 2.—Mischief may be committed by an act affecting property belonging to the person who commits the act, or to that person and others jointly.

Illustrations

(a) A voluntarily burns a valuable security belonging to Z intending to cause wrongful loss to Z. A has committeed mischief.

(b) A introduces water into an ice-house belonging to Z and thus causes the ice to melt, intending wrongful loss to Z. A has committed mischief.

(c) A voluntarily throws into a river a ring belonging to Z, with the intention of thereby causing wrongful loss to Z. A has committed mischief.

(d) A, knowing that his effects are about to be taken in execution in order to satisfy a debt due from him to Z, destroys those effects, with the intention of thereby preventing Z from obtaining satisfaction of the debt, and of thus causing damage to Z. A has committed mischief.

(e) A having insured a ship, voluntarily causes the same to be cast away, with the intention of causing damage to the underwriters. A has committed mischief.

(f) A causes a ship to be cast away, intending thereby to cause damage to Z who has lent money on bottomry on the ship. A has committed mischief.

(g) A, having joint property with Z in a horse, shoots the horse, intending thereby to cause wrongful loss to Z. A has committed mischief.

(h) A causes cattle to enter upon a field belonging to Z, intending to cause and knowing that he is likely to cause damage to Z's crop. A has committed mischief.

426. Whoever commits mischief shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three months, or with fine, or with both.

427. Whoever commits mischief and thereby causes loss or damage to the amount of fifty rupees or upwards, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

428. Whoever commits mischief by killing, poisoning, maiming or rendering useless any animal or animals of the value of ten rupees or upwards, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

429. Whoever commits mischief by killing, poisoning, maiming or rendering useless, any elephant, camel, horse, mule, buffalo, bull, cow, or ox, whatever may be the value thereof, or any other animal of the value of fifty rupees or upwards, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to five years, or with fine, or with both.

430. Whoever commits mischief by doing any act which causes, or which he knows to be likely to cause, a diminution of the supply of water for agricultural purposes, or for fod or drink for human beings or fo r animals which are property, or for cleanliness or for carrying on any manufacture, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to five years, or with fine, or with both.

431. Whoever commits mischief by doing any act which renders or which he knows to be likely to render any public road, bridge, navigable river or navigable channel, natural or artifical, impassable or less safe for travelling or conveying propetry, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to five years, or with fine, or with both.

432. Whoever commits mischief by doing any act which causes or which he knows to be likely to cause an inundation of an obstruction to any public drainage attended with injury or damage, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to five years, or with fine, or with both.

433. Whoever commits mischief by destroying or moving any light-house or other light used as a sea-mark, or any sea-mark or buoy or other thing placed as a guide for navigators, or by any act which renders any such light-house, sea-mark, buoy or other such thing as aforesaid less useful as a guide for navigators, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, or with fine, or with both.

434. Whoever commits mischief by destroying or moving any landmark fixed by the authority of a public servant, or by any act which renders such land-mark less useful as such, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

435. Whoever commits mischief by fire or any explosive substance intending to cause, or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby cause, damage to any property to the amount of one hundred rupees or upward [1] [or (where the property is agricultural produce) ten rupees or upwards], shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years and shall also be liable to fine.

436. Whoever commits mischief by fire or any explosive substance, intending to cause, or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby cause, the destruction of any building which is ordinarily used as a place of worship or as a human dwelling or as a place for the custody of property, shall be punished with [2] [imprisonment for life], or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

437. Whoever commits mischief to any decked vessel or any vessel of a burden of twenty tons or upwards, intending to destroy or render unsafe, or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby destroy or render unsafe, that vessel, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

438. Whoever commits, or attempts to commit, by fire or any explosive substance, such mischief as is described in the last preceding section, shall be punished with [2] [imprisonment for life], or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

439. Whoever intentionaly runs any vessel aground or ashore, intending to commit theft of any property contained therein or to dishonestly misappropriate any such property, or with intent that such theft or misappropriation of property may be committed, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

440. Whoever commits mischief, having made preparation for causing to any person death, or hurt, or wrongful restraint, or fear of death, or of hurt, or of wrongful restraint, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to five years, and shall also be liable to fine.

441. Whoever enters into or upon property in the possession of another with intent to commit an offence or to intimidate, insult or annoy any person in possession of such property, or having lawfully entered into or upon such property unlawfully remains there with intent thereby to intimidate, insult or annoy any such person, or with intent to commit an offence, is said to commit "criminal trespass".

442. Whoever commits criminal trespass by entering into or remaining in any building, tent or vessel used as a human dwelling or any building used as a place for worship, or as a place for the custody of property, is said to commit "house-trespass".

Explanation.—The introduction of any part of the criminal trespasser's body is entering sufficient to constitute house-trespass.

443. Whoever commits house-trespass having taken precautions to conceal such house-trespass from some person who has a right to exclude or eject the trespasser from the building, tent or vessel which is the subject of the trespass, is said to commit "lurking house-trespass".

444. Whoever commits lurking house-trespass after sunset and before sunrise is said to commit "lurking house-trespass by night".

445. A person is said to commit "house-breaking" who commits house-trespass if he effects his entrance into the house or any part of it in any of the six ways hereinafter described; or if, being in the house or any part of it for the purpose of committing an offence, or, having committed an offence therein, he quits the house or any part of it in any of such six ways, that is to say :—

First.—If he enters or quits through a passage made by himself, or by any abettor of the house-trespass, in order to the committing of the house-trespass.

Secondly.—If he enters or quits through any passage not intended by any person, other than himself or an abettor of the offence, for human entrance; or through any passage to which he has obtained access by scaling or climbing over any wall or building.

Thirdly.—If he enters or quits through any passage which he or any abettor of the house-trespass has opened, in order to the committing of the house-trespass by any means by which that passage was not intended by the occupier of the house to be opened.

Fourthly.—If he enters or quits by opening any lock in order to the committing of the house-trespass, or in order to the quitting of the house after a house-trespass.

Fifthly.—If he effects his entrance or departure by using criminal force or committing an assault, or by threatening any person with assault.

Sixthly.—If he enters or quits by any passage which he knows to have been fastened against such entrance or departure, and to have been unfastened by himself or by an abettor of the house-trespass.

Explanation.—Any out-house or building occupied with a house, and between which and such house there is an immediate internal communication, is part of the house within the meaning of this section.

Illustrations

(a) A commits house-trespass by making a hole through the wall of Z's house, and putting his hand through the aperture. This is a house-breaking.

(b) A commits house-trespass by creeping into a ship at a port-hole between decks. This is house-breaking.

(c) A commits house-trespass by entering Z's house through a window. This is house-breaking.

(d) A commits house-trespass by entering Z's house through the door, having opened a door which was fastened. This is house-breaking.

(e) A commits house-trespass by entering Z's house through the door, having lifted a latch by putting a wire through a hole in the door. This is house-breaking.

(f) A finds the key of Z's house door, which Z had lost, and commits house-trespass by entering Z's house, having opened the door with that key. This is house-breaking.

(g) Z is standing in his doorway. A forces a passage by knocking Z down, and commits house-trespass by entering the house. This is house-breaking.

(h) Z, the door-keeper of Y, is standing in Y's doorway. A commits house-trespass by entering the house, having deterred Z from opposing him by threatening to beat him. This is house-breaking.

446. Whoever commits house-breaking after sunset and before sunrise, is said to commit "house-breaking by night".

447. Whoever commits criminal trespass shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three months, or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both.

448. Whoever commits house-trespass shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

449. Whoever commits house-trespass in order to the committing of any offence punishable with death, shall be punished with [1] [imprisonment for life], or with rigorous imprisonment for a term not exceeding ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

450. Whoever commits house-trespass in order to the committing of any offence punishable with [1] [imprisonment for life], shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term not exceeding ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

451. Whoever commits house-trespass in order to the committing of any offence punishable with imprisonment, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, and shall also be liable to fine; and if the offence intended to be committed is theft, the term of the imprisonment may be extended to seven years.

452. Whoever commits house-trespass, having made preparation for causing hurt to any person or for assaulting any person, or for wrongfully restraining any person, or for putting any person in fear of hurt, or of assault, or of wrongful restraint, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

453. Whoever commits lurking house-trespass or house-breaking, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, and shall also be liable to fine.

454. Whoever commits lurking house-trespass or house-breaking, in order to the committing of any offence punishable with imprisonment, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine; and if the offence intended to be committed is theft, the term of the imprisonment may be extended to ten years.

455. Whoever commits lurking house-trespass, or house-breaking, having made preparation for causing hurt to any person, or for assaulting any person, or for wrongfully restraining any person, or for putting any person in fear of hurt or of assault or of wrongful restraint, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

456. Whoever commits lurking house-trespass by night, or house-breaking by night, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine.

457. Whoever commits lurking house-trespass by night, or house-breaking by night, in order to the committing of any offence punishable with imprisonment, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to five years, and shall also be liable to fine; and, if the offence intended to be committed is theft, the term of the imprisonment may be extended to fourteen years.

458. Whoever commits lurking house-trespass by night or house-breaking by night, having made preparation for causing hurt to any person or for assaulting any person, or for wrongfully restraining any person, or for putting any person in fear of hurt, or of assault, or of wrongful restraint, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to fourteen years, and shall also be liable to fine.

459. Whoever, whilst committing lurking house-trespass or house-breaking, causes grevious hurt to any person or attempts to cause death or grevious hurt to any person, shall be punished with [1] [imprisonment for life], or imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

[1] Subs. by Act 26 of 1955, s. 117 and Sch., for "transportation for life".

460. If, at the time of the committing of lurking-trespass by night or house-breaking by night, any person guilty of such offence shall voluntarily cause or attempt to cause death or grevious hurt to any person, every person jointly concerned in committing such a lurking house-trespass by night or house-breaking by night, shall be punished with [1] [imprisonment for life], or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

461. Whoever dishonesty or with intent to commit mischief, breaks open or unfastens any closed receptacle which contains or which he believes to contain property, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

462. Whoever, being entrusted with any closed receptacle which contains or which he believes to contain property, without having authority to open the same, dishonestly, or with intent to commit mischief, breaks open or unfastens that receptacle, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

Chapter XVIII

Of Offences Relating to Documents and to [2] * * * Property Marks

463. Whoever makes any false document or part of a document with intent to cause damage or injury, to the public or to any person, or to support any claim or title, or to cause any person to part with property, or to enter into any express or implied contract, or with intent to commit fraud or that fraud may be committed, commits forgery.

464. A person is said to make a false document—

First.—Who dishonestly or fraudulently makes, signs, seals or executes a document or part of a document, or makes any mark denoting the execution of a document, with the intention of causing it to be believed that such document or part of a document was made, signed, sealed or executed by or by the authority of a person by whom or by whose authority he knows that it was not made, signed, sealed or executed, or at a time at which he knows that it was not made, signed, sealed or executed; or

Secondly.—Who, without lawful authority, dishonestly or fraudulently, by cancellation or otherwise, alters a document in any material part thereof, after it has been made or executed either by himself or by any other person, whether such person be living or dead at the time of such alteration; or

Thirdly.—Who dishonestly or fraudulently causes any person to sign, seal, execute or alter a document, knowing that such person by reason of unsoundness of mind or intoxication cannot, or that by reason of deception practised upon him, he does not know the contents of the document or the nature of the alteration.

Illustrations

(a) A has a letter of credit upon B for rupees 10,000, written by Z. A, in order to defraud B, adds a cipher to the 10,000, and makes the sum 100,000 intending that it may be believed by B that Z so wrote the letter. A has committed forgery.

(b) A, without Z's authority, affixes Z's seal to a document purporting to be a conveyance of an estate from Z to A, with the intention of selling the estate to B and thereby of obtaining from B the purchase-money. A has committed forgery.

(c) A picks up a cheque on a banker signed by B, payable to bearer, but without any sum having been inserted in the cheque. A fraudulently fills up the cheque by inserting the sum of ten thousand rupees. A commits forgery.

(d) A leaves with B, his agent, a cheque on a banker, signed by A, without inserting the sum payable and authorizes B to fill up the cheque by inserting a sum not exceeding ten thousand rupees for the purpose of making certain payments. B fraudulently fills up the cheque by inserting the sum of twenty thousand rupees. B commits forgery.

(e) A draws a bill of exchange on himself in the name of B without B's authority, intending to discount it as a genuine bill with a banker and intending to take up the bill on its maturity. Here, as A draws the bill with intent to deceive the banker by leading him to suppose that he had the security of B, and thereby to discount the bill, A is guilty of forgery.

(f) Z's will contains these words—"I direct that all my remaining property be equally divided between A, B and C." A dishonestly scratches out B's name, intending that it may be believed that the whole was left to himself and C. A has committed forgery.

(g) A endorses a Government promissory note and makes it payable to Z or his order by writing on the bill the words "Pay to Z or his order" and signing the endorsement. B dishonestly erases the words "Pay to Z or his order", and thereby converts the special endorsement into a blank endorsement. B commits forgery.

(h) A sells and conveys an estate to Z. A afterwards, in order to defraud Z of his estate, executes a conveyance of the same estate to B, dated six months earlier than the date of the conveyance to Z, intending it to be believed that he had conveyed the estate to B before he conveyed it to Z. A has committed forgery.

(i) Z dictates his will to A. A intentionally writes down a different legatee from the legatee named by Z, and by representing to Z that he has prepared the will according to his instructions, induces Z to sign the will. A has committed forgery.

(j) A writes a letter and signs it with B's name without B's authority, certifying that A is a man of good character and in distressed circumstances from unforeseen misfortune, intending by means of such letter to obtain alms from Z and other persons. Here, as A made a false document in order to induce Z to part with property, A has committed forgery.

(k) A without B's authority writes a letter and signs it in B's name certifying to A's character, intending thereby to obtain employment under Z. A has committed forgery inasmuch as he intended to deceive Z by the forged certificate, and thereby to induce Z to enter into an express or implied contract for service.

Explanation 1.—A man's signature of his own name may amount to forgery.

Illustrations

(a) A signs his own name to a bill of exchange, intending that it may be believed that the bill was drawn by another person of the same name. A has committed forgery.

(b) A writes the word "accepted" on a piece of paper and signs it with Z's name, in order that B may afterwards write on the paper a bill of exchange drawn by B upon Z, and negotiate the bill as though it had been accepted by Z. A is guilty of forgery; and if B, knowing the fact, draws the bill upon the paper pursuant to A's intention, B is also guilty of forgery.

(c) A picks up a bill of exchange payable to the order of a different person of the same name. A endorses the bill in his own name, intending to cause it to be believed that it was endorsed by the person to whose order it was payable; here A has committed forgery.

(d) A purchases an estate sold under execution of a decree against B. B, after the seizure of the estate, in collusion with Z, executes a lease of the estate, to Z at a nominal rent and for a long period and dates the lease six months prior to the seizure, with intent to defraud A, and to cause it to be believed that the lease was granted before the seizure. B, though he executes the lease in his own name, commits forgery by antedating it.

(e) A, a trader, in anticipation of insolvency, lodges effects with B for A's benefit, and with intent to defraud his creditors; and in order to give a colour to the transaction, writes a promissory note binding himself to pay to B a sum for value received, and antedates the note, intending that it may be believed to have been made before A was on the point of insolvency. A has committed forgery under the first head of the definition.

Explanation 2.—The making of a false document in the name of a fictitious person, intending it to be believed that the document was made by a real person, or in the name of a deceased person, intending it to be believed that the document was made by the person in his lifetime, may amount to forgery.

Illustration

A draws a bill of exchange upon a fictitious person, and fraudulently accepts the bill in the name of such fictitious person with intent to negotiate it. A commits forgery.

465. Whoever commits forgery shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

466. Whoever forges a document, purporting to be a record or proceeding of or in a Court of Justice, or a register of birth, baptism, marriage or burial, or a register kept by a public servant as such, or a certificate or document purporting to be made by a public servant in his official capacity, or an authority to institute or defend a suit, or to take any proceedings therein, or to confess judgment, or a power of attorney, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

467. Whoever forges a document which purports to be a valuable security or a will, or an authority to adopt a son, or which purports to give authority to any person to make or transfer any valuable security, or to receive the principal, interest or dividends thereon, or to receive or deliver any money, movable property, or valuable security, or any document purporting to be an acquittance or receipt acknowledging the payment of money, or an acquittance or receipt for the delivery of any movable property or valuable security, shall be punished with [1] [imprisonment for life], or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

468. Whoever commits forgery, intending that the document forged shall be used for the purpose of cheating, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

469. Whoever commits forgery, intending that the document forged shall harm the reputation of any party, or knowing that it is likely to be used for that purpose, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine.

470. A false document made wholly or in part by forgery is designated "a forged document."

471. Whoever fraudently or dishonestly uses as genuine any document which he knows or has reason to believe to be a forged document, shall be punished in the same manner as if he had forged such document.

472. Whoever makes or counterfeits any seal, plate or other instrument for making an impression, intending that the same shall be used for the purpose of committing any forgery which would be punishable under section 467 of this Code, or, with such intent, has in his possession any such seal, plate or other instrument, knowing the same to be counterfeit, shall be punishable with [1] [imprisonment for life], or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

473. Whoever makes or counterfeits any seal, plate or other instrument for making an impression, intending that the same shall be used for the purpose of committing any forgery which would be punishable under any section of this chapter other than section 467, or, with such intent, has in his possession any such seal, plate or other instrument, knowing the same to be counterfeit, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

474. Whoever has in his possession any document, knowing the same to be forged, and intending that the same shall fraudently or dishonestly be used as genuine, shall, if the document is one of the description mentioned in section 466 of this Code, be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine; and if the document is one of the description mentioned in section 467, shall be punished with [1] [imprisonment for life], or with imprisonment of either description, for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

475. Whoever counterfeits upon, or in the substance of, any material, any device or mark used for the purpose of authenticating any document described in section 467 of this Code, intending that such device or mark shall be used for the purpose of giving the appearance of authenticity to any document then forged or thereafter to be forged on such material, or who, with such intent, has in his possession any material upon or in the substance of which any such device or mark has been counterfeited, shall be punished with [1] [imprisonment for life], or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

476. Whoever counterfeits upon, or in the substance of, any material, any device or mark used for the purpose of authenticating any document other than the documents described in section 467 of this Code, intending that such device or mark shall be used for the purpose of giving the appearance of authenticity to any document then forged or thereafter to be forged on such material, or who with such intent, has in his possession any material upon or in the substance of which any such device or mark has been counterfeited, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

477. Whoever fraudently or dishonestly, or with intent to cause damage or injury to the public or to any person, cancels, destroys or defaces, or attempts to cancel, destroy or deface, or secretes or attempts to secrete any document which is or purports to be a will, or an authority to adopt a son, or any valuable security, or commits mischief in respect to such document, shall be punished with [1] [imprisonment for life], or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

[2] [477A. Whoever, being a clerk, officer or servant, or employed or acting in the capacity of a clerk, officer or servant, willfully, and with intent to defraud, destroys, alters, mutilates or falsifies any book, paper, writing, valuable security or account which belongs to or is in the possession of his employer, or has been received by him for or on behalf of his employer, or wilfully, and with intent to defraud, makes or abets the making of any false entry in, or omits or alters or abets the omission or alteration of any material particular from or in, any such book, paper, writing, valuable security or account, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, or with fine, or with both.

Explanation.—It shall be sufficient in any charge under this section to allege a general intent to defraud without naming any particular person intended to be defrauded or specifying any particular sum of money intended to be the subject of the fraud, or any particular day on which the offence was committed.]

480. [Using a false trade mark.] Rep. by the Trade and Merchandise Marks Act, 1958 (43 of 1958), s. 135 and Sch. (w.e.f. 25th November, 1959).

481. Whoever marks any movable property or goods or any case, package or other receptacle containing movable property or goods, or uses any case, package or other receptacle having any mark thereon, in a manner reasonably calculated to cause it to be believed that the property or goods so marked, or any property or goods contained in any such receptacle so marked, belong to a person to whom they do not belong, is said to use a false property mark.

482. Whoever uses [5] * * * any false property mark shall, unless he proves that he acted without intent to defraud, be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

483. Whoever counterfeits any [6] * * * property mark used by any other person shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

484. Whoever counterfeits any property mark used by a public servant, or any mark used by a public servant to denote that any property has been manufactured by a particular person or at a particular time or place, or that the property is of a particular quality or has passed through a particular office, or that it is entitled to any exemption, or uses as genuine any such mark knowing the same to be counterfeit, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, and shall also be liable to fine.

[7] [485. Whoever makes or has in his possession any die, plate or other instrument for the purpose of counterfeiting a property mark, or has in his possession a property mark for the purpose of denoting that any goods belong to a

486. [1] [Whoever sells, or exposes, or has in possession for sale, any goods or things with a counterfeit property mark] affixed to or impressed upon the same or to or upon any case, package or other receptacle in which such goods are contained, shall, unless he proves—

(a) that, having taken all reasonable precautions against committing an offence against this section he had at the time of the commission of the alleged offence no reason to suspect the genuiness of the mark, and

(b) that, on demand made by or on behalf of the prosecutor, he gave all the information in his power with respect to the persons from whom he obtained such goods or things, or

(c) that otherwise he had acted innocently, he punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

487. Whoever makes any false mark upon any case, package or other receptacle containing goods, in a manner reasonably calculated to cause any public servant or any other person to believe that such receptacle contains goods which it does not contain or that it does not contain goods which it does contain, or that the goods contained in such receptacle are of a nature or quality different from the real nature or quality thereof, shall, unless he proves that he acted without intent to defraud, be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three years, or with fine, or with both.

488. Whoever makes use of any such false mark in any manner prohibited by the last foregoing section shall, unless he proves that he acted without intent to defraud, be punished as if he had committed an offence against that section.

489. Whoever removes, destroys, defaces or adds to any property mark, intending or knowing it to be likely that he may thereby cause injury to any person, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.]

Of currency-notes and bank-notes

[2] [489A. Whoever counterfeits, or knowingly performs any part of the process of counterfeiting, any currency-note or bank-note, shall be punished with [3] [imprisonment for life], or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Explanation.—For the purposes of this section and of sections 489B, [4] [489C, 489D and 489E], the expression "bank-note" means a promissory note or engagement for the payment of money to bearer on demand issued by any person carrying on the business of banking in any part of the world, or issued by or under the authority of any State or Soverign Power, and intended to be used as equivalent to, or as a substitute for money.

489B. Whoever sells to, or buys or receives from, any other person, or otherwise traffics in or uses as genuine, any forged or counterfeit currency-note or bank-note, knowing or having reason to believe the same to be forged or counterfeit, shall be punished with [3] [imprisonment for life], or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

489C. Whoever has in his possession any forged or counterfeit currency-note or bank-note, knowing or having reason to believe the same to be forged or counterfeit and intending to use the same as genuine or that it may be used as genuine, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, or with fine, or with both.

489D. Whoever makes, or performs any part of the process of making, or buys or sells or disposes of, or has in his possession, any machinery, instrument or material for the purpose of being used, or knowing or having reason to believe that it is intended to be used, for forging or counterfeiting any currency-note or bank-note, shall be punished with [3] [imprisonment for life], or with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

[1][489E. (1) Whoever makes, or causes to be made, or usse for any purpose whatsoever, or delivers to any person, any document purporting to be, or in any way resembling, or so nearly resembling as to be calculated to deceive, any currency-note or bank-note shall be punished with fine which may extend to one hundred rupees.

(2) If any person, whose name appears on a document the making of which is an offence under sub-section (1), refuses, without lawful excuse, to disclose to a police-officer on being so required the name and address of the person by whom it was printed or otherwise made, he shall be punished with fine which may extend to two hundred rupees.

(3) Where the name of any person appears on any document in respect of which any person is charged with an offence under subsection (1) or on any other document used or distributed in connection with that document it may, until the contrary is proved, be presumed that that person caused the document to be made.

Chapter XIX

Of the Criminal Breach of Contracts of Service

490. [Breach of contract of service during voyage or journey.] Rep. by the Workmen's Breach of Contract (Repealing) Act, 1925 (3 of 1925), s. 2 and Sch.

491. Whoever, being bound by a lawful contract to attend on or to supply the wants of any person who, by reason of youth, or of unsoundness of mind, or of a disease or bodily weakness, is helpless or incapable of providing for his own safety or of supplying his own wants, voluntarily omits so to do, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three months, or with fine which may extend to two hundred rupees, or with both.

492. [Breach of contract to serve at distant place to which servant is conveyed at master's expense.] Rep. by the Workmen's Breach of Contract (Repealing) Act, 1925 (3 of 1925), s. 2 and Sch.

Chapter XX

Of Offences Relating to Marriage

493. Every man who by deceit causes any woman who is not lawfully married to him to believe that she is lawfully married to him and to cohabit or have sexual intercourse with him in that belief, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

494. Whoever, having a husband or wife living, marries in any case in which such marriage is void by reason of its taking place during the life of such husband or wife, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Exception.—This section does not extend to any person whose marriage with such husband or wife has been declared void by a Court of competent jurisdiction, nor to any person who contracts a marriage during the life of a former husband or wife, if such husband or wife, at the time of the subequent marriage, shall have been continually absent from such person for the space of seven years, and shall not have been heard of by such person as being alive within that time provided the person contracting such subsequent marriage shall, before such marriage takes place, inform the person with whom such marriage is contracted of the real state of facts so far as the same are within his or her knowledge.

495. Whoever commits the offence defined in the last preceding section having concealed from the person with whom the subsequent marriage is contracted, the fact of the former marriage, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

496. Whoever, dishonestly or with a fraudulent intention, goes through the ceremony of being married, knowing that he is not thereby lawfully married, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine.

497. Whoever has sexual intercourse with a person who is and whom he knows or has reason to believe to be the wife of another man, without the consent or connivance of that man, such sexual intercourse not amounting to the offence of rape, is guilty of the offence of adultery, and shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to five years, or with fine, or with both. In such case the wife shall not be punishable as an abettor.

498. Whoever takes or entices away any woman who is and whom he knows or has reason to believe to be the wife of any other man, from that man, or from any person having the care of her on behalf of that man, with intent that she may have illicit intercourse with any person, or conceals or detains with that intent any such woman, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Chapter XXI

Of Defamation

499. Whoever by words either spoken or intended to be read, or by signs or by visible representations, makes or publishes any imputation concerning any person intending to harm, or knowing or having reason to believe that such imputation will harm, the reputation of such person, is said, except in the cases hereinafter excepted, to defame that person.

Explanation 1.—It may amount to defamation to impute anything to a deceased person, if the imputation would harm the reputation of that person if living, and is intended to be hurtful to the feelings of his family or other near relatives.

Explanation 2.—It may amount to defamation to make an imputation concerning a company or an association or collection of persons as such.

Explanation 3.—An imputation in the form of an alternative or expressed ironically, may amount to defamation.

Explanation 4.—No imputation is said to harm a person's reputation, unless that imputation directly or indirectly, in the estimation of others, lowers the moral or intellectual character of that person, or lowers the character of that person in respect of his caste or of his calling, or lowers the credit of that person, or causes it to be believed that the body of that person is in a loathsome state, or in a state generally considered as disgraceful.

Illustrations

(a) A says—"Z is an honest man; he never stole B's watch"; intending to cause it to be believed that Z did steal B's watch. This is defamation, unless it fall within one of the exceptions.

(b) A is asked who stole B's watch. A points to Z, intending to cause it to be believed that Z stole B's watch. This is defamation, unless it fall within one of the exceptions.

First Exception.—It is not defamation to impute anything which is true concerning any person, if it be for the public good that the imputation should be made or published. Whether or not it is for the public good is a question of fact.

Second Exception.—It is not defamation to express in good faith any opinion whatever respecting the conduct of a public servant in the discharge of his public functions, or respecting his character, so far as his character appears in that conduct, and no further.

Third Exception.—It is not defamation to express in good faith any opinion whatever respecting the conduct of any person touching any public question, and respecting his character; so far as his character appears in that conduct, and no further.

Illustration

It is not defamation in A to express in good faith any opinion whatever excepting Z's conduct in petitioning Government on a public question, in signing a requisition for a meeting on a public question, in presiding or attending at such meeting, in forming or joining any society which invites the public support, in voting or canvassing for a particular candidate for any situation in the efficient discharge of the duties of which the public is interested.

Fourth Exception.—It is not defamation to publish a substantially true report of the proceedings of a Court of Justice, or of the result of any such proceedings.

Explanation.—A Justice of the Peace or other officer holding an enquiry in open Court preliminary to a trial in a Court of Justice, is a Court within the meaning of the above section.

Fifth Exception.—It is not defamation to express in good faith any opinion whatever respecting the merits of any case, civil or criminal, which has been decided by a Court of Justice, or respecting the conduct of any person as a party, witness or agent, in any such case, or respecting the character of such person, as far as his character appears in that conduct, and no further.

Illustrations

(a) A says—"I think Z's evidence on that trial is so contradictory that he must be stupid or dishonest." A is within this exception if he says this in good faith, inasmuch as the opinion which he expresses respects Z's character as it appears in Z's conduct as a witness, and no further.

(b) But if A says—"I do not believe what Z asserted at that trial because I know him to be a man without veracity"; A is not within this exception, inasmuch as the opinion which expresses of Z's character, is an opinion not founded on Z's conduct as a witness.

Sixth Exception.—It is not defamation to express in good faith any opinion respecting the merits of any performance which its author has submitted to the judgment of the public, or respecting the character of the author so far as his character appears in such performance, and no further.

Explanation.—A performance may be submitted to the judgment of the public expressly or by acts on the part of the author which imply such submission to the judgment of the public.

Illustrations

(a) A person who publishes a book, submits that book to the judgment of the public.

(b) A person who makes a speech in public, submits that speech to the judgment of the public.

(c) An actor or singer who appears on a public stage, submits his acting or singing to the judgment of the public.

(d) A says of a book published by Z—"Z's book is foolish, Z must be a weak man. Z's book is indecent, Z must be a man of impure mind." A is within the exception, if he says this in good faith, inasmuch as the opinion which he expresses of Z respects Z's character only so far as it appears in Z's book, and no further.

(e) But if A says—"I am not surprised that Z's book is foolish and indecent, for he is a weak man and a libertine." A is not within this exception, inasmuch as the opinion which he expresses of Z's character is an opinion not founded on Z's book.

Seventh Exception.—It is not defamation in a person having over another any authority, either conferred by law or arising out of a lawful contract made with that other, to pass in good faith any censure on the conduct of that other in matters to which such lawful authority relates.

Illustration

A Judge censuring in good faith the conduct of a witness, or of an officer of the Court; a head of a department censuring in good faith those who are under his orders; a parent censuring in good faith a child in the presence of other children; a schoolmaster, whose authority is derived from a parent, censuring in good faith a pupil in the presence of other pupils; a master censuring a servant in good faith for remissness in service; a banker censuring in good faith the cashier of his bank for the conduct of such cashier as such cashier—are within this exception.

Eighth Exception.—It is not defamation to prefer in good faith an accusation against any person to any of those who have lawful authority over that person with respect to the subject-matter of accusation.

Illustration

If A in good faith accuses Z before a Magistrate; if A in good faith complains of the conduct of Z, a servant, to Z's master; if A in good faith complains of the conduct of Z, a child, to Z's father—A is within this exception.

Ninth Exception.—It is not defamation to make an imputation on the character of another provided that the imputation be made in good faith for the protection of the interest of the person making it, or of any other person, or for the public good.

Illustrations

(a) A, a shopkeeper, says to B, who manages his business—"Sell nothing to Z unless he pays you ready money, for I have no opinion of his honesty." A is within the exception, if he has made this imputation on Z in good faith for the protection of his own interests.

(b) A, a Magistrate, in making a report to his own superior officer, casts an imputation on the character of Z. Here, if the imputation is made in good faith and for the public good, A is within the exception.

Tenth Exception.—It is not defamation to convey a caution, in good faith, to one person against another, provided that such caution be intended for the good of the person to whom it is conveyed, or of some person in whom that person is interested, or for the public good.

500. Whoever defames another shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

501. Whoever prints or engraves any matter, knowing or having good reason to believe that such matter is defamatory of any person, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

502. Whoever sells or offers for sale any printed or engraved substance containing defamatory matter, knowing that it contains such matter, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

Chapter XXII

Of Criminal Intimidation, Insult and Annoyance

503. Whoever threatens another with any injury to his person, reputation or property, or to the person or reputation of any one in whom that person is interested, with intent to cause alarm to that person, or to cause that person to do any act which he is not legally bound to do, or to omit to do any act which that person is legally entitled to do, as the means of avoiding the execution of such threat, commits criminal intimidation.

Explanation.—A threat to injure the reputation of any deceased person in whom the person threatened is interested, is within this section.

Illustration

A, for the purpose of inducing B to resist from prosecuting a civil suit, threatens to burn B's house. A is guilty of criminal intimidation.

504. Whoever intentionally insults, and thereby gives provocation to any person, intending or knowing it to be likely that such provocation will cause him to break the public peace, or to commit any other offence, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.

[1] [505. Whoever makes, publishes or circulates any statement, rumour or report,—

(a) with intent to cause, or which is likely to cause, any officer, soldier, [2] [sailor or airman] in the Army, [3] [Navy or Air Force] [4] [of India] to mutiny or otherwise disregard or fail in his duty as such; or

(b) with intent to cause, or which is likely to cause, fear or alarm to the public or to any section of the public or to any section of the public whereby any person may be induced to commit an offence against the State or against the public tranquillity; or

(c) with intent to incite, or which is likely to incite, any class or community or persons to commit any offence against any other class or community, shall be punished with imprisonment which may extend to [5] [three years], or with fine, or with both.

Exception.—It does not amount to an offence, within the meaning of this section, when the person making, publishing or circulating any such statement, rumour or report, has reasonable grounds for believing that such statement,

506. Whoever commits the offence of criminal intimidation shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both:

and if the threat be to cause death or grievous hurt, or to cause the destruction of any property by fire, or to cause an offence punishable with death or [1] [imprisonment for life], or with imprisonment for a term which may extend to seven years, or to impute unchastity to a woman, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, or with fine, or with both.

507. Whoever commits the offence of criminal intimidation by an anonymous communication, or having taken precaution to conceal the name or abode of the person from whom the threat comes, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, in addition to the punishment provided for the offence by the last preceding section.

508. Whoever voluntarily causes or attempts to cause any person to do anything which that person is not legally bound to do, or to omit to do anything which he is legally entitled to do, by inducing or attempting to induce that person to believe that he or any person in whom he is interested will become or will be rendered by some act of the offender an object of Divine displeasure if he does not do the thing which it is the object of the offender to cause him to do, or if he does the thing which it is the object of the offender to cause him to omit, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

509. Whoever, intending to insult the modesty of any woman, utters any word, makes any sound or gesture, or exhibits any object, intending that such word or sound shall be heard, or that such gesture or object shall be seen, by such woman, or intrudes upon the privacy of such woman, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine, or with both.

510. Whoever, in a state of intoxication, appears in any public place, or in any place which it as a trespass in him to enter, and there conducts himself in such a manner as to cause annoyance to any person, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to twenty-four hours, or with fine which may extend to ten rupees, or with both.

Chapter XXIII

Of Attempts to Commit Offences

511. Whoever attempts to commit an offence punishable by this Code with [1] [imprisonment for life] or imprisonment, or to cause an offence to be committed, and in such attempt does any act towards the commission of the offence, shall, where no express provision is made by this Code for the punishment of such attempt, be punished with [2] [imprisonment of any description provided for the offence, for a term which may extend to one-half of the imprisonment for life or, as the case may be, one-half of the longest term of imprisonment provided for that offence], or with such fine as is provided for the offence, or with both.

Illustrations

(a) A makes an attempt to steal some jewels by breaking open a box, and finds after so opening the box, that there is no jewel in it. He has done an act towards the commission of theft, and therefore is guilty under this section.

(b) A makes an attempt to pick the pocket of Z by thrusting his hand into Z's pocket. A fails in the attempt in consequence of Z's having nothing in his pocket. A is guilty under this section.

JAPAN

The present Penal Code of Japan has been in force since 1908. While several important revisions have been made in the Code itself, it still governs most of the fundamental aspects of the present-day administration of criminal justice in Japan. In 1961, the Japanese Government after a 5 year study by the Preparatory Commission, published A Preparatory Draft for the Revised Penal Code (referred to as the Preparatory Draft Code) which has yet to be enacted. The questionnaire will be answered largely on the basis of the present Penal Code unless significant changes are proposed in the Preparatory Draft Code.

1. The present Code consisting of the General Provisions (Part I) and Crimes (Part II) does not provide a sentencing system which would maintain the mechanical correlation between detailed degree of penalty and detailed degree of apparant gravity of criminal acts. Part I of the Preparatory Draft Code, however, contains a chapter dealing with sentencing (Articles 7 to 58; for more information see question No. 9 (a) below).

2. No numbering system is used; new articles are added to the original ones, e.g., Article 100, Article 100–1, Article 100–3, etc.

3. One of the two types of a state of mind, intent or negligence, is recognized as an essential element of any crime. In most cases, criminal intent is required; at a minimum, negligence is necessary. There is no statutory definition of either intent or negligence. Article 38 of the present Code briefly states that "an act done without criminal intent is not punishable except as otherwise specifically provided by statute" (also Article 18 of the Preparatory Code). The present Code specifically enumerates the following seven negligences as punishable: (1) Negligent fire (Articles 116 and 117–2); (2) Negligent explosion (Article 117); (3) Negligent flooding (Article 122); (4) Negligent obstruction of traffic (Article 129); (5) Negligent injury (Article 209); (6) Negligent homicide (Article 210); and (7) Causing death or personal injury through professional or gross negligence (Article 211).

In the case of intent, the Penal Code imposes a heavier penalty than in the case of negligence. A person who fails to use such care as is required in the conduct of his profession or occupation and thereby kills or injures another is considered to have committed a more serious offense and is dealt with more severely; a person who is guilty of gross negligence is treated similarly.

The present Penal Code, as well as the Preparatory Draft Code relating to the subjective element of crimes are intended to extend the coverage of the culpability principle as a restraint on the imposition of punishment (sentencing). The lack of specificity of the offender's criminal intent, defects in his mental capacity short of insanity, environmental factors contributing to the commission of crime, etc. are all considered by the sentencing court as circumstances mitigating the defendants' blameworthiness or culpability. (Juhei Takeuchi, "Introduction," A Preparatory Draft for the Revised Penal Code of Japan, 1961, South Hackensack, N.J., Fred B. Rothman & Co., 1964, p. 4).

4. Neither the present Code nor the Preparatory Draft Code provide articles relating to causation.

5. On the basis of the continental European concept of diminished responsibility, the punishment of a mentally disordered person may be reduced or acquittal may be granted as stated in Article 39 of the present Code: "an act of a person of unsound mind is not punishable. Punishment shall be reduced for acts of weak-minded persons."

The present Code's concern with the treatment of the offender is exclusively based upon punishment in the traditional sense and upon its derivatives such as conditional release and suspension of the execution of sentence including probation. Accordingly, the court loses its jurisdiction over an insane and dangerous defendant once it has acquitted him. Likewise, a mentally abnormal offender entitled to reduced punishment may be released from prison before his mental condition is improved and his criminal propensity corrected.

Under the Mental Health Law of 1950, the governor of a prefecture may, on the basis of concurring certificates by two or more psychiatrists, commit any mentally disordered person dangerous to himself or others to a public mental hospital. Nevertheless, the governor's opinion as to the necessity to detain an acquitted defendant might differ from that of the court, and there might also be a gap in time between acquittal and commitment. Furthermore, such administrative commitment is sometimes criticized because of the lack of adequate facilities for the treatment of the mentally disabled.

As a possible solution to this problem, the Preparatory Code adopts the system of so-called "security measures." Security measures, now widely used in many European countries, are measures specifically designed for the isolation and the medical or educative treatment of certain kinds of offenders whose criminality creates special danger for society. Also, security measures generally devoid of punitive connotations, and their duration is determined according not to degree of culpability, but to need for treatment. (See Takeuchi, A Preparatory Draft for the Revised Penal Code of Japan, 1961, p. 14–15.) The following are the relevant provisions concerning the definition and the procedural aspects of insanity under the Preparatory Draft Code:

Article 15 (Mental Disorder). (1) Acts committed by a person who, as a result of mental disorder, lacks capacity to discriminate as to the propriety of his conduct or to act according to such discrimination are not punishable.

(2) Punishment for acts of a person whose capacity as set out in paragraph (1) is markedly diminished as the result of mental disorder may be reduced.

Article 110 (Curative Measures). A person suffering from a mental disorder who has committed acts punishable by confinement or a heavier punishment, to whom the court has applied the provisions of Article 15, may by order be subjected to curative measures if the court finds that he is likely in the future to commit similarly punishable acts and that such measures are necessary to protect the safety of the public.

Article 111 (Nature of Curative Measures). A person subjected to curative measures shall be committed to a security institution and given such curative and protective treatment as he requires.

Article 112 (Duration of Curative Measures). Curative measures shall continue for a five year period: Provided, that the court may extend such measures for as many three year periods as are necessary.

Article 113 (Release). (1) A person subjected to curative measures must be released by administrative action if his continued commitment has become unnecessary. Application of curative measures shall then be deemed complete.

(2) There must be at least one administrative review each year to determine if a person subjected to curative measures shall be relieved from such measures.

Provisional release accompanied by curative supervision may be granted administratively to inmates of an institution (Article 124). Punishment and curative measures imposed on the same person may be enforced consecutively, but the execution of the one may be dispensed with if it becomes unnecessary after the execution of the order. (Articles 120 and 122).

Under Article 165 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, it is required that only the judge selects a psychiatrist to examine the defendant and renders the decision regarding insanity, taking into consideration the psychiatrist's report.

6. Under the present Code, there is no express provision dealing with the problems of alcohol and drug intoxication; they are generally considered under Article 39 (persons of unsound mind or weak-minded persons). The Preparatory Code, however, provides abstinence measures for alcoholic or narcotic addicts The relevant provisions of the Preparatory Code are as follows:

Article 115 (Abstinence Measures). A person who commits acts punishable by confinement or a heavier punishment because of his habitual addiction to excessive use of alcoholic beverages or to narcotics or nerve stimulants may by order be subjected to abstinence measures if he is likely to commit similarly punishable acts in the future unless his addiction is cured.

Article 116 (Nature of Abstinence Measures). (1) A person subjected to abstinence measures shall be committed to a security institution and given abstinence therapy and other treatment necessary to cure his addiction.

(2) The court may, instead of committing such person to a security institution, subject him to administrative abstinence supervision if it appears that his addiction can be cured without commitment.

(3) A person subjected to such supervision may be committed to a security institution by administrative action upon approval by the court if circumstances indicate such commitment to be necessary.

Article 117 (Duration of Abstinence Measures). Abstinence measures shall continue for a one year period; Provided, that if necessary the court may order a single one-year extention.

Article 118 (Discharge). (1) A person subjected to abstinence measures must be discharged by administrative action whenever such measures become unnecessary.

(2) There must be at least one administrative review every six months to determine if there shall be discharge from such measures.

Article 119 to Article 123 [omitted.]

7. The Penal Code contains the following:

Article 36 (Self-Defense). (1) An act unavoidably occurring in the protection of one's own rights or the rights of another person against imminent and unjust infringement is not punishable.

(2) Punishment for an act which exceeds the limits of defense may be reduced or remitted according to the circumstances.

Article 37 (Averting Imminent Danger). (1) An act unavoidably done to avert a present danger to the life, person, liberty, or property of oneself or another person is not punishable only in case the injury produced by such act is not out of proportion to the injury which was sought to be averted. However, the punishment for an act which is out of proportion may be reduced or remitted according to the circumstances.

(2) The provisions of the preceding paragraph do not apply to a person who has a special professional or occupational duty.

The Preparatory Code Provides:

Article 13 (Justifiable Defense). (1) Unavoidable acts done to protect one's own interest or threat of another against imminent unlawful infringement are not punishable.

(2) If such acts exceed the limits of justifiable defense, punishment may be reduced in light of the circumstances. Such acts are not punishable when committed by one to whom blame cannot be imputed because he acted in a state of extreme shock or excitement.

Article 14 (Averting Imminent Danger). (1) Acts unavoidably done to avert danger which is imminent to one's own interest or that of another and which cannot otherwise be avoided are not punishable if the harm resulting therefrom does not exceed the harm sought to be averted.

(2) Where acts done to avert such danger are excessive, the provisions of Article 13 (2) shall apply with necessary modifications.

Both the present Code and Preparatory code are not as elaborate as the U.S. Draft Code.

8. There is no distinction between felony and misdemeanor.

Article 9 of the present Code provides: Principal penalties are death, imprisonment with forced labor, imprisonment, fine, penal detention, minor fine; confiscation being an additional penalty.

Article 32 of the Preparatory Code states:

Punishments are of the following kinds: (1) death; (2) imprisonment; (3) confinement; (4) fine; (5) penal detention; (6) minor fine.

Article 32 of the suggested Alternative Draft provides:

Punishments are of the following kinds: (1) death; (2) incarceration; (3) fine; (4) penal detention; (5) minor fine.

9a. The present Code does not provide the court with any specific guides in fixing sentences or suspending the execution of sentences; the broad judicial discretion in sentencing under the Code, coupled with the emphasis on the culpability principle, has resulted in moderate or even lenient sentences in general and short prison sentences in particular. However, Article 47 of the Preparatory Code sets forth general standards for sentencing in Part I:

Article 47 (General Standards). (1) Punishment shall be assessed commensurate with the culpability of the offender.

(2) Punishment shall be imposed for the purpose of redressing offenses and reforming and rehabilitating offenders, in light of the age, character, career and environment of the offender, the motive, method, result and impact on society of the offense, and the attitude of the offender after the offense.

(3) Punishment shall not exceed in kind or amount that which is necessary to maintain legal order. The death penalty shall be invoked only with great caution.

There has been much discussion about the usefulness of such general standards, and most lawyers are apparently skeptical about the practical value of such abstract criteria. Additional provisions for sentencing include: Imposition of Fines and Minor Fines (Article 48); Pronouncement of Fine or Minor Fine in Terms of Days (Article 49—deleted); Surrender (Article 50); Conversion of Imprisonment into Confinement (Article 51—deleted); Special Rules for Crimes Committed for Gain (Article 52); Extent of Reduction by Law (Article 53); Alternative Punishments and Reduction by Law (Article 54); Reduction by Virtue of Extenuating Circumstances (Article 55); Pronouncement of Fine in Lieu of Incarceration (Article 56); Order of Increase and Reduction Penalty (Article 58).

It should be noted however, that the main thrust of the Preparatory Draft Code which incorporates the provision of Articles 47 to 58 into Part I is not directed toward reducing the discretionary power of the court in any manner.

b. The present Code sets forth only suspension of execution of sentence (Articles 25–27), while the Draft Code provides for both suspension of execution of sentence (Articles 78–83) and suspension of pronouncement of sentence (Articles 84–87).

c. Probation is a form of suspension of sentence. It must be noted that under Japanese law the mode of placing the convict on probation is not necessarily the same as in the United States. If the judge finds the accused guilty, he must pronounce an appropriate sentence. If the judge sees fit, however, he may, under certain limitations, suspend the execution of the sentence for a certain period. He may then place the probationer under the supervision of a probation officer, but this is not a mandatory step except in certain cases prescribed by law. The term "probation" is used here in its broader sense.

d. Under Article 25–2 of the present Code, defendants granted suspension of execution of their sentences may be placed under the supervision of a probation officer who is assisted by voluntary probation workers.

e. Indeterminate sentence has never been adopted in Japanese criminal law, except for youthful offenders under twenty years of age (Article 29 of the Juvenile Law). The Preparatory Draft, however, empowers the court to impose indeterminate sentences on habitual offenders with two or more prior convictions:

Article 61 (Habitual Recidivism). An habitual recidivist is an offender who has committed another crime after having been earlier sentenced to imprisonment for six months or more as a recidivist and is to be punished again as a recidivist by a limited term of imprisonment, and whom the court finds as a fact to be an habitual offender.

Article 62 (Imposition of Indeterminate Sentence). (1) An indeterminate sentence may be imposed upon an habitual recidivist.

(2) An indeterminate sentence may be imposed in a case of concurrent crimes, in which one crime carries an indeterminate sentence and the other does not, only when the crime for which an indeterminate sentence can be imposed, controls under Article 64 [Punishment for concurrent crimes].

(3) An indeterminate sentence pronounced pursuant to paragraph (1) shall prescribe maximum and minimum terms within the limits otherwise authorized by law: Provided, that the minimum term may not be less than one year even though the minimum otherwise authorized is less than that.

f. Without defining what constitutes dangerous special offenders, Articles 56 and 57 of the present Code provide:

Article 56 (Subsequent Offenses). (1) When a person who has been sentenced to imprisonment at forced labor within five years from the day on which the execution has been completed or remitted, again commits a crime punishable with imprisonment at forced labor, this crime constitute a subsequent offense [recidivism].

(2) The same applies when a person who has been sentenced to death for a crime of the same nature as one punishable by imprisonment at forced labor again commits a crime punishable by imprisonment at forced labor for a limited term within the period provided in the preceding paragraph, as computed from the day when (his former) sentence was remitted or from the day when the execution was completed or remitted if the punishment (of his former sentence) was commuted to imprisonment at forced labor.

(3) When a sentence of imprisonment at forced labor would have been rendered for one crime which is a constituent part of consolidated crimes, a person who has been sentenced for such consolidated crimes shall, even though such constituent crime is not the gravest, be deemed to have been sentenced to imprisonment at forced labor for the purpose of application of provisions relating to subsequent offenses.

Article 57 (Punishment for Subsequent Offenses). Punishment for a subsequent offense shall not exceed twice the maximum term of imprisonment at forced labor provided for such crime.

g. Punishments of crimes concerning foreign aggression under the present Penal Code are as follows: conspiring with a foreign state and causing use of armed forces against Japan—the maximum penalty is death (Article 82); siding with enemy state, engaging in military service of such state, or otherwise affording military advantage to such state—the maximum is death or life imprisonment and the minimum, two years (Article 82); preparing or conspiring with another to join with or render aid and assistance to enemy state—the maximum is ten years and the minimum, one year (Article 88).

h. Certain crimes carry mandatory minimum prison sentences. For example, Article 177 of the present Penal Code provides that "a person who, through violence or intimidation, has sexual intercourse with a female person of not less than thirteen years of age, commits the crime of rape and shall be punished with imprisonment at forced labor for a limited term of not less than two years."

i. Parole is provided in Part I (Articles 28 and 29) of the present Penal Code. More elaborate provisions concerning parole are set forth in Part I (Articles 88 to 93) of the Preparatory Draft Code, but these provisions are still not as elaborate as those mentioned in Chapter 34 of the U.S. Draft Code.

j. Granting of parole is discretionary with the parole board known as the District Offenders Rehabilitation Commission whose decision is subject to review by the National Commission (See the Offenders Prevention and Rehabilitation Law).

k. No.

m. For similar provisions, see Articles 56 and 57 cited in Question 9 (f).

n. Neither the Penal Code nor the Code of Criminal Procedure has provisions concerning the preparation of the written adjudication; the matter is left to rules (Article 53 of the Rule Concerning the Criminal Procedure). Nevertheless, judgments assessing penalties, and probably other adjudication as well, ought usually to be prepared in written form or set out in the protocol of trial. Reasons for sentences are usually included in the citation of applicable laws and penal provisions (Article 219 of the Rule Concerning the Criminal Procedure).

o. Sentences are subject to review on appeal by appellate courts including the Supreme Court. Japanese appellate courts generally have the power to raise or lower the sentences imposed by lower courts (Articles 400 and 412 of the Code of Criminal Procedure). However, no heavier penalty than that imposed by the original judgment may be pronounced when the defendant appeals (Article 402 of the Code of Criminal Procedure).

p. Both the Government and the defendant may appeal (Article 351 of the Code of Criminal Procedure).

q. The Code of Criminal Procedure contains the following relevant provisions:

Article 381: In the event that a motion of Koso-appeal has been made on the ground that the penalty is improper, the facts which are entered in the record of proceedings and the evidence examined in the original court and which sufficiently make it believable that the penalty is improper shall be referred to in the statement of reasons for Koso-appeal.

Article 392: (1) An appellate court shall investigate such matters as contained in the statement of reasons for Koso-appeal.

(2) [Omitted]

Article 393: (1) An appellate court may, when it is necessary to conduct the investigation as mentioned in the preceding Article, examine facts upon request of a public procurator, the accused, or the counsel, or upon its own authority: Provided, that the facts, the explanation as mentioned in Article 382-2 of which has been made shall be examined only when they are indispensable for proving the penalty determined improperly or the errors in and/or of facts to affect the judgment.

(2) An appellate court may, when deems necessary, conduct upon its own authority the examination in regard to such circumstances as emerged after the judgment in the first instance and as should affect the penalty determined.

(3)–(4) [Omitted]

Article 394: Any evidence that could be used as evidence in the first instance may be made as evidence even in an appellate instance.

r. Not applicable.

s. Chapter VIII (Concurrent Crimes) of the Preparatory Draft Code contains the following Articles:

Articles 63 (Concurrent Crimes). Concurrent crimes are two or more crimes concerning which no finally-binding adjudication has yet been made. However, if confinement or a heavier punishment has been imposed by a finally-binding adjudication for a given crime, only such crime and those crimes which were committed before such adjudication became finally binding shall constitute concurrent crimes.

Article 64 (Punishment for Concurrent Crimes). (1) When concurrent crimes, one or more of which are punishable by confinement or a heavier punishment, are to be jointly adjudicated, only the punishment prescribed for the most serious crime shall be utilized in sentencing: Provided, however, that the court shall not impose a sentence lighter than the minimum punishment prescribed for any of the other crimes.

(2) The court may also impose cumulatively a fine or minor fine in cases falling within paragraph (1).

Article 65 (Increase in Term of Imprisonment of Confinement). When two or more of such concurrent crimes are punishable by imprisonment or confinement for a limited term, the sentence may exceed the maximum term of punishment otherwise authorized. In such case the maximum term shall be increased by one-half: Provided, however, that the sentence shall not exceed the cumulative maxima of all the crimes.

Article 66 (Cumulative Imposition of Fine, Penal Detention or Minor Fine). (1) When two or more of such concurrent crimes are punishable by fine, sentence shall be imposed within the limits of their cumulative maxima.

(2) A fine shall be imposed cumulatively with either penal detention or a minor fine.

(3) Penal detention or a minor fine shall be imposed cumulatively with other penal detention or minor fine.

Article 67 (Disposition of Unadjudicated Crimes). When a finally-binding adjudication has been made concerning certain concurrent crimes but not concerning others, a further adjudication shall be made concerning the latter.

Article 68 (Execution of Sentence). (1) When two or more finally-binding adjudications have been made concerning concurrent crimes, all sentences so imposed shall be executed cumulatively: Provided, that when one such adjudication imposes the death penalty, or imprisonment or confinement for life, no other punishment except a fine or minor fine shall be executed.

(2) If cumulative execution of sentences of imprisonment or confinement for a limited term is markedly inconsistent with the purposes of Articles 64 and 65, the court may in consideration of such purposes remit the execution of a part of the punishment imposed.

t. The Preparatory Draft has similar provisions:

Article 52 (Special Rules for Crimes Committed for Gain). Punishment shall be imposed on a person who has committed a crime for purposes of gain pursuant to the following rules:

(i) when the court has determined to impose imprisonment, or confinement it may also impose a fine even though such cumulative imposition is not specifically authorized. In such cases, if no fine is prescribed for the crime the maximum fine is 300,000 yen.

(ii) when the court has determined to impose a fine only, the maximum permissible fine is three times that specified for the crime.

u. An adjudication imposing a fine, minor fine, etc. is enforced upon the order of a public prosecutor and his order is as enforceable as a confession of judgment on an obligation (Article 490 (1) of the Code of Criminal Procedure). The provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure relating to confession of judgment apply by analogy to this kind of order, but no copy of the adjudication has to be served before enforcement (Article 490 (2) of the Code of Criminal Procedure; See also Article 46 of the Bankruptcy Law; Article 44 of the Debtor's Composition Law; and Articles 528 (1) and 560 of the Code of Civil Procedure).

v. Article 49 of the Preparatory Draft Code had originally proposed pronouncement of a fine or a minor fine in terms of number of days, but it was deleted.

w. Article 48 of the Preparatory Code states: In imposing a fine or a minor fine, the assets, income and other financial circumstances of the offender shall also be taken into consideration.

10. Article 38, paragraph 3 of the present Code concerns itself only with mistake of law: An ignorance of the law cannot be deemed to constitute a lack of intention to commit a crime, but punishment may be reduced according to the circumstances.

Article 20 of the Preparatory Draft states:

(1) Ignorance of law shall not mean the absence of intent: Provided, that punishment may be reduced in light of the circumstances.

(2) A person who acts without knowing that his acts are not permitted by law shall not be punished, if there is adequate reason for his ignorance.

Regarding ignorance or mistake of fact, Article 19 of the Preparatory Draft provides:

(1) A person who acts without realizing the existence of facts which make his act criminal shall not be deemed to have acted intentionally.

(2) A person who commits a crime graver than the one he intends to commit, without knowing that at the time of his act the facts aggravating the crime, shall not be punished for the graver crime.

11. No.

12. The Preparatory Draft contains the following: Crimes committed abroad by Japanese nationals (Article 2); Crimes committed abroad by public officials (Article 3); Certain crimes committed abroad (Article 4); and Crimes committed abroad by aliens (Article 5).

13. The Japanese Penal Code follows that of the European countries, but it provides only for conspiracy to commit insurrection, foreign aggression or private war, as set forth in Articles 78, 88 and 93:

Article 78 (Preparation and Conspiracy). A person who makes preparations or conspires with another to commit an insurrection shall be punished with imprisonment for not less than one year nor more than ten years.

Article 88 (Preparation and Conspiracy). A person who makes preparations or conspires with another to commit the crimes mentioned in Articles 81 and 82 (foreign aggression and assistant to enemy) shall be punished with imprisonment at forced labor for not less than one year nor more than ten years.

Article 93 (Preparation and Conspiracy for Private Wars). A person who makes preparations or conspires with another to wage a private war against a foreign state shall be punished with imprisonment for not less than three months nor more than five years, but the punishment of a person who denounces himself shall be remitted.

The present Penal Code divides accomplices, instigators, and accessories; it provides that "two or more persons who have jointly executed a crime are all principals," (Article 60) that "a person who has instigated and caused another to execute a crime" is an instigator (Article 61), and that "a person who has assisted a principal is an accessory" (Article 62). Although this system follows the lines of the French and German codes, the Japanese court developed the concept of a "conspiratorial-coprincipal" through cases interpreting Article 60, beyond the limits set by the Penal Code.

The conspiratory-coprincipal theory has much in common with the Anglo-American law of conspiracy, but this theory requires that criminal activity progress beyond the simple overt act to a stage where actual harm is done to society before criminal liability is attached. (See Ryuichi Hirano, "The Accused and Society: Some Aspect of Japanese Criminal Law," Law in Japan, ed. by Arthur Taylor von Meheren, Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1963, p. 290.)

14. The felony-murder rule was often criticized by Japanese lawyers. In Japan, if a person dies as a result of a train wreck, rape, or robbery, the death penalty or life imprisonment is imposed on the person who committed the original criminal act. A killing in connection with arson is not specifically punished, but arson itself carries the death penalty. The term "murder" is not used in these cases, but in fact the same results are reached as under the felony-murder rule. However, most scholars argue that even in these cases negligence turned toward the graver harm on the part of the actor should be required. The Draft Penal Code adopts this view as set forth in Article 21: "if aggravated punishment is prescribed on the basis of the results of a crime, but it was impossible to forsee such results, such aggravated punishment cannot be imposed." (Hirano, Law in Japan, p. 284.)

17. Japan has enacted five separate laws, each prescribing appropriate control measures within its respective areas. They are the Penal Code, the Opium Law (Law No. 71 of 1954); the Narcotic Control Law (Law No. 14, 1953); the Taima (Cannabis sativa, L.) Control Law (Law No. 124 of 1948); and the Awakening Drugs Control Law (Law No. 252 of 1951). Articles 136 to 141 of the Penal Code prohibits importation, manufacture, or sale of smoking opium and implements used for smoking it.

The present Penal Code provides for absolute prohibition of all forms of gambling, lotteries, and operation of gambling establishments, with only one exception—betting on "objects provided for monetary entertainment" (Articles 185–187).

The present Penal Code prohibits abortion by any means, whether self-induced or performed by another person (Articles 212–216). The Eugenic Protection Law (Law No. 156 of 1948), however, legalizes abortion within broad limits. In particular, this Law provides that an abortion can be performed whenever, in the judgment of a single authorized physician, "it is feared that the continued pregnancy or childbirth will for physical or economic reasons markedly injure the health of the mother's body" (Article 14(1)(iv)).

The Penal Code does not provide for the crime of prostitution. The Prostitution Prevention Law (Law No. 118 of 1956) prohibits the maintenance of houses of prostitution, but the act of prostitution itself is not treated as a crime. Article 3 of the Law states that "no person shall engage in prostitution nor become the other party thereto," but no criminal sanctions are imposed for violation of this Article.

Although the Penal Code prohibits public indecency and the distribution of pornographic literature in Articles 174–175, these are not strictly enforced in Japan. The Supreme Court of Japan held in 1957 that the translation of Lady Chatterley's Lover was an obscene publication, while a large number of pulp magazines were free from restraint.

Homosexuality, incest and sodomy are not punishable either under the Penal Code or Draft Code.

18. Article 117 of the Penal Code states: A person who causes an explosion of gunpower, a steam-boiler, or other potentially explosive object and thereby damages or destroys an object mentioned in Article 108 (setting fire to dwellings) or an object mentioned in Article 109 (setting fire to structures other than dwellings) which belongs to another shall be dealt with in the same way as provided for arson. The same also applies to a person who damages or destroys an object mentioned in Article 109 which belongs to him or an object mentioned in Article 110, and thereby endangers the public.

Firearms are not governed by the present Code, but are rigidly controlled by the Law Concerning the Control of the Possession of Firearms and Swords (Law No. 6 of 1958).

19. The heaviest penalty under the Penal Code is death by hanging. Japanese courts have declared that such penalty is not contrary to the constitutional provision prohibiting cruel punishments. Under the present Code, capital punishment may be imposed for the following 12 offenses:

(1) Insurrection.

(2) Rendering aid and assistance to the enemy.

(3) Arson of inhabited structures, such as a house, train, electric car, or ship.

(4) Causing damage to structures used as a human habitation, or causing damage to structures in which people are actually present, thereby causing death.

(5) Overturning a train or electric car, capsizing a vessel, or otherwise endangering traffic, thereby causing death or injury.

(6) Adding poisonous substance to water main, thereby causing death.
(7) Murder.
(8) Killing one's or his spouse's lineal ascendants.
(9) Causing death while in the commission of rape and robbery.
(10) Causing death while in the commission of an offense of robbery.
(11) Destroying aircraft in flight or causing it to fall.
(12) Causing death by use of explosives.

The Penal Code provides no separate proceeding to determine sentence in a capital case.

20. Article 256 (5) of the Code of Criminal Procedure provides: "Multiple counts or citations of penal provisions may be alleged conjunctively or in the alternative [in the indictment]." Professor Dando in his work, The Japanese Law of Criminal Procedure, commented as follows:

Even if there is but one criminal transaction, if various legal provisions may be applied to it they must be alleged in multiple counts. For example, if it is not clear whether the property in question was in the legal possession of the injured party, there must be a count alleging that the facts constitute theft and another that they constitute wrongful appropriation of lost property. Consequently, counts can be included either conjunctively (theft—but if not theft then wrongful appropriation of lost property). . . . Penal provisions may also be cited conjunctively or alternatively in a single count. For example, since there is a difference of opinion whether pilfering the contents of a package with which one has been entrusted is legally theft or wrongful appropriation, if such facts are alleged in the counts it is probably permissible to cite as applicable provisions both Penal Code Articles 235 (theft) and 252 (wrongful appropriation). (See Shigemtsu Dando, The Japanese Law of Criminal Procedure, trans. by B. J. George, Jr., South Hackensack, N.J., Fred B. Rothman & Co., 1965, p. 171.)

With respect to the case belonging to another jurisdiction, Article 258 of the Code of Criminal Procedure states:

A public prosecutor shall, when he considers that a case does not come within the jurisdiction of the court corresponding to the public prosecutor's office to which he belongs, send the said case to a public prosecutor of the public prosecutor's office corresponding to the court having the jurisdiction together with the documents and evidence.

Under Article 338 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, the public prosecution shall be dismissed in the following cases:

(1) [Omitted.]
(2) In a case where the public prosecution has been instituted in violation of the provisions of Article 340 (dismissal of prosecution by revocation and re-indictment);
(3) In a case where the public prosecution was instituted, the public prosecution has again been instituted for the same case with the same court;
(4) In a case where the procedure for the institution of public prosecution is void due to the violation of the provisions thereof.

The Republic Of Korea

1. The Penal Code of 1953 consists of two parts. Part I contains the general provisions (Articles 1 to 86) and Part II the specific provisions (Articles 87 to 372). The former deals with the general principles, including sentencing, that are to be applied to the latter. Sentences are designated for the specific crimes desscribed in each Article of Part II.

2. No numbering system is used: new provisions are added to the original ones, e.g., Article 1, Article 1–2, Article 1–3, etc.

3. On the basis of German law, two elements of a state of mind, intent and negligence, are provided for in the Penal Code. This distinction leaves no room for the intermediate concept of "recklessness" as conceived by Anglo-American law. There is no statutory definition of either intent or negligence. Article 13 and 14 of the Penal Code simply provide:

Article 13 (Criminal Intent). Criminal conduct due to ignorance of facts which constitute the elements of a crime is not punishable.

Article 14 (Negligence). Conduct in ignorance, due to neglect of normal attention of facts which constitute the elements of a crime, shall be punishable only where the law specifically so prescribes.

The Penal Code specifically enumerates five crimes of negligence which are subject to punishment: (1) setting fire by negligence (Articles 180 and 171); (2) inundation by negligence (Article 181); (3) obstruction of traffic by negligence (Article 189); (4) bodily injury and homicide by negligence (Articles 266, 267, and 268); (5) crimes concerning stolen property committed by negligence (Article 364).

In the case of intent, the Penal Code imposes a heavier penalty than in the case of negligence. Dean Ryu made a comparative study of negligence in the following terms: . . . the crimes of negligence in Korea are less numerous than in Germany, but more numerous than in Anglo-American law, in which the crime of negligence is a very exceptional phenomenon. The Korean Code rather resembles the Anglo-American pattern in accepting certain acts as criminal only if committed by gross negligence, in contrast to simple negligence. Thus, the crimes of receiving stolen property are punishable only when committed by gross negligence (or negligence in the conduct of a trade). In case of setting fire, obstructing traffic, bodily injury and homicide, due to gross negligence, the punishment is aggravated. (The Korean Criminal Code, trans. by Paul Ryu, South Hackensack, N.J., Fred B. Rothman & Co., 1960, pp. 7–8.)

4. Article 17 (Casual Relationship) of the Penal Code) Conduct not connected with causation of the risk which is an element of a crime, shall not be punishable although a harm occurs.

5. Article 10 (Persons Suffering from Mental Disorders) of the Penal Code: (1) A person who, due to a mental disorder is unable to pass rational judgments or to control his will, is not punishable.

(2) The punishment of a person who, due to a mental disorder, is deficient in the capacity mentioned in the preceding paragraph, shall be mitigated.

(3) The provisions of the preceding two paragraphs shall not apply to the criminal conduct of a person who, anticipating the risk of committing crime, has intentionally incurred mental disorder.

In commenting on Article 10, Dean Ryu notes that: A simple provision for reduction of penalty in cases of diminished responsibility tends to oversimplify this important issue of criminal legislation. The uncritical reception by the Korean Code of the continental European concept of diminished responsibility is regrettable. (Ryu, op. cit., p. 28.)

There are neither provisions concerning medical treatment nor commitment of mentally disordered defendants to a mental institution under the Penal Code. The judge selects a psychiatrist and renders a judgment of insanity, taking into consideration the psychiatrist's report.

6. No provisions under the Penal Code.

7. Article 21 (Self-Defense) of the Penal Code: (1) Conduct in order to prevent impending and unjust infringement of the accused's or another person's interest shall not be punishable, provided that there are reasonable grounds therefor.

(2) Where conduct in self-defense has exceeded reasonable limits the punishment may be mitigated or remitted depending upon the extent of the available extenuating circumstances.

(3) In the situation described in the preceding paragraph, conduct due to fear, surprise, excitement, or confusion at night-time or under other insecure circumstances, is not punishable.

Article 22 (Necessity). (1) Conduct in order to avert impending danger to the legal interest of the accused or another person shall not be punishable provided that there are reasonable grounds therefor.

(2) The provisions of the preceding paragraph shall not apply to a person charged with the duty not to avoid the danger.

(3) The provisions of paragraphs 3 and 4 of the preceding Article shall apply mutatis mutandis to the present Article.

Article 23 (Self-help). (1) Where it is impossible by legal procedure to preserve a claim, conduct in order to avoid the impossibility or serious difficulties of its enforcement shall not be punishable provided that there are reasonable grounds therefor.

(2) Where conduct as described in the preceding paragraph has exceeded reasonable limits, the punishment may be mitigated or remitted depending upon the extent of the available extenuating circumstances.

8. Article 41 (Classification of Punishment) of the Penal Code: Punishment shall be classified as follows: (1) Death penalty; (2) Penal servitude; (3) Imprisonment; (4) Deprivation of qualifications; (5) Suspension of qualifications; (6) Fine; (7) Detention; (8) Minor fine; (9) Confiscation. Each penalty is explained in Articles 42 to 50.

9.a. Article 51 (Criteria of Determination of Sentence) of the Penal Code: In determining sentence the following matter shall be taken into consideration: (1) The age, character and conduct, intellect and environment of the offender; (2) Circumstances regarding the victim; (3) The motive, the means and the result of the criminal conduct; (4) Circumstances after the commission of the crime.

9.b. The Penal Code provides both suspension of imposition of sentence (Articles 59–61) and suspension of execution of sentence (Articles 62–65).

9.c. Probation is a form of suspension of sentence.

9.d. There is no provision concerning supervision by a probation officer under the Penal Code. At present, only a juvenile offender under twenty years of age may be placed under the supervision of a probation officer. (Article 32 of the Juvenile Law, Law No. 489 of 1958, Legal Dictionary, ed. by Zung-ham Kim, Seoul, Pommunsa, 1968, p. 405.)

9.e. Indeterminate sentence may be imposed only on the juvenile offender under the Youth Law (Article 54 of the Youth Law).

9.f. There is no definition of dangerous special offenders, but the Penal Code provides the following relevant provisions:

Article 35 (Repeated Crimes). (1) Where, within three years after completion or remission of the execution of a punishment, a person is convicted of an offense punishable by imprisonment or by a more severe punishment, he shall be sentenced as a repeating offender.

(2) Punishment for a repeated crime shall be twice the maximum term of that specified for that crime.

Article 36 (Discovery of Repeated Crime After the Imposition of Sentence). Where, after imposition of a sentence, the crime is discovered to be a repeated one, the punishment may be determined de novo by increasing that imposed by sentence at the trial, except where the execution of that sentence has been completed or the punishment remitted.

9.g. Chapter I, Crimes of Insurrection (Article 87–90) of the Penal Code contains the following provisions:

Article 87 (Insurrection). A person who creates a disorder for the purpose of usurping the national territory of subverting the National Constitution shall be punished according to the following classification:

(1) A ringleader shall be punished by death, penal servitude for life or imprisonment for life.

(2) A person who participates in, or directs the plot, or engages in other important activities shall be punished by death, penal servitude, or imprisonment for life or for not less than five years; the same shall also apply to a person who has himself engaged in killing, wounding, destroying or plundering.

(3) A person who merely responds to the agitation and follows the lead of another or merely joins in the disorder shall be punished by penal servitude or imprisonment for not more than five years.

Article 88 (Homicide for the Purpose of Insurrection). A person who kills another for the purpose of usurping the national territory or subverting the National Constitution shall be punished by death, penal servitude for life or imprisonment for life.

Article 89 (Attempts). Attempts to commit the crimes of the preceding two Articles shall be punished.

Article 90 (Preparations, Conspiracies, Agitation, or Propaganda). (1) Anyone who makes preparations or conspires with intent to commit the crimes of Articles 87 or 88 shall be punished by limit penal servitude or imprisonment for not less than three years, but when a self-determination is made before the intended crime has reached the commencement stage, the punishment shall be mitigated or remitted.

(2) The preceding paragraph shall apply to a person who agitates or propagates the commission of the crimes of Articles 87 or 88.

9.h. Certain crimes carry mandatory prison sentences. For example, Article 241 of the Penal Code states:

Article 241 (Adultery). (1) A married person who commits adultery shall be punished by penal servitude for not more than two years. The same shall apply to the other participant.

(2) [Omitted]

9.i. Article 72 (Parole Requisities) of the Penal Code: A person serving a sentence of penal servitude or imprisonment whose behavior has been good and who has shown sincere repentance may be provisionally released by an act of administrative discretion after he has served ten years of a life sentence or one-third of a limited term of punishment.

(2) If a fine or minor fine has been imposed concurrently with the punishment specified in the preceding paragraph, the amount thereof shall be paid in full.

Article 73 (Custody Before Imposition of Sentence and Parole). (1) For the purpose of release on parole, the number of days of custody before imposition of sentence, included in the period of sentence, shall be calculated as time served.

(2) In the case of paragraph 2 of the preceding Article, the number of days of custody before imposition of sentence calculated as the period of internment in lieu of a fine or minor fine shall be deemed to be the payment of a corresponding amount.

Article 74 (Nullification of Parole). Where, during the period of parole, a judgment imposing a sentence of imprisonment or a more severe punishment becomes final, the release on parole shall lose its effect; this shall not apply where the sentence is imposed upon a crime of negligence.

Article 75 (Revocation of Parole). Where a person released on parole violates the parole regulations concerning surveillance, the parole may be revoked.

Article 76 (Effect of Parole). (1) Where since the granting of parole, ten years of a life sentence, or the remaining term of a limited punishment, elapses without nullification or revocation of the parole, the execution of punishment shall be deemed to have been completed.

(2) In the case of the preceding two Articles, the number of days spent during parole shall not be included in the term of punishment.

9.j. Prisoners are released on parole by an administrative agency known as the Parole Administration Committee which is under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Justice (Articles 49 to 52 of the Penal Administration Law, Law No. 1222 of 1962; the Offenders Rehabilitaiton Law, Law No. 730 of 1961).

9.k. No.

9.l. No

9.m. For similar provisions, see Question 9.f.

9.n. Under Article 323 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, it is provided that in pronouncing sentence, the reasons for the judgment shall contain facts constituting crimes, the gist of the evidence and application of relevant laws.

9.o. Sentences are subject to review by the Appellate Courts including the Supreme Court. The Appelate Court has the power to raise or lower the sentence imposed by a lower court, but it cannot impose a penalty heavier than that imposed by the trial court in a case appealed by the defendant (Articles 364 (6), 368 and 396 of the Code of Criminal Procedure).

9.p. Both the Government and the defandant may appeal (Article 338 of the Code of Criminal Procedure).

9.q. There are no standards for review of sentencing under the Penal Code. The Code of Criminal Procedure, however, lists, inter alia, an "improper sentence" as one of the grounds for appeal to the court of second instance, which must be alledged in writing (Article 361-5 of the Code of Criminal Procedure). Also included as grounds for appeal to the Supreme Court is "an inappropriateness of sentence in a case in which the death penalty or penal servitude or imprisonment for not less than ten years has been adjudged" (Article 383 of the Code of Criminal Procedure). Generally, an Appelate Court and the Supreme Court decide only the issues raised by the appellant in writing. Thus the Code of Criminal Procedure provides:

Article 364 (Judgment by the Appellate Court). (1) The appellate court shall render a decision on the basis of the grounds stated in the reasons for appeal.

(2) [Omitted]

Article 384 (The Scope of Appeal). The Supreme Court shall render a decision on the basis of the grounds stated in the reasons for appeal. . . .

9.r. Not applicable.

9.s. The Penal Code has the following Articles:

Article 38 (Concurrent Crimes and Application of Punishment). (1) When concurrent crimes are adjudicated at the same time, punishment shall be imposed in accordance with the following standards:

(1) In the event that the punishment specified for the most severe crime is a death penalty or penal servitude for life or imprisonment for life, the punishment provided for the most severe crime shall be imposed.

(2) In the event that the punishments specified for each crime are of the same kind, other than a death penalty or penal servitude for life or imprisonment for life, the maximum term or maximum amount for the most severe crime shall be increased by one half thereof, but shall not exceed the sum total of the maximum terms or maximum amounts of the punishments specified for each crime, except that several minor fines or several confiscations may be imposed together.

(3) In the event that the punishments specified for each crime are of a different kind, other than penal servitude for life or imprisonments for life, they shall run consecutively.

(2) As to each paragraph of the preceding Section, penal servitude and imprisonment shall be regarded as the same kind of punishment.

Article 39 (Concurrent Crimes not Adjudicated: Several Judgments and Concurrent Crimes: and Execution of Punishment and Concurrent Crimes). (1) Where, of several concurrent crimes, one or more have not been adjudicated, sentence shall be imposed for the latter.

(2) Where several judgments as set forth in the preceding Section have been rendered, they shall be executed in accordance with provisions of the preceding Article.

(3) Where a person sentenced for concurrent crimes receives amnesty or remission of the execution of punishment with regard to any one of them, punishment for the remaining crimes shall be determined de novo.

(4) In the execution of punishment specified in the preceding three Sections, the period of sentence already served shall be taken into account.

Article 40 (Compound Crimes). When conduct constitutes several crimes, punishment provided for the most severe crime shall be imposed.

9.t. No.

9.u. A judgment imposing a fine, minor fine, etc. is enforced upon the order of a public prosecutor and his order is as enforceable as a confession of judgment on an obligation (Article 477 of the Code of Criminal Procedure). In this case, the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure relating to confession of judgment apply by analogy to this kind of order. Article 70 of the Penal Code also provides that "when rendering a sentence of a fine or minor fine, the court shall simultaneously determine and decree a substitutive term of internment in a workhouse in the event that payment of such fine or minor fine is not made in full."

9.v. Article 69 (Fine and Minor Fine) of the Penal Code: (1) A fine and a minor fine shall be paid within thirty days from the day when the judgment has become final, but when a fine is imposed, interment in a workhouse in lieu of the fine unless and until the amount is paid in full may be concurrently ordered.

(2) A person who does not pay a fine in full shall be interned in a workhouse and work for a term of not less than one month nor more than three years, or, in case of a minor fine, of not less than one day but not more than thirty days.

9.w. A fine is fixed depending upon the gravity of the offense of which the defendant is convicted.

10. The Penal Code provides the following:

Article 15 (Mistake of Fact). (1) Criminal conduct in ignorance of facts which aggrevate a crime is not punishable as the aggrevated crime.

(2) [Omitted]

Article 16 (Mistake of Law). Where a person commits a crime in the belief that his conduct does not constitute a crime under existing law, he shall not be punishable only when his mistake is based on reasonable grounds.

Under the provision of Article 16, an unreasonable mistake of law affords no excuse whatever, except in case of extenuating circumstances.

11. No.

12. The Penal Code contains crimes committed by Koreans and by aliens (Articles 3 and 5); crimes committed by aliens on board a Korean vessel or aircraft outside Korea (Article 4); crimes committed abroad against the Republic of Korea and Korean nationals (Article 6).

13. The Penal Code provides only for conspiracy to commit insurrection, foreign aggression or private war, as prescribed in Articles 90, 101 and 111:

Article 90 (Preparations, Conspiracies, Agitation, or Propaganda). (1) Anyone who makes preparations or conspires with intent to commit the crimes of Articles 87 or 88 (insurrection) shall be punished by limited penal servitude or imprisonment for not less than three years, but when a self-denunciation is made before the intended crime has reached the commencement stage, the punishment shall be mitigated or remitted.

(2) [Omitted]

Article 101 (Preparations, Conspiracies, Agitation or Propaganda). (1) A person who makes preparations or conspires with intent to commit any of the crimes of Articles 92 through 99 shall be sentenced to penal servitude for a limited term of not less than two years; but when self-denunciation is made before the intended crime has reached the commencement stage, the punishment shall be mitigated or remitted.

(2) [Omitted]

Article 111 (Private War Against Foreign Countries). (1) A person who wages a private war against a foreign country shall be punished by limited imprisonment for not less than one year.

(2) Attempts to commit crimes described in the preceding paragraph shall be punished.

(3) A person who makes reparations or conspires with intent to commit the crime of paragraph 1 shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than three years or fined not more than twenty-five thousand hwan. . . .

14. Article 15 of the Penal Code provides that "where, due to certain consequences of a crime, a more severe punishment is imposed thereon, the more severe punishment shall not be applied if such consequences were not foreseeable." Under the above provision, A, an instigator, is responsible for instigating an aggravated bodily injury only if, at the time when he instigated B to inflict a bodily injury upon C, the latter's death was foreseeable.

17. The Penal Code prohibits importation, manufacture, or sale of smoking opium and implements used for smoking it (Articles 198 to 206). There exists the Opium Law which is designed to control importation, exportation, sale or distribution of raw opium, marijuana and other narcotics Law No. 1954 of 1957).

The Penal Code prohibits abortion by any means, whether self-induced or performed by another person including a doctor, midwife and pharmacist (Articles 269 to 270), but it is not well enforced as Professor Hahm describes:

The apprehension and prosecution of offenders has been sporadic. There has been no public outcry that might have prompted a more vigorous enforcement of the law. In a few cases where an abortion results in the death of a woman, the law-enforcement agencies institute criminal proceedings against the offenders. In the overwhelming majority of the cases, however, where abortions are successful, the law remains utterly unconcerned. (Pyong-Choon Hahm, The Korean Political Tradition and Law, Seoul, Hollym Corporation, 1967, p. 234.)

The Penal Code provides for absolute prohibition of gambling, betting, lotteries for gain, and operation of gambling establishments (Articles 246–249). Although the Code does not provide for the crime of prostitution, the Prostitution Prevention Law (Law No. 771 of 1961) carries penal sanctions for the maintenance of houses of prostitution and for the parties of prostitution. An indecent act performed in public is punishable and distribution or sale of any pornographic writing, picture, or other object, or displaying the same in public is made a criminal act (Articles 243–245). Homosexual activity is not punishable.

18. Firearms are not regulated by the Penal Code, but are strictly controlled by the Gun and Gunpowder Control Law (Law No. 835 of 1961). On the control of explosives, the Penal Code provides:

Article 119 (Use of Explosives). (1) One who injures a person or damages property or disturbs the public peace by using explosives shall be punished by death, penal servitude for life or for not less than seven years.

(2) A person who commits the crimes of the preceding paragraph in time of war, a calamity or other (warlike) incident shall be punished by death or penal servitude for life.

(3) Attempts to commit the crimes of the preceding two paragraphs shall be punished.

Article 172 (Destruction by Explosives). (1) A person who causes an explosion of gunpowder, a steam boiler, or other potentially explosive object and thereby damages or destroys an item mentioned in Articles 164 through 167 (arson) shall be punished in accordance with the provisions for arson.

(2) Where the conduct of the preceding paragraph is caused by negligence, it shall be punished in accordance with the provisions for fire caused by negligence.

19. Under the Penal Code the following offenses are subject to capital punishment: (1) Insurrection; (2) Rendering aid in collaborating with the enemy; (3) Espionage; (4) Causing injuries to a person or damages to property by using explosives; (5) Arson of dwellings; (6) Obstruction of traffic causing death or injury of another; (7) Obstruction of use of drinking water causing death or injury of another; (8) Murder; (9) Murder upon request by fraudulent means; (10) Robbery-murder: death; (11) Piracy.

20. The Code of Criminal Procedure contains the following Article:

Article 254 (Method of Instituting Public Action). (1) The institution of public prosecution shall be made by filing an indictment.

(2)–(4) [Omitted]

(5) Facts constituting several offenses (multiple counts) and penal provisions may be stated conjunctively or in the alternative.

Under the above Article, if a person is suspected of having committed more than one offense, the prosecutor can state in the indictment all the alleged offenses together, or can state only the most serious one. (The Republic of Korea, The Supreme Court, Korean Legal System, 1970, p. 34.) Other relevant provisions of the same Code include:

Article 258 (Sending cases to other jurisdiction). If a prosecutor considers that the case does not come within the jurisdiction of the court corresponding to the prosecutor's office to which he belongs, he shall transfer the case, together with the documents and evidence, to a prosecutor of the prosecutor's office corresponding to the court having jurisdiction.

Article 327 (Judgment dismissing public action). The public prosecution shall be dismissed by a judgment in the following cases:

(1) In a case the court has no jurisdiction over the accused;

(2) In a case the public prosecution has been instituted in violation of the procedure prescribed by law;

(3) In a case where the public prosecution was instituted, the public prosecution has again been instituted with the same case;

(4) In a case where the public prosecution has been instituted in violation of Article 329 (cancellation of public prosecution and re-indictment).

(5)–(6) [Omitted]

Pakistan

The Indian Penal Code 1860 and the Code of Criminal Procedure 1898 applied to the whole of the former British-India sub-continent, which presently comprises the territories of Pakistan and India. After the Independence of Pakistan in 1947, these Codes were adopted in Pakistan by virtue of the provisions of Indian Independence Act 1947, and continue to be applicable under the title of The Pakistan Penal Code 1860 [1] and Code of Criminal Procedure 1898.[2]

A Xerox copy of the contents of the Pakistan Penal Code will show that the laws of the Penal Code correspond to those of the Indian Penal Code. So that the criminal laws in India and Pakistan are alike and the answers to the questionnaire relating to India will apply to Pakistan also.

As for question 18, a copy of the Arms Act 1878,[3] is attached. The provisions of this law consolidate and amend the law relating to Arms, Ammunition and Military Stores. The Government has in this law the power to control the sale, purchase, and import dealings in the arms and ammunition, etc. Strict penalties are provided for infringement of the law. Penalties for contravention are prescribed in Chapter VI of the Act.

The functions of the Central Government under certain provisions of this Act, subject to certain conditions, were entrusted to—

(a) Provincial Governments with their consent, for a period of three years (with effect from the 1st April, 1951), see Gaz. of P., 1951, Pt. I, p. 181; and

(b) The Chief Commissioner of Karachi, for the period 28th April, 1952 to 31st March, 1957, see Gaz. of P., 1954, Pt. I, p. 136.

The Act has been applied to—

(i) Baluchistan by Regulation III of 1940 with certain restrictions and modifications.

(ii) Phulera in the Excluded Area of Upper Tanawal to the extent the Act is applicable in the N.-W.F.P. (Upper Tanawal) (Excluded Area) Laws Regulation, 1950.

(iii) Excluded Area of Upper Tanawal other than Phulera, by the N.-W.F.P. (Upper Tanawal) (Excluded Area) Laws Regulation, 1950 and declared to be in force in that area with effect from 1st June, 1951; see N.-W.F.P. Gazette, Ext., dated 1st June, 1951; and (iv) The Leased Areas of Baluchistan, see the Leased Areas (Laws) Order, 1950 (G.G.O. 3 of 1950); and applied in the Federated Areas of Baluchistan; see Gazette of India, 1937, Pt. I, p. 1499.

It has been extended to the Baluchistan States Union by the Baluchistan States Union (Federal Laws) (Extension) Order, 1953 (G.G.O. 4 of 1953), as amended.

The Act has been and shall be deemed to has been brought into force in Gwadur with effect from the 8th September, 1958 by the Gwadur (Application of Central Laws) Ordinance, 1960 (37 of 1960), s. 2.

It is in force throughout the province of Assam except the Lushai Hills, see Notification No. 2443-T., dated the 1st June, 1914, Assam Gazette, 1914, Pt. II, p. 843.

A license granted under the Explosives Act, 1884 (4 of 1884), for the manufacture, possession, sale, transport or importation of an explosive may be given the effect of a like license granted under the Arms Act, 1878 (11 of 1878), see Act 4 of 1884, s. 15.

As to the possession, manufacture and export of arms, ammunition and gun-powder in the Chittagong Hill Tracts, see the Chittagong Hill Tracts Regulation, 1900 (1 of 1900), ss. 11 and 12.

As to further law relating to unlawful manufacture and posession of explosive substances, see the Explosive Substances Act, 1908 (6 of 1908), ss. 4 (b) and 5.

This Act has been repealed in its application to the Province of West Pakistan except certain provisions by West Pakistan Ordinance 20 of 1965, s. 29 (with effect from the 8th June, 1965).

The Act has been amended in Bengal by the Bengal Criminal Law (Arms and Explosives) Act, 1932 (Ben. 21 of 1932), and the Bengal Criminal Law (Amendment) Act, 1934 (Ben. 7 of 1934); and in the N.-W.F.P. by the Indian Arms (N.-W.F.P. Amdt.) Act, 1934 (N.-W.F.P. 1 of 1934) and Sind Act 10 of 1953 s. 12.

[9] Subs. ibid., for "Gazette of India".

III.—IMPORT, EXPORT AND TRANSPORT

6. No person shall bring or take by sea or by land into or out of [1] [Pakistan] any arms, ammunition or military stores except under a license and in the manner and to the extent permitted by such license.

Nothing in the first clause of this section extends to arms (other than cannon) or ammunition imported or exported in reasonable quantities for his own private use by any person lawfully entitled to possess such arms or ammunition; but the Collector of Customs or any officer empowered by the [2] [Central Government] in this behalf by name or in virtue of his office may at any time detain such arms or ammunition until he receives the orders of the [2] [Central Government] thereon.

Explanation.—Arms, ammunition and military stores taken from one part of of [1] [Pakistan] to another by sea or across intervening territory not being part of [1] [Pakistan] are taken out of and brought into [1] [Pakistan] within the meaning of this section.

7. Notwithstanding anything contained in the Sea Customs Act, 1878, no arms, ammunition or military stores shall be deposited in any warehouse licensed under section 16 of that Act without the sanction of the [2] [Central Government].

8. [Levy of duties on arms, etc., imported by sea.] Rep. by the Amending Act, 1891 (XII of 1891).

9. [Power to impose duty on import by land.] Rep. by the Amending Act, 1891 (XII of 1891).

10. The [3] [appropriate Government] may, from time to time, by notification in the [4] [official Gazette],—

(a) regulate or prohibit the transport of any description of arms, ammunition or military stores over [5] [the whole of Pakistan] or any part thereof, either altogether or except under a license and to the extent in the manner permitted by such license, and

(b) cancel any such notification.

Explanation.—Arms, ammunition or military stores transhipped at a port in [1] [Pakistan] are transported within the meaning of this section.

(III.—IMPORT, EXPORT AND TRANSPORT. IV.—GOING ARMED AND POSSESSING ARMS, ETC.)

[6] Offences under this section are bailable, see Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898 (Act 5 of 1898), Sch. II.

[7] After this section, a new s. 19A, prescribing a heavier penalty for offenses under cl. (a) (c), (e) or (f) of s. 19 in respect of certain arms, has been inserted in Bengal. See the Bengal Criminal Law (Arms and Explosives) Act, 1932 (Ben. 21 of 1932), s. 3 and the Bengal Criminal Law Amdt. Act, 1934 (Ben. 7 of 1934), s. 3.

For secret breaches of sections 5, 6, 10, 14, and 15—XLV of 1860.

20. Whoever does any act mentioned in clause (a), (c), (d) or (f) of section 19, in such manner as to indicate an intention that such act may not be known to any public servant as defined in the Pakistan Penal Code, or to any person employed upon a railway or to the servant of any public carrier,

For concealing arms, etc.

And whoever, on any search being made under section 25, conceals or attempts to conceal any arms, ammunition or military stores,

Shall be punished with imprisonment for a term which may extend to seven years, or with fine, or with both.[1]

For breach of license.

21. Whoever, in violation of a condition subject to which a license has been granted, does or omits to do any act shall, when the doing or omitting to do such act is not punishable under section 19 or section 20, be punished with imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both.

For knowingly purchasing arms, etc., from unlicensed person.

22. Whoever knowingly purchases any arms, ammunition or military stores from any person not licensed or authorized under the proviso to section 5 to sell the same; or

Delivers any arms, ammunition or military stores into the possession of any person without previously ascertaining that such person is legally authorized to possess the same,

For delivering arms, etc., to person not authorized to possess them.

Shall be punished with imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to five hundred rupees, or with both.

Penalty for breach of rule.

23. Any person violating any rule made under this Act, and for the violation of which no penalty is provided by this Act, shall be punished with imprisonment for a term which may extend to one month, or with fine which may extend to two hundred rupees, or with both.

Power to confiscate.

24. When any person is convicted of an offense punishable under this Act, committed by him in respect of any arms, ammunition or military stores, it shall be in the discretion of the convicting Court or Magistrate further to direct that the whole or any portion of such arms, ammunition or military stores, and any vessel, cart or baggage-animal used to convey the same, and any box, package or bale in which the same may have been concealed, together with the other contents of such box, package or bale, shall be confiscated.

VII.—MISCELLANEOUS

Search and seizure by Magistrate.

25. Whenever any Magistrate has reason to believe that any person residing within the local limits of his jurisdiction has in his possession any arms, ammunition or military stores for any unlawful purpose, or that such person cannot be left in the possession of any such arms, ammunition or military stores without danger to the public peace, such Magistrate, having first recorded the grounds of his belief, may cause a search to be made of the house or premises occupied by such person or in which such Magistrate has reason to believe such arms, ammunition or military stores are or is to be found, and may seize and detain the same, although covered by a license, in safe custody for such time as he thinks necessary.

The search in such case shall be conducted by, or in the presence of, a Magistrate, or by, or in the presence of, some officer specially empowered in this behalf by name or in virtue of his office by the[2] [appropriate Government].

[1] A proviso, prescribing a heavier penalty for offences under this section in respect of certain arms, has been inserted in Bengal; see Ben. Act 21 of 1932, s. 4. After this section, a new s. 20A prescribing heavier penalty in certain cases has been inserted in Bengal; see Ben. Act 7 of 1934, s. 4.

[2] See footnote 4, preceding page.

Seizure and detention by appropriate Government.

26. The [1][appropriate Government] may at any time order or cause to be seized any arms, ammunition or military stores in the possession of any person, notwithstanding that such person is licensed to possess the same, and may detain the same for such time as it thinks necessary for the public safety.

Power to exempt.

27. The [1] [appropriate Government] may from time to time, by notification [2] published in the [3] [official Gazette],—

[4] (a) Exempt any person by name or in virtue of his office, or any class of persons or exclude, any description of arms or ammunition, or withdraw any part of [5] [Pakistan],[7] [or of the Province, as the case may be,] from the operation of any prohibition or direction contained in this Act; and

(b) Cancel any such notification, and again subject the persons or things or the part of [6] [Pakistan] [6] [or Province] comprised therein to the operation of such prohibition or direction.[7]

Information to be given regarding offences.

28. Every person aware of the commission of any offence punishable under this Act shall, in the absence of reasonable excuse, the burden of proving which shall lie upon such person, give information of the same to the nearest Police-officer or Magistrate, and every person employed upon any railway or by any public carrier shall, in the absence of reasonable excuse, the burden of proving which shall lie upon such person, give information to the nearest Police officer regarding any box, package or bale in transit which he may have reason to suspect contains arms, ammunition or military stores in respect of which an offence against this Act has been or is being committed.

Sanction required to certain proceedings under section 19, clause (f).

[8] 29. Where an offence punishable under section 19, clause (f), has been committed within three months from the date [9] on which this Act comes into force in any province, district or place to which section 32, clause 2, of Act [10]XXXI of 1860 [10] applies at such date, or where such an offense has been committed in any part of [5] [Pakistan] not being such a district, province or place, no proceedings shall be instituted against any person in respect of such offence without the previous sanction of the Magistrate of the district [11] * * *.

Searches in the case of offences against section 19, clause (f), how conducted.

30. Where a search is to be made under the Code of Criminal Procedure [12] [13] * * *, in the course of any proceedings instituted in respect of an offence punishable under section 19, clause (f), such search shall, notwithstanding anything contained in the said Code [14] * * *, be made in the presence of some officer specially appointed by name or in virtue of his office by the [9][appropriate Government] in this behalf, and not otherwise.

PHILLIPPINES

The criminal law of the Philippines is patterned after the Spanish Penal Code of 1870 which was extended to the Philippines by an 1886 royal order of the Spanish Crown and made effective in this former Spanish colony in 1887. The Spanish Code was based on the classical theory of criminal science which dictates that criminal responsibility can only be demanded or exacted on grounds of imputability (or actor's knowledge or free will) and that penalty imposed by way of retribution must be proportionate to the harm done, not only quantitatively but also qualitatively; i.e., the emphasis is on the act and not on the doer. The same theory, not surprisingly, pervades the current basic criminal law of the Philippines, the Revised Penal Code, which was approved by the former Philippine Legislature on December 8, 1930 and took effect on January 1, 1932. The Code has since undergone several changes.[1]

Criminal procedure which, along with other procedural rules in the Philippines, comes under the general heading, "Remedial Law," is governed basically by the Rules of Court as revised on January 1, 1964. We hope to discuss briefly the relvant rules and other special procedural laws as required. At this point, it should be pointed out that the Philippines has one central government with all political subdivisions made subordinate to it. There is one Supreme Court, one Court of Appeals, quite a number of courts of first instance and other inferior courts distributed over designated judicial districts. A court's jurisdiction rests on such factors as personal circumstances, subject matter, gravity of offense charged, etc., prescribed by law. The basic codes are applicable nationally. The penal code, however, is enforceable not only within the Philippines but also outside the country in certain cases, such as those involving offenses committed on board Philippine ships or airships; those concerning counterfeiting or Philippine coins or currency, etc.; those against national security; and others committed in the exercise of official functions by government employees abroad.

As amended to date, the Revised Penal Code contains 367 articles, numbered consecutively starting at 1. It is divided into Books I and II. Book I consists of two parts: (1) the basic principles affecting criminal liability (Articles

[1] The Revised Penal Code (Act 3815, as amended), 1964 ed., Central Book Supply Co., Manila [1964]. 158 p.

1–20); and (2) the provisions on penalties, including both criminal and civil liabilities (Articles 21–113). Felonies are defined in Book II with the corresponding penalties classified and grouped under 14 titles (Articles 114–365).

Felonies, Intent or Culpability

Pursuant to Article 3, they are "acts and omissions" divided into: (1) intentional felonies committed "by means of deceit (dolo)"; and (2) culpable felonies committed "by means of fault (culpa)." Luis B. Reyes, in a widely-used commentary on the Code, makes the following pertinent observation:

In intentional felonies, the act or omission of the offender is malicious. In the language of Art. 3, the act is performed with deliberate intent (with malice). The offender, in performing the act or in incurring the omission, has the intention to cause an injury to another. In culpable felonies, the act or omission of the offender is not malicious. The injury caused by the offender to another person is "unintentional, it being simply the incident of another act performed without malice" [1]

By way of illustration, the same author cites a felony by omission as follows: "Anyone who fails to render assistance to any person whom he finds in an uninhabited place, wounded or in danger of dying, is liable for abandonment of persons in danger (Art. 275, par. 1, Revised Penal Code)." [2] Note, however, that for an omission to be a felony there must be an express provision of law, making it so and punishing it as such. Common law crimes or those which do not rest for their authority upon any express declaration of the legislature, are not recognized in the Philippines. In this jurisdiction what is controlling is the maxim nullum crimen, nulla poena sine lege (there is no crime where there is no law punishing it).

In both felonies committed either by dolo or culpa, the acts or omissions must be voluntary. Those committed by means of dolo are considered performed voluntarily or with deliberate intent, it being presumed in all cases that negligent acts or omissions are voluntary. Deliberate intent refers to criminal intent.

Defenses

Mistake of fact (not mistake of law) constitutes a defense provided, however, the following requisites are present: (1) That the act done would have been lawful had the facts been as the accused believed them to be; (2) That the intention of the accused in performing the act should be lawful; (3) That the mistake must be without fault or carelessness on the part of the accused.

Insanity as a defense is covered in Article 12 which treats with exempting circumstances. In this connection, Judge Reyes, quoting a famous Filipino criminologist, states that an imbecile—one who while advanced in age has a mental development comparable to that of a child of two or seven years of age—is exempt in all cases from criminal liability because of the absence of the conditions of free will and voluntariness in any of his actions; whereas, an insane person may not be so exempt if it can be shown that he acted during a lucid interval.[3]

On the matter of self-defense, the Code provides:

Art. 11. Justifying circumstances.—The following do not incur any criminal liability:

1. Anyone who acts in defense of his person or rights, provided that the following circumstances concur:

First. Unlawful aggression;

Second. Reasonable necessity of the means employed to prevent or repel it;

Third. Lack of sufficient provocation on the part of the person defending himself.

2. Anyone who acts in defense of the person or rights of his spouse, ascendants, descendants, or legitimate, natural or adopted brothers or sisters, or of his relatives by affinity in the same degrees, and those by consanguinity within the fourth civil degree, provided that the first and second requisites prescribed in the next preceding circumstance are present, and the further requisite, in case the provocation was given by the person attacked, that the one making defense had no part therein.

3. Anyone who acts in defense of the person or rights of a stranger, provided that the first and second requisites mentioned in the first circumstance of this article are present and that the person defending be not induced by revenge, resentment, or other evil motive.

Aggression within the context of the above article refers to actual or imminent aggression, and the "reasonableness of the necessity" to repel or prevent aggression is measured in terms of the type of weapon used, physical condition of both the attacker and the victim and other circumstances.

Under paragraph 2 of the article on defense, "relatives" extend to those connected by affinity (in-laws) or consanguinity (blood relatives) up to the "fourth civil degree" such as first cousins, provided however the circumstances stipulated in sub-paragraphs 1 and 2, supra, are present and that if there was any provocation at all, the person undertaking the defense had no part in it whatsoever.

Procedural Matters

Sentences or judgments appealed to a higher court may be lowered, raised, confirmed or remanded back to the trial courts for new trial, as the circumstances may warrant. Under applicable rules, only questions of law are directly appealable to the Supreme Court. Generally, both questions of fact and questions of law may, under certain standards, be appealable to the Court of Appeals. Written reasons for decisions are required, unless they involve decisions handed down by inferior courts which are not of record; i.e., municipal courts.

All offenses under the Revised Penal Code calling for capital punishment, such as murder and kidnapping, if given the death penalty by a court of first instance, are automatically appealed to the Supreme Court which can only confirm the death sentence by a unanimous vote of the Justices.

On multiple prosecutions for related offenses and others concerned with prosecutions barred by a former prosecution for another offense, the Rules of Court follow more or less the same procedural patterns of the American judicial system.

Crimes Without Victims

Abortion, gambling, prostitution are not, under any circumstances, exempt from criminal liability and are dealt with more or less severely. Homosexual activity, however, is generally prosecuted under vagrancy provisions of the Code.

Parole

Indeterminate sentencing in the Philippines is covered by a special law, Act 4103 of 1933, otherwise known as the Indeterminate Sentence Law. This law formalized and established the present-day administrative machinery for implementing an effective parole system in the country. It provided the guidelines for the application by the Court of the minimum and maximum penalties for the offense defined by the Revised Penal Code and other laws in accordance with the prescribed rules, and the procedure for releasing on parole certain convicts whose behavior, training and good potentials merit "a second change" at a normal life. Provisions of the law are implemented by a Board of Indeterminate Sentence with broad powers of investigation and the discretion to authorize the release of prisoners who have served the minimum penalty but subject to re-arrest and confinement should the conditions of the parole be violated.[1]

Penalties

Attached is a copy of a table excerpted from the Code itself, showing the duration and category of each penalty. This should put in a better light the provisions of the proposed U.S. Federal Code on concurrent and consecutive terms of imprisonment in relation to Article 70 of the Revised Penal Code which provides as follows:

Art. 70. Successive service of sentences.—When the culprit has to serve two or more penalties, he shall serve them simultaneously if the nature of the penalties will so permit; otherwise, the following rules shall be observed:

[1] Bunye, Alfredo M. An analytical study of the application of penalties in the Revised Penal Code, in relation to the provisions of the Indeterminate Sentence Law in Decision Law Journal, vol. 5, January 31, 1949, pp. 1–11.

In the imposition of the penalties, the order of their respective severity shall be followed so that they may be executed successively or as nearly as may be possible, should a pardon have been granted as to the penalty or penalties first imposed, or should they have been served out.

For the purpose of applying the provisions of the next preceding paragraph the respective severity of the penalties shall be determined in accordance with the following scale:

1. Death,
2. Reclusión perpetua,
3. Reclusión temporal,
4. Prisión mayor.
5. Prision correccional,
6. Arresto mayor,
7. Arresto menor,
8. Destierro,
9. Perpetual absolute disqualification,
10. Temporary absolute disqualification,
11. Suspension from public office, the right to vote and be voted for, the right to follow profession or calling, and
12. Public censure.

Notwithstanding the provisions of the rule next preceding, the maximum duration of the convict's sentence shall not be more than threefold the length of time corresponding to the most severe of the penalties imposed upon him. No other penalty to which he may be liable shall be inflicted after the sum total of those imposed equals the same maximum period.

The preceding should be read together with Article 81 which specifically states that "death sentence shall be executed with preference to another. . ."

Proposed Philippine Code of Crimes

The Revised Penal Code of the Philippines is in the process of total revision. You might find the ideas from this current revision effort enlightening. In 1947, the President of the Philippines created a Code Commission to revise "all existing substantive laws and codify them in conformity with the customs and traditions of the people and with modern trend in legislation and the progressive principles of law." Several years and several commissions later, a Code of Crimes was drafted but, for one reason or another, was never enacted into law. Recently, however, a leading Manila paper,[1] carried the story that President Marcos certified for immediate enactment by the Philippine Congress what appears to be the same draft code. This draft and relevant periodical literature[2] might prove more interesting and useful for your purposes. The general structure of the proposed Code of Crimes may be gleaned from "rationale" of the Code Commission, which is excerpted as follows:

The first and most far-reaching task of the Code Commission was to determine the basic philosophy of the new Code of Crimes. For this purpose, the conflict between two opposite theories or schools—the classical or juristic, and the positivist or realistic—had to be examined . . . To the classicist, and specifically the framers of the Spanish Penal Code of 1870, man is essentially a moral creature with an absolutely free will to choose between good and evil. They assert that man should be adjudged and held accountable for wrongful acts, so long as that free will appears unimpaired . . . However, eventually, the classical method of considering the offender as an abstract being, and of prefixing for him, through a series of hard-and-fast rules, a great multitude of penalties with scant regard to the human element, found stubborn and severe critics in the persons of Dr. Cesare Lombroso and Professors Rafael Garofalo and Enrico Ferri, who were the forerunners and founders of the positivist school of criminology. . .

The positivists hold that man is subdued occasionally by a strange and morbid phenomenon which constrains him to do wrong, in spite of or contrary to his volition. It is for this reason that the central idea of all positivist thinking is the defense of the community from anti-social activities, whether actual or potential, against the morbid type of man who is called a "socially dangerous person." To forestall the social danger and to achieve social defense, the positivist philosophy has thus chosen a different path. Premised upon the proposition that man is primary, while the deed is only secondary, the new school takes the view that crime is essentially a social and natural phenomenon, and as such, it cannot be treated and checked by the application of abstract principles of law and jurisprudence nor by the imposition of a punishment, fixed and determined a priori; but rather through the enforcement of individual measures in each particular case after a thorough, personal and individual investigation conducted by a competent body of psychiatrists and social scientists.

After a deliberate and careful study of the vast field of criminal science, the Commission came to the conclusion that no particular school of thought or theory could claim perfection and monopoly of the true and rightful approach toward the administration of criminal justice . . .

The foregoing reasons, among others, kept the Commission from committing itself entirely to either of the two opposing schools of thought. The Commission prefers to follow the path of Criminal Politic which may be considered as the giusto mezzo or the happy medium between the two extreme theories.

For this purpose, the Commission retains the principle of moral blame or free will in every act or omission (Articles 14 and 16), but at the same time the man or the actor is considered as more important than the act itself. (Arts. 106 to 112) [1]

The proposed Code contains 951 articles as compared with 367 of the present Code. Among the new concepts introduced are: (1) a crime is either consummated or attempted, discarding in effect the classical distinction between attempted, frustrated and consummated crimes; (2) the accessory after the fact whose guilt depended largely upon the guilt of the principal under the present Code became the principal of a separate and different crime (Arts. 32, 384–390); (3) the idea of a quasi-offense was scraped and a bi-partite classification of offenses was adopted; i.e., an act is either a crime or a misdemeanor (Article 13); (4) the requisites for self-defense were enlarged to include defense of property and a juris tantum presumption that the injury inflicted upon an intruder was reasonably necessary to prevent or repel the aggression; (5) wealth dishonestly accumulated by a public official is made subject to forfeiture in favor of the government (Art. 445); (6) the right against self-incrimination has been restricted (Art. 446); (7) persons judicially declared "socially dangerous" are subject to curative security measures until such time that they have been pronounced no longer dangerous to society (Arts. 561–562); (8) the refusal of any person to aid an officer of the law in the arrest of any lawbreaker, or in the maintenance of peace and order is penalized as a misdemeanor against the public administration (Art. 804); and (9) the principles enunciated in Article 247 of the Revised Penal Code have been abrogated. The article in question, a most interesting and intriguing one, provides in part: "any legally married person, who having suprised his sponse in the act of committing sexual intercourse with another person, shall kill any of them or both of them in the act or immediately thereafter, or shall inflict upon them any serious physical injuries, shall suffer the penalty of destierro. This penalty is simple banishment to an area outside of the commission of the crime. The same article further provides that if the injuries inflicted are not serious, there is an absolute exemption from criminal liability. Under the proposed Code, repressions of imprisonment are provided.

Conclusion

Hopefully, this report on both the Revised Penal Code and the proposed Code of Crimes of the Philippines will help put in a better perspective the pros and cons surrounding the current moves to further develop American criminal jurisprudence.

QUESTIONS 1, 2, 6, 7, 8

The Subcommittee on Criminal Laws and Procedures of the United States Senate Committee on the Judiciary has, as of January 26, 1972, requested information about a large number of subjects related to the criminal codes of

Denmark, Norway and Sweden. The inquiries are arranged under 20 numbered questions, and detailed separate reports have been prepared for some of the numbered questions (Nos. 3, 4, 5, 11 and 12), but the time factor does not allow a similar detailed discussion of the remaining questions. The purpose of this report is give a tentative answer to the total inquiry, primarily by references to Professor Andenaes' standard text on Norwegian criminal law [1] and to the available translations of the Danish Criminal Code,[2] the Norwegian Penal Code,[3] and the Swedish Penal Code.[4]

QUESTION 1

The history of the current Scandinavian criminal codes is normally dated back to the criminal law reform movement of the 19th century. The Danish, Norwegian, and Swedish Penal Codes were originally composed of two parts. First a general part which applied to all crimes, regardless of whether they were described in the criminal codes called the special part, which described the offenses which traditionally have been considered crimes in Scandinavia. The contents of these special parts may very roughly be compared to the common law concept of felonies and more serious misdemeanors. However, Scandinavian criminal law has not expanded this concept nearly as much as the common law concept of felonies has been in Anglo-American law. The Danish and the Norwegian Penal Codes are still divided into this two-part arrangement, but approximately the latter half of the general part of the Danish Criminal Code [5] is really a subpart on sentencing. The Swedish Penal Code was divided in 1965 into three parts in an arrangement which has some similarity to that of the Proposed Federal Criminal Code.[6] One of the explanations given for the Swedish rearrangement is that the draftsmen assumed that the code should give information on what is punishable, not only to lawyers but also to the general public. It was felt that the definitions of the individual crimes was of most interest to the general public. Consequently, the highly technical provisions about punishment were moved to the end of the Swedish Penal Code.[7]

The numbering system of the Danish and the Norwegian Criminal Codes runs consecutively from Section 1 to Section 305 or Section 436, respectively, regardless of the division of the codes into parts and chapters. This reflects the usual Danish-Norwegian way of citing a statutory provision, namely by name, date, and section number. The numbering system of the Swedish Penal Code runs consecutively from Chapter 38, regardless of the division into parts. Each chapter is divided into sections which are numbered consecutively from Section 1 to the end of the Chapter. Also, the Swedish arrangement reflects the usual Swedish way of citing a statutory provision, namely by the popular name of the statute, by the chapter number and by the section number. The few unused section numbers in the Scandinavian criminal codes indicate repealed provisions. A few code sections have been expanded by the use of lower case letters. For instance, Sections 39, 39a, 39b and 39c of the Norwegian Penal Code.

The numbering system of the Proposed Federal Criminal Code indicates the chapter number in the first digit(s) of the section number. A somewhat similar numbering system is to be found in the Uniform Commerical Code. The Scandinavian countries use the traditional numbering system for statutes, but they have gone one step further and applied an outright decimal classification system for technical regulations, e.g., the Swedish Building Standards,[1] where the chapter number is followed by a decimal which indicates the exact section. The advantage of the decimal system is that the possibilities for expansion are practically limitless. However, such numbering techniques would scarcely be applied to more permanent statutory enactments, such as the criminal codes.

Section 502 of the proposed Federal Criminal Code establishes the rather generally accepted principle that voluntary intoxication does not in itself relieve the perpetrator of criminal liability. However, as it was explained under Question 5, Scandinavian criminal law basically accepts the medical (psychiatric) criteria for mental diseases and defects, and a school of thought exists which would apply the same approach to voluntary intoxication. For instance, the original Section 45 (from 1902 to 1929) of the Norwegian Penal Code would punish many seriously intoxicated perpetrators only for negligent crimes. The result was, as explained by Professor Andenaes in Appendix A (p. 265–267), that the Norwegian courts handed down some decisions which directly created an uproar. Section 45 of the Norwegian Penal Code was amended in 1929, and it now has a somewhat stronger wording than the corresponding Section 18 of the Danish Criminal Code and Chapter 1, Section 2, of the Penal Code of Sweden.

The Norwegian interpretation of Section 45 is explained by Andenaes in Appendix A (p. 263–272). Danish[2] and Swedish[3] practice is, in spite of the different wordings of the statutory provisions, not too different from the Norwegian. This is so because it is a relatively rare case that a perpetrator is completely unconscious, and because also Denmark and Swenden recognize that so-called pathologic intoxication is an involunatry intoxication. Cases where a relatively small amount of alcohol or drugs have a completely abnormal effect are examples of pathological intoxication. In brief, the Scandinavian attitude toward voluntary intoxication seems to be slightly more liberal than Section 502 of the Proposed Federal Criminal Code.

The intoxicated perpetrator is often treated differently for sentencing purposes in Scandinavia. Section 85 cfr. Section 72 of the Danish Criminal Code and Section 56 cfr. Section 39 of the Norwegian Penal Code allow the courts to reduce the punishment for an intoxicated perpetrator and to issue suitable injunctions or conditions for parole, or the like. The Swedish practice seems to be very similar.[4] On the other hand, the security measures which were discussed under Qusetion 5, may possibly be used if the perpetrator is an alcholic or an addict. See the Danish Criminal Code, Section 73 cfr. 70, the Norwegian Penal Code Sections 39–39e, and the Penal Code of Sweden, Chapter 31 "Of Surrender for Special Care."

Chapter 6 of the proposed Federal Criminal Code[5] deals with defenses involving justification and excuse. Both the Danish Criminal Code[6] and the Norwegian Penal Code[7] have provisions in their general parts which, in principle, cover the same subjects as does the proposed Chapter 6. The Swedish Chapter 24, "Of Self-Defense and Other Acts of Necessity," has much likeness to the mentioned Danish and Norwegian provisions, but the Swedish provisions are systematically placed in "Part Two" on specific criminal offenses (the special part). The reason for this systematic arrangement seems to be that the provisions on self-defense and other acts of necessity may be said to modify each of the statutory definitions of individual criminal offenses in "Part Two" of the Penal Code of Sweden.[8]

The Scandinavian provisions are much briefer than the proposed Chapter 6. They avoid technical definitions and clearly leave this whole subject area to be filled in by the courts and by jurisprudential literature. Scandinavian legal writers normally deal with self-defense and other acts of necessity under the heading of "Grounds of Impunity" rather than under that of Defenses Involving Justification and Excuses." The difference in terminology indicates, inter alia, that the full burden of proof for grounds of impunity does not fall on the Scandinavian defendant. A leading Danish writer states clearly that reasonable doubts (in dubio pro reo) as to grounds of impunity must be resolved in favor of the defendant.[1]

The Norwegian law on self-defense and other acts of necessity is discussed in some detail by Professor Andenaes in Appendix A (p. 143–173). This discussion is representative also of Danish and Swedish jurisprudence.

Section 3002 of the proposed Federal Code[2] classifies criminal offenses or Class A Felonies, Class B Felonies, Class C Felonies, Class A Misdemeanors, Class B Misdemeanors, and Infractions. It is further stated as a justification for this classification in the comments on Section 3202 of the proposal that under existing law an authorized [prison] term indicates the outer limit of the virtually unfettered discretion which a judge may exercise in sentencting an offender to prison. This description refers to present Federal criminal law, but it gives also a good description of present Scandinavian criminal law.

Professor Andenaes has taken a very critical attitude toward the proposed Section 3002, explaining his point of view in detail in 3 Working Papers 1462–1464.[3] This writer has nothing to add to Andenaes' comments since he also covers Danish and Swedish criminal law, and seems to be very representative of Scandinavian jurisprudence in this matter.[4]

(1) In General

Professor Andenaes has made rather detailed comments to Part C. "The Sentencing System," of the proposed Federal Criminal Code[5] in 3 Working Papers 1461–1471.[6] These comments cover all of the Scandinavian countries, and they are, generally speaking, very representative of Scandinavian jurisprudence. Andenaes has treated the question of sentencing, or rather the question of reactions of society against infractions of the criminal laws, in-depth in his standard text on Norwegian Criminal Law.[7] Unfortunately, this part of the text was not included in its English version. Also the standard Danish text has a substantial part on the system of sanctions.[8] Among the Scandinavian texts on special subjects mention should be made on the one on meting out punishment[9] and another on suspended sentences and probation.[10] Also a standard work on deprivation of freedom by administrative agencies[11] is of interest, because Scandinavian criminal law employs security measures which are not, technically considered, punishment. The rather uniform Scandinavian rejection of indeterminate sentences can be traced back to the third meeting (1952) of Scandinavian Criminalists,[1] and to the periodical literature of that time.[2]

(2) Suspended Sentences and Probation

Scandinavian judges have, as explained by Andenaes in 3 Working Papers 1464–1465, a choice between giving a suspended sentence or placing the perpetrator on probation. The relevant provisions are to be found in the Danish Criminal Code, Sections 62–69, the Norwegian Penal Code Sections 52–54, and the Penal Code of Sweden, Chapter 27 "Of Conditional Sentences."

Scandinavian judges have the discretion to decide that a defendant should not be supervised during the probation period, or that a special ad hoc supervision be arranged. This is done very seldom, and by far the most probations are supervised by probation officers who are provided by special administrative agencies. These agencies are supervised by the Ministry of Justice, rather than by the individual courts. Full-time probation officers are trained as social workers or as lawyers, and the police does not have active functions in the supervision of probation.[3] Voluntary probation officers are used to stretch the staff of professional full-time probation officers, and it is quite usual that Scandinavian police officers are involved in community activities, such as youth clubs, and the like. It is possible that some Scandinavian police officers are acting as voluntary probation officers and that they are well qualified for this work. However, they would have to retire as police officers, if they desire to become full-time probation officers.

Most of the North-European countries, except Norway, have provisions which in principle, are like the provision about unconditional discharge in Section 3101 of the Proposed Federal Criminal Code. To the German and Swedish provisions which are mentioned by Andenaes in 3 Working Papers 1465 should be added Section 85 of the Danish Criminal Code. Furthermore, Section 937 of The Danish Procedural Code provides about less serious criminal offenses.[4]

Sec. 937, Subsec. 1: The judge is authorized to close a case with a warning if he finds that the defendant is guilty, but that the case because of the kind of criminal infraction, for instance, especially when a first time offender has committed a minor infraction, is suitable for decision by warning. The defendant has the right to reject such decision and to request a formal judgment [which may be appealed] unless this is excluded by other provisions.[5]

Subsec. 2: The decision to close a case with a warning should be made in writing in the official court record.

(3) Indeterminate Sentences

Professor Andenaes states correctly in 3 Working Papers 1465–1466 that adult and completely normal offenders are not, as the general rule, subjected to indeterminate sentences in Scandinavia, and most Scandinavian legal writers seem to share Andenaes' apprehension against this form of sentencing.[6] However, it was explained under Question 5 above that a substantial part of those sentenced persons who in the United States would have to serve close to the maximum of their indeterminate term, would, in Scandinavia, have been subjected to security measures.[7] Such security measures in Scandinavia are considered treatment, rather than punishment. However, they are handled down by a court in the form of a sentence, and they are most definitely indetermi-

[3] This statement refers to the supervision as such, and not to the fact that the probation agencies and the police are cooperating. For instance, Section 58 (now Section 59) of the Danish Criminal Code in Appendix B deals with prosecutions for parole violations. The reference to "the Public Prosecutor" means, in practice, that most of the decisions to prosecute are made by the local police chief, rather than by the local probation agency.

nate. That the practical difference between the United States and Scandinavia is less than the theoretical one is illustrated by the Danish types of specialized imprisonment which are all indeterminate with broad ranges between minimum and maximum terms. See, for instance, the Danish Criminal Code Sections 41–43 about youth prison and Sections 62–69 about workhouses for habitual criminals and preventive detention of dangerous criminals for up to twenty years or more (Sections 65–66). Furthermore, Section 73 of the Danish Criminal Code is an example of the case where indeterminate treatment for alcholism in an institution may be imposed besides the usual definite sentence.

(4) Extended Term Prison Sentences for Dangerous Special Offenders

Section 3202 of the proposed Federal Criminal Code makes it possible to apply very long prison terms to dangerous special offenders when this "is required for the protection of the public from further criminal conduct." The Scandinavian Criminal Codes have social defense provisions which, in practice, have a very similar effect, but they are looked upon as security measures, rather than as punishment. The practical result of this philosophy is that the special institutions for this type of prisoners offer unusually good material treatment inside their walls, while their safety measures toward the outside exceed that of any other type of prison. The relevant Scandinavian provisions are to be found in the Danish Criminal Code, Sections 66–69; the Norwegian Penal Code, Sections 39–39c; and the Penal Code of Sweden, Chapter 30, "Of Intent."

(5) Authorized Prison Sentences

The Scandinavian Criminal Codes have, as explained by Andenaes in 3 Working Papers 1461–1476, broad authorized prison sentences which leave much discretion with the courts. A good example is Section 237 about murder and manslaughter in the Danish Criminal Code. This provision is not graded, and it states simply:

Any person who kills some other person shall be guilty of homicide and liable to imprisonment for any term ranging from five years to life.

(See Appendix B for the related offenses in Sections 238–241).

(6) Mandatory Minimum Sentences

The Scandinavian minimum sentences for individual crimes, such as the 5 year minimum in Section 237 of the Danish Criminal Code (see (5) above), cannot be described as mandatory, because they may be modified by the mitigating circumstances which are described in the general part of the codes. See, for instance, Sections 84–85 of the Danish Criminal Code.

The statutory minima for certain kinds of punishments are mandatory. For instance, the Danish Criminal Code Section 44 establishes a mandatory minimum of seven days for the punishment of simple detention, and Section 33 establishes the mandatory minimum of 30 days for the punishment of imprisonment.

Professor Andenaes mentions in 3 Working Papers 1468 that there is a common European movement away from the very short prison terms. This movements has gained momentum since Andenaes submitted his comments to the proposed Federal Criminal Code. The Danish Ministry of Justice held in June of 1971 a conference on the policy on crimes. Ombudsman Nordskov Nielsen explained here that the Danish courts already were moving away from terms of imprisonment of 4 months or less, and that the courts were using fines and probation more often than previously.[1] The summarized report of the meeting indicates that Denmark is not going to follow West Germany which has abolished imprisonment of 6 months or less.[2] Danish terms of imprisonment of 4 months or less will probably not be used very much in the future. One of the conclusions of the conference seems to have been that short imprisonment ought to be preserved in the Criminal Code, because it, inter alia, may be needed to terminate a sudden wave of very active criminality.[3] This statement is not explained in more detail, but it would refer to demonstrations such as those in Washington, D.C., in May of 1971.

(7) Release on Parole

The Proposed Federal Criminal Code has in Chapter 34 provisions on release on parole. The corresponding Scandinavian provisions are to be found in the Danish Criminal Code, Sections 38–40, 42–43, 63 and 66; in the Penal Code of Sweden, Chapter 26, Sections 6–22; and the Norwegian statute on prisons,[1] Sections 35–47. The main difference from the proposed Federal Criminal Code is that the right to be considered for parole in Scandinavia comes at a clearly defined time, normally when two-thirds of the sentence has been served. This is a simple consequense of the Scandinavian preference for determinate sentences for normal and adult offenders. The decision on parole is made by the Ministry of Justice which, in practice, means the State Directorate for the Prisons. The prisoner has a right to appeal to a quasi-judicial body, and the large majority of prisoners with regular prison terms (as opposed to security measures) are released when they have served two-thirds of their time.

(8) Special Sanction for Organizations

Section 3007 of the proposed Federal Criminal Code allows the court to require an organization to give notice of its convictions to the persons or class of persons ostensibly harmed by the offense. Scandinavian criminal law does not have a similar general provision. There is not much need for such a provision in Scandinavia, because the Scandinavian news media give good coverage to this type of conviction. Some highly specialized provisions, such as the Danish Criminal Codes' Sections 164 (malicious prosecution) and 273 (libel and slander) keeps the defendant[2] liable for the cost of the publication of the judgment. Similar Scandinavian provisions would probably be implemented for other subject areas, if need were felt for them.

(9) Publicity for Convictions

Convictions are in Scandinavia published through the ordinary news media, and through the printed court reports. This seems to be sufficient. There have not, to the knowledge of this writer, been Scandinavian proposals on using differently colored license plates or the like for persons previously convicted for drunken driving. The Scandinavian reaction is rather to completely deny such persons the privilege of driving motor vehicles.

(10) Persistent Misdemeanants

It has been explained above that the Scandinavian reaction against habitual criminals with a long record of minor criminality would be security measures, rather than punishment. It has also been explained above that the practical difference between Scandianavia and the United States is less than the theoretical one. Especially Section 62 of the Danish Criminal Code defines at length a habitual criminal, the definition coming very close to the persistent misdemeanant in Section 3003 of the proposed Federal Criminal Code. Moreover, this Danish sanction "in lieu of punishment" is practically speaking nothing more than a regular indeterminate sentence. The Norwegian and Swedish sanctions against persistent misdemeanants are couched more in the terms of regular security measures, but the general Scandinavian attitude seems not to be very different.

(11) Sentences to be in Writing

The provisions which require Scandinavian judges to give reasons in writing for sentences imposed are to be found in the Scandinavian Procedural Codes, rather than in the Criminal Codes.

(12) Appeals

Scandinavian criminal sentences are, when we speak in general terms with disregard minor differences between the individual countries, subject to one ordinary appeal to a higher court. Both the defendant and the prosecution have this right to appeal the entire case once. It is considered a matter of course that the higher court has the right both to increase and to lower the punishment, since one of the justifications for the institute of appeal is the desire for some degree of uniformity. Appeal to the Supreme (Highest) Court will normally require certiorari, and the Supreme Court will not consider the guilt of the defendant. The purpose of these Supreme Court reviews are to decide legal questions, and to reconsider the meting out of punishment.

[2] The Danish courts prefer to make a physical person, e.g., the responsible corporation officer, liable. However, legal writers claim that this liability could be placed directly on the juristic person, i.e., the corporation. The question is mostly theoretical, because Danish corporation law requires a corporation to have one director who is the legally responsible director of the corporation. See on the collective penal liability: Hurwitz, Den Danske Strafferetspleje, 2nd ed. Copenhagen, G.E.C. Gad, 1961, p. 387–389.

The Scandinavian Procedural Codes have, through these limitations on the right to ordinary appeals and requests for new trials, succeeded in making it practically impossible to postpone a criminal case almost indefinitely through procedural maneuvers. Already the possibility of a higher punishment in the appellate court prevents many spurious appeals, and reduction of punishment by the Supreme Court has in Scandinavia been sufficient to guide the lower courts without having to go as far as to discard well-established interpretations of the Constitution.

There exists in Scandinavia, besides the right to ordinary appeal, a right to extraordinary appeal. Such extraordinary appeal is granted in the very few cases where new evidence makes it likely that the defendant should not have been found guilty, and in the extremely few cases where grave procedural errors have been committed.

Attached as Appendix E is a brief outline of Danish-Norwegian criminal law and procedure. Appeals are discussed under Nos. 2–3 and 16 (p. 229–230 and p. 230–239).[1] The Swedish procedural provisions are available in translation, and they are attached as Appendix F.[2]

(13) Concurrent and Consecutive Terms of Imprisonment

Section 3204 of the Proposed Federal Criminal Code is discussed by Professor Andenaes in 3 Working Papers 1473 which strongly suggests that the Anglo-American practice of concurrent or consecutive sentences be abolished in favor of the European system of "joint sentences."

The relevant provisions of the Scandinavian criminal codes are to be found in the Danish Criminal Code, Sections 88–89 and 93, Subsection 2, the Norwegian Penal Code, Sections 62–64, and the Penal Code of Sweden, Chapter 1, Section 1. The generally accepted European theories about "Plurality of Offenses" are explained by Andenaes in Appendix A (p. 303–307). This writer has nothing to add, with the exception that Andenaes' treatment of this matter is very representative of Scandinavian jurisprudence.

The subquestion about what happens if one, but not all of the convictions under a single sentence, is reversed on appeal may be answered most easily with a reference to the character of the joint sentence. It follows of the concept itself that the new joint sentence would have to be based on the crimes it actually covers, and that it probably would be milder. See, for instance the Danish Criminal Code, Section 88: "one penalty shall be fixed for these offenses within the statutory range of the punishment prescribed. . . ." Furthermore, Section 89, Subsection 2, gives instructions for some difficult problems, such as a latter conversion of an indeterminate sentence into a determinate sentence.

(14) Fines

Chapter 33, Fines, of the Proposed Federal Criminal Code is discussed at some length by Professor Andenaes in 3 Working Papers 1474–1475, and more briefly by Professor Damaska in 3 Working Papers 1485. The corresponding Scandinavian provisions are to be found in the Danish Criminal Code, Sections 50–54, the Norwegian Penal Code, Sections 27–28, and the Penal Code of Sweden, Chapter 25, Of Fines, etc.

Collection of fines does not represent any serious problem in Scandinavia. Fines are collected under the threat of imprisonment, and the Scandinavian and European conventions on the validity of criminal judgments[3] make it possible to enforce collection wherever the defendant may be found within the borders of Western Europe.

The so-called day-fines are discussed in a separate report entitled "Fines Proportional to the Income of the Offender in the Nordic Countries," which is enclosed as Appendix G. The purpose of these fines is to treat the rich and the poor defendant alike. They do require time-consuming investigations of the financial ability of the defendant and they cannot be described as a very successful experiment. An influential Danish legal writer has recently suggested to postpone the decision on the actual number of days to be served until it is established that the defendant can not, or will not, pay the fine. This would allow for leniency in cases where the defendant cannot be blamed for his inability to pay, and the writer states that Sweden has established somewhat similar practice.[1] It is probably against this kind of background that Andenaes in 3 Working Papers 1475 suggests to leave imposition of fines to the discretion of the court, rather than to suggest a system similar to the Scandinavian day-fines.

Mistakes of law and mistakes of fact are, in Scandinavia, normally dealt with under the heading of Subjective Guilt (mens rea), rather than as a specific defense. The differences in the systematic approach indicates basically that a mistake, if it is acceptable at all, will have the effect of negating the intent of the perpetrator.

The Scandinavian law on mistakes is primarily established by the court and by the jurisprudential literature. Professor Andenaes has discussed mistakes of law in 3 Working Papers 1460–1461 and he gives a much more detailed discussion of both mistakes of fact and mistakes of law in Appendix A (p. 201–209 & p. 227–239). This broader discussion is representative of the Scandinavian jurisprudence on mistakes. Besides the quoted Swedish Professor Thornstedt there ought to be mentioned the standard Danish text.[2]

QUESTION 11–12

SCANDINAVIAN COUNTRIES—QUESTION 3

A. In General

The Roman law maxim "actus non facit reum, nisi mens sit rea" (An act does not make [its perpetrator] guilty, unless the mind be guilty; that is unless the intention be criminal)[3] is almost universally accepted, but this element of guilt is far from the same in all legal systems. English law developed different requirements about mens rea for different types of offenses. This common law development has been described by J. W. C. Turner[4] who points out that it is possible to bring the common law requirements for acting recklessly, acting knowingly and acting intentionally together under the broad requirement about voluntary conduct with some foresight of the consequences. The main distinction consequently, differentiates between wilful crimes and merely negligent ones. Section 2.02 of the Proposed Official Draft of the Model Penal Code (1962)[5] continues this concept of common law by defining non-negligent culpability as purposely, knowingly, or recklessly. Section 302 of the Proposed Federal Criminal Code[6] goes a step further by defining as wilful crimes as those which are committed intentionally, knowingly, or recklessly.

The developments on the European Continent followed different trends. They were based more directly on the Roman law concepts of dolus (fraud, wilfulness or intentionality)[7] and culpa (fault, neglect, negligence)[8] as these concepts had been developed by the Glossators and by canon law. One of the main differences was that reckless conduct here became a subdivision under negligence, rather than a subdivision under dolus. Another major difference was that dolus and culpa on the Continent developed as general concepts which were applied rather uniformly to all crimes. One of the difficulties in understanding the Continental European terminology is merely a matter of translation. It is quite usual to translate the vernacular[1] word for the Latin dolus as intent, even though dolus includes conduct engaged in intentionally, knowingly and, to a very limited degree, recklessly. The latter is most often discussed under the heading of dolus eventualis. On the other hand, culpa is, on the European Continent, mostly used to describe blameworthy conduct in connection with negligence,[2] even though it must be admitted that the American use of culpability as including acting intentionally, knowingly, recklessly and negligently is linguistically correct.

Scandinavian jurisprudence has, since the middle of the 19th century, followed Continental European jurisprudence on the matter of subjective guilt. It is easy to trace the impact of German jurisprudence on the concept of subjective guilt (mens rea), even though Scandinavian jurisprudence always has been more pragmatic and less theoretical than the German. Professor Andenaes' comments on Section 302 of the proposed Federal Criminal Code[3] (Appendix A) reflect the European way of thinking, as does Chapter 6 on subjective guilt (mens rea). This may be seen in his standard text on Norwegian criminal law which is attached as Appendix A.[4] The Danish Professor Waaben has made an even larger contribution by writing a broad comparative text on the concept of dolus or intention in criminal law. The English summary of this text[5] is attached in Appendix B, while Appendix C contains translations of the sections of the Scandinavian criminal codes which are referred to below.

B. Intent (Dolus)

The Scandinavian criminal codes do not attempt to define intent or dolus. Neither do the codes attempt to define the blameworthy conduct (culpa) which is required to establish criminal negligence, including recklessness. The codes refer in numerous cases to the well-established concepts which have been laid down by the courts and by jurisprudential literature over a long period of time. See, for instance, the Swedish Penal Code, Chapter 1, Section 2 ("intentionally"); and the Norwegian Penal Code, Section 40 ("unintentionally" . . . "negligent"); and the Danish Criminal Code, Section 19 ("negligence") and Section 21 (2) "criminal intention").

The 1917 and 1923 drafts of the present Danish criminal code of 1930 contained definitions of criminal intent or dolus,[6] and of culpable negligence.[7] However, these definitions were omitted by the legislature, because they were found to be superfluous. Scandinavian writers seem to agree that it would be extremely difficult to draft satisfactory definitions. It is usual in this context to refer to the extensive German literature about the volition theories (based on defendant's will) and the consciousness theories (based on defendant's conception)[8] and to the later results of the psychological sciences which would make it difficult to formulate "correct" definitions in this subject area. Also contributing to the difficulties is the fact that Scandinavian courts, and jurisprudence recognize a concept which has been called "veiled intent."[9] This term was coined by the President of the Danish Supreme Court Ib Trolle, and refers basically to the fact that practical life often produces situations which tend to defy theoretical definitions, even though a situation is relatively easy to judge when it is considered in the light of all the accompanying circumstances. The Scandinavian criminal codes follow the rather generally accepted approach of leaving it to the courts and to the scholarly tradition to define the different kinds of culpability. Practical experience from this approach has been good, and Professor Andenaes' comments about the definition in Section 302 of the proposed Federal Criminal Code[1] should be read against this background. Some comments should be made about the generally accepted Scandinavian concepts of subjective guilt (mens rea).

The Swedish concept of dolus (intent) is somewhat different from the Danish-Norwegian concept and probably closer to the Continental European concepts. Swedish writers normally divide dolus into three subdivisions: the term dolus directus (direct intent) is used when the consequences are exactly what the perpetrator desired, while the term dolus indirectus (indirect intent) is used when the perpetrator should have seen that the consequences were (practically) unavoidable, even though he did not exactly desire these circumstances to materialize. Dolus eventualis is in Sweden used to establish intent (dolus) in a situation where the perpetrator should have known that the consequences were possible (although not necessarily unavoidable) and that it furthermore is probable that the perpetrator would not have acted otherwise, even though he had understood that the consequences would occur.[2] This is often referred to as "the hypothetical test."

The Danish-Norwegian concept of direct intent corresponds to the Swedish, while Denmark and Norway, as explained by Andenaes, would establish indirect intent (dolus indirectus) if it is considered probable that the perpetrator realized the consequences as being certain or preponderantly possible.[3] Dolus eventualis is recognized in Danish-Norwegian jurisprudence, but, as has been pointed out by a leading Danish writer, there is very little practical use for dolus eventualis when probability is used to define indirect intent.[4] A Swedish case of 1939 illustrates the differences between Swedish and Danish-Norwegian practice.

Two Swedish defendants were accused of attempted murder for having hit a police officer, who tried to stop them, with their car. The highest Swedish prosecutor asked the court to accept the Danish-Norwegian rule which would establish indirect intent (dolus) in a case like this where it was preponderantly possible that the police officer would have been killed, and he pointed also to the fact that the traditional hypothetical rule for Swedish dolus eventualis did not apply to the facts in this case. The defendants claimed that they hoped that the police officer would jump away from the path of the car, which he actually must have done since he was injured, rather than killed. The Swedish Supreme court upheld the traditional hypothetical rule and acquitted the defendants of attempted murder, while it may be assumed that they would have been found guilty of attempted murder in Denmark.

C. Negligence

It has been mentioned already that the Scandinavian criminal codes do not attempt to define negligence, and that the Scandinavian term "Uagtsomhed" has a somewhat broader meaning than the Anglo-American term negligence. The essence of Scandinavian criminal negligence consists of different types of blameworthy conduct (culpa) which does not amount to intent (dolus), but which, under public policy, is being discouraged by the sanction of a punishment which is always much lower than that prescribed for the corresponding intentional crime. It is usual to divide Scandinavian criminal negligence into conscious and unconscious negligence. The former group is very close to the wilfull crime of recklessness, and the previously discussed Swedish case illustrates how difficult it often is, in practice, to distinguish between an intentional crime and one of conscious negligence. The category of unconscious negligence corresponds rather closely to the usual Anglo-American concept of criminal negligence. Andenaes discusses negligence at some length in his general text[1] and this explains the rather brief sentences in his comments on the proposed Federal Criminal Code.[2] The matter of differences between tort standards and criminal law standards for negligence has a special interest for Scandinavians, because a very large number of their tort cases are settled in the same court proceedings as are the corresponding criminal cases. This adjudicating of civil claims in criminal proceedings has greatly simplified, for instance, traffic accident cases.[3]

D. Criminal Liability Without Subjective Guilt

The requirement of subjective guilt has had a very strong influence on the development of Scandinavian criminal law. It is very generally accepted, but it does not prevent the law under certain circumstances from dispensing with the requirement and making the criminal liability dependent upon purely objective elements. This will occur especially when a strong public policy is involved. It is common to discuss mistakes in this connection, because an honest mistake of law may be said to preclude subjective guilt. However, the maxim "ignorantia legis neminem excusat"[4] is widely accepted also in Scandinavia. The matter of mistake will be discussed in more detail under Question 10.

Strict criminal liability is frowned upon by the Scandinavian courts. Andenaes mentions the rules on the owner's liability for animals as a current example of strict criminal liability.[5] Other writers seem inclined to explain such provisions as merely presumptive,[6] even though they admit that the presumption may be rather strong.

Corporate criminal liability in the form of fines, etc., is widely used in Scandinavia.[7] Older theories criticized this, because it is a fiction to talk about the subjective guilt of a legal entity such as a corporation or a cooperative. Contemporary writers feel that such fines are justified for offenses in economic life. They tend to restrict the protection of "actus non facit reum, nisi mens sit rea" to physical persons.

THE GENERAL PART OF THE CRIMINAL LAW OF NORWAY

By Johannes Andenaes, Dr.jur., Translated by Thomas P. Ogle, LL.B.

SUBJECTIVE GUILT (MENS REA)

§ 19. Survey

I. General considerations

It is an almost universal rule of modern penal law, that before criminal liability can exist there must be not only an objective breach of a penal provision but also subjective guilt (mens rea) on the part of the actor, usually intent, but at least negligence. A driver who accidentally kills a small child crossing the path of the car has, objectively, caused the death of a human being (Penal Code, § 223). A man who remarries in the mistaken belief that his former wife is dead has, objectively, violated the law against bigamy (Penal Code, § 220: see Marital Laws, § 9). Neither person is criminally liable, however, because the necessary guilt is lacking.

"Guilt" as a legal concept.—When used in this connection, "guilt" is not a moral, but a legal concept. There is, undoubtedly, a close relationship between the legal and the moral concept of guilt. Both are built on the proposition that the perpetrator can be blamed for acting as he did, and the moral and legal reproach will normally follow one another. But this is not always so. A person who has acted according to his own conscience is perhaps free from blame morally—one must obey God rather than man—but guilt in a legal sense may nevertheless be present. As mentioned earlier, we see that the idea of guilt and blame becomes problematical to the extent that a deterministic view of human action is accepted.[1] And in any discussions about the future formation of the penal law, it is difficult to avoid this problem. But the meaning of the requirement of guilt under positive law can largely be presented and treated without having to deal with these difficult questions.[2]

II. The guilt must exist at the moment of the act

The guilt must exist at the moment the act which creates liability is committed. A later approval of the act does not have the same effect. If I happen to kill my neighbor accidentlally, I do not become a murderer by thereafter expressing joy over his death. My happiness over the result is not the same as a willingness to commit the illegal act.

However, where a continuing activity is concerned I can be held criminally liable if I cut timber in my neighbor's forest because I have made an error as to the boundaries, I cannot be punished for larceny; but the result would be different, of course, if I continued to do so after having been told where the boundary is. If I buy a stolen object in good faith, I am not guilty of receiving stolen goods; but if I dispose of the goods after learning that they were stolen, I may be punished for embezzlement.

Depending upon the circumstances, a subsequent failure to prevent or limit a harm can also bring about criminal liability, if the person who accidentally set the cause in motion learns of the danger while he still has control over the further course of events (see pp. 2566–2567).

§ 20. What Degree of Guilt is Required?

I. Intention is required as a general rule

The general rule on the degree of guilt required for criminal liability is set out in Penal Code, § 40, para. 1: "The penal provisions of this Code do not apply to an act committed unintentionally unless it is explicitly provided or unmistakably implied that a negligent act is also punishable."

The special degrees of intention, which are purpose and premeditation, are required only when they are explicitly mentioned in the provision in question. Of especially great practical significance is the purpose to secure for oneself or others an unwarranted gain, which is a common element of the offenses for gain (larceny, embezzlement, robbery, etc.). Premeditation is a concept which has its greatest significance in the offense of homicide (Penal Code, § 233, para. 2).

Where the law applies to negligent acts, there are often two different penal provisions, a more severe one for the intentional offense, and a milder one for the negligent offense. Penal Code, § 233, which deals with intentional homicide, provides for a minimum penalty of six years, while the ordinary punishment in Penal Code, § 239, for negligent homicide, is imprisonment from twenty-one days to three years.

There also exist, however, certain provisions which place intentional and negligent offenses on equal footing; see Penal Code, §§ 359, 360 and 362. The question of which degree of guilt exists becomes significant in these cases only for the determination of the punishment to be imposed. Such an equalization of intentional and negligent offenses can exist only where lesser offenses are concerned. In more serious offenses, the difference in culpability between the intentional and the negligent offense is so great that both forms cannot well be treated in one penal provision.

An examination of the penal law will reveal that there are many serious offenses which are not punishable when committed through negligence This applies, for example, to deprivation of freedom (Penal Code, § 223), most offenses against decency and morals (Penal Code, chap. 19), and placing another in a helpless condition (Penal Code, § 242). The legislature has clearly provided punishment for negligence where a negligent violation has great practical significance, but not where it will exist only in rare and exceptional cases. Negligent rape is theoretically possible (the man interprets the passivity of the woman as consent, while in reality she is paralyzed by fear), but does not play such a great role in practice as to cause the legislature to make special provision for it.

II. The special rule for misdemeanors by omission

Penal Code, § 40, para. 2, has a special rule for misdemeanors "consisting of omission to act." Here, the general rule is reversed:
The misdemeanor is punishable even when committed by negligence, "unless the contrary is explicitly provided or unmistakably implied." Thus, the intentional and the negligent violations are equalized; the degree of guilt will have significance only in determining the punishment to be imposed.

The reason for this rule is that it is also necessary to punish negligence in most penal provisions of this type, since it is almost impossible to prove intention. "When the law imposes upon people a whole line of duties, such as testifying as witnesses, acting as jurors, sweeping the street in front of their houses, and informing the authorities of deaths, the main purpose of the law would most probably be frustrated if it had to accept the defendant's excuse that he had not intentionally violated the law, but had done so only because of forgetfulness" (S.K.M., p. 59). This in itself necessitates only that the negligent act be also punishable; it does not require that the negligent and the intentional offense be treated equally. But it can be argued in favor of equal treatment, that even in their intentional form, these offenses are merely minor misdemeanors having no serious effects, and thus the intentional and the negligent offense can be treated in one penal provision within the same penal framework. Because of the rule in Penal Code, § 40, para. 2, it has been necessary for certain penal provisions to state expressly that only an intentional breach is punishable (Penal Code, §§ 324, 347).

These considerations are not so strong in the case of felonies by omission. The general rule in Penal Code, § 40, para. 1, comes into play here. The negligent violation is punishable only when criminal liability is explicitly provided or unmistakably implied.

The rule in Penal Code, § 40, para. 2, seems simple and clear at first sight, but closer examination reveals that it contains many difficulties of interpretation.[1] The situation would have been clearer if the rule did not exist; then the legislature would have had to state expressly in each case whether the penal provision should also apply to negligence.

As we have seen earlier, penal provisions directed mainly toward action may sometimes be violated by passivity as well. The first question which arises here is this: Does the expression "misdemeanor consisting of omission to act" apply to all misdemeanors committed by an omission or only to the genuine non-action misdemeanors (see above, § 13. I)? The words used suggest the former, but it appears from the legislative history that the latter is the correct interpretation (S.K.M., p. 59). This is also the natural solution. It would not be reasonable to treat the passive violation of a penal provision more strictly than the ordinary active violation.

Thus, the rule applies only to those penal provisions which refer expressly to a failure to act. Of course, the precise expressions "fail to act" or "omission" need not be used. One who "neglects" to make a report, or "fails to appear," or "fails to fulfill" or "does not heed" his duties, will fall within the rule. However if the law penalizes one who "refuses" (Penal Code, §§ 327, para. 2, 333 et al.) or "declines" (Penal Code, §§ 326, 344 et al.), intent is required whether the provision is violated by an act or by an omission.

III. The requirement of guilt for offenses outside the Penal Code

As a general rule, according to Penal Code, § 1, the general part the Code applies to all crimes, even those which are covered by legislation outside the Penal Code itself. But this general rule holds true only when the opposite is not provided, and Penal Code, § 40, para. 1, expressly limits its rule to "the penal provisions of this code." In other words, there is no general provision as to what degree of guilt is required in offenses against other laws. On the other hand, the rule in Penal Code, § 40, para. 2, which deals with the non-action misdemeanors, has no such limitations on its sphere of applicability. This rule therefore applies to all offenses (see Rt. 1933, p. 1179).

Acts creating new offenses often contain express provisions as to the degree of guilt which they require. Some, such as the Act against unfair competition of July 7, 1922, § 11, require a specific purpose. Others, such as the Patent Act of July 2, 1910 (No. 4), § 37, require intent. Many laws expressly equate intent and negligence; an example is the Vagrancy Act, §§ 16 and 17 (one who intentionally or negligently becomes intoxicated). Others, such as the Price Act of June 24, 1953, 52, have special punishment provisions for the two forms, with a more severe punishment for an intentional violation. In some laws it is unmistakably implied that a negligent violation is also punishable, since the law contains rules about increase of punishment where the violation is intentional.

There nevertheless remain many instances where the law has no provision on the form of guilt. What rule should be followed in these cases?

In order to answer this question, it is necessary to know something about the historical background. The Criminal Code of 1842, like the Penal Code of 1902, limited its rule on the degree of guilt to those Acts which fell within the Code itself. And, in practice, the enactments in other laws were, to a large extent, applied to negligent breaches as well as intentional ones. The Penal Code of 1902 intended to retain the earlier practice in this area (see Innst. O.L. for 1901/1902, p. 31). This has also been the interpretation of the courts. In a judgment of the Supreme Court (Rt. 1939, p. 623), which dealt with the so-called police legislation, it was stated that "the silence of the law does not mean that intent is a prerequisite to liability, but that this issue must be resolved by an interpretation of the individual legal provision, according to its content and purpose. It has been held that where the legal provision will not effectively attain its purpose if it applies only to intentional violations, it must be supposed that the purpose of the law is to cover negligent violations as well." There is a long line of decisions to this effect.

Thus, it is established practice that Penal Code, § 40, para. 1, cannot be applied to legislation outside the Code itself. But this situation is hardly satisfactory. The law usually gives no concrete clue as to which degree of guilt is required, and the judge must therefore render his decision chiefly on a determination as to what degree of guilt ought to be required. In other words, the evaluation which the legislature ought to have made is left to the judge. The chapters on misdemeanors in the present Penal Code contain a number of provisions of much the same kind as can be found in other laws. There is little consistency in holding that under Penal Code, § 40, intent is required in one case because the penal provision is in the Penal Code itself, but negligence will suffice in a similar case, where the penal provision is in another law. The resulting uncertainty can be removed only by legislation giving definite rules on the degree of guilt which is required. This is still often neglected when new offenses are created. There can be complete order and logic only after a thorough examination and revision of the older legislation with this question in mind.

When a law contains many penal provisions, an interpretation or the purpose of the law may lead to the requirement of intent in one section and the sufficiency of negligence in another. This is also true when a law has a common punishment provision against "one who violates some provision of the law." That the penal provision is common does not warrant the conclusion that the requirement of guilt is the same in all sections (see statements in Rt. 1939, p. 624).

I. Survey

In order for an offense to be intentional, the act itself must be intentional (consciously willed). A person who happens to strike another by an involuntary movement has not acted intentionally. The same is true when a movement is coerced beyond the physical power to resist. It is often stated that involuntary or coerced movement is not an act at all, and for this reason alone is free from liability.

Of course, something more than the mere intentional commission of an act is required for criminal liability for an intentional offense. One who shoots at an elk but hits a person, has shot intentionally, but he has not intentionally caused the death of another. One who remarries under the belief that his previous spouse is dead, has intentionally entered into a new marital relationship, but not intentionally into one "which is void due to previous marriage" (Penal Code, § 220). Liability for an intentional offense requires that the intent encompass not only the act itself, but also the consequences and the circumstances which make it an offense.

We shall consider this a bit more closely. The special problems of acts committed under the influence of alcohol, however, shall be reserved for a later section (see below, § 30).

1. The intention must encompass the consequences which the penal provision mentions

First of all, the intention must encompass the consequences which are mentioned in the penal provision—a person's death under Penal Code, § 233, physical injury under § 229, and destruction of or damage to a chattel under § 291. Similarly, if the provision penalizes the creation of a danger, then the danger must be intentionally created.

The intention need not encompass the individual steps in the course of events.—However, the intention need not encompass the individual steps in the course of events. When the result is what the perpetrator intended it to be, it makes no difference that it has come about in an unexpected manner. Examples: (1) A hits B on the head with an axe and then, thinking that he is dead, throws him into a lake. An autopsy shows that B was in reality only unconscious, and that the cause of death was drowning. (2) A throws himself at B in order to kill him; B steps aside to avoid A, and in so doing falls into a lake and drowns. In both cases, A is guilty of intentional homicide. This is true even if A, in example 1, had already regretted his act when he lowered the "corpse" into the water. There would be no intention at that moment, but there was intent when he set in motion the course of events which led to the death, and that is sufficient.

The sequence of events may become so extraordinary, however, that liability for the result is excluded, the result being too remote (see above, § 12, V). In such a case, there will be punishment only for an attempt.

Aberratio ictus.—A special case is the one which is called aberratio ictus, "erroneous hit." A sends a box of poisoned chocolates to his rival B; B gives them away to child C, who eats some and dies. A intended to kill, and he has killed, but he did not intend to kill C. The general opinion here is that he cannot be punished for the completed murder of C, but only for the attempted murder of B. This question has no great practical significance, since in such cases of attempt a special rule in Penal Code, § 51, para. 2, allows the infliction of the same punishment which would apply to a completed offense.

2. The intention must cover all objective elements of the crime.

The intention must also encompass the remaining portions of the penal provision's description of the crime. It must, as the expression goes, cover the entire objective elements of the crime. Liability for bigamy (Penal Code, § 220) requires knowledge that the former marriage still exists. Liability for incest (Penal Code, § 207) requires knowledge of the relationship. Liability for usury (Penal Code, § 295) requires knowledge that there exists "distress, carelessness, lack of judgment or dependence" in the other party, and also requires that the gain is "unmistabkably out of proportion" to what is given in return. If the perpetrator believes that it is only the other's vanity which he exploits, or if he makes a mistake as to the value of his gain so that he does not understand the lack of proportion, he cannot be punished.

The enactment in Penal Code § 42 as to mistake.—All this follows from the general rule in Penal Code, § 40, that intention is required for criminal liability. But for emphasis, the law states it expressly in Penal Code, § 42: "To a person who has committed an act in ignorance of circumstances determining the punishability of the act or increasing his liability for punishment, these circumstances are not attributable."

Penal Code, 42, speaks not only of circumstances which determine, but also of those which increase the penal guilt. § 182 can be mentioned as an example. Forgery of documents is generally punished with imprisonment up to two years, "but up to four years if the document is a Norwegian or foreign official document." One who uses a false document without knowing the circumstances which make it an official document can be punished only under the milder penal provision. Another example: One who uses violence toward a civil servant in the belief that he is a private person cannot be held liable under the special enactment in Penal Code, § 127, as to violence toward civil servants, but only under the general provision on assault in Penal Code, § 228.

At times, the law has a general provision on punishment against a certain type of act, but also has exceptions which provide for decreased punishment or complete impunity under certain conditions. Penal Code, § 163 and 166, contain general provisions against false oath and false testimony in court, but the provisions are supplemented by Penal Code, § 167, which grants impunity or a decrease in punishment to one who was charged with an offense when he testified falsely, or who could not tell the truth without exposing himself or one of his next-of-kin to punishment or loss of public esteem. The principle in Penal Code, § 42, also comes into play on such occasions, even though its wording does not fit so well here. One who erroneously believes that he is in such a situation as Penal Code, § 167, mentions, will therefore benefit from it (see Rt. 1934, p. 97).

An error with respect to punishably equal factors, however, has no significance. If the usurer believes that he exploits his victim's carelessness, while it is actually distress which is exploited, the error will not create impunity since the law equates distress with carelessness. The principle also applies where mistake of persons is involved (error in persona). A defames, assaults or kills a person who he thinks is his enemy B, while in reality it is the innocent C. Here, the error does not relate to "circumstances determining the punishability of the act or increasing his liability for punishment."

3. Further about the effective area for § 42

The principle in Penal Code, § 42, also applies to circumstances which are significant for liability even though they are not mentioned in the penal provision in question, such as those grounds of impunity which are mentioned in the general part of the Penal Code. One who believes that he is in a situation of self-defense or emergency cannot be punished for an intentional breach of the law if his act would have been justified under the circumstances which he believed to exist. The same applies to the unwritten grounds of impunity, such as consent or lawful forcible redress of a wrong.

4. "Subjective excess"

Some penal provisions are not satisfied with an intention covering merely the objective elements of the crime, but set up certain subjective requirements in addition. They may, for example, require a purpose which goes beyond what is objectively required (see below, § 22, V).

II. Incorrect understanding of the expression of the law does not preclude intention

As we have seen, the principle is that the actor shall be judged according to his perception of the factual situation. An incorrect understanding of the meaning of the legal expressions, however, does not have the same effect. Let us once again look at the usury case. If the usurer incorrectly believes that his gain is not "unmistakably out of proportion" with what he renders, it can either be because he makes a mistake as to the value of the consideration to be rendered by one of the parties, or because he interprets "unmistakably out of proportion" differently than did the legislature. In the first case, his mistake is judged according to Penal Code, § 42; in the latter case it is a mistake of law which is judged according to Penal Code, § 57, and which does not create impunity to the same extent. The same result will follow if the actor makes an error as to the meaning of other words which the law uses, such as "significant damage," "public place," "unreasonable price," and "indecent act."

Lack of knowledge as to the illegality of the act does not preclude intent.— Knowledge that the act is punishable or at least unlawful is not necessary to the existence of intention. This is also true where the penal provision itself expressly demands that the act shall be "illegal," "unlawful," or "unjustified" (see S.K.M., pp. 98–99). If the actor makes a mistake with respect to factual circumstances which are of significance for lawfulness, this mistake is judged according to Penal Code, § 42, but if he knows the conditions and errs only as to the legal question, this is a mistake of law which is judged according to Penal Code, § 57, not according to Penal Code, § 42. This is at least the starting point. We shall later see that it is often difficult to distinguish between the two provisions (see below, § 24, IV).

III. Exceptions to the main rule

The rule that the intention must encompass every factor which is of importance for ciminal liability has certain exceptions.

1. Penal Code, § 42, para. 3

We have such an exception in Penal Code, § 42, para. 3: "Error regarding the value of an object or the estimated amount of damages caused will be taken into account only when punishability depends thereon."

Some penal provisions let the scope of punishment depend on the value of the object which is taken or the degree of the damage which is caused by the act; see, for example, Penal Code, §§ 183, para. 2 ("damage of more than one thousand kroner"), 256, para. 2 ("whether considerable values are involved"). Here, the value of the object or the degree of the damage is not conclusive for the question of punishability, but has significance only for the degree of punishment. It therefore follows from Penal Code, § 42, para. 3, that it is the objective value which counts and not the value which the perpetrator estimated. The rule is based on considerations of convenience. The actor's opinion of the value, if he had any at all, is not easy to determine. Thus, the actual value is used in determining the seriousness of the offense. The Penal Commission held that "there can be no danger in this solution because of the law's broad scope of punishment" (S.K.M., p. 64).

It is only monetary value which does not have to be encompassed by the intent. When the physical extent of the harm is involved, the general rule in Penal Code, § 40, applies. A person is not liable for consequences greater than he counted on at the moment of action.

The Penal Code has no provisions which make liability depend directly on the value of an object or the degree of the damage in so far as intentional offenses are concerned. But the value can be indirectly determinative for the question of criminal liability. An example of this is usury, where the value of each consideration determines whether the contract yields "a return unmistakably out of proportion." Similarly, the value of an object may be determinative as to whether an act is legal because of necessity or self-defense. Mistake by the actor in these cases is judged according to the main rule in Penal Code, § 42, para. 1 (see S.K.M., p. 64).

2. Penal Code, § 43

Another important group of exceptions to the main rule is the one covered by Penal Code, § 43: cases where an increased punishment is provided because a punishable act has caused an unintentional result. The law has a large number of such enactments. Of special practical significance is Penal Code, § 228, para. 2, dealing with assault which causes death or serious injury. The provision does not explicitly state that death does not have to be encompassed by the intent. But this is clearly demonstrated by a comparison with the provision on intentional homicide, which has a much more severe punishment. As a general rule, a provision which increases punishment where an act results in harm does not require that the harm be intended (see, for example, Penal Code, §§ 157, 228, 229). The law's choice of language is very much varied on this point, but its meaning is generally clear.

Purely accidental results do not cause punishment to be increased under Penal Code, §§ 43. The perpetrator must have been able to foresee the possibility of such a result, or, having later become aware of the danger, must have failed to prevent it, despite his ability to do so.

According to the law's formulation, the decisive fact is whether the perpetrator could have foreseen the possibility. Thus, the judge must take his knowledge, intelligence and experience into consideration. There must, in other words, be a certain degree of guilt, but it need not amount to criminal negligence as to the result. The perpetrator can be held liable for assault resulting in death even though there is no basis for holding him liable for negligent homicide.[1] In legal writings, the term culpa levissima has been used.

If one builds on the deterministic theory of an absolute causality in human life with respect to thought and action also, one can say that the expression "could have foreseen" has no real meaning. For when the actor really has not foreseen the danger it may also be said that he could not have foreseen it. What the law must mean is this: Would he have foreseen the danger if he had used his abilities and knowledge in the way the law requires? The law takes into account the actor's particular abilities, but poses an objective requirement of attention and thoughtfulness. Similar questions arise in determining whether the act is negligent (for further detail, see below, § 23, II). The degree of risk is less under Penal Code, § 43, than when negligence is involved, but the principles for the evaluation otherwise seen to be the same.

[1] In Danish and Swedish law, negligence is now required with respect to punishment-increasing results (Danish Penal Code, § 20; Swedish Penal Code, chap. 5, § 12). The same is true for Germany (after an amendment of 1953, St.G.B., § 56). But since the law of these countries requires less for negligence than Norwegian law, the difference on this point is perhaps not overly great.

It is difficult to specify what is required with any more precision. If the law is interpreted liberally, the purely theoretical possibility that the harm might occur ought to suffice. This is certainly not the meaning; there must exist a degree of danger of such magnitude that it is counted upon in ordinary life. This can hardly be expressed more clearly without the aid of examples. A case which arises not too infrequently is this: During an assault or a fight, one of the parties receives a heavy blow, stumbles backwards, falls, hits his head against the pavement or the edge of the sidewalk, cracks his skull and dies (see, for example, Rt. 1939, p. 6). This is such a foreseeable possibility that if the perpetrator is guilty of assault, he will be convicted of assault resulting in death (Penal Code, § 228, para. 2). The result would be different if the blows were insignificant in themselves, and the fall occurred because the victim stumbled. The following German case gives an example of an unforeseen consequence. Two workers enter into a quarrel and both strike a few light blows, grapple, push and shove for a while, but then separate. When one of them begins to put on his hat, he sways, holds his hands over his heart and falls dead to the ground. The autopsy reveals that the excitement and stress caused by the fight led to a heart attack because of an organic defect. This is a development which is so alien to the thoughts of an ordinary layman that there can be a conviction only for ordinary assault.

In certain cases, the possibility of harm can be determined by pure statistics. The mortality rate by chloroform narcosis is deemed to be one in 1,500–5,000 cases (the figures vary). Suppose that a burglar chloroforms a sleeping apartment-dweller in order to be able to look through the apartment in peace; because of a physical weakness, the victim dies from the chloroform. The perpetrator can be held liable for robbery (Penal Code, § 267), but can he be convicted of robbery resulting in death? If he did not know that the victim was old and frail, the answer must be that such a result was too remote to create liability.

According to Penal Code, § 43, even though the perpetrator could not have foreseen the possibility of harm at the moment he acted, he can nevertheless be held liable for the result if, after becoming aware of the danger, he fails to prevent it despite his ability to do so. Moreover, it should be noted here that the later omission can possibly lead to criminal liability for intentionally causing the result (see above, § 13, V, 1). If I knock an innocent person to the ground and calmly watch him bleed to death, I will hardly get away with assault resulting in death; I must be prepared to be convicted of intentional murder. If there exists no intent to kill in my failure to act, however, the rules on assault resulting in death will be used.

3. Purely objective conditions for criminal liability

It has already been mentioned that conditions for an increase in punishment need not be encompassed by the intent. The same is true where certain conditions for liability are concerned. Here we can speak about purely objective conditions for liability.

(a) Consequences. In certain cases a specific consequence does not have to be encompassed by the intent. This applies to Penal Code, § 285, with respect to the consequence that the creditors are caused a loss, and to Penal Code, § 240 and 388, with respect to the consequence that the woman is placed in a state of helplessness or distress.

Whether Penal Code, § 43, can be applied by analogy in these cases is debatable. The words of the law are against such an analogical application. When Penal Code, § 42, speaks not only about circumstances which determine liability but also circumstances which increase the punishment, while Penal Code, § 43, restricts its rule to the latter category, it must be presumed that the legislature actually meant to limit the rule in this way. Nevertheless, it seems to be the general opinion that Penal Code, § 43, can be used analogically, in that it is regarded as a casuistical expression of the general principle that purely accidental consequences have no significance on the issue of criminal liability. The question has little practical significance, since a consequence of such a type will very rarely be unforeseeable.

(b) Accompanying circumstances. The objective condition for liability may be an accompanying circumstance rather than a consequence. The most important example exists in the provisions concerning sexual offenses against children. In order to make the prosecution of such offenses less difficult, an amendment of 1927 provided in most such cases that a mistake as to age does not preclude liability (see Penal Code, §§ 195–198, 201 and 212). One who had intercourse with a girl below sixteen years of age (Penal Code, § 196) was not free from punishment even if he felt certain that she was above this age. At times, this rule could be very harsh, and in 1960 the Penal Law Commission proposed a rule to the effect that the perpetrator should be free from liability if his mistake as to the girl's age was not due to any negligence. In Parliament the Bill caused a hard struggle. In the end the majority accepted the Bill as far as the sixteen-year limit is concerned, whereas the old rule was retained with respect to the fourteen-year limit in § 195 (Amendment of February 15, 1963).

We have another important example in the provisions on defamation. Defamations are generally punishable only if they are untrue (Penal Code, § 249, para. 1). If one were to apply the error provisions of Penal Code, § 42, it would lead to a situation where the accused could be punished only when he knew of the falsity. But this is not the rule. The defamation must be intentional to the extent that the defamer must know that he is defaming. If, for example, he makes a mistake as to the meaning of the words he is using, so that he does not know that he is saying something defamatory, he cannot be punished. But with respect to the falsity, special rules as to guilt apply, and they are to be found in Penal Code, § 249, para. 3. If the defamer had the duty or obligation to express himself, or expressed himself in legitimate protection of his own or another's interests, he can be held criminally liable only if he was negligent with respect to the falsity, and the burden of proving that care has been exercised is placed upon him. Where there is no such reason for making the statement, the defamer is criminally liable even if he reasonably believed that he was speaking the truth. Truth is his only defense. Stated in another way, the falsity is a purely objective condition of liability. The legislature has found it necessary to depart from the principle of guilt in order to give sufficient protection to honor and reputation. We have a special provision in Penal Code, § 248, covering accusations made in bad faith.

IV. Mistake as to one's own responsibility

The principle in Penal Code, § 40 and 42, applies to circumstances of the act, not to circumstances which determine the criminal responsibility of the actor. If a boy erroneously believes that he has not reached the age of fourteen, he is nevertheless criminally liable. Considerations of expediency have led the legislature to fix a definite limit in the process of maturity; when this limit is reached, the law presupposes the the person has achieved the maturity which will allow him to be fully responsible. The perpetrator's own ideas as to his age are of no consequence. A similar rule applies if a person considers himself to be insane.

V. Liability for negligence

If intention is lacking with respect to a single element of the crime, punishment for an intentional offense is precluded. Instead, liability for negligence may exist. This presupposes first that the law makes the act punishable in its negligent form, and secondly that negligence exists with respect to those factors of punishability where intention is lacking (see Penal Code, § 42, para. 2). For example, a person destroys an object in the erroneous belief that it is his own. If the error can be attributed to negligence, he may be punished for negligent destruction of another person's property, but only if the damage is of such a nature as is mentioned in Penal Code, § 292, since negligent causation of damage of lesser magnitude is not punishable (Penal Code, § 391, para. 3). A person who appropriates an object in the belief that it is his own cannot be punished, even if his negligence is quite considerable, since neither Penal Code, § 257, on larceny, nor Penal Code, § 392, on illegal deprivation of possession, applies to negligence.

§ 22. Intention, Purpose and Premeditation

I. Survey

Our Penal Code, as distinguished from many foreign codes and drafts, has not tried to define the concepts of intention (with purpose and premeditation as special forms) and negligence. Their meaning must therefore be established by theory and practice.[1]

In everyday life, the expressions intention, purpose and premeditation are generally used haphazardly without any clear understanding of the differences between them. In penal law, however, each of these concepts has its own definite technical meaning.

In any close study of the precise meaning of intention, there are two basic viewpoints, either of which may be used as a foundation: the volition theory on the one hand, and the consciousness theory on the other. According to the volition theory, intention may be defined as the will to commit an act of a nature which the penal provision describes. According to the consciousness theory it can be defined as the consciousness of committing such an act. The difference between the two interpretations, however, is more often one of expression than of reality. In the main, both formulas lead to the same results, and where doubtful borderline cases arise, the solution is not obtained merely from the basic principle, for both theories can be interpreted in various ways. The real problem is to distinguish between the most blame-worthy cases which belong under intention, and those less blame-worthy, which belong under negligence. This cannot be done by a single formula; a combination of many factors may be required. The correct procedure is to deal with the various groups of cases and solve them by considering the natural meaning of the words in the penal provision, judicial precedent and expediency.

II. Intention exists if the consequence is desired

With respect to a harmful result, intention exists first of all where purpose exists, that is, where the actor desires to cause the particular result by his act. In such cases, the thought of the result is a motive for doing the act. Whether the probability that the result will occur is great or small makes no difference. A person who shoots at another in order to kill him is acting with the intent to kill even if the distance between them is so great that it is quite unlikely that the bullet will hit its target. The woman who undertakes an abortion just for safety's sake is acting intentionally even though she deems it unlikely that she is actually pregnant. The limitation here is in the requirement of adequacy: the danger may be so remote that the law does not take it into account, even though some odd person does (see above, § 12, V and § 14, V). Some, by the way, include this limitation in the concept of intention; they say that in such cases the perpetrator does not act with the necessary intention. In my opinion, it is more natural to consider the concept of adequacy as a limitation on the objective range of the penal provision, but this is a purely terminological question.

III. Intention with respect to probable consequences

Intention also exists as to undesired consequences, if the perpetrator considered them certain or preponderantly probable. A person who sets fire to his house in order to collect the insurance is an intentional murderer if he thought it certain or preponderantly probably that the tenant would burn to death. The fact that he may regret the death does not free him from full liability, since he foresaw what would occur as a result of his act. And similarly, intent exists with respect to those circumstances of the act which he considered certain or preponderantly probable. A man who remarries is an intentional bigamist if he thinks it certain or preponderantly probable that his former wife is still living, even though he hopes that she is not. Of course, it is not the actual degree of probability which matters, but the probability which the perpetrator deems to exist.

These propositions can be regarded as established by judicial practice. What is doubtful is the degree of probability required. Does "preponderantly probable" refer to the borderline of certainty, or is it enough that the harm more likely than not is going to materialize? Or does the concept lie somewhere in between these points? It is difficult to give a definite answer to this question. In older treatises and judicial decisions, a very high degree of probability was undoubtedly considered necessary; the draft bill to the Penal Code thus uses the expression "quite preponderantly probable" (S.K.M., p. 38). More recent decisions have tended to be satisfied with a lower degree of probability,[1] and with pure possibilities.[2] In any event, this last proposition goes too far. Whether mere possibilities in connection with other factors can be sufficient will be discussed under IV. When the determination of whether intention exists rests entirely on the actor's opinion as to probability, it must at least be required that he thought it more probable than not that the offensive result would occur.

A situation may be assumed where it is uncertain whether a result will occur, but the actor knows that it will occur if he attains his goal. During an inflamed political situation there is a plan to derail a train in order to assassinate a prominent politician who is travelling on that train. The would-be assassin thinks it highly improbable that the plot will succeed at all, since he expects that the train crew will discover the attempt and prevent the accident. But he must know that if he succeeds, many other passengers will also be killed. In other words, this is a necessary feature of the desired goal. Here there is intent to kill not only the politician, but also the other passengers.

IV. The consequence presented itself as possible

The most doubtful case arises when the offensive result is neither desired (II) nor considered certain or preponderantly probable (III), but has merely presented itself to the perpetrator as more or less possible. What is said in the following about future results of the act applies similarly when the uncertainty is related to other elements of the crime.

It is generally agreed that intention exists in some of these cases—the term dolus eventualis is often used here—but not in others. There is less agreement on where the borderline is to be drawn.

The psychological situation of the perpetrator can be different in these cases.

1. Dolus eventualis

The perpetrator may have decided that he desires the act done even though the unfortunate consequence should follow. In a way he has accepted the result in his mind. Suppose a second-hand dealer is offered some silver objects for sale. He reflects on the possibility that they are stolen goods, but decides that even though this may be so, it shall not prevent him from making a good buy. It is often said that the perpetrator has accepted the result as part of the bargain, an expression which is a bit dangerous since it is also used differently in other contexts. There is general agreement that intention is present here. But it is of no great practical significance, since it rarely will be possible to prove the thought of the perpetrator.

A strange case from Denmark is referred to in UfR 1918, p. 946: A carpenter who was depressed over the unfaithfulness of his wife stood by his work bench, lit his pipe, threw the match behind him into the wood shavings, and then walked out of the room saying: "Happen what may." He had vaguely imagined that in case of fire he would leave the region, and that it would then be possible to work out a better relationship with his wife. He was convicted of intentional arson.

2. Conscious negligence

The opposite situation may exist: the perpetrator thinks that if his plan should develop so badly that the evil result follows, he would wish the act undone, but he acts in the hope that it will go well; he "takes a chance." In this case, no intention exists, unless the result was considered overwhelmingly probable (see III). The fact that the perpetrator has consciously taken a risk is not enough for intent; this is the area of the so-called conscious (or advertent) negligence. There is occasionally some uncertainty on this point in court

3. Hypothetical intention

In many cases, the perpetrator has not made a definite choice whether he would prefer to act or refrain from acting, should the undesired result follow. He knows that there is a risk and he acts without further thought on the matter.

A concept which seems to be generally accepted in Swedish jurisprudence is that the judge must ask himself whether the accused would have committed the act, had he counted on the result as certain or overwhelmingly probable. If the answer is yes, intention exists; if the answer is no, there is only negligence. This concept is often called the hypothetical consent theory, in contrast to the positive consent theory, which recognizes intent only in group 1.

Strong objections may be raised against this solution. One may argue that intent should imply a certain element of volition in the defendant's attitude toward the result at the moment of action. Under the hypothetical formulation, however, criminal liability depends not on what the perpetrator actually thought at the moment of action, but on what he would have thought under certain conditions. Where two acts are committed by two actors, each having exactly the same thoughts about the results, one can be held to have acted intentionally, the other only negligently, on the basis of the judge's knowledge of the character of the actor and of his interest in the act.

It can be said in favor of the hypothetical formulation that despite these objections it provides a useful distinction between the subjectively more aggravating and less aggravating acts. There are also Norwegian decisions which seem to apply it, such as Rt. 1933, p. 1132. Some young men were accused under Penal Code, § 95, for having lowered and destroyed a Swastika flag which had been raised on May 1 over the German consulate in Narvik. The provision imposes punishment on anyone who publicly insults the flag or national symbol of a foreign state, and the issue was whether the accused's intention had encompassed the fact that the Swastika flag was the official flag of the German state, or whether they had regarded it merely as a party emblem. The Supreme Court unanimously held that it was sufficient that the accused had conceived the possibility that it could be the official flag of Germany and that they would have committed the act even if they had had certain knowledge of this fact. (See also the Quisling Case in Rt. 1945, pp. 109, 111.) None of these decisions is completely clear in its reasons, however; the reasoning of the latter case fits in just as well with the positive consent theory. It cannot be generally said that the hypothetical consent theory is established judicial practice, and I believe that the best reasons militate against its recognition. Moreover, when intention is extended as far in the direction of probable consequences as it is in modern judicial practice (see above under III), the practical necessity for recognition of hypothetical consent is greatly reduced.

In recent years, a Swedish judicial decision has caused discussion about situations where the actor consciously fails to obtain information on a doubtful point so as to be able to use the defense of "good faith." The Swedish case, which resulted in criminal liability, involved indecent conduct with a girl below the age of fifteen.[1] This case is of little practical significance for us because of our special rule that mistake as to age does not prevent punishment, but similar questions may arise with respect to other offenses, such as receiving stolen goods. The buyer of a stolen object may have doubts, and yet may consciously fail to make inquiry. If he had had positive knowledge that the goods were stolen, perhaps he would not have made the purchase. According to the hypothetical formulation, intent cannot be established in such a case. The positive consent theory, however, can lead to the finding of intent. When the buyer makes sure that he remains in ignorance, it shows that the possibility of the goods being stolen does not influence him as long as he believes that he has a pretense under which to avoid punishment.

[1] See: (1941) Nytt juridiskt arkiv, I, p. 466; comments by Strahl, in (1945) Svensk Juristtidning, pp. 32–34; Alexanderhon, op. cit., p. 295; von Eyben, in (1951) Nordisk Tidsskrift for Kriminalvidenskab, pp. 297–298; Hurwitz, Den danske kriminalret, p. 325.

The perpetrator must have conceived the possibility of the result.—An absolute condition for the finding of intent is that the perpetrator at least conceived the possibility of the result. Had he not done so at all, there is no intent, even though it is clear that nothing would have deterred him.

R. Mbl. 42, p. 16: During World War II, a provisional decree issued by the Norwegian Government in exile in London prohibited the purchase of objects confiscated by the German occupation forces in Norway. The accused had bought two such objects without knowing they were confiscated, but she declared in court that it would have made no difference even if she had known. This was held insufficient for intent; she must also have thought of this possibility.

The "veiled" intent.—The previous presentation has perhaps given a somewhat misleading impression of the offender as a person who acts with crystal-clear consciousness and who calculates the risk in percentages. The situation is often quite different. The perpetrator either acts quickly and impulsively, without any thought of the consequences, or else his ability to think is curtailed by excitement or fear. There can also be cases of psychological self-delusion, where the perpetrator veils the character of the act for himself, and thus commits the crime in a sort of semi-consciousness.[1] A clear consciousness is not required; the concept of intention also includes the half-clear, veiled intention. But there are reasons for exercising a certain care in evaluating the proof. Injustice may easily be done by a judge who supposes that a person who acted impulsively or in excitement has actually conceived everything which he would have conceived in quiet contemplation.

V. Purpose

In some instances, the law is not satisfied with intention, but requires a definite purpose (see above, II). Here the law generally requires this specific purpose in addition to an intention which covers the objective elements of the act. Penal Code, § 161, provides punishment for anyone who obtains explosives "with intent to commit a felony thereby"; Penal Code, § 174, refers to anyone who counterfeits money "with the intent of putting it into circulation." In these cases it is the additional purpose which gives an otherwise harmless act its offensive character. The most important offenses where a definite purpose has significance are the offenses for gain, in which the act must have been committed for the purpose of obtaining an unlawful gain for oneself or others (see, e.g., Penal Code, § 257, on larceny). It is not necessary, however, that this purpose be actually attained in order for the offense to be complete.

VI. Premeditation

Premeditation is different from purpose. This concept at one time had a greater significance than it has today. According to the Criminal Code of 1842, intentional homicide committed with premeditation was murder, and the punishment for murder was death; only an amendment of 1874 gave the court power to impose life imprisonment instead. The concept of murder does not exist in the new Penal Code. The fact that homicide is committed with premeditation does not cause an increase of the minimum penalty, but it is one of the factors which permit imprisonment for life (Penal Code, § 233, para. 2). Premeditation has been given a certain significance in the infliction of serious bodily injury (Penal Code, § 231) as well as in homicide.

Premeditation exists when the crime has been committed as a result of a considered decision and not a spontaneous impulse. Generally, the determining factor will be whether the perpetrator had the time and the occasion for peaceful contemplation. But even if he had, no premeditation will exist unless he actually weighed the matter, and not, for example, when he was in a state of emotional excitement, precluding any peaceful premeditation (Rt. 1948, p. 1042; 1949, p. 402; see also the statements in Rt. 1954, p. 823). Purpose may exist without premeditation. A person who, immediately upon seeing another take out a wallet, gets the sudden impulse to strike him to the ground and rob the corpse, acts with purpose but not with premeditation. On the other hand, premeditation can exist without purpose. The owner of a house who sets fire to it so that he can collect the insurance money, even though he realizes that the tenant's family will probably burn to death, acts with premeditation but not with murderous purpose.

VII. Special provisions as to the degree of guilt

In certain penal provisions, the law uses expressions which raise the question whether ordinary intention is required or something more or less.

When the law requires "reliable information" as a condition for criminal liability (Penal Code, § 139), this means something more than ordinary intention; the same is true when the law speaks about "testimony which he knows to be false" (Penal Code, § 165). Dolus eventualis is not enough, and a greater degree of probability is undoubtedly required here than elsewhere. Something less than ordinary intent is required when the law speaks about "knowing or presuming" (Penal Code, § 155). Whether the law makes any exceptions from the general requirement of intent, and what is required in such a case, must be determined by an interpretation of the individual provision.

I. The negligent offense also requires an intentional act

As a general rule, the negligent offense also requires an intentional (consciously willed) act or ommission. But this is not an absolute rule. A negligent omission may be due to a person's failure even to think of the necessity of acting; in other words, he does not make any decision one way or the other. As far as acts are concerned, the negligence may be due to the fact that the actor did not exercise the necessary control over his movements. A doctor who is performing an operation, for example, may sever a muscle because of lack of attention or carelessness. He undoubtedly wanted to do an act, but not such an act as he actually has done.

In contrast to the intentional offense, here, even though the act itself is generally intentional, the intention does not encompass all elements of the act. It is sufficient if intention is lacking even as to a single element. The essence of the concept of negligence is that the actor has failed to behave as a knowledgeable and reasonable person would have done. However, this is nothing more than a starting point which must be considered in detail later.

II. Violations of integrity

We shall first examine negligence in the infliction of harm to persons or property, the so-called violations of integrity.

The distinction between conscious and unconscious negligence.—In theory, there is a distinction between conscious (advertent) and unconscious (inadvertent) negligence. The former exists when the perpetrator knows that he is exposing his surroundings to danger; the latter exists when the possibility of danger is not in his mind at all. A motorist who speeds in order to catch a train, with his heart in his throat for fear that there might be an accident, acts with conscious negligence. If, however, he sits behind the steering wheel so engulfed in his own thoughts that he does not react fast enough when a small child runs out into the street, his negligence is unconscious. The term conscious negligence is used whenever the actor knows of the danger created by the act, even though he does not himself consider the act as negligent. Something less than the name would imply is actually required.

The two forms of negligence are psychologically very different. To employ a figure of speech, it can be said that conscious negligence is a lack of consideration while unconscious negligence is a lack of attentiveness. The latter may be caused by excessive strain (a guard falls asleep on duty), or an improper diversion of attention (a scientist is so engrossed in his problem that he is blind and deaf to the dangers of the traffic). It is not easy, however, to distinguish between conscious and unconscious negligence in practice, and the negligence provisions of the Penal Code treat both forms the same way, The code, however, has many special provisions against the intentional causing of danger, such as Penal Code, §§ 150, 156, 157. These provisions apply to behavior which, with respect to the harmful result, constitutes conscious negligence. The fact that the mere creation of a danger may be punished is significant in that punishment can be imposed even though the harmful result does not occur.

The difference between conscious and unconscious negligence does not coincide with the difference between gross and ordinary negligence. Conscious negligence will generally be more aggravated than unconscious negligence, but the former can be very excusable, and the latter very serious. As Skeie expresses it: "The reckless character of a man who causes harm is often demonstrated by the fact that he does not bother to think about the interests of others" (I, p. 233). Some penal provisions require gross negligence (see for example, Penal Code, §§ 86a, 140, para. 2), but the degree of negligence is otherwise significant only for the measure of punishment.

The evaluation of negligence.—Even though conscious and unconscious negligence are treated the same way in practice, it can be helpful to build on the distinction for purposes of analysis.

(a) Conscious negligence borders on intention. The lower limit of intention is also the upper limit of negligence. Therefore, I can refer here to the presentation above (§ 22, III and IV).

Beneath negligence, on the same graded scale, is the guilt-free (objectivlely legal) act. An act is not negligent merely because the actor knows that it entails certain dangers. An apprehensive motorist may be painfully aware of the danger that a small child may suddenly dart into the street. Should an accident occur, his awareness that it might happen will not make him liable if he drives with moderate speed, and according to the rules. Here, see again the concept of permissible risk (§ 14, V). The actor's own judgment of his act is of no significance. If he is of a thoughtful and especially careful nature, and blames himself where no one else would find any faults, he will not be liable merely because of that. And conversely, if he is of a very bold and aggressive nature, and thinks it permissible to take more chances than general opinion would accept, this does not relieve him of liability.

(b) The greatest practical difficulties arise in the appraisal of unconscious negligence. No difficulties of delimitation arise in relation to intention. When the actor has not even thought of the possibility of the harmful result, intention can never exist. But the difficulties are great in determining the boundary in relation to the impunitive act. Here relatively little of a general nature can be said; the difficulty lies in determining whether negligence exists in the concrete case.

In many areas of life, rather definite norms of evaluation are created, such as norms about how a motorist should drive, how a doctor should dress a wound, how a miner should blast, and how a carpenter should do his job. In other situations, there is nothing to fall back upon except a judgment as to how an ordinary reasonable man—a bonus pater familias to use the expression of the Roman law—would have acted. Such differences as may exist because of employment, education and position must be considered, however. An expert may be able to detect a danger which a layman would not have thought about. A farmer has a different area of experience than has a city dweller, a labourer's experience is different from that of a white collar worker. This is significant when they are faced with dangers outside of their trade. No single set of norms will suffice; many must be used.

Negligence according to the law of torts and penal law.—Not every depravture from the norm is negligence, creating criminal liability. And the requirements of the penal law are different from those of tort law. The question in torts is who is to bear the burden of the damage, the innocent victim or the person causing it? Here it may be reasonable to be satisfied with a lesser degree of negligence. It is an entirely different matter when a question of punishment is involved. "It is absolutely clear, in reality," says the Penal Code Commission, "that just as the law sometimes does not punish the unintentional breach at all, there will, in other instances, be good reasons to limit the imposition of punishment to the more serious cases of carelessness, foolishness or thoughtlessness. To go so far as to punish each and every attributable negligence is an aimless waste of a measure which, above all else, should be used moderately and with care" (S.K.M., p. 62). It often happens in legal practice that a person who is acquitted of criminal negligence is nevertheless required to pay damages (see, for example, Rt. 1930, p. 1383; 1932, p. 969; 1933, p. 110).

A finding of negligence must always be made on the basis of the individual situation. For example, if an automobile accident is involved, it is not enough to ascertain the speed at which the car was travelling, and how the driver operated it. One must also consider such circumstances as the width of the road, general visibility, light conditions and whether the road was slippery. A factor which must always be considered is whether or not the actor had sufficient time to act. An error committed in a difficult situation must be judged in a different manner than one committed where there was sufficient time for calm contemplation.

Subjective or objective judgment of negligence.—Whether the determination of negligence shall be subjective to the extent that it considers the individual peculiarities of the actor is a completely different question. Should the intelligent person and the foolish person, the thoughtful and the careless, the calm and the nervous be treated differently? The question is extremely complicated, and little thought out in legal literature. And judicial practice is generally not very illuminating, for the courts hardly ever give any detailed explanation of the general viewpoint which lies behind the decision in the concrete case. The problem cannot be solved by any general formula, e.g., that an objective standard is applied in tort law, but a subjective one in penal law. Here, there is room only for some guiding points.

It should be clear from the above that the basic requirement for liability is that the act conflicts with the objective norm of justifiable behavior. If the actor keeps within the norm, no inquiry is called for as to whether he could have done even better by exercising some special ability possessed by him. Therefore, the issue whether a subjective standard should be used as a basis for decision will have its greatest importance in the form of the question whether subjective grounds for excuse can lead to an acquittal even though objectively a wrong has been committed. But it is necessary to remember that when factors such as knowledge of local conditions or of the actual situation are given significance, no normal measure can be set up. The individual must be judged according to his actual knowledge, unless he can be blamed for not obtaining such knowledge.

If the objectively wrongful act is caused by a lack of attentiveness, then the scale is the same for all. It will not help a person to claim that he is a notoriously careless person, and has shown the attentiveness which he usually does. The purpose of imposing liability for negligence is to enforce attentiveness. On the other hand, an especially attentive person will not be held liable for failing to live up to his usual standard if he has nevertheless fulfilled general reasonable requirements. As a rule, it is also unimportant to know the reasons for the lack of attentiveness; whether, for example, the absent-minded motorist was pondering over life's great questions, or whether he was thinking of his adventures last night.

However, the rule as to the objective measurement scale can hardly be maintained to its fullest extent. It is often natural to impose stricter requirements of attention on one who acts in an area where he has no knowledge and experience than on one who is able and experienced. A person lacking knowledge and experience must compensate for this, so to speak, by an increased amount of care. Similar rules apply to one who, because of a defect of sight or hearing, is more likely than others to cause damage. On the other hand, there are good reasons for relaxing the requirements where young persons are concerned. There is no reason to punish a sixteen-year-old for failing to show the same care as an adult. The degree of maturity must be considered in determining his carelessness in the tort law as well, where the question has been especially important in the field of contributory negligence.

However, if the error is due to a lack of intelligence, experience, calmness, physical strength, etc., the scale of measurement will be subjective in principle. The actor is not punishable if he did the best he could. The general sense of justice makes a distinction between what the perpetrator "can help" and what he "cannot help." It is only the former which forms the basis for reproach and thus, for a judgment of guilt. We blame a person because he exhibits carelessness, recklessness or a lack of consideration, but not because he is stupid, color-blind or easily frightened. The judgment of negligence in criminal law builds on this general way of thinking. But the distinction becomes more problematical upon closer analysis. Is not the carelessness of the perpetrator the outcome of heredity and environment, just as his other qualities are? From a deterministic point of view, it is unreasonable to say that a person can help one trait more than another. But the distinction may have another justification. To threaten punishment for a lack of attentiveness has the practical effect of inviting greater attentiveness; to threaten punishment for stupidity, color-blindness or a lack of mental ability, however, has no rational purpose, for such matters are not under the control of the will, and thus cannot be influenced by threats of punishment.

Nevertheless, the arguments in favor of an objective adjudication of negligence in the penal law are by and large those which can be voiced in favor of criminal liability independent of subjective guilt in general. It is easier to determine the existence of an objective error than to analyze the reasons why the error was made. By cutting off subjective reasons for defense, the rules of liability could be made easier to apply and acquittals due to difficulties of proof could be avoided. This argument is not strong enough to justify ignoring the individual inferiority of the actor, but it cannot be denied that the question as to which individual weaknesses should be considered in the determination is filled with many problems, both theoretical and practical.

Those cases where a person voluntarily engages in an activity which requires special knowledge or special skill, such as driving a car, mining, and conducting physical and chemical experiments, must be discussed separately. It may be that it is negligent of him even to begin this activity with the inferior capacity he may have. A person practices medicine without education; someone drives a car without a license or while over-tired; a color-blind person takes a job which requires perception of color, etc. He will then be liable if he makes a mistake. But if the individual cannot be blamed in this respect, he can hardly be held liable merely because his knowledge, talents or other abilities are not up to par. The doctor who has passed his exams must be permitted to act on the assumption that he has that knowledge which is necessary for general practice; one who has been given a driver's license is entitled to consider his abilities good enough for ordinary traffic. If, for example, the motorist's ability fails in a difficult situation—in confusion, he steps on the gas instead of on the brake—he cannot be held criminally liable. We have had a case where a locomotive driver in an unexpected situation became so confused that he drove directly against a red light. No matter how serious the mistake is from an objective point of view, the result in a criminal case must be an acquittal if the accident cannot be blamed upon inattentiveness, but upon the fact that the locomotive driver froze into paralysis. The result may be different in tort law. In that area, there is more reason to use the risk viewpoint as a foundation.

The difference is illustrated by a Supreme Court decision in Rt. 1951, p. 1028. A truck driver wanted to pass a bus which had stopped on the road to pick up a passenger. The road was a bit narrow, because of a pole on the other side, and the truck driver, misjudging the distance, dented the side of the bus. The driver was prosecuted under Motor Vehicle Act, § 29 (cpr., § 17, para. 2), for negligent driving, but was acquitted. His attempt to pass the bus could not be held against him; he had not "taken a chance" and his misjudgment could not be characterized as punishable negligence. However, there is hardly any doubt but that the driver would be held liable in a compensation case. It was stated, by the way, in the criminal case that he had paid the costs of repairing the bus.

III. Negligence outside of the area of violations against integrity

Negligence plays a part in many other penal provisions besides those which deal with harm to persons or property. Much of what has been said above will also be true in these areas. Here as well, the key to the concept of negligence is the behavior which a knowledgeable and reasonable man uses, and the same principles with respect to the significance of individual inferiority in the actor also apply. But it must be emphasized that the question of what amount of care is required must be discussed in connection with the individual legal provisions. To illustrate, I shall mention some types of penal provisions where liability for negligence is of practical importance.

1. Negligent causing of danger

Some penal provisions describe the offense as a negligent, danger-creating behavior. To this type belongs Penal Code, § 352, para. 2, penalizing one who "by careless handling of fire or inflammable materials causes danger of fire," and Motor Vehicle Act, § 17, para. 2, which states that a driver "shall drive carefully, and watch out as best he can, so that he does not cause damage and inconvenience to others." In practice, a lesser degree of negligence is required to be convicted under such provisions, than to be held criminally liable for the results of negligent behavior. It thus happens not infrequently that a driver who has hit a person is sentenced for the breach of Motor Vehicle Act, § 17, para. 2, but at the same time is acquitted of negligent homicide (involuntary manslaughter, Penal Code, § 239) (see, for example, Rt. 1931, p. 816).

There seems to be a greater reluctance against convicting a man for negligent homicide in Norway than in many other countries.[1] In the five years from 1947 to 1951, only twenty-five persons were punished for negligent homicide, an average of five per year. A similar number were sentenced for negligent causing of bodily harm. In Sweden the comparable figure for negligent homicide was 169 and in Denmark forty-five per year. Even if one takes into consideration the difference in the population and in the density of the traffic, it is obvious that different scales are being used in these countries. In Germany in 1930 there were more than 30,000 sentences for negligent homicide or negligent causing of bodily harm.[2] Such figures show that provisions which apparently have the same contents can in practice mean something completely different.

The fact that the accused has acted as carefully as most, does not absolutely guarantee his acquittal. One who has exercised the normal degree of care may be free from liability in general, but the courts will not accept a traditional practice which they regard as unwarranted.

2. Breach of security provisions

Legislation also contains a long list of preventive provisions which apply to such matters as safety measures in industrial plants, the handling of explosives, and the equipment and driving of automobiles. A violation is generally met with punishment. These provisions seek to prevent harm by forcing a higher degree of care than is required by the general norm of carefulness. Even though a person has intentionally violated such preventive provisions—by consciously breaking the speed regulations of Motor Vehicle Act, § 20, for example—it is not certain that his actions can be characterized as negligent with regard to possible harm.

Very often, the breach of a safety provision is also punishable in its negligent form. The breach of the speed regulations is thus punishable, even though the driver has not looked at the speedometer and was not aware of the fact that the speed was above the permissible limit. Here, a conviction for negligence naturally requires something different from what is required in a case involving the breach of Motor Vehicle Act, § 17, para. 2 (careless driving), or in a case involving negligent homicide. The decisive question is whether the accused has exhibited the attentiveness which it is reasonable to require with respect to this particualr penal provision.

3. Breach of business provisions

The legislature has passed a number of provisions concerning the conduct of business, such as those dealing with maximum prices, rationing, closing time, and the sale of alcoholic beverages. Here the purpose is not to prevent harm to person or property, but to protect other interests of society. But when a negligent violation is a penal offense, the question here as well will be: Has he done what reasonably can be demanded for avoiding a violation of the provision invoived? The breach may have been committed not by the businessman himself, but by one of his employees. The question will then be: Has he instructed the employees as he should have and kept such control over them as can reasonably be required?[3]

4. The significance of the interest which is to be protected

This should suffice to show that the question of what "negligence" is resolves into a number of individual questions regarding the degree of care required in relation to the various penal provisions. In general, it can be said that the requirements must be adjusted according to the significance of the interests which the penal provision seeks to protect.

IV. Punishment for lack of judgment

Penal Code, § 325, provides punishment for a public servant who "shows gross lack of judgment in his duty"; see also the Responsibility Act of February 5, 1932, § 10 of which provides punishment for a member of the Cabinet who shows neglect or lack of judgment in his duties. According to these provisions, it does not help a civil servant or a Cabinet Minister to claim that he is not very sensible, intelligent or wise, and that he has done his best. When the law mentions lack of judgment as well as neglect and carelessness, it must mean that the failure to live up to certain standards as to knowledge and sensibility is also punishable. One who voluntarily accepts an official position which requires special insight and understanding, thereby assumes a certain objective obligation to fulfill these requirements. Mere forgetfulness, however, cannot result in a conviction (Rt. 1954, p. 1151).

§ 24. Mistake of Law

I. Survey

The defendant in a criminal case sometimes wishes to exculpate himself by stating that he acted in good faith, because he did not know that his action violated any law. It may be that he did not even know that any rules of law existed in this area. Or he may have known that rules existed but had been given incorrect information about the contents of the rules, by a lawyer whom he asked for advice, for example. Or perhaps he both knew of and studied the provision, but interpreted it in a way which the court finds erroneous. In all these cases, we speak about mistake of law.

The issue of mistake of law arises most often with respect to misdemeanors and legislation outside the Penal Code, less often when more serious crimes, such as assault, murder, defamation and theft are involved. These penal provisions are generally known by all normal adult persons. But a person can undoubtedly make a mistake as to the age limits in the sections on sex offenses, or a businessman, because of his hard-boiled business morals, may not realize that his behavior constitutes a fraud. A person may also make a mistake with respect to a ground of impunity. He may believe that the law gives him greater right to self-defense or use of necessity measures than it actually does, or he overestimates the legal significance of consent of the victim.

Conscientious offenders.—No mistake of law exists where the actor believes that he has a moral or religious obligation to violate the law (such a person is called a conscientious offender). The pacifist who publicly urges the refusal of military service (Rt. 1918, I, p. 465), and the worker who supports an illegal strike (Rt. 1939, p. 602), are perhaps acting in the belief that they are following a higher law. The same may be true on a larger scale in political offenses. In all these cases, the actor knows that the law of the land forbids or requires, and thus no mistake of law exists.

The conscientious offender represents a tragic conflict for the legal system. As far as possible, rules should be formed so that no one is forced to choose between them and his own conscience. As examples of legal attempts to avoid such conflicts, we can mention the rule which allows a person who, on religious grounds, does not want to take an oath, to use an affirmation (on his honor and conscience), and the rule which allows a pacifist to do civilian work instead of military service. But when serious attacks on the interests of society are involved, society finds it necessary to protect itself with punishment, even though the offender honestly believes his action to be morally right. His motive may then have a bearing on the measure of punishment solely.

II. Penal Code, § 57

Mistake of law is treated very differently in different countries.[1] The rule in many jurisdictions is that a mistake of law will not make for impunity at all, or will do so only in very exceptional cases. In other jurisdictions punishability presupposes the mistake of law to have been incurred at least negligently. Some make no distinction as to whether the mistake of law is negligent, but solve the problem according to the nature of the mistake. Thus, the earlier German Reichsgericht in practice stressed whether the mistake was of a penal or non-penal nature: the latter type of mistake exculpated, but not the former. In the writings on criminal law, it has often been held that knowledge of punishability or at least of illegality is part of the intent: if such knowledge is lacking no conviction for intentional breach should take place.

[1] A detailed discussion is found in Thornstedt, Om rättsvillfarelse (Stockholm, 1956). See also Andenaes, "Ignorantia Legis in Scandinavian Criminal Law," in Essays in Criminal Science, p. 215 et seq. (ed. Mueller, 1961).

Penal Code, § 57, provides: "If a person was ignorant of the illegal nature of an act at the time of its commission, the court may reduce the punishment to less than the minimum provided for such an act, and to a milder form of punishment, provided the court does not decide to acquit him for this reason."

The expression "ignorant of the illegal nature" gives no clear picture of the scope of the provision. One who acts in good faith because of a factual mistake, also errs with respect to the illegal nature of the act, such as where a person takes someone else's property, mistaking it for his own. But Penal Code, § 57, was not meant to apply to cases of factual mistake. It is Penal Code, § 42, which applies to them. We will later consider in greater detail the distinctions between these two provisions (see IV).

The provision speaks only about mistake as to illegality, not as to punishability. If the actor known that the act is unlawful, it can never be impunitive merely because he does not know that it is punishable as well. A farmhand may break a contract of employment because he has received a better offer. He knows that it is unlawful to break the contract, but he does not know that it is also punishable (Penal Code, § 409; see Rt. 1921, p. 510; 1924, p. 702). However, when the acts do not appear to violate any interests, the mistake as to punishability and the mistake as to illegality generally coincide. This is the case with respect to many violations of the penal provisions outside the Penal Code. If I do not know of the penal provision, I also do not know that the act is forbidden.

What Penal Code, § 57, directly provides is that a mistake as to illegality may lead to a decrease in punishment. The section also permits the court to refuse to grant such a decrease. And the paragraph presupposes that the court can acquit completely because of the mistake. There are, then, four alternatives from which the judge can choose; he may: (1) acquit completely; (2) reduce the punishment below the general minimum or to a milder form; (3) consider the mistake as an extenuating circumstance within the general framework of the law; (4) attach no significance to the mistake at all.

This seems unreasonable at first sight. The number of legal provisions are so overwhelming today that no person could have knowledge of more than a fraction of them. How, then, can one hold it against a defendant that he does not have knowledge of a particular provision? To this one can say that no one need know all the rules. There are two requirements: First, knowledge of the general legal rules governing community living which apply to all persons: Secondly, knowledge of the special rules of the trade or occupation in which the individual is engaged. One who wishes to build a house, drive a car, or start a trade must obey the rules which apply to the activity concerned. But a fisherman does not have to know the rules pertaining to industry, and a farmer can live happily without any knowledge of maritime law.

An examination of the cases in this area reveals a certain discrepancy between the judge and the lay judges.[1] We often come upon decisions in country or city courts which acquit a person because of his mistake of law, the lay judges having outvoted the judge, but which are reversed by the Supreme Court (see, for example, Rt. 1959, pp. 105, 796; 1953, p. 459). The lay judges clearly place themselves in the position of the accused, and find it natural that he did not know about the provision in the law; perhaps they themselves learned about it for the first time in the courtroom. The professional judge thinks more about the necessity of an effective enforcement of the law. Actually, this is but a simple example of the general conflict between professional and lay judges. The layman looks chiefly at the individual case; the lawyer considers the wider implications. In the years from 1954 to 1958, there was only one reported case in which the Supreme Court upheld an acquittal because of an excusable mistake of law. During the same period, eight cases were reported where the lower court acquitted on this ground, but where the decision was reversed by the Supreme Court. In six of the eight cases, the lay judges had outvoted the judge.

The accused's position.—Great weight must be given to the position of the accused. Strong demands must be made on the owner or manager of an enterprise. On the other hand, the subordinate must generally be free from liability when he has acted according to his superior's instructions, without having any special reason for suspicion.

The accused's education and mental abilities.—One must also take into consideration the accused's education and mental abilities (see Rt. 1926, p. 948). This is so at least with respect to general rules of community living. Where special rules for a profession are involved, it will probably be more difficult to acquit because of lack of intelligence or experience.

The rule is new.—One reason for holding the mistake of law excusable is that the rule is new (see Rt. 1939, p. 430). Here, however, the general situation of the times must be considered. During war, when provisions of a serious nature are constantly being enacted, the excuse that the provision is new carries less weight; the people must be required to keep informed (see Rt. 1940, p. 514).

The actor is a stranger.—Another reason for excuse is that the actor is a stranger to the jurisdiction. A foreign tourist cannot be required to acquaint himself with the mysteries of our liquor law, but a foreign trawl-fisher can be required to learn our rules on territorial waters and foreigners' rights to fish (see Rt. 1934, p. 727). It can also be excusable for Norwegian citizens to be unfamiliar with regulations in force in a place to which they have recently moved or through which they are travelling.

The meaning of the law has been doubtful.—A third reason for excuse is that the meaning of the law has been doubtful. The accused may have relied on an interpretation of the law which was expressed in the draft bill, in earlier practice, or in statements by public authorities. Because of this, he cannot be blamed if the court now adopts another interpretation.

However, the main question is not whether the meaning was more or less legally doubtful, but whether or not the accused acted faithfully according to this understanding of the purpose of the law. A person who has set out to exploit the loopholes in the law cannot expect any charity if he makes a mistake, even though the interpretation was quite doubtful from a judicial point of view.

> Rt. 1906, p. 562: It was forbidden to serve liquor in connection with selling and buying. A country merchant who had previously been fined for serving liquor to his customers, conducted himself in such a manner that he did not serve in connection with the customers' purchase, but when they came to settle their monthly accounts; he then took them into a private room next to the store and served them there. One of the judges felt that this conduct was outside the scope of the law. But the majority felt that the law also covered a serving of this nature and upheld the lower court's finding of guilt. Only one of those voting wanted to reverse because of good faith.

The total judgment of the method of action is of the essence.—Not an isolated judgment as to whether the mistake of law is excusable, but a total judgment of the method of action is of the essence. Only that mistake of law which makes the act itself justifiable will generally be accepted as excluding punishment. Thus, the phrase "excusable mistake of law" does not give a completely accurate picture of what actually happens in practice.

IV. The distinction between § 42 and § 57

At times the distinction between the areas to which Penal Code, §§ 42 and 57, apply is doubtful.[1] If the mistake in the concrete case is accepted as excusable, it makes no difference which of the two sections was applicable; the result must be an acquittal in either case. The question is of importance, however, if negligent mistake exists with reference to a penal provision which requires intent. Here, the mistake will result in impunity if Penal Code, § 42, applies, but not if Penal Code, § 57, applies.

1. Penal Code, § 57, also applies to special rules for limited areas or groups

Penal Code, § 57, applies not only to ignorance of general laws and provisions, but also of special rules for a limited area or a limited group, such as a community, a part of a city, or the University of Oslo.

[1] Some modern judicial decisions on this point are referred to in Skeie, Den norske strafferett, I pp. 475–479 (Oslo 1946). See also Skeie, Afhandlinger om forskjellige retsspörgamall, pp. 134–136 and 191–193 (Kristiania, 1913).

Rt. 1939, p. 623: The accused fished in an inlet which by royal decree was preserved from fishing. He knew about this preservation law (Act No. 20 of June 25, 1937), but he did not know that the inlet in question had been preserved. The Supreme Court decided that this was a mistake of law under Penal Code, § 57.

Territorial limits and community limits.—A mistake as to jurisdictional boundaries must be decided under Penal Code, § 57, when the boundary is determinative for the punishability of the act. Example: An English trawler is caught within territorial waters; the skipper excused himself by saying that he kept outside of the territorial waters as they were marked out on his English chart. This is a mistake as to how far the Norwegian prohibition against trawl-fishing extends, and is judged according to Penal Code, § 57. The result would be different if he knew about the boundaries, but made a mistake as to his actual position. That would be a mistake of fact which would be judged according to Penal Code, § 42 (Rt. 1953, p. 1537; 1954, p. 679).

2. Existence or contents of a judicial or administrative decision

A mistake concerning the existence or contents of a judicial or administrative decision in an individual case, such as a restraining order, a divorce decree, or an importation permit, however, is judged according to Penal Code, § 42, as a mistake of fact (Rt. 1950, p. 242). The decision becomes more difficult if the actor knows about the existence and contents of the decision but, because of a mistake of law, errs about its judicial effects. On this point, see below under 3.

3. The distinction between mistake of situation and mistake of norm

It is presupposed both in theory and in practice that not every mistake of law should be judged according to Penal Code, § 57, and this concept finds some support in the legislative history.[1]

A misconception of legal rules, according to this interpretation, may also cause a person to err with respect to "circumstances determining the punishability of the act, or increasing his liability for punishment" (Penal Code, § 42). In judicial practice, this is generally called a mistake of the situation, as distinguished from a mistake of the norm, which falls under Penal Code, § 57.

Mistakes as to rights and status. Thus, a mistake of the existence of the right or the legal status which the penal provision seeks to protect, is judged according to Penal Code, § 42, and not according to Penal Code, § 57, regardless of whether the mistake concerns the actual circumstances or a legal rule. The mistake may concern property rights, contractual rights or family rights. Example 1: A man who has received a deathbed gift from a friend accepts and uses the gift, not knowing that such gifts are invalid. He cannot be punished for larceny, embezzlement or the unlawful use of another man's property. Example 2: A woman has been deserted by her husband, and she has not heard from him since. She has been told that the marriage ends automatically when the spouses have not seen each other for seven years. She cannot be punished for bigamy if she remarries when the seven years are over.

Skeie wishes to limit the doctrine to apply only to mistakes about legal rights or status.[2] Hagerup expresses the rule more generally: "Penal Code, § 42, applies to the concrete circumstances which determine the criminal nature of the act, and which are a condition for the judgment passed on the act by the law: § 57 refers to this very judgment itself."[3] The line of thought behind this abstract formula is the following: For penal provisions which seek to protect property rights, it is a requirement of punishability that the property actually belongs to someone else. One who commits an error with respect to the property law is not unfamiliar with the commandment "thou shalt not steal," but he errs with respect to "a circumstance determining the punishability of the act." (Penal Code, § 42.) Similarly, a penal provision which seeks to protect the marital relationship presupposes that a marriage exists; one who believes that the marriage has terminated is not ignorant of the prohibition against bigamy, but of a condition determining punishability. The same reasoning applies in other cases.

The distinction lacks a logical basis.—This may seem both simple and reasonable at first sight. However, upon closer analysis, one must arrive at the conclusion that the distinction lacks any logical basis. It becomes a question of linguistic formulation whether one should say that a mistake of law concerns a condition for the judgment passed on the act by the law or this judgment itself. Let us discuss the examples mentioned above: Objectively, the law prohibits appropriation of deathbed gifts; it prohibits remarriage as long as the other spouse is alive, even though he has been gone for seven or eight years. Thus, a mistake concerning the property law or the law of domestic relations is also a mistake as to how far the penal norm extends, or, in other words, a mistake about the judgment which the law passes on the act. On the other hand, however, it is not difficult to phrase the rule so that a mistake concerns the conditions for the judgment of the law even in cases where it is agreed that the mistake should be judged under Penal Code, § 57. A man, for example, sells goods in violation of a rationing provision which he does not know about. He is, to rephrase Hagerup's words, not ignorant of the commandment "You shall not sell rationed objects without coupons," but he is ignorant about the condition for application of this commandment, that this particular object is rationed.

When the actor knows about the actual relevant conditions, but believes the act is legal, this is always a mistake with respect to the scope of the penal provision, regardless of whether the mistake pertains directly to the extent of the provision's descriptive expressions, or the extent of the legal concepts with which it operates. However, the thoughts of the actor will often concern the existence of the right or the legal status without any knowledge of the legal ground on which it builds. A son, for example, hears from his father that their farm has timber rights in a neighbour's woods, but he has no knowledge about the basis of the right. A mistake of this type must be considered a mistake of fact.

An examination of judicial practice shows that the distinction between a "mistake with respect to situation" and a "mistake with respect to norm" is often obscure, and that a reason for deciding such matters one way or another is hardly ever given. And this should come as no surprise: the distinction pretends to be of a fundamental conceptual nature while, as we have seen, there is no logical basis for it.

Policy considerations.—It may be asked whether there are any important policy reasons for segregating certain groups of legal mistakes, such as those regarding rights and legal status, for special treatment, despite the difficulties in making the distinction.

From a practical point of view, there may be a difference between an ordinary mistake of law and a mistake about rights and legal status. But in the more serious crimes there is very seldom an issue of good faith due to a general mistake of law. Even though the perpetrator does not know positively that the act is forbidden, he at least knows its character as a violation of interests. Because of a mistake as to a legal right or a legal status, however, he may violate an interest which he does not know exists. It may seem unreasonable to convict a person of a serious felony when he is in good faith, even though his good faith can be held against him as negligent.

Secondly, with respect to the penal provision's effectiveness, it is less necessary to inculcate knowledge of legal rules which have only a peripheral significance for the scope of the provision, than it is to inculcate knowledge about the penal provision itself.

All mistakes of law ought to be encompassed by Penal Code, § 57.—In jurisdictions which do not give mistake of law an impunitive effect, or do so only under very strict conditions, unreasonable results can be avoided by separating certain groups of judicial mistakes and by treating them as factual mistakes. A strict adherence to the traditional doctrine that only the excusable mistake of law can be impunitive, would require that such a method of avoidance also be recognized under Norwegian law.

There is, however, a more natural and more satisfying solution. Both according to its wording and according to the legislature's intentions, Penal Code, § 57, gives the judge the authority to decrease the punishment or acquit completely according to his own opinion in the individual case. By relying on Penal Code, § 57, the judge can go right into the matter and decide whether it is necessary and reasonable to impose punishment despite the mistake of law, instead of seeking the solution in an obscure distinction between "mistake with respect to situation" and "mistake with respect to norm." Such an interpretation of the law, of course, does not exclude the possibility that court practice can develop more definite rules in typical cases. The formula "excusable mistake of law" provides a satisfactory solution in the great majority of cases where a question about the significance of mistake of law arises, such as cases of violation of provisions for the public order, business regulations and other legislation outside the Penal Code. But it is an untenable generalization to say that the contents of Penal Code, § 57, are exhausted by this. With offenses of a more serious nature, one ought to reply upon the freedom which the law gives the judge, so that he can determine more carefully what significance the mistake of law should have in light of the letter and spirit of the penal provision.

That the question cannot be solved by a completely general formula is confirmed by a scrutiny of the individual penal provisions.

The formulation of some penal provisions clearly indicates that a mistake of law will be deemed impunitive even if it is negligent. The provisions on larceny and other offenses for gain require a purpose of obtaining for oneself or for others an unwarranted gain. A person who is in good faith with respect to his right, lacks this purpose and thus cannot be punished for larceny. But even under the Criminal Code of 1842, which (until an 1889 amendment) did not require a purpose of gain, the courts consistently acquitted for larceny when the perpetrator had acted in good faith.[1] This was so even though he did not believe that he exercised a personal right, but only a public right, such as an alleged right to free seaweed harvesting on another person's property. This practice is well founded. It would seem offensive to convict for larceny when the defendant did not act dishonestly. On the other hand, the Supreme Court has not accepted as impunitive such a mistake as to public right when the accusation concerns the violation of an owner's right to hunt or fish (Penal Code, § 407).[2]

From a practical point of view it could hardly be criticized that the belief of exercising a public right is given an impunitive effect with respect to an accusation of larceny, but not with respect to the violation of hunting or fishing rights under Penal Code § 407.

Another instance where the penal provision clearly presupposes knowledge of the illegality is Penal Code, § 110, which decrees punishment for the judge who acts "against his better judgment." It is not sufficient for a finding of guilt that the judge has negligently committed an error as to legal rules.

§ 25. Criminal Liability Without Subjective Guilt (Strict Liability)

I. Provisions about criminal liability without guilt

As we have seen, the law often dispenses with the requirement of guilt with respect to a single element of otherwise intentional offenses (see above, § 21, III). However, we also have some penal provisions which waive the requirement of guilt completely and make liability depend upon purely objective elements. There are no such provisions in the Penal Code itself, but the Act about the coming into force of the Code, § 8, para. 1, presupposes that there are rules about objective criminal liability (strict liability) in the legislation outside the Code.

We have some such rules concerning liability for animals. Of some importance were the provisions in the Enclosure Act (Act on the preservation of land of May 16, 1860), §§ 21-24 and 38, which dealt with those cases where domestic animals go wandering onto another person's property. The new Act of June 16, 1961, has abolished the objective liability and requires intent or negligence on the part of the owner. Objective penal responsibility for dog owners is found in § 1 of the Act of July 9, 1926, on liability for damage to cattle caused by dogs. The Act on reindeer holding of May 12, 1933, §§ 74 and 96, also contains rules imposing objective liability if animals stray onto forbidden areas. None of these statutes directly provides that liability is independent of guilt, but it is settled in judicial practice that they must be so interpreted (see Rt. 1907, p. 289, 1938, p. 411, and 1960, p. 755). In any event, the maximum punishment under each of these statutes is a fine. And according to the

Act about the coming into force of the Penal Code, fines may not be converted into imprisonment unless guilt is actually proved. In other words, the fines can be collected only by civil execution.

Policy considerations.—When the law makes criminal liability objective in these cases it is primarily because of policy reasons. An owner is usually able to control his animals if he exercises the necessary care, but in the individual case it may be difficult to disprove the existence of an accident. A rule providing for objective liability prevents the really unjustified acquittals which such difficulties of proof might cause. Strictly speaking, it can be argued that this consideration goes no further than to justify placing upon an owner the burden of proving that care has been shown. But by making liability completely objective, the legislature perhaps hopes to stimulate a higher degree of care than that which is otherwise necessary for the avoidance of criminal liability. Thus, there exists a preventive consideration which is related to that often mentioned in support of strict liability in tort law. How great a weight it has it is not easy to say.

Comparable considerations may exist with respect to other relationships, such as that of employer and employee. Foreign laws often contain purely objective rules concerning the liability of the principal which are parallel to the employer's liability under civil law. Our former rules about this type of liability have gradually been abrogated and have been replaced by rules which impose the burden on the employer of proving impunity (see above, § 9, II). It is only when the employer is a "legal person" that liability in some cases is placed on him (see below, § 26, II). Perhaps the axiom that punishment cannot be imposed without subjective guilt has been carried too far. A fine which may not be converted into imprisonment acts only as a purely economic obligation, comparable to a duty to pay damages or to make redress. And if such an economic sanction is a suitable method for the prevention of certain offenses, there can hardly be any decisive arguments against it.

In times long past even serious punishments were imposed on an objective basis, such as in the form of joint criminal liability for offenses committed by one's close relatives. Today, this would offend the general sense of justice. Nor is there any practical necessity for such an objective liability. But the question arises under military occupation, when the occupation forces must count on opposition from the population as a whole. Here, sanctions which are imposed without respect to individual guilt, such as arrests of hostages or executions of prominent citizens as retributions for attacks, can be effective. The moral consciousness condemns such a sacrifice of innocent persons. But experience shows that military necessity will often cause moral scruples to topple.

II. Other sanctions of penal character

Occasionally, someone other than the guilty party is burdened with a liability which differs from punishment in name only. We have such a case in the Purchase Tax Act of May 19, 1933, § 3, para 2. One who violates the rules about purchase tax is punished by a fine and is also obliged to pay twice the amount to the Treasury, and four times the amount in case of repetition. From a formal point of view, the additional amount is a civil legal consequence and not a penal one, but in reality it is a sanction of penal character (see above, § 1, IV). And for this liability "a seller or owner [must answer] for his assistant's acts, and also a husband for his wife's and children's acts." The most important example of sanctions which are not regarded formally as punishment, but which have the same effects, are found in the provisions on forfeitures, which often apply also against persons other than the law-breaker himself.[1]

§ 26. Criminal Liability for Legal Persons (Corporate Criminal Liability) [2]

I. Posing the problem

When a crime has been committed on behalf of a legal person, such as a corporation, a trade-union or a co-operative, the question arises whether criminal liability may be imposed not only upon the actor, but also upon the legal person itself. In tort law a legal person is liable for whatever damage is caused by its organs or servants. Can there be a similar criminal liability? It is obvious that not all types of punishment can be imposed upon a legal person; imprisonment and capital punishment both presuppose a physical person. On the other hand, fines, forfeitures, loss of rights (such as the right to trade) and dissolution are all possible in the case of legal entities.

[1] See the discussion of the 20th Nordic meeting of jurists (Oslo, 1954).

In older theory the question was often solved by conceptual deductions from the purposes of punishment and the nature of legal persons. One argument was that punishment is a sanction directed against the criminal mind and therefore cannot fulfill its objective in the case of a legal person which has no mind in a natural sense. The opposite argument was that the legal person actually has its own mind, different from the individual minds of its members, and that therefore it can also be guilty of offenses and ought to be subject to punishment.

Such arguments have no value. The mind and the acts of the legal person are of course nothing else but the mind and acts of the persons who act on its behalf. To speak about "the organization's decisions," "the activity of the corporation" and "the community's offer," is merely to use a metaphorical way of expression which is practical and easy, but which does not correspond to a psychological reality. But this does not rule out the possibility of criminal liability for the legal person. This is a practical legislative question which must be answered by considerations of policy. De lege ferenda, the problem is as follows: Is there a need for such a liability? And if so, are there any counter arguments of a decisive character?

Policy considerations.—Clearly it is not a question of replacing the individual liability with the collective. As a starting point, we must accept the proposition that the liability which is imposed upon the guilty person directly is the most effective. The question is whether there is any reason to supplement this individual liability by a liability of the legal person, generally or in particular areas.

For those members of an organization who are not guilty of the illegality, the liability of the legal person really constitutes a sort of criminal liability without guilt, a liability which, it is true, affects them only indirectly through their interest in the organization. The arguments for and against such liability are therefore on many points similar to those for and against objective criminal liability.

First, if the law restricts itself to an individual liability contingent upon subjective guilt, it will often be difficult to get at the one who is actually guilty. When the act is committed by a larger organization, such as an industry or a trade union, it is perhaps impossible to learn where the fault is, or, at most, the subordinate who has performed the penalized act itself is discovered while the actual guilt lies higher up in the leadership. Even though the formal head of the organization is reached, the real power may lie in interests even beyond this. By making the organization itself liable, the law makes sure that the offense will not be without consequences, and it opens up the door to an economic sanction proportional to the significance of the violation, while fines otherwise must generally be determined with relation to the economic condition of the individual who is personally liable (see Penal Code, § 27). By placing the liability on the organization, the law hopes to create in the leaders and membership a positive interest in preventing illegalities. Generally, the violations have been committed in the interest of the organization, and if liability is imposed only on the one who is directly guilty, the leadership and members would actually escape liability, unless the law imposes joint liability.

The elimination of the organization's interest in the violation may create a different psychological attitude in the one who acts on its behalf. As long as he risks only a personal liability, he may count on the organization's gratitude for his zeal, and a possible fine might be paid by it as a part of its operating expenses. When the organization itself must pay, he cannot expect the same gratitude.

The most important opposing consideration, that of imposing punishment on innocent persons, does not weigh as heavily as otherwise, since such persons are affected only in that sphere of their interests which is related to the organization. This interest stands and falls with the knowledge and care which is shown by the organization's leaders and employees, and there is nothing strange or repulsive about the idea of holding their violations in behalf of the legal entity against that legal entity by imposing sanctions upon it.

What weight these general considerations carry, varies greatly with the different areas. For ordinary criminal offenses, such as murder, larceny and fraud, there will be no need for such a corporate criminal liability. The question has its greatest significance for those offenses which can be characterized as offenses in economic life: violations of building and business laws, price and rationing provisions, taxation and revenue laws, and last, not least, breaches of those rules which society has established for the activities of the organization itself, such as legislation on labor disputes and monopolistic practices. Here and in other countries, the tendency has been toward recognition of criminal liability for legal persons in those cases where practical considerations suggest it, and it is possible that the strong development of the economic and trade organizations of our time will lead to a continued development in this direction.

> Hurwitz points out that the modern problem of criminal liability for legal persons is but a part of a greater problem of the need of imposing liability upon the collective entity of which the offender is a member, and that the historical development in this area has been in a wave-like motion (see the book cited in footnote 24, §§ 1 and 2). At the primitive level, it was natural to make the then predominant collective entities, the tribe and the family, liable for their members' offenses, a practice which we see in ancient Germanic and Roman law. In the later Roman law, with its individualistic touch, purely personal liability became the rule. In the middle ages collective liability reappeared, especially in its application to cities and guilds. For example, when the French city of Montpellier rebelled against a royal tax increase and some royal servicemen were killed during the fighting, it was punished in 1379 by losing its university, city hall and all its privileges; in addition, it was fined heavily, some of its town walls were torn down, and its moats filled; lastly, 600 of its most guilty citizens were sentenced to death. Collective liability for cities and guilds was practised all the time till the end of the eighteenth century. During the time of enlightenment, the thought developed that justice requires all punishment to be based on individual guilt. Former provisions on collective liability were regarded as remnants of a primitive stage of law. The more recent development of organizational life, together with offenses under modern economic legislation, have given the problem new significance.

II. The main rule: No criminal liability for legal persons

The main rule in our law is that criminal liability can only be imposed upon one who is personally guilty and not upon the legal person. Even in cases of nonfeasance, in breach of duty imposed upon the corporation, criminal liability lies with the individuals responsible for the omission, not with the legal person itself. On the other hand, measures without penal character may be used, primarily forfeiture of the profits obtained by the offense (Penal Code, § 36). The Penal Law Commission states that "By this means, one achieves for the most part what is intended by those favoring corporate criminal liability" (S.K.M., p. 53; see p. 44). This is probably too optimistic. The risk of having to part with the profit if the offense is discovered may have its preventive effect, but it cannot be expected to be very great.

Exceptions.—Some provisions contain exceptions to the rule:

1. Fines to avoid unnecessary litigation.—§ 202, para. 3, of the Courts of Justice Act (see §§ 203, 204) threatens fines to avoid unnecessary litigation: "If it is not shown upon whom the liability rests among those who have the authority to make decisions on the affairs of a community an organization, a firm, an institution, a savings bank, or an estate, the corporate party litigant itself may be fined." As can be seen, the corporate liability is subsidiary: if it is determined who the guilty individual is, the rules do not apply. The provision is motivated by purely practical considerations: if this type of fine shall attain its purpose, it must be capable of immediate imposition, without any necessity for a special investigation to determine who is liable.

2. Economic legislation.—The most important provisions affecting corporate criminal liability are contained in the economic regulatory statutes. The Price Act of June 26, 1953, § 53, provides that if the Act is violated by anyone acting on behalf of a firm, an institution or an organization, the firm, institution or organization is subject to fines and the loss of the right to continue business activities, provided, however, that the violation has been committed in order to further the interests of the legal person; or when the legal person must be presumed to have substantially benefited from the violation. Such rules about punishment for organizations which violate the price laws were first enacted at the beginning of World War II. Subsequently they were also introduced into economic legislation; see, for example, the temporary enactments on importation and exportation prohibitions of December 13, 1946, § 6, para. 1.

The prerequisite for the organization's liability, according to the Price Act, is that a "punishable act" has been committed; that is, it must be shown that the requirements for punishment of an individual person do exist. The law has not gone so far as to burden the organization with criminal liability on the basis of a purely objective breach, where the actor was irresponsible or did not have subjective guilt or mens rea. But the organization may be punished even if the actor himself is not prosecuted.

DET KRIMINELLE FORSAET

Summary in English

It is an almost universally accepted principle that no punishment should be inflicted unless some mental element, or rather a kind of legal fault, is involved in the offence committed. The doctrine on this element of guilt is not the same in all criminal systems. In his treatise "Mens rea in German and English Criminal Law" (Journal of Comparative Legislation and International Law, 17–18, 1935-36), Hermann Mannheim has pointed out some characteristic dissimilarities between German and English law. In Denmark, as in the other Scandinavian countries, the principles of criminal responsibility have many features in common with those of German criminal law. The legal concepts of „forsaet" German "Vorsatz") and „uagtsomhed" (German: "Fahrlassigkeit") denote two categories of guilt, like the Roman law concepts of "dolus" and "culpa". The subject matter of the present study is the concept of criminal intention (dolus) in Danish law.

In Chapter I a brief historical outline is given of the principles of liability; the main contents of German and Scandinavian jurisprudence since the 19th century are stated, and a comparison is made between the principles adopted by some Continental legal systems and the doctrine of "mens rea" in English law. It is pointed out that, apart from the analytical concepts presented by Bentham and Austin, general definitions of "intention", "recklessness", "negligence", etc. have played a minor role in England. Recently, however, J. W. C. Turner and Glanville Williams have endeavoured to view the common law and statutory rules on criminal liability in the light of general notions of "foresight of consequences", etc.

Chapter II,1 deals with the relations betwen theoretical statements on liability and the rules of law laid down in the practice of the courts. Particular attention is given to the fact that the difinitions of analytical theory cannot be indentified with actual law. Jurisprudential analysis has exerted a considerable influence on the development of positive law, e.g. by showing that different offences should to some extent be judged by general standards or principles concerning foresight of consequences, mistake of fact, etc. However, German authors have often gone too far in their attempts to reduce the formulas of liability to a few brief definitions intended to cover every case arising in court practice.

Chapter II,2 is devoted to the problems of proof of criminal intention. Furthermore, the question is raised as to the extent to which it is possible to infer the principles of liability from the statements of the courts in criminal cases.

Chapter III–VII deal with some of the principal groups of cases involving questions of criminal intention. The basic element in criminal guilt is denoted by the concept of "voluntary act" (in German doctrine: "die Handlung", defined as "Willensbetatigung"). This aspect of criminal intention is dealt with in Chapter III,2.

Chapter IV contains an inquiry into the type of intention presenting the greatest number of problems in the practice of the courts; it is frequently asked whether the offender has had sufficient knowledge of the facts characterizing or surrounding the criminal act or omission. It may for instance be questioned whether he knew that a statement made by him was false, that a document had been falsified by others, that a person against whom the act of the offender was directed was in a state of mental abnormality, or that he was a public officer engaged in the execution of his duties, etc. (Chapter IV, 1-3). Two offences of outstanding practical importance are specially dealt with. In some sexual offences it may be a matter of doubt whether the offender knew that a young person was under 15 (or 18) years of age (IV,4). Similarly, as regards the receiving of stolen property, it will often be a decisive question of fact whether the accused knew that the goods received had been stolen (IV,5).

Chapter V deals with the intentional causation of certain consequences of an act. The most striking illustration of this type of criminal intention is presented by intentional homicide (V,1). Various provisions in penal legislation have made it a criminal offence to cause a risk of damage to physical objects or danger to the life or health of other persons. These offences are specified in Chapter VI. In legal doctrine it has been a matter of dispute whether criminal intention implies only knowledge of the material circumstances connected with the dangerous situation, or whether the offender should also realize that under such circumstances there is a risk of some future damage. In the present study the latter view is supported.

Chapter VII deals with a group of offences against property, including larceny, embezzlement and fraud. The mental elements of these offences are outlined, and consideration is given to various special problems of intention, e.g. mistakes of fact excluding liability.

In Chapters VIII—IX attention is focused on the relations of criminal intention to other concepts of considerable importance within the general theory of responsibility: criminal attempt (VIII,1), participation in crime (VIII,2), mental abnormality (IX,1), and drunkenness (IX,2).—

The primary object of this book is to consider whether it is possible to give a general definition of the concept of criminal intention laid down by Danish courts. A brief statement of the main points of the discussion is given below.

When the definition of a crime requires a certain consequence of an act (e.g. death or bodily harm), the consequence in question may have been desired or aimed at by the offender,—though not necessarily as an ultimate end. In German doctrine this type of intention—desire of the consequences—is termed "Absicht" (in Danish: "hensigt").

In many crimes, however, the material element is a certain circumstance accompanying or surrounding the act of the offender (e.g. the age of a child). In such cases the first degree of criminal intention is actual knowledge of the circumstances required by law.

In German and Scandinavian jurisprudence it is generally admitted that the scope of criminal intention cannot be kept within the limits indicated by the expressions "desire of consequences" or "knowledge". On the other hand, intention does not include all cases where the offender has been aware of the fact that harmful consequences might possibly ensue from his act, or that it was possible that the elements constituting the crime were present. In Danish criminal law "recklessness" is not treated as a separate form of guilt, but the states of mind covered by that term are classified partly as criminal intention, partly as criminal negligence. Consequently, some difficulty arises in drawing the line separating intention from the form of criminal negligence called "advertent negligence" (in German: "bewusste Fahrlassigkeit").

In German legal theory it is usually stressed that only a narrow scope of criminal intention beyond the limits of "desire of consequences" or "positive knowledge" is admissible. If the offender has not been aiming at the criminal effect, or has not been certain that such effect would ensue or that some external circumstance was present at the time of the act, punishment for an intentional offence is excluded, unless he has acted with so-called "dolus eventualis". The meaning of this concept is explained by Mannheim in the above-mentioned study on "mens rea". Swedish theory generally follows the definitions just referred to, and Swedish courts have frequently applied the test of "dolus eventualis" described by the German author Reinhard Frank: intention is present in an act if the court is of opinion that, although the offender did only regard the criminal result as possible or probable, he would nevertheless have acted in the same manner even if he had foreseen it as a certainty.—In Danish and Norwegian doctrine it is held that the foresight of probability may be classed with actual knowledge or certainty; consequently the courts should resort to the tests of "dolus eventualis" only if the offender has regarded the consequences or the circumstances specified in the rule of law as merely possible.

The inquiries carried out in the preceding chapters have shown that it is extremely difficult to make certain how the limits of intention are drawn in Danish court practice. There can be no doubt, however, that considerable importance is attached to the criterion of "probability". It is hardly possible to specify the degree of probability generally required by the courts, but the offender should at least have regarded the criminal consequence or circumstance as the more probable alternative. Similar conclusions have been expressed in Danish theory by Hurwitz, in Norwegian theory by Andenaes; these authors have pointed out that the definition of criminal intention cannot be restricted to the high degrees of probability indicated by some previous legal writers: a probability coming near to positive knowledge or certainty. Furthermore, it is stressed that the courts are not likely to require the same degree of probability in all criminal offences. As regards the concept of "dolus eventualis", it is submitted that none of the theories on this form of criminal intention seems to have been definitely accepted by Danish courts. It may be suggested—in accordance with the view held in Danish theory by Hurwitz and von Eyben—that the limits of intention are to some extent determined by the discretion of the courts, taking into consideration the character of the offence, the nature of the evidence, and other factors which cannot be included in a definition of general validity. However, the concept of intention is not nearly as flexible as the standard of negligence.

In German theory on criminal liability there is a permanent controversy between "Willenstheorien" (e. g. R. von Hippel) and "Vorstellungstheorien" (e. g. Reinhard Frank). This controversy, which can be traced in Scandinavian theory too, is almost exclusively of a terminological nature. If the arguments of the theories are critically examined, the latter theory appears to be better suited to characterize the various types of criminal intention.

The problems of ignorance of law have not been considered in the present study, apart from fragmentary remarks on cases in which some understanding of legal qualities, etc. are relevant to the question of criminal intention. Nor does the study concern itself with the problems of responsibility for unintentional offences. As has been mentioned above, "criminal negligence" is a second category of guilt in Danish law, consisting either in "advertent negligence" (recklessness) or in "blameworthy inattention". As regards petty offences, intention and negligence are generally punishable under the same legal provisions, whereas liability for major offences is often restricted to criminal intention. The standard of negligence is narrower in criminal law than in the law of torts.

The Norwegian Penal Code

with an Introduction by Professor Dr.jur. Johs. Andenaes)

CHAPTER 3—CONDITIONS DETERMINING PUNISHABILITY

Section 40

The penal provisions of this code do not apply to an act committed unintentionally unless it is explicitly provided or unmistakably implied that a negligent act is also punishable.

A misdemeanor consisting of omission to act is also punishable when committed by negligence, unless the contrary is explicitly provided or unmistakably implied.

Section 41

In cases where a superior cannot be punished for a misdemeanor committed by somebody in his service, the subordinate can always be held responsible, even if the penal provision, according to its wording alone, is directed against the superior.

Section 42

To a person who has committed an act in ignorance of circumstances determining the punishability of the act or increasing his liability for punishment, these circumstances are not attributable.

Where the ignorance can be ascribed to negligence, the punishment provided for a negligent act is applied, if negligence is punishable.

Error regarding the value of an object or the estimated amount of damages caused will be taken into account only when punishability depends thereon.

Section 43

Where the law provides that an unintentional consequence of a punishable act entails increased punishment, the more severe punishment applies only where the offender could have foreseen the possibility of such a consequence, or where, in spite of his ability to do so, he has failed to prevent such a consequence after having been made aware of the danger.

SCANDINAVIAN COUNTRIES

Legal writers usually distinguish between the objective and subjective conditions for criminal guilt, and it is usual to mention among the objective conditions that there must be a chain of events which causally links the defendant to the offense, be it a positive act or an omission. There seems also to be rather general agreement that there are situations where this causal connection between the defendant and the offense is too weak to justify criminal liability. American writers tend to express this by their requirement of proximate cause, and European writers express much the same idea when they require both causation and adequacy in order to establish criminal liability. Continental European, and especially German, jurisprudence has produced a substantial and highly theoretical literature about the causation and adequacy theories. These theories are most vehemently rejected by Scandinavian jurisprudence which, by and large, is close to Anglo-American law in the matter of causation. The Scandinavian criminal codes do not attempt to define causation, and the relatively scarce Scandinavian literature on causation in criminal law reflects that such definitions are not needed.

It is against this background that Professor Andenaes speaks a word of caution in regard to Section 305 in his comments on the Proposed Federal Criminal Code.[1] His more detailed remarks on "Causation and Adequacy," from his text on Norwegian criminal law,[2] is attached as Appendix A, because they are representative of Scandinavian jurisprudence on the matter of causation. Andenaes is directly aiming at the Continental European theories when he states on p. 114:

"It is especially the doctrine of conditio sine qua non, which has been given the honor of representing logic. This theory is untenable for two reasons. First, it is not possible to speak of the logical and the natural scientific concept. Within both philosophy and natural science, the concept is interpreted in different ways.

"Secondly, the theory ignores the fact that a judicial question about interpretation is involved, and that this question must be solved by legal consideration, not by reference to the terminology of other sciences. It is the concept of legal causation which is in issue, not that of logic or natural science. It is even possible that such expressions as 'being about,' 'cause' and 'lead to' can have a different meaning depending on the connection in which they are used, in the same way as other legal expressions."

The standard Swedish [3] and Danish [4] texts contain statements which are briefer, but rather similar to the above. In this connection it should be mentioned that the two leading Danish writers [5] give their wholehearted endorsement to a discussion of causation which is to be found in a well known English text:[1]

. . . The images and metaphors, the fluid and indeterminate language, upon which both courts and textbook writers (even when most anxious to jettison traditional ideas) still fall back when deciding issues of causal terminology, or explaining such issues to others, have their roots in certain features of a variety of concepts which permeate the daily nonlegal discourse of ordinary men. These features need to be brought to light and described in literal terms; for the assertion often made by the courts, especially in England, that it is the plain man's notions of causation (and not the philosopher's or the scientist's) with which the law is concerned, seems to us to be true. At least it is true that the plain man's causal notions function as a species of basic model in the light of which the courts see issue before them, and to which they seek analogies, although the issues are often very different in kind and complexity from those that confront the plain man. These notions have very deep roots in our thinking and in common ideas of when it is just or fair to punish or exact compensation. Hence even lawyers who most wish the law cut loose from traditional ways of talking about causation concede that at certain points popular conceptions of justice demand attention to them.

This English text is of interest also because it contains a rather full summary of the above-mentioned Continental European theories on causation and adequacy. These two chapters on "Individualizing Theories and Theory of Conditions (Bedingungstheorie)" and "The Generalizing Theories: Adequate Cause," respectively are attached as Appendix B.[2]

§ 12. CAUSATION AND ADEQUACY[3]

I. Posing the problem

In the law of torts, before liability may be imposed there must be established to exist a causal relationship between the act upon which the liability is based and the damage for which compensation is demanded. The question of causation does not have the same importance within penal law. Most penal provisions do not describe the offense in terms of the causation of a certain result; instead, they speak, e.g., about "appropriating" or "carrying away" an object (Penal Code, §§ 255 and 257), "giving false testimony" (§ 166), and "using" false documents (§ 182). The interpretation of the individual expressions of the penal provisions does not necessarily involve the concept of causation.

Nevertheless, a large number of provisions do involve this concept, especially those which are directed against a physical harm inflicted on person or on property. At times, the law penalizes the person who "causes" a harm (e.g., Penal Code, § 233, on homicide), at times it uses other expressions which mean the same. For example, it speaks about "injuring" another in body or health (§ 229), "bringing about" danger (§ 150), "destroying" an object (§ 291). The same idea is present when the law increases the punishment because harm has become the "result" of an offense (§§ 148 and 169). Moreover, when the law refers to "forcing" or "inducing" someone to commit an act (§§ 266 and 270), causal relationship is required; but these terms also constitute a characterization of the act in question.

Thus, whenever a penal provision uses the term causation or a similar expression, a discussion of the meaning of causation becomes part of the interpretation of the provision. And since the question is involved in a large number of provisions, it is only natural to discuss it in the general part of the criminal law.

A great deal of confusion has been created in the study of causation by the often advanced theory that the solution to the problem is to be found outside of jurisprudence, in logic or in the natural sciences. In Norwegian theory, Stang has been a strong proponent of this view: "The question of the meaning of the expressions, cause and effect, belongs to the common basis of all sciences: logic."[1] It is especially the doctrine of conditio sine qua non, which has been given the honor of representing logic. This theory is untenable for two reasons. First, it is not possible to speak of the logical or the natural scientific causal concept. Within both philosophy and natural science, the concept is interpreted in different ways.[2]

Secondly, the theory ignores the fact that a judicial question of interpretation is involved, and that this question must be solved by legal considerations not by references to the terminology of other sciences. It is the concept of legal causation which is in issue, not that of logic or natural science. It is even possible that such expressions as "bring about," "cause" and "lead to" can have a different meaning depending on the connection in which they are used, in the same way as other legal expressions.

II. The condition theory

The usual starting point in Norwegian theory has been the condition theory, which holds that every necessary condition—every conditio sine qua non—is to be regarded as a cause. To determine whether or not a particular act is the cause of a particular harm, one thus asks: Would the harm have occurred if the act had not been committed? A kind of differentiation computation is made: the actual result is compared with what would have happened had there been no act; it is the difference for which the perpetrator must answer. According to this terminology, every act has an eternity of causes, both coordinate and successive. For example, two old enemies, A and B, meet on a road and start to quarrel. One word leads to another, and it ends with A stabbing B. If A had taken another road, or if he had left his knife at home, or if he had not originally been in a bad mood because of a quarrel with his wife, the killing would not have occurred. Had B, on the other hand, been out a little bit later, or had he controlled his tongue a little better, it would not have happened either. And each one of these causes itself has a long line of other causes of a more or less remote nature.

People are not that theoretical in the language of ordinary life. One would not say that the now deceased third person who originally introduced A's parents to each other caused B's death, even though it is quite clear that had they not met, A would never have existed and thus no killing would have occurred. When one questions the causes for something, it is for the purpose of obtaining an explanation. And we designate as causes that or those foregiong events which give us the explanation, which make us understand the occurrence. The answer often depends on the practical purpose which one is seeking. The doctor determines the immediate cause of death: loss of blood due to stabbing. The judge asks who caused the death. The forensic psychologist goes back even further, to the motives of the murderer and to any other factor which may explain the act.

The fact that the condition theory goes further than common language usage in attaching causation to more distant factors, gives it a somewhat theoretical and distant aspect, but it is of little practical importance for the application of this concept of causation in law. The necessary limitation is created by other prerequisties of criminal liability, an unlawful act and subjective guilt. Thus, a broad formulation of the requirement of causation is not so dangerous. In the penal law, liability must be based upon an unlawful act (or omission). It then becomes decisive whether this act can be considered a cause; if other factors, for which no one can be made responsible, may also be described in the same way is without legal significance.

The formula conditio sine qua non can well serve as a point of origin in determining criminal liability for an unlawful act. When the causal relationship is not altogether clear, it is quite natural to ask what the situation would have been if the act had not been committed. But a closer analysis will show that this formula cannot be used without modifications and explanations, and that the determination will often have to be made by a subjective interpretation, where there might be reasonable differences of opinion as to the solution of the individual case. This is natural enough. Legal problems can rarely be solved by a simple formula. The limits can be fixed only through paraphrasing, explanations and exemplification. But the very formulation of the condition theory tends to create the illusion that the solution is easily obtained by a simple mathematical formula.

[2] For further information, see, for example, Nordic Summer University 1951, Årsaksproblemet (Copenhagen, 1952). To a large extent, modern natural science has freed itself from the concept of causation. If a formula for the relationship between the phenomena could be set up (as is the case, for example, in the laws of mechanics for the movements of bodies), the scientific problem would be solved without any necessity to speak of cause and effect.

III. Harm inflicted by one person alone

The first situation to be considered is where only one person inflicts harm. Under the condition theory, the following considerations must be made: If the unlawful act is imagined as non-existent, the result, for which the question of criminal liability has been raised, would sometimes not have occurred; at other times it would have occurred in exactly the same way. The question of causation is usually clear in such cases. But there are also cases which fall in between, where the difference is that the result would have occurred at another time, at another place, or at least in another way. If A had not killed B, he would nevertheless have died sooner or later; he might even have been suffering from an incurable disease. This fact can be taken into consideration in the law of torts, because damages are assessed so as to coincide precisely with the difference in interest.[1] If damages are to be paid to the survivors for the loss of the person who supported them, the sum will not be computed on the theory that the deceased would have lived forever. The computation must be based upon his life expectancy; if he was fatally ill, the compensation would be nil. This principle of the difference in interest is not carried to its ultimate conclusion even in the law of torts. Funeral expenses, for example, must either be paid fully or not at all. And if a person has been killed, or an object has been destroyed or damaged, the total liability will usually be placed on the perpetrator, even if it is clear that other causes would have produced the same result and the act in question had not been committed. If I set fire to a house, common tort doctrine will require me to pay full compensation, even if the entire town is destroyed the next week by an earthquake.

The situation is different in penal law. The Penal Code speaks about one who causes another's death, but not about one who accelerates the death of another, or who brings about his death at another place or in another manner than would otherwise have been the case. It speaks about one who destroys or damages another person's property, not about one who merely brings about a change in the mode of destruction. A choice must therefore be made; the change must either be considered a cause leading to criminal liability for murder, or for destruction of property, or there must be a complete acquittal (or, in felony-cases, punishment for attempt). The main rule must be that every substantial change as to time, place or method, is deemed sufficient to constitute a causal relationship. It does not help the perpetrator to show that other causes would have interfered had he not committed the act. One who shoots and kills a traveller who is on the way to the airport is guilty of murder even though the plane on which the deceased was to depart crashes, leaving no survivors. This follows from a natural interpretation of the penal provision. It is directed against one who causes another's death, and this the murderer has done. Similarly, one who has set fire to a house has undoubtedly destroyed or damaged it (Penal Code, § 291), even though it is quite clear that it would have burned down anyway for other reasons. This issue was faced squarely in a case in the German Reichsgericht. While a house was on fire, the defendants had set fire to other parts of the house. It was clear that the house would have burned down anyway, but the defendants were nevertheless convicted of causing damage. This result would also have been reached under Norwegian law. Whether the fact that the fire was already burning should be taken into consideration in determining whether the damage is "substantial," is another question which may be of importance for the classification of the vandalism as "serious" (§ 292). Since the house was doomed at the time the act was committed, the damage was really nil from an economic point of view.

Conceivably the change created by the act may be so insignificant that it would be unnatural to give it any legal relevance. If an error by a doctor or nurse shortens the life of a dying person by a few minutes or seconds, the error would hardly be punished as negligent manslaughter; on the other hand, when the acceleration is substantial, the fact that death was inevitable will constitute no defense. In many cases, one is faced with a question of opinion, where the condition theory gives no single answer.

The following hypotheticals may serve as illustrations: (1) the mother of a new-born baby places it out in the cold, and it freezes to death. The post-mortem shows that the child was asphyxiated and would probably have died from a lack of respiration if the mother had placed it in a warm bed immediately after birth. The cold air acted as a stimulant and set the respiration in motion. By exposing the child to death by freezing, the mother saved it from suffocation. She is no doubt liable for completed child murder. In reality, only the danger to which she has exposed the child has had a chance to work, not the danger of suffocation. The fact that the act on which liability rests has warded off another danger is not an exculpating circumstance. (2) A person is about to bleed to death after an accident. Another person comes to his aid and prevents him from bleeding to death by stopping the flow of blood, but he negligently uses a dirty bandage which causes an infection leading to death. He is guilty of negligent homicide. (3) A local anesthetic must be given to a child who is to undergo surgery. The doctor mistakenly uses cocain instead of novocain as the anesthetic. The child dies while still under the anesthetic, but experts can prove that novocain would also have caused death because of a hidden constitutional defect in the child. In this example, which is taken from a German case,[1] the result would have been an acquittal. A causal connection between the act and the harm is not sufficient; there must also be a causal connection between the fault and the harm. The process, of course, would not have been absolutely the same if the correct method had been used, but the difference is nevertheless so small that the result must be regarded as legally equivalent. (4) The same is true for the following example: A motorist drives with defective brakes. A child runs across the road, the driver is unable to slow down, and the child is run over. Expert testimony reveals, however, that it would have been impossible to avoid the accident even with proper brakes.

IV. Harm inflicted by several persons

We shall now assume that more than one person is charged with responsibility for the same harm.

The usual case is where several persons have acted jointly. If A, B and C, acting together according to a common plan, assault and kill a fourth person, they are all responsible for the murder, and not merely the one who struck the fatal blow. And if one of them argues that the other two would have managed as well without his help, this will not free him from criminal liability for the murder. The situation is considered a joint act for which all participants are liable. The solution would probably have been the same even if the law had directed itself only against the one who causes the death of another. But, as a security device, the law, in its provisions against homicide, assault, vandalism, etc., has expressly mentioned complicity besides causation. A person can be penalized as an accomplice even though his participation was not necessary to the result. We shall return to this question under the theory of complicity. (See below, §§ 31–32.)

Even in the absence of such intentional cooperation, there are times when the condition criteria fail.[2]

(a) One example is the concurrence of independent causes. A and B, independent of each other, both give a fatal dose of poison to the victim. Two factories lie on a river, and emit refuse into the water; the refuse of each is enough to pollute the water (compare Penal Code, § 398). A gives a sedative to a railroad signalman, but before it begins to take effect, the signalman is assaulted by B, who ties his legs and hands. When the signalman is supposed to perform his duties, he is both unconscious and tied up, and a train accident occurs. In these instances, either act could be imagined absent, and the result would nevertheless occur.

According to the condition theory, neither A nor B would have caused the damage. The events, of course, have not occurred in precisely the same way as they would have if only one of the causes had been present, but there is not such a substantial difference as would normally be required. Common sense would rather treat it as the existence of a double set of causes; thus there are two explanatory reasons, each of which alone would suffice. And there can be no doubt that both must be held liable. This is quite obvious as far as the liability to pay damages is concerned: one who is damaged cannot be left without legal remedy merely because there were two persons involved in the causation of the damage. The same must hold true in penal law. To punish for attempt in such cases would be artificial, and for misdemeanors and negligent felonies, the result would have to be an absolute acquittal, because here—as a rule—attempt is not punishable. As a prerequisite, both causes must have been operative: if only one of them accomplished the result, liability for completed murder will attach only to that cause. A administers a deadly poison to the victim, but before the poison has had time to take effect, B kills the dying person with an axe. A can be punished for attempted murder, but B will be punished for murder.

It is possible that A's act, instead of coinciding with that of B, coincides with a natural phenomenon of some other event for which no one can be held responsible. In the example of the signalman who was given a sedative, suppose that before the sedative began to take effect, a flood destroyed a bridge which he had to cross in order to perform his functions. At the critical moment he is unconscious, but under no circumstances would he have been able to perform his duties.

In such instances, the better reasoning would probably not hold A liable for inflicting the harm. Logically it might appear difficult to distinguish the coincidence of two attributable acts from that of one attributable act and one act of nature. However, there is this difference, that in the latter group of cases the damage would have occurred even though no unlawful act had been committed at all. This argument is especially applicable where the damage question is involved. When two attributable acts coincide, the conditio sine qua non requirement must be disregarded, since it is obvious that compensation must be paid even though there are two persons involved in the causation of the damage. When the attributable act coincides with an act of nature, however, it is natural to reason that the act has not caused any greater damage than would have occurred in any case, and that compensation therefore should not be paid. There is hardly any reason to require a different solution in penal law. But where an intentional felony is involved, its perpetrator may of course be punished for attempt.

(b) Another combination is that which has been designated as excess of causes. Suppose that five grams of poison is needed to kill a person. The victim's wife, the cook, and the chambermaid, not acting in concert, give him three grams each, for the purpose of killing him. None of the causes is sufficient in itself to produce death, but there is such an excess of them that one cause could be excluded without changing the result. Here, each individual must be deemed to have full criminal liability, even though the condition criteria have not been fulfilled.

(c) A third combination is also possible: two causal elements work together; one could have produced the effect by itself, the other could not have done so. The man who needed five grams of poison to die is given six grams by his wife and, independently, three grams by the cook. According to the condition criteria, the former has caused the death, not the latter. It seems more natural, however, to say that both participated in the causation, although in varying degrees.[1]

Such concurrences of unlawful and independent acts as we have mentioned (a–c) have little practical importance.

At times it is quite clear that either A or B has caused the harmful result, but it may be uncertain which one of them did. Both A and B have shot at the victim, but he was hit by only one bullet, and it is impossible to determine from whose gun it came. Whether such an evidentiary doubt should lead to joint liability of A and B in the law of torts has often been discussed.[1] In penal law it is clear that the benefit of the doubt, here as always, must be given to the accused. As previously mentioned, if A and B have cooperated in the effort to kill C, they will both be deemed guilty. But, if they have acted independently of each other, as in the case above, they can be punished only for attempted murder.

V. The theory of adequate causation

The chain of events can develop so fortuitously that a comparatively innocent act may lead to drastic consequences. The question then arises, within both the law of torts and the penal law, whether liability extends as far as the causal connection. Already Orsted held that there had to be a reasonable connection between the unlawful act and the harm.[2]

The German author von Kries created the expressions adequate and inadequate causal connection, which have become common in modern theory. In one practical and important situation the requirement of adequate cause has obtained legal recognition and has at the same time been defined somewhat more precisely (Penal Code, § 43; see below). Aside from this provision, there is no express legal authority to limit liability to adequate consequences, but the idea has been approved by most authors. With respect to the precise meaning of the concept, however, we have not come much further than Orsted's requirement of a reasonable connection.[3]

An analysis of what is meant by the requirement of adequacy can be divided into two parts. First, the act must entail a certain risk of harm; it must have a certain general causative capability. Secondly, the danger must have been produced in a fairly normal manner. The following presentation concerns only the penal law and not the law of torts, where the problems are somewhat different, partly because subjective guilt does not play such a great role there as it does in the penal law, partly because the rules are less determined by written law, and partly because the law of torts deals with economic damage, while the penal law, as a rule, is concerned with liability for certain concrete harms, such as death and bodily injury.

1. I shall first discuss the requirement of the act's causative capability. This requirement has little significance in penal law as an independent condition of liability. The necessary limitation is generally to be found in the requirement of subjective guilt. If the act itself creates no risk of harm, then there is neither intent nor negligence in the event some harm should actually occur because of unforeseen circumstances. I stop a person on the street and speak to him; when he moves on, a falling brick hits him on the head. I persuade my uncle to take a cruise; the ship hits a mine and sinks with all hands aboard. Had I not interfered with the course of events, the other person would have escaped the accident. But I obviously cannot be held liable for these results.

However, an intent to harm may exist even though the risk is very small. The reason why I persuade my uncle to take the cruise is precisely that I hope he will die by an accident so that I will inherit his estate. Even though my wish actually comes true, I cannot be punished for murder. And, what is equally important from a practical point of view, I cannot be found guilty of attempted murder if the hope is not fulfilled. In such cases, freedom from liability follows from the fact that I have not committed an unlawful act. I am within the area of permitted and free action, where no one questions any motions (compare below, § 14, V).

[3] The most recent complete exposition of the adequacy concept is given by A. Vinding Kruse, in (1951) Tidsskrift for Rettsvitenskap, pp. 321–425. He considers mainly the law of torts, but cites also the basic propositions of Orsted and von Kries. See also Carl Bonnevie, Adekvanslæren og beslektede rettsfelter (Oslo, 1942), and, especially for the penal law, Skeie, Den norske straffelov, I. pp. 129–135 (2nd Ed., Oslo, 1946).

But suppose that I induced him to take the trip by giving him false information. Then there exist both an unlawful act and an intent as to the consequences. If the risk is as small as it usually is under normal cruise conditions, I would hardly be sentenced for murder anyway (or even attempted murder). Here the adequacy concept comes into play. When the danger is so small that in practice it is not taken into account, the accidental result will be considered inadequate, even though a particular individual may have taken it into account. (The solution will be different if I knew of certain dangers, such as a plot to sink the ship, or the fact that it is not seaworthy.) The result must be legally justified on the ground that the law's threat of punishment against one who "causes a person's death" cannot reasonably be interpreted to include such peculiar "acts of homicide." Not only will the degree of probability be considered, but also the nature of the act itself. If a person shoots at another with intent to kill, he cannot hope for an acquittal even if the distance between them is so great that there is very little likelihood of hitting the victim. If he misses, he will be guilty of attempt; if he hits and kills, he will be guilty of murder.

These are theoretical problems of little practical significance. However, the requirement of adequacy is of more importance in relation to those offenses where the punishment may be increased because of unintentional consequences. A typical example is Penal Code, § 228, on assault, which substantially increases the punishment where the act results in death, or harm to body or health. The assault itself must be intentional, but the effect giving rise to increased punishment need not be. (If the effect is intended, then the act is either intentional causing of bodily harm (Penal Code, § 229) or intentional homicide (Penal Code, § 233). Penal Code, § 43, states that the increased punishment in such cases applies only "where the offender could have foreseen the possibility of such a consequence" or "where in spite of his ability to do so, he has failed to prevent such a consequence after having become aware of the danger." For further details, see below, § 21, III, 2.

Unforeseen course of events

2. It may happen that the act is inherently dangerous, but that the damage occurs in a strange or unforeseen way. A shoots at B for the purpose of killing him; he misses, but B's fear causes a fatal heart attack. Should A be punished for murder or merely for attempted murder? A is working with explosives in a grossly negligent manner, causing an explosion; B is hit by a stone fragment and receives a small injury but, since he is a bleeder, the flow of blood cannot be stopped, and he dies. Can A be punished for negligent homicide or merely for his careless conduct? (Penal Code, § 352.) B is injured by a reckless driver. The injury is not fatal, but it necessitates an operation, and B dies during the narcosis. Has the driver of the car negligently caused B's death?

Such a deviation from the normal course of events is generally not a defense to a criminal charge. If A has tried to kill B and has succeeded, it is difficult to see any reason why he should be punished only for attempt, merely because the course of events was not the anticipated one. The same is true in the negligence cases: a person has negligently caused danger to human life, and human life has actually been lost as a result of his act; there is hardly any reason to absolve him of criminal liability merely because it was difficult to foresee the precise manner in which the harm would occur. It may be argued that liability should not depend on mere chance. But the answer to this is that the difference between an attempt and a completed crime depends precisely on the chance of the result having occurred. For negligent felonies (and misdemeanors), the same chance determines the entire question of liability. If the harmful result does not materialize, the perpetrator benefits from that fact; if it does materialize, he must be held liable.

The damage has no connection with the inherent danger of the act. Nevertheless, this principle cannot be followed completely. Von Kries mentions the following example in one of his treatises.[1] A coachman falls asleep and his horse takes the wrong road; a bolt of lighting strikes and kills the passenger.

The coachman's act has been negligent; if the horse and coach had fallen into a ditch, he would have been responsible for any injury to the passenger. And had the coachman taken the correct route, the passenger would not have been hit by the lightning. So far the causal connection is clear. The general sense of justice nevertheless rebels against convicting him of negligent homicide (or imposing upon him the obligation of compensating the survivors). The harm here has no connection with the danger inherent in the act. It could just as easily have happened that the passenger was saved from the lightning because of the detour. There is a great difference between this example and the previous ones where, despite the uncalculated course of events, it was nevertheless the dangers inherent in the act which were realized.

Remote and indirect causal connection. These cases in which the harm has no connection with the inherent dangers of the act are clear. In practice, however, one would probably go somewhat further and exclude criminal liability even where there is a certain connection between the harm caused and the danger inherent in th act. Exampl 1: A, with intent to kill, strikes B on the head with an axe. B recovers from the assault, but becomes somewhat deaf because of the blow. Later, but before A has been brought to court, B is hit by a car and killed because he did not hear the sound of the horn. If A had not attacked B, the latter would still be alive; thus, there is a connection between the assault and the death. A powerful blow on the head creates a certain danger of impairing one's hearing, and diminished hearing leads to increased risk in traffic. Thus, there could also be said to be a general connection between the assault and the fatal accident. Nevertheless, A would most probably be convicted only of attempted homicide. Example 2: A woman is hit by a negligent driver and is seriously injured. She is recovering well but is still depressed when one day she sees her mutilated face in the mirror, and becomes so despondent over her lost beauty that she commits suicide. The motorist will probably not be found guilty of negligent homicide.

The foreseeability of events is hardly any less in these cases than in others where liability will be imposed. But the damage is remote and indirect. In English law there is a doctrine that remote causes cannot lead to liability. Such a rule cannot be set up under Norwegian law, but the remoteness of the causal connection can nevertheless be significant. In particular, where some time has elapsed after a damaging act, so that the situation has become stabilized (example 1), and then a new independent cause comes into play and brings about new consequences, the latter cause will dominate the picture so completely that it would be felt unnatural to extend the liability for the first act so far as to cover the consequences of the intervening act.

Older theory sometimes held that legally the causal connection is severed when the result is due to an intervening free act which breaks into the chain of events and which is due to the victim himself or to an independent third person (see example 2).[1] The proposition that only the person who commits the last act is liable for the further consequences cannot be accepted in its absolute form. But the obvious essence of this theory is that it is often felt unnatural to stretch liability for the first act that far; the intervening act is the one which dominates the picture of causation.

The requirement of adequacy as a safety valve. The requirement of adequacy may be regarded as a safety valve, which permits a judge to exclude a liability which he does not consider reasonable. Not only will the degree of probability be emphasized in attempting to solve the problem, but also such other factors as the degree of guilt, the closeness of the causal connection, and the nature of the surrounding circumstances.

Terminological and systematical questions. Terminologically, the adequacy concept can be expressed in various ways. It can be said that only adequate causal connection is causal connection within the meaning of the law. Or it can be said that, in addition to the requirement of causal connection, there is this further requirement that the connection be adequate. The first expression is closer to the words of the law. For aside from those examples which are dealt with in Penal Code, § 43, the limits of liability must be determined by a natural interpretation of the individual penal provision and not by any ready-made theory of adequacy. The question here as elsewhere in the doctrine of causation, is this: What connections does the law require when it uses the terms "to cause," "to bring about," "to injure," "to destroy" and so on.[1] In newer jurisprudence it has often been said that the older theories of legal causation mix together the concepts of causation and adequacy. This reproach is not justified.

To sort out in one special chapter the problems which are treated in this section (V) may have its advantages from a systematic and terminological point of view. But a certain danger is bound to exist when one operates with the concept of adequacy as something which is given a priori, and which is added on to the individual descriptions of the acts, while in fact this concept should be found in an inductive way, based on an interpretation of the different provisions.

Causation in the Law

Part III—The Continental Theories

XVI—Individualizing Theories and Theory of Conditions (Bedingungstheorie)

In this and the next chapter we examine some of the more prominent theories of causation propounded on the continent. The interest of doing so, from the point of view of the student of the common law, may lie in learning how the causal problems with which he is familiar appear to lawyers who do not share his empirical outlook and who view legal concepts against the background of systematic philosophy. In order to emphasize the difference of approach we touch only lightly on the views of those, such as the French writers, who distrust systems and tolerate inconsistencies, and concentrate instead on the German language writers who have invented and systematized the main theories.[2] Their work has been elaborated by writers in other European countries and in Latin American and accepted by the courts in many of these countries. On the other hand we have attempted to make the theories more intelligible by citing freely from the decisions of the courts which purport to apply them. Most of the theories were designed to meet the problems of criminal law in the first place and, accordingly, the reader will find a greater emphasis on these problems and on the decisions of criminal courts than we would expect in a discussion of causation in the common law.

The expression 'theories of causation' is used because the writers with whom we are dealing do not regard an inquiry into causal principles in principle different from an attempt to construct a scientific theory. In our view this is a mistake; the 'theories' are in fact conceptual, not empirical investigations. But the use of the word is inveterate and it would distort the views of continental writers to present them as if they purported to give an analysis of the meaning or use of 'cause' in the law.

Unlike the Anglo-American writers who have made piecemeal contributions to the study of causation, continental jurists have not hesitated to apply to the law philosophical doctrines of considerable complexity.[3] Indeed some German writers have sought to identify the legal notion of cause either with Kant's doctrine, embodied in the statement that 'everything which occurs presupposes some other thing upon which it follows in accordance with a rule'[4] or with Mill's doctrine of a cause as a complex of conditions invariably followed by a given type of consequence. Von Kries on the other hand constructed on the basis of a philosophical theory about the nature of probability

[1] Very much in point are those Danish decisions in which the accused is acquitted of negligent homicide because the causal connection is too remote, and in which it is said that the death is not deemed "to have been caused in such a way" as the provision on negligent homicide requires (see Hurwitz, Den danske kriminalret, pp. 252–253 (Copenhagen, 1952)).

[3] This applies primarily to those writing in German and to a lesser extent to those writing in Italian, Spanish, and Dutch. The French contributions, on the other hand, are decidedly empirical, perhaps more so than the English. a theory of causation[1] specially adapted for use by lawyers. Other writers have distinguished the legal and philosophical notions of cause and have pointed, in particular, to the fact that the law is not primarily concerned with explanation[2] but rather with fixing the limits of responsibility; yet even those writers who refuse to identify the legal and philosophical notions of cause are influenced by systematic philosophy to a far greater extent than are Anglo-American writers.

One corollary of this is that the continental writers are reluctant to admit that common sense or the ordinary use of causal expressions outside the law is a reliable guide for the lawyer.[3] To this von Kries and the adequacy theorists form a partial exception, for they considered that the causal judgments of the ordinary man confusedly reflected the fact that the alleged case had or had not 'increased the objective probability' of the consequence.[4] A second corollary is that, despite the profusion of different 'causal' expressions to be found in the codes[5] the writers on the whole treat 'causal connexion' as a uniform and unvarying element in legal responsibility.[6]

Generalizing and Individualizing Theories

The fundamental distinction recognized by continental theorists is between those theories which recognize that every particular casual statement is implicitly general, in the sense that its truth is dependent on the truth of some general statement of regularities, and those theories which do not recognize this. Theories of the first kind are known as 'generalizing theories'; those of the second kind as 'individualizing theories'. To English readers, who have had the benefit of Hume's and Mill's analyses of causation and a long empirical tradition in philosophy, an individualizing theory which completely divorces the notion of causation from causal generalizations or laws may seem strange; literally taken, such theories seem to insist that there is a quality of 'being a cause' or 'being causally efficacious' which inheres in or belongs to particular acts or events and perhaps also to omissions, so that, just as a blow may have the quality or attribute of being heavy, so it may have the quality or attribute of being a cause or being causally efficient. On this view the causal quality or efficacy of a particular action or event is primary, not a feature derived from the fact that it is an instance of a kind of event believed to be regularly or generally connected with an event of some other kind. There is, however, still some merit in these theories as a reminder that the claim, characteristic of the British empiricists, that the whole meaning of causal connexion is to be found in the notion of regular sequence is mistaken. We have seen that the circumstances of individual cases have much to do with the distinction between causes and mere conditions.[7]

As their name suggests, the generalizing theories insist that, if a particular act or event is a cause of something, its status as a cause is derived from the fact that it is of a kind believed to be generally connected with an event of some other kind.

The individualizing theories themselves divide into two main types: the first of these, 'necessity' theories, insist not only that 'being a cause' is an intrinsic attribute of particular events, but that if an event is genuinely a cause it nec- essarily produces its effect because of its own nature, because 'it is what it is in itself'.[1] A 'mortal' wound[2] is a cause of death necessarily; for if it did not cause death, it would not be a mortal wound. Perhaps the only plausibility which this theory has is due to its failure to distinguish between two senses of the dangerous word 'necessity'. The meaning of 'mortal' may be so defined that as a matter of logic nothing shall count as a mortal wound if death does not result; but this incorporation of a causal relation into the meaning of a general expression does not show the causal relation to be a necessary one or more than an instance of a regular sequence.

The second type of individualizing theory is the 'efficiency' theory. This also insists that the relationship between a particular cause and its effect is not derived from their status as instances of a regularity; but differs from the necessity theory in allowing that events may possess causal efficacy in varying degrees or proportions. A cause, to be a cause, must, as a particular act or event, be efficient; but the concurrence of several factors may be required to contribute the 'causal energy' needed for the production of an effect. This strange terminology, like the English metaphors of varying causal 'potency' which are its counterparts, is an attempt to analyse the concept of causation in terms of the most familiar case: that of a moving thing causing another to move. Like all extensions of a single case to the whole field, it fails mainly because it provides no criteria for determining the existence of the property of causal efficiency or the measurement of its varying degrees.

Between the individualizing and generalizing theories we must place the continental variant of the doctrine of the equivalence of conditions, the 'theory of conditions'.[3] Some have adopted this doctrine in the form that any necessary condition is entitled to be called a cause; others in the form that the word 'cause' is reserved for the totality of all necessary conditions. It might well be thought that this theory should be classed with the generalizing theories on the ground that a condition X can only be shown to be a necessary condition of an occurrence Y by appeal to general laws showing that Y never occurs without X. But most German theorists have thought that the classification of a condition as necessary can be made, without recourse to known generalizations,[4] by an appeal to the imagination.[5] The generalizing theories, of which the most important is the 'adequate cause' theory, make contact with modern ideas of probability. According to the adequate cause theory, which is widely received by civil courts on the continent, a contingency is for legal purposes a cause of harm if it increases the probability of the occurrence of harm of that sort.[6] The generalizing theories accord with the principles we have extracted from common sense in their insistence both on the essential connexion in the central case between particular causal statements and certain generalizations and on the importance of the contrast between normal and abnormal conditions.

Lastly there is one curious strand in German philosophical thought in connexion with human action that demands attention. Most thinkers rigidly adhere to the view that in considering whether a human actor has caused harm only the actor's physical movements may be regarded as relevant, not his state of mind: once it is found that such movements were the cause of harm the question whether the act was deliberate, mistaken, or accidental is relevant only to the question of fault or mens rea. 'The disposition of the will can add nothing to and take nothing that the existence of the act and its causal property'.[7] This view is a reflection of the sharp distinction made by Kant between imputation (Zurechnung) and causation,[8] and is based on the identification of causation with physical processes.

Sometimes this identification is expressed in the aphorism 'Kausalitat ist blind, Finalitat sehend'. Their emphasis on this identification prevents German writers from recognizing that in causal inquiries it is sometimes illuminating to cite voluntary conduct, sometimes conduct which is less than fully voluntary and sometimes mere physical movements as the cause of an event.[1] Much depends on the context. In some contexts physical movements described as such are appropriately cited as the cause of harm; a doctor may cite a sudden movement as the cause of a heart attack. In other contexts the search for an explanation, quite apart from considerations of fault, may make an answer in terms of some person's deliberate act the appropriate answer to the question what was the cause of the harm; e.g. the deliberate act of the deceased in swallowing poison, as opposed to his mistakenly swallowing poison administered by another.

We proceed, after an historical introduction, to analyse in detail the two most important theories, the theory of conditions and the adequacy theory.

I. Individualizing Theories of Causation

Causation has been intensively discussed by continental lawyers for the last 150 years. Whereas in the Anglo-American world one can point only to Leon Green's Rationale of Proximate Cause as a comprehensive study of the subject, on the continent dozens of books have been published dealing solely or substantially with causation, and numerous theories and variants of theories have been propounded. Some observers have thought that this torrent of speculation and systematization has produced only a weiter of fruitless and confusing abstractions[2] and that the problem would be better left to the unfettered discretion of the judge.[3] Nevertheless, the German courts and, to a varying extent, the courts of other European countries, have adopted and adhered to one of the main theories: most criminal courts adopt the theory of conditions while civil courts adopt the adequacy of some similar theory.

'Necessary' Causes

At the beginning of the nineteenth century lawyers generally took the view that a cause in law meant a 'necessary' cause in the sense that, given the alleged cause, the alleged consequence necessarily followed[4] by virtue of an intrinsic property of the alleged cause. This was applied particularly to the law of homicide and a distinction was drawn between mortal and non-mortal wounds.[5] If the accused gave a mortal wound and the victim died he had caused death in the legal sense but not if he gave a non-mortal wound and the victim died through the concurrence of gangrene, unskilful treatment, or some other intervening factor.

This view was unduly favourable to the accused and depended on the notion that lethality was an attribute inherent in some wounds and not others. It was criticized by Stubel[6] with those works the scientific discussion of causation in the legal sphere really began. Stubel and later Kostlin[7] pointed out that human experience did not provide any examples of 'necessary' causes and the law did not, in order to establish causal connexion, require that the act under consideration should have been 'necessary or even sufficient, predominant, or indispensable in the circumstances'.[8] On the contrary each act presupposes, in order to achieve its effect, a number of external circumstances and conditions as subsidiary causes; only the sum of all subjective and objective conditions can together be considered as the cause of the effect in the sense of being indispensable[9] in the circumstances.

[1] This range of possible cases was perhaps overlooked by Lord Sumner in Samuel v. Dumas, [1924] A.C. 431, 462, where he decided that the cause of the scuttling of a ship was not the voluntary act of the master and crew who scuttled it but the entry of the sea-water. The majority of the House of Lords thought otherwise.

[9] But this is a muddle, for though the totality of all such conditions may have been together sufficient to produce the consequence one cannot conclude that the totality was indispensable in the circumstances, since there may have been another such set present on the same occasion. Above, Chap. V, p. 116.

According to Stubel the contrast between 'necessary' and 'accidental' or 'coincidental'[1] had no place in the law, whilst Kostlin wished to retain a distinction between what was coincidental in itself and coincidental only from the standpoint of the actor (i.e. unforeseen).[2] These writers were feeling their way towards certain distinctions which have been made explicit in more recent discussion.[3] On the one hand, even if a set of conditions of a certain kind were always followed by a given consequence this would not justify the conclusion that the conditions 'necessarily' produce the consequence by virtue of a special causal property. Secondly, it is very seldom possible to assert that a certain consequence always follows upon a single earlier condition. Clearly it does not in cases of 'intellectual origination'[4] or psychological influence; when one person is influenced by the promptings, suggestions, or threats of another it is by no means always true that he would always be influenced by the same threat, &c., in the same way. Similarly, in relation to natural events, a revolver shot in the shoulder may cause death on a particular occasion although such a shot is not always followed by death. The example of a mortal wound might seem to be to the contrary, but a wound is called 'mortal' (in one sense of the word)[5] only because it is nearly certain that counteracting conditions which would avert death will be absent. In general, the most that can be asserted of a single condition is that it is frequently followed by a given event.[6]

When the concept of a single condition, necessarily followed by a particular consequence, fell into discredit, legal science did not at once transfer its allegiance to the notion of a condition frequently or usually followed by a particular consequence. Instead a number of individualizing theories developed.[7] These are of the sort with which Anglo-American lawyers are familiar.

'Efficient' and similar causes[8]

The most important, perhaps, is the theory which treats as the cause of an event the efficient or the most efficient condition.[9] This theory is generally termed metaphysical[10] since it is said to have its roots in the Aristotelian concept of an efficient cause[11] or source of motion and, perhaps it is not unfair to add, is incapable of translation into literal terms, or at any rate into non-mechanical terms. The chief exponent of this theory was Birkmeyer[12] who argued that a certain quantity of energy attached to each condition of an event and that by 'cause' the law meant that condition to which the greatest quantity attached and which therefore made the greatest contribution to the result. In the event of equally great contributions made by two or more acts each might be regarded as a cause and so punishable. But the quantity of energy could not be exactly measured and 'the judge in determining the causal quality of a concrete event may decide in accordance with his full and unfettered discretion'.[13]

This theory had obvious metaphysical attractions while seeming to escape some of the difficulties of the necessity theory. It also claimed support from introspection, since it is asserted that we know from our own experience that some conditions are 'more efficient' than others and from that can infer, by the use of sympathy and understanding, that the experience of others is the same.[14] Children and primitive people, it is argued, naturally explain events in terms of substances and attribute greater or less force or activity to different substances, animate or inanimate.[1] But even if we are acquainted from introspection with degrees of causal efficiency this would not, in the minds of mature persons, justify the extension of the concept by analogy to animals or plants, still less to natural occurrences, with which the law is often concerned.[2]

Of von Buri's criticisms of Birkmeyer two are of particular importance and may be said to have led to the defeat of the individualizing school. The first is that, on Birkmeyer's own admission, no precise criteria can be given for the distinction between efficient and non-efficient causes and the decision must therefore be left to the discretion of the judge.[3] Birkmeyer gives some examples of efficient causes but does not further justify their characterization as such; he treats their efficiency as self-evident.

Secondly, so far as the notion of efficiency can be literally applied, it is not clear, argues von Buri, that the law does accept this criterion. For instance, in a case of participation in crime the principal may have pulled the trigger while the accessory stood by motionless keeping watch; yet accessory and principal are both held to have caused the state of affairs which is proscribed by the criminal law (Tatbestand),[4] the 'relative intensity with which their will has been expressed'[5] and so the relative 'efficiency' of their acts is taken into account only for purposes of punishment. To accommodate such cases Birkmeyer was obliged to distinguish between 'causing' and 'providing the occasion'[6] or 'influencing',[7] for he held, consistently with his general theory, that a free human decision could not be caused.[8] These points are indeed well taken and important,[9] but his theory suffered in German eyes from its failure, as compared with von Buri's, to provide a unified theory of causation for the criminal law.

Birkmeyer further held that an efficient cause may be interrupted in its operation, as when a mortally wounded man is struck by lightning, but failed to give a clear elucidation of the notion of interruption. In view of these defects and criticisms the notion of an efficient cause was eclipsed by the theory of conditions. In Germany it has not been resuscitated, though in Italian civil law[10] it is still preferred by some to the adequacy theory and its terminology makes an occasional reappearance when a writer or judge is momentarily caught off his guard.

Birkmeyer's theory is in fact not without its merits. A more literal account of the notion of the comparative efficiency of different conditions of the same event could be given in terms of the more or less dangerous character of the various conditions, and one factor in determining this would be the greater or less frequency with which they would be followed by harm of a defined sort.[11] In theory at least numerical values could be assigned to represent the frequency of the harm occurring given each condition, and the condition most frequently followed by harm would often be selected as the most dangerous and so as the cause. However, such a reconstructed theory of efficient causes would cease to be an individualizing theory,[12] since what is likely to happen can be ascertained only by reference to what happens or would happen on an average if a large number of examples were taken with a known basic condition in common, other conditions remaining unknown in advance in each particular case. But a theory based on likelihood encounters in turn a number of serious objections which we consider later in connexion with the adequacy theory.

Many nineteenth-century writers besides Birkmeyer adhered to one of the individualizing theories, most of which are variants of his. They held that the cause of an event was that condition which could be described as the principal or most 'active' condition,[1] or as sufficient in itself to produce the event,[2] or, refining Birkmeyer's mechanics, the condition which is decisive in the sense of 'tilting the balance between forces in a state of equilibrium',[3] or of 'changing the direction of events',[4] or releasing 'potential energy' and supplying a driving force.[5] There is a striking similarity between such metaphors and those used by Anglo-American lawyers. The natural tendency of such theories is to select the event nearest in time to the alleged consequence as its cause. This view was adopted by Ortmann with the qualification that the cause must be the act of a free agent other than the injured party, 'free' being taken in a wide sense as compatible with negligent or accidental conduct.[6] The efficiency theory, however, has been altogether rejected, except in such specialized branches of the law as marine or industrial insurance where the question of the cause of a loss or the scope of an occupational risk arises. Such exceptions have been explained on the ground that in marine and industrial insurance the law is mainly concerned with responsibility for the consequences of natural events rather than of human conduct. The concept of efficiency, it is held, can be applied to natural events, perhaps because things have a measurable motion even if it must be rejected for human conduct. Heavy seas have a greater causal 'value' than ordinary waves; but human conduct may upset their relative values, e.g. by blowing a hole in the hull of the ship so that ordinary waves become more 'efficient' than they would otherwise be.[7]

Even, however, if we take into account the continued fondness of the French civil courts for the expression cause generatrice,[8] it must be recognized that in the twentieth century the individualizing theories have suffered a decline.[9] This is in marked contrast with the continued popularity of the metaphors of 'potency', &c., with Anglo-American courts and, to a lesser extent, writers. Though some German writers regard the individualizing theories as more in accordance with common sense than other views and so in principle the only correctly conceived theories,[10] the vague character of commonsense judgments of causation and the obscure metaphors involved in the individualizing theories themselves have stood in the way of their acceptance. Hence those who, like Nagler, wish to revive the individualizing point of view introduce nowadays a different criterion of cause—viz. that only such conditions of an event as are socially reprehensible are in the legal sense causes:[11] thus only those road users who have contravened traffic regulations or customs can be regarded as having in law caused a road accident.

II. Rise of the Theory of Conditions (Bedingungstheorie)

The germ of the theory of conditions is perhaps contained in the notion versari in re illicita[12] applied in many systems of criminal law in the past and in quite modern times by the Spanish Supreme Court.[13] One who takes part in an illegal activity is responsible for all harm which would not have occurred but for his participation. But in its modern form the theory was first expounded by the Austrian writer Glaser.[14]

If one attempts wholly to eliminate in thought[15] the alleged author [of the act] [he says] from the sum of the events in question and it then appears that nevertheless the sequence of intermediate causes remains the same, it is clear that the act and its consequence cannot be referred to him . . . but if it appears that, once the person in question is eliminated in thought from the scene, the consequences cannot come about, or that they can come about only in a completely different way, then one is fully justified in attributing the consequence to him and explaining it as the effect of his activity.[1]

This is a way of expressing the idea that every sine qua non or necessary condition of an event is its cause. We leave for later consideration the sense in which 'condition' is here to be understood and note merely that it is characteristic of the continental theory of conditions to decide whether a condition is a sine qua non by a process of elimination in thought (hinwegdenken) or assimilation (hinzudenken). The continental formulation suggests that the existence of causal connexion depends on the imaginative power of the judge; this difficulty is avoided by the usual Anglo-American formulation, 'Would compliance with the law have averted the harm?'

Shortly after Glaser, von Buri in Germany adopted a similar view.[2] His arguments were strongly influenced by the mechanical analogies favoured by the supporters of the theory of efficient cause. It is in general impossible to distinguish the different parts of a consequence,[3] he argued; if three thieves each take 1,000 marks from a chest containing 3,000 marks, the loss is divisible but usually, for instance if three persons attack and kill a fourth, the harm is indivisible.[4] Hence we cannot say that the act of each has caused a part of the harm. Can we say that each has caused the whole harm? Von Buri takes the analogy of a mill. Suppose that a certain quantity of water is required to turn the mill-wheel and that one mill-pond provided four-fifths of this quantity, another one-fifth, it would nevertheless be correct to say that the water from each mill-pond was the cause of the wheel turning since each was equally necessary and neither would produce any effect without the other.

To Birkmeyer's objection that, if each condition is ineffective without the others, only the sum of all the conditions can be the cause of an event,[5] von Buri gave no convincing reply. Indeed no satisfactory answer to this objection can be given unless appeal is made to the common-sense contrast of cause and condition which lies outside the scope of such theories. Thus Tarnowski, who is aware of the difficulty, states the theory of conditions as follows: 'The theory of conditions takes as its starting-point the proposition that all conditions of a consequence, which cannot be eliminated in thought without eliminating the consequence also, are equivalent and therefore[6] each single one of these necessary conditions can be regarded as a cause of the consequence.' The 'therefore' hardly serves to conceal the non sequitur. The only arguments adduced to support this reasoning are that the legal concept of cause is not necessarily the same as the philosophical concept and that each condition is sufficient to produce the consequence provided that the other conditions are also present; each condition may be regarded as completing the set. But no reasons are given for borrowing some parts of the philosophical (i.e. Mill's) theory and omitting others.

Von Buri does not refer to Mill's writings. However, the theory of conditions soon became associated with Mill's name. Von Bar, a contemporary of von Buri, who held a different theory of causation, cites a long extract from Mill's Logic[7] dealing with the equivalence of conditions.[8] When the theory of conditions came to be accepted by continental criminal courts and writers, it was justified by the adoption of parts of Mill's philosophy rather than by von Buri's notion of the equal efficiency of conditions.[9]

The German Reichsgericht in its criminal division accepted the theory of conditions from the start. In a case decided in 1880 accused left a wine bottle containing a solution of arsenic on the windowsill and left the house, though she should have foreseen that her husband, addicted to drink, might taste it, which he did, with fatal consequences. She was convicted of negligent killing,[1] despite the intervening carelessness of the husband, since, 'without her act of putting in position and leaving the bottle of poison, the husband of the accused would not have been killed, hence the occurrence of the whole consequence was conditioned by this conduct on her part and therefore her conduct was fully causal'.[2] German criminal courts including the Bundesgerichtshof have with almost unbroken consistency adhered to this theory ever since and it has been adopted by the criminal courts of most other European countries, though the very extensive liability which would naturally follow from it has been limited by theories of fault or mens rea and unlawfulness.

Of the German writers who followed von Buri the most prominent exponents of the theory of conditions are von Liszt, Radbruch, Dohna, von Lilienthal, and Beling. The most recent writers on criminal law are, however, not nearly as whole-hearted in its support as the courts, for the theory of conditions makes causation an element of minor importance in criminal liability, reducing it to the issue of what American writers term 'cause-in-fact', with the result that matters which, from a common-sense viewpoint, turn on causation, have to be considered under another rubric, such as fault (mens rea) or unlawfulness. Hence even those writers who support the theory of conditions tend to introduce elements of the adequacy theory in some other part of the theory of criminal responsibility, or, like Antolisèi, to modify it by admitting exceptions, e.g. that if exceptional or very rare events have contributed to bring about the consequence the connexion between act and consequence is merely 'occasional', not causal.[3]

In civil law the theory of conditions has had very little success, courts preferring on the whole to make use of the adequacy theory or of the metaphors associated with the individualizing theories. Nevertheless, some notable writers, among whom the South African de Wet deserves particular mention,[4] have advocated it for civil law in view of its apparent simplicity and the ease with which it can be applied. It can further be argued in its favour that it reduces causation to a pure question of fact and is the only theory which avoids confusion with the requirement of fault.[5] It does, however, lead to a very complex theory of fault or unlawfulness,[6] designed to obviate the extension of responsibility beyond due limits.

III. The Notion of a Condition

We now deal in greater detail with the theory of conditions. There is a part of this theory which is common to it and the adequacy theory, viz. the analysis of the notion of a condition. Radbruch says that the theory of adequate cause starts from the same point as von Buri's theory, viz. the notion of a collective cause (or complex set of conditions) and the equivalence of all conditions.[7] Perhaps this is an overstatement, but at least the adequacy theory requires that every cause must first be a necessary condition of the consequence; it then accepts the equivalence of conditions in the sense that the only ground for distinguishing between them is derived from estimates of probability drawn from general statements of probabilities.

We consider first in what sense the theory of conditions understands 'a condition' and next what it says about equivalence.

We treat the notion of a condition under the following headings: (i) sets of conditions; (ii) the difficulty about omissions; (iii) the generalization (description) of the consequence; (iv) the generalization of the condition; (v) the procedure of elimination and substitution; (vi) additional and alternative causation; (vii) interpersonal transactions; (viii) proof in hypothetical inquiries.

(i) Sets of conditions. As we have seen, the conduct of the actor is usually stated to be a condition of a consequence, 'if once it is eliminated in thought, the consequence at once falls away'.[1] The procedure of elimination, however, presupposes that the condition being investigated may be a member of a complex set of conditions or collective cause.[2] Does such a set contain a limited or unlimited number of members? Sometimes it is suggested that the number is limited and the complete set theoretically enumerable: thus Grispigni objects to the view that exceptional conditions exclude liability because, he says, there is always some unforeseeable or exceptional condition of an event, but it may not amount to more than one-hundredth part of the causal complex.[3] This can meaningfully be said only if a complete count of the conditions is possible. But most writers agree that the conditions of an event are unlimited, at least if the negative conditions are included. The notion of the sum of the conditions of an event 'leads to infinity'.[4] For instance, it is a condition of the spread of a fire which could have been extinguished that A did not put it out, B did not put it out, &c., for an indefinite series of persons; hence it is impossible to state the whole set of conditions in a particular case.[5] This, however, is not really fatal to the procedure of elimination or to the notion of a necessary condition[6] since it is in many cases possible to state a limited number of positive conditions of an event which suffice to produce it in the absence of counteracting conditions,[7] and causal laws or natural laws do usually contain just such specifications of the positive conditions of events.[8] The absence of counteracting conditions may be treated for practical purposes as a single negative condition, and there is no need for the unattainable complete enumeration.

(ii) The difficulty about omissions. This difficulty has been felt more acutely in continental than in Anglo-American law. The objections to treating an omission as a cause apply equally to treating it as a condition; hence they are dealt with here. It is said of omissions that they (a) are nothing[9] and (b) are not movements.

If omissions are nothing, there seems no reason why they should figure even theoretically among the conditions of an event; it would actually be superfluous and pointless to mention them, for nothing would thereby be added to what is already known of the event. But in fact it is in many circumstances not pointless to mention an omission among the conditions of an event, for instance to mention that X, who was suffering from a disease of which he died, failed to consult a doctor. The explanation of this is that we sometimes know how to prevent a harmful occurrence though we may not know how it is caused. The theory that negative descriptions of conduct are nothing, coupled with the obvious fact that there is sometimes point in drawing attention to omissions, has led to heroic attempts to demonstrate that omissions are 'really' something, i.e. positive acts. To this end it has been said that omissions, though they have no existence in the physical world, exert a psychological influence.[10] It is true that sometimes, for instance, silence gives consent. If a husband keeps silent when his wife declares her intention to kill their child his omission to speak may encourage her to act and so exert a psychological influence. But this is not always true, even when human conduct is in question: a warder's omission to guard a lunatic, so that he escapes and does harm, does not exert a psychological influence on the lunatic, but merely provides him with an opportunity.[1] Still less does my omission to turn off a tap exert a psychological influence on the water which then floods my neighbour's property.

Another argument for assimilating omissions to positive acts is that a positive act precedes or accompanies the omission and it is this which is really the condition or cause of the event. Partly this merely reflects the familiar theory that a duty to act can only be based on a preceding act of the person subject to the duty, e.g. a doctor has a duty to attend a patient only if he has undertaken to do so, never merely because the patient needs attention; but this is inconsistent with positive law[2] and with ordinary usage. Another form of the same argument is that omissions to perform a duty, with which the law is mainly concerned, are themselves the consequences of positive acts, i.e. of the act of repressing the actor's inclination to perform the duty or of 'driving the possibility of having the inclination underground' so that it never, so to speak, comes to the surface.[3] This presupposes that consciousness of the duty is an essential condition of breach of duty, a doctrine which receives some support from legal writers[4] but would not account for those instances in ordinary usage where we speak of inadvertent omissions, e.g. when someone has failed to turn up at a meeting because he has forgotten the date of it. However, von Buri was prepared to cater for such cases of inadvertent omission on the theory that the positive act involved was busying oneself at the relevant time with other ideas and thereby preventing the consciousness of duty from obtruding itself.[5] But even if it is conceded that there always are some such psychological conditions of an omission they are not usually treated as acts: on the contrary they are contrasted with acts. Further, it is not the psychological antecedent which commonsense or law treats as significant, but the omission to perform the duty, which may have many and varying psychological antecedents.

Another attempt to view omissions as 'really' positive asserts that an omission is equivalent to the removal of an obstacle to the occurrence of a consequence;[6] such removal is itself positive. An 'obstacle' primarily refers to a factor which is known or assumed to be present and which would prevent a purpose from being achieved. If a warder fails to guard a lunatic, who then commits suicide, the warder's omission is indeed equivalent to the removal of an obstacle in the way of the lunatic's purposes; but an employer's failure to guard dangerous machinery is not naturally described as the removal of an obstacle to the workman's injury, since the workman does not intend to injure himself.

A related view is that an omission does not set causal laws in motion but removes an obstacle to their operation.[7] Not rescuing a drowning man removes an obstacle to the operation of the physical and physiological laws involved in drowning. The arguments we have just considered also apply to the use of 'obstacle' here. But partly this view reflects the belief that, since causal principles are usually stated in positive terms, they cannot incorporate negative descriptions, so that the apparently negative conditions must be shown to be 'really' positive. This is obviously a non sequitur.

Nevertheless, continental writers have continued to feel a difficulty about the causal status of omissions, and underlying this feeling is a genuine distinction between two types of knowledge, viz. knowledge of what will, in normal circumstances, produce a given result and knowledge of what will, in normal circumstances, prevent it. There is indeed a contrast between causing by intervening and by not preventing. The cases in which an omission is said to be a cause are mostly those in which the law requires precautions to be taken to prevent harm.

The argument that causation always involves movement has attracted some writers.[1] The objections to it were noted in Chapter II.[2]

(iii) Generalization (description) of the consequence. The continental writers speak of the generalization rather than of the description of a consequence. The problems which, under this name, have vexed continental theorists arise from the fact which we have had occasion to stress, that any particular may be classified under a number of different descriptions of different levels of specificity and only the context can determine which is appropriate for legal purposes. These problems have been the more acute because some writers appear to entertain the notion that there is in principle an ideal complete description of every event, which for the purposes of the law undergoes abstraction. The complete description is called the 'concrete description'.

Of what must a wrongful act be shown to be a necessary condition?[3] If we ask this in a case of homicide, we are first inclined to answer 'death', for homicide is unlawfully causing death; but if all men are mortal, no act can be a necessary condition of a man's death. Hence 'death' is too wide.[4] Suppose then we say that the act must be a condition of the particular death in all its details.[5] This at once appears too narrow, for if A when killed by B is wearing a coat sold him by C, C's act in selling him the coat is a necessary condition of A's death while wearing this coat: and his wearing this coat is one of the 'details' of his death.[6] Hence the writers make various attempts to steer a course between these two extremes.

Trager's test[7] was whether without the wrongful act the consequence would have been different from the point of view of legal appraisal. Bodily injury and death are two legally different categories; hence the act of the accused may be a condition of death, according to Trager's view, even if the deceased person would in any case have been wounded. Suppose, however, that B is attempting to wound C when A shouts. C turns towards A and so is wounded in the side, not in the back as he would otherwise have been. Is A's shout a necessary condition of C's wound? The legal category would be the same without his shout. Trager is in a difficulty, which he solves arbitrarily by making a distinction between the case where A intended a warning and where he intended to distract C's attention. He maintains that the shout is not a condition of the wound in the first case but is in the second, there being a special doctrine of the law relating to accessories that the slightest difference in the consequence is sufficient to make an act of assistance a condition and so to support a charge of aiding and abetting.

Trager also maintained that large differences in the time of death, wounding, &c., or in the seriousness of a wound were significant and entered into the description of the consequence, while small ones were neglected. But law and common sense agree that it is possible to kill a man who is certain to die very shortly:[8] a mortally wounded man may be murdered. To deal with cases of additional causation,[9] as when two men simultaneously shoot and kill a third, Trager introduced the argument that the consequence would not be the same without the act of one of the attackers, since death from one mortal wound is not the same as death from two mortal wounds; but this is to adopt arbitrarily, for a limited purpose, the view that a consequence must be described 'concretely' in all its details.

Radbruch argued that we must distinguish characteristics of the consequence which interest us from those which do not.[1] Only the interesting factors form part of the description of the consequence. Tarnowski's view is comparable; he asserts that the description depends on the nature and circumstances of the crime and that no general formula for all crimes is possible.[2] The question remains whether some closer guide to the interesting or relevant factors can be given.

M. L. Muller,[3] reacting against Trager's view, proposed a 'concrete' description of the consequence, at least so far as details of time and place are concerned; but he nevertheless regarded the fact that a broken vase was painted or the victim of a murder wearing a particular coat as irrelevant. The legal category was relevant, he maintained, to the description of the condition, not of the consequence. The Reichsgericht appeared to adopt his view in a case in which the accused was convicted of arson when he had set fire to part of a house already on fire;[4] it then appeared to adopt a different view in a case in which a doctor who administered cocaine instead of novocaine as an anaesthetic was acquitted of negligent killing, since the novocaine would probably also have led to death.[5]

None of these views is satisfactory since the difficulties spring from the fundamental defects of necessary condition as a test of causation. In general, the appropriate description of harm will be the description implied in the relevant legal rule (e.g. death). The fact that the harm may also be described in further detail ('in a red coat', 'on a Monday') is only of importance because a reference to some of this detail will be required to show that a particular unique instance of the legally proscribed harm has occurred. The fact that acts such as selling a red coat to the victim will be necessary conditions of the harm thus described is irrelevant. Moreover, in cases of additional and alternative causes the test of necessary condition must break down altogether unless supplemented by that of generally sufficient conditions.

Further, a theory of how consequences should be described for legal purposes may be made to embody special legal doctrines. Thus Hartmann[6] thinks that the 'way' in which the consequence occurs should be incorporated into its description: when a rail accident occurs because the signalman was drugged we should speak of the consequence not as a 'rail accident' but of a 'rail accident occurring because a signalman was drugged'; this ensures that the drugging of the signalman counts as a necessary condition of the accident and excludes the argument that it was not a condition because the signalman was also handcuffed independently of the drugging. But even if 'way' could be sufficiently defined.[7] Hartmann's view would be no more than an attempt to base responsibility on whether the actor's conduct made a difference to the 'way' in which the consequence occurs. This restriction on responsibility requires to be justified and in fact few lawyers would wish to treat differently the case where A and B independently and simultaneously shoot C, when the consequence would have occurred in the same way (shooting) without A's act, and the case where A shoots C while B independently and simultaneously strangles him, where, but for A's act, the consequence would have occurred in a different way. In any case, references to the manner of occurrence such as 'accident occcurring because a signalman was drugged' involve a knowledge of causal processes which depends on common sense principles.

Except where the special features of events which, like death, are certain to occur at some time create difficulties, the German puzzles will be avoided by using not the notion of necessary condition, but that of a condition which is generally sufficient, with others, to produce the harm, described in terms of the relevant legal rule.[8] This description may require some further qualification in the following type of case. Suppose a man would with normal medical treatment die of 'a disease in five years' time. Dr. A treats him so unskilfully that he dies in two years' time; or Dr. B treats him so skilfully that he lives for ten years. The treatment by each doctor is sufficient, with other conditions, to produce the patient's death, though after differing intervals of time: yet we are not at all inclined to call B's treatment a condition of the patient's death. This is because, when a consequence is described as 'death', it is implied that it occurred before the time it would normally have been expected on the information available when the alleged cause occurred. The patient's death would with normal treatment have been expected in five years' time. Hence A's treatment is causally connected with his death. B's treatment would be causally connected with the prolongation of his life. The law would surely adopt this implication of the ordinary usage of terms like 'death'. Accordingly descriptions such as 'death' implied in the relevant legal rule should usually be adopted but interpreted as follows: 'Death' means any dying before the deceased would normally have died; 'bodily injury' prima facie means any bodily injury, since persons do not in the normal course of things suffer bodily injury; the destruction of property means its destruction before it would normally disintegrate. There is a distinction between killing and prolonging life, improving a wound and making it worse, damaging an object and repairing it. Sometimes the law may express or imply a more detailed description; killing a Norman was once a more serious crime than just killing. But usually a rule referring to killing will be satisfied by proof of any killing, i.e. of any instance of death occurring before it would normally occur. The details of the killing are only relevant in showing that the facts of the case present an instance of the state of affairs proscribed by the law.

(iv) Generalization of the condition. This presents serious difficulties for the adequacy theory but less for the theory of conditions. We can accept Muller's conclusion that the condition must be described in accordance with legal categories: e.g. 'false pretences or the perversion or suppression of the truth';[1] the prosecutor or plaintiff must prove an instance of what is described, and for this purpose must adduce details, e.g. that A falsely told B on such-and-such a date at such-and-such a place that he had a suitcase full of banknotes.

(v) The procedure of elimination and substitution. As will be remembered, Glaser first proposed and von Buri adopted the procedure of hypothetical elimination in order to test whether an act or omission was a necessary condition of a consequence.[2] The two main problems that arise for them in this connexion are whether the act or omission is simply eliminated or whether another is substituted for it;[3] and whether there is difference between acts and omissions in this respect.

It is simplest to take the case of omissions first. Suppose accused was riding a bicycle without a light: the court wishes to determine whether this was a condition of a collision. Obviously it can do so only by asking whether a collision would have occurred if the other conditions had been similar but accused's bicycle had had a light. The elimination of the condition, according to the terminology of the German courts, involves the substitution of the act which accused omitted. Thus in one case[4] accused and his brother were riding bicycles without lights at night; the deceased coming in the opposite direction collided with the brother and was killed. Accused was charged with negligent killing and the prosecution argued that, had the accused had a light, the deceased would have been able to see his brother's bicycle. The trial court held that there was no causal connexion between the failure to have a light and the death, because it eliminated accused from the scene altogether, and concluded that the accident would still have occurred. On appeal it was pointed out that the true inquiry was what would have occurred had the accused been present with a lighted bicycle.[5] If the procedure of elimination without substitution is applied to omissions, no omission can be a condition of an event.

Probably the best solvents of scepticism on this point are the licence cases. In German and French law it has been held that to drive a car without a licence or employ a worker without an identity card is not necessarily the cause of a road or industrial accident in which the car or worker is involved.[1] Whether it is depends on whether the driver, if he had had a licence, would have driven more skilfully and thereby avoided the accident; similarly for the permit case. It seems clear that this conclusion can only be reached by going beyond simple elimination of the condition and supposing that the actor was driving and complied with the law by having a licence.

[3] Apparently 'elimination with substitution' is the supposition that the actor was in a position to which the law violated by him applies and that he complied with it (e.g. by driving with a licence). 'Simple elimination' is the supposition that he was not in a situation to which the law applies (e.g. not driving) and that the situation remained in all other respects unchanged (e.g. no one else drove).

However the Reichsgericht before the war in certain cases purported to adopt a procedure of elimination without substitution.[2] This was to avoid denying liability in cases of alternative causation, e.g. when if A had not shot B, C would have done so at the same place and time. Since the war it has been recognized that substitution is necessary. But the recognition has come in an unsatisfactory way, because it too has occurred in cases[3] of alternative causation which are anomalous.

The procedure of simple elimination seems more satisfactory when the alleged cause is a positive act. If accused shot deceased with a revolver it seems necessary only to notice that, if accused's shot is eliminated, deceased's death is eliminated also. It seems unnecessary to inquire what else would have happened if accused had not fired; indeed, even if, in that event, someone else would have shot deceased, this would not, from a common-sense point of view, prevent our considering that the act of accused was the cause of death. However, cases of additional causation present a difficulty for the elimination theory and we now consider these.

(vi) Additional and alternative causation. It is unnecessary to repeat the definitions of these terms, which were set out in Chapter VIII.[4] What we have termed 'additional' causation is often called 'cumulative' by continental writers.

It is agreed that in cases of additional causation, as where A and B simultaneously shoot C in a fatal part of the body, both should be legally responsible for the death; but this seems inconsistent with the theory of conditions if elimination is taken as the test of whether an act is a condition. Some half-hearted attempts have been made to circumvent or obviate the difficulty. Enneccerus[5] mentions the fiction that the consequence occurs twice, the fact that the law is primarily concerned with fixing responsibility and the argument that each act is a necessary condition for itself. Tarnowski[6] argues that, in the case of simultaneous shots by A and B, we cannot say that the victim's death would have occurred in the absence of A's shot, since this presupposes that B's shot is a necessary condition of the death; this turns on an ambiguity in the expression 'necessary condition'. What is presupposed is that B's shot is sufficient, with other circumstances, to produce death; not that no other similarly sufficient condition was present on this occasion. Tarnowski also argues that the 'class' of lethal shots must be eliminated,[7] and presents this as a theory of how conditions should be described, but this would only demonstrate that some lethal shot was necessary, not that any particular member of the class was.

None of the arguments adduced to reconcile the theory of conditions with the need to impose liability on both actors in cases of additional (including overtaking)[8] causation seems convincing. The notion of a necessary condition requires to be supplemented by that of a sufficient condition.

Alternative causation presents analogous difficulties for the theory of conditions. The German cases have been analysed in Chapter VIII and the arguments adduced by the writers do not add to what has already been said on the subject.[9]

unsuitable because it more naturally applies to causal processes which operate 'through the mind' analogously with physical processes, e.g. hypnotism.[1]

When one person provides the reason or part of the reason for another to act it is often but not always the case that the latter would not have acted as he did but for the act of the former.[2] When accused was charged with obtaining a premium of 600 marks by false pretences the prosecution failed since the widow who had paid the money in order to obtain a loan of a larger amount admitted that she would have done so even had she known that accused was lending on his own account and not on behalf of an imaginary H.[3] This admission was taken to mean that the false statement was no part of her reason for paying the money. But when accused falsely told certain guards that deceased had killed several inmates of concentration camps, and one of the guards then shot deceased dead, it was held that accused was rightly convicted of instigating the guard to commit malicious wounding with fatal consequences even if the guard had already decided to beat up deceased and would have done so without being prompted by accused.[4] The cases are distinguishable only if we assume that the guard, unlike the widow, was influenced by the false statements at least to the extent that his determination to do violence to the deceased was thereby reinforced. The court in the second case did not appear to notice that its decision was inconsistent with the theory of conditions as normally interpreted.

(viii) Proof in hypothetical inquiries. Whether an act is a condition of a given consequence involves consideration of what would have happened upon a hypothetical set of facts.[5] According to the German cases the hypothetical event and so the status of the act as a condition must be established with certainty or with a probability bordering on certainty. It was held to be error in the trial court to convict accused when the evidence merely showed that the harm, an outbreak of fire, could or might have been excluded by taking certain precautions.[6] There is often a doubt what the reaction of a human being would have been in hypothetical circumstances; since we do not command evidence that human conduct is completely determined such questions can never be answered with more than a high degree of probability. When the question was whether a doctor, if consulted, would have continued a certain treatment the fact that the treatment was medically appropriate and that there was no reason for him to discontinue it was held sufficient to permit the court to conclude with a probability bordering on certainly that he would have continued it.[7]

IV. The Identication of Causes and Conditions

The identification of causes and conditions required by the theory of conditions creates certain difficulties for the criminal courts which adopt the theory of conditions. We have seen how they are sometimes embarrassed by the fact that an act which from a common-sense point of view is the cause of harm would not, upon a literal interpretation ot the theory of conditions, count as a conditions.[8] We may now ask how the courts deal with the converse difficulties which arise when harm which from a commonsense point of view would not count as caused by an act is treated by the theory, owing to the identification of causes and conditions, as a consequence in law.

The identification leads to liability in cases of coexisting conditions such as the susceptibility of the victim,[9] of contributory negligence,[10] and of the concurrent negligence of a third party.[11] This is acceptable unless the negligence is gross or unnatural. The awkward cases, in which the theory of conditions appears too strict, are cases of voluntary interventions and intervening abnormal or coincidental acts or events, including grossly negligent acts.

Voluntary interventions. It was once thought that voluntary interventions could be regarded as a statutory exception to the theory of conditions in view of the provisions dealing with aiding and abetting crimes, which would be superfluous if the theory of conditions were literally applied.[1] Frank argued that there was an implied prohibition[2] on inquiry into the causes of volutary acts. From this it is deduced that there is no liability for negligent instigation or assistance of the principal offender or for instigation of or assistance in committing suicide, where suicide is not a crime.[3] However, the courts have reached the conclusion that this statutory exception, if it exists at all, does not extend beyond instigation, assistance, and perhaps suicide.[4] The main reason for this conclusion is that Frank's view would make it impossible for accused to be found guilty of crimes of negligence when he had neglected a duty to guard against the voluntary act of another. Thus a seller was convicted of negligent export of forbidden goods when he sent them to a person living near the frontier without inquiring whether they were intended for export, though from the circumstances it appeared probable that they were.[5] Again a husband was convicted of negligently killing his child when he deserted the household without informing relatives or the police, although his wife had frequently threatened to kill herself and the child, which she did.[6]

In consequence of these and other decisions on negligence many authors have adopted the view that cases of the intervention of free and voluntary acts form no exception to the theory of conditions.[7] However, this cannot be taken as finally settled. The main argument in favour of their view is that words such as 'kills' or 'killing' are presumably used in the same sense by the legislature in creating the crimes of intentional killing and negligent killing; so whatever causal relation is implied by the one is implied also by the other. The theory of conditions, it is asserted, provides an account of the only relation which would hold in both classes of case. On the other hand the description of the deserting husband's act as 'negligently killing his child' seems somewhat artificial and it may be that the law is in such cases extending the meaning of words such as 'kills', 'wounds', and 'burns' for reasons of policy; so that the relation of 'providing an opportunity for killing' or 'not preventing killing', which would more naturally be used to describe the conduct of accused, may not be the same as the causal relation implied by the use of 'kills', &c., in ordinary speech or in other contexts of the law.

The Italian penal code expressly makes this distinction, for after providing that no one is guilty of a crime unless the harmful or dangerous event which forms part of the crime is the consequence of his act, it goes on to say that failing to prevent an event, in the case of one who has a legal duty to prevent it, is equivalent to causing it.[8]

German courts have on other occasions appeared to recognize that voluntary intervening conduct negatives causal connexion between condition and consequence. In a case where three persons not acting in concert attacked and killed a fourth, the court said that when one person has given a mortal wound he can be convicted only of attempted homicide if the death is subsequently accelerated by the independent act of another.[9] But on the facts it was held open to the jury to find that two of the three were guilty of intentional homicide since the act of the second did not accelerate the death. This decision appears to recognize that the intervention of a voluntary actor negatives causal connexion; but this is consistent with the theory of conditions.[10]

German military courts also recgonize the importance of a voluntary intervention from the point of view of causal connexion. An N.C.O. was charged with 'disobedience whereby danger of serious prejudice [to military discipline] was brought about'. He had collected and sold empty cartridge cases and applied the proceeds for purchasing equipment for his men. It was held that if the disobedience consisted in the sale of the cartridge cases and the prejudice arose from the application of the proceeds the accused could not be convicted because the sale and application were not causally connected.[1] The reason why there was no causal connexion is clearly that, although the sale was a sine qua non of the application of the proceeds, a voluntary decision intervened.

In Germany the status of a voluntary intervention from the point of view of the theory of conditions must therefore be regarded as undecided. In Spain, where the theory of conditions is taken by the courts as the starting-point, an exception is made when there is the 'express and deliberate fault of the victim'[2] or the 'voluntary act of a third person'.[3] This, according to Ferrer, cannot be explained on any causal theory but only by the fact that the law is concerned not with causation but with responsibility, which is a teleological problem.[4] In Italy the legislature has enacted that the concurrence of pre-existing, simultaneous or subsequent causes, even if independent of the act or omission of accused, does not exclude causal connexion between the act or omission and the result, but subject to the proviso that subsequent causes exclude causal connexion when they are sufficient by themselves to determine the result.[5] Many writers have pointed out that the proviso cannot be interpreted literally; but it appears to leave room for some mitigation of the awkward results of the theory of conditions. Subsequent voluntary conduct might be regarded as within the proviso.

Abnormal intervening events and acts. The courts have met the difficulty of reconciling the theory of conditions with the requirements of common-sense in cases of coincidence and extraordinary intervening events or acts in various ways. In one recent case the Bundesgerichtshof stated that while reaffirming its adherence to the theory of conditions, it was unnecessary to decide what the position would be as regards causal connexion if a victim wounded by the accused was struck and killed by lightning in the place where he was immobilized by the wounding, or if he was killed in an accident while on the way to consult the doctor.[6] The more usual approach, however, is to deal with the difficulty under the heading of fault. Two cases may be contrasted. In one accused drove a lorry in the early morning with an unlighted trailer. He was stopped by the police and then ordered to drive to the nearest petrol station, the policeman intending to follow behind him in a car and so protect him from collision from the rear. However, before the police car was in position another lorry collided with the unlighted trailer from the rear and the driver was killed. Accused was convicted of negligent killing because his omission to light the trailer was a necessary condition of the death and he was negligent (in relation to the death) because the course of events was not unforeseeable or beyond all probability.[7]

In another case, however, accused, who was drunk, was wheeling his bicycle home at night when he fell in the road. A passing motorist stopped and removed him to the side of the road, but as he was returning to his car another motorist driving negligently from behind collided with the first motorist's car and killed his wife. Accused was acquitted of negligent killing since, though his act was casually connected with the death according to the theory of conditions, he was not negligent because the combination of the attempt at rescue and the negligence of the second motorist made the course of events unforeseeable, though neither was unforeseeable by itself.[8]

This shows how the awkward effects of the theory of conditions may be mitigated by the use of a doctrine that negligence is relative to the course of events. By an application of common-sense principles of causation the same conclusion might well have been reached but for different reasons. In the first case the fact that a collision occurred with an unlighted vehicle just at the moment before the police vehicle was in position would not, perhaps, be regarded as a coincidence negativing casual connexion, since there is, even during a short period of time, an appreciable likelihood that an unlighted vehicle on a road will be struck by another from behind in conditions of poor visibility. On the other hand, the likelihood that a lighted vehicle which has stopped at the side of the road for a short period will be struck from behind, as in the second case, is so small that the occurrence might reasonably be regarded as a coincidence; and the court's language indicates that it was the combination or coincidence of the two events which it regarded as the decisive factor.

The German writers themselves have made a number of objectives to the application of the theory of conditions in criminal law. First, it departs from ordinary usage, as we have repeatedly emphasized, and hence on this ground Beling, for example, who had first accepted the theory, later rejected it. Secondly, it leads to what is regarded as too extensive responsibility in some classes of case. One of these is the egg-shell skull or haemophiliac type of case; it is thought too harsh to hold an accused person liable for harm of which the pre-existing susceptibility of the victim is a concurrent cause. The adequacy theory, which is preferred in this respect, is only a part cure for the mischief, because it relieves an actor from liability not when there is an abnormal auxiliary condition but when the act does not significantly raise the probability of the harm. On this basis accused is not guilty of homicide if he has given a very light blow; but if he has given a fairly heavy blow which has resulted in death because the victim was a haemophiliac, he is liable. Common-sense principles do not of course, afford a remedy for this difficulty, since they draw a distinction between pre-existing conditions of the victim and subsequent abnormal events.

Another objectionable class of case is felt to be that of crimes aggravated by their consequences,[1] such as malicious wounding with fatal consequences. This may seem strange to an Anglo-American lawyer, who is used to the felony-murder doctrine, which may make accused liable for the full crime of murder in circumstances where there is no initial crime as serious as malicious wounding. But in Germany the injustice has been felt to be such that the legislature has intervened by adding an extra requirement of fault or mens rea in such cases, viz. that the ultimate harm must have been at least negligently brought about;[2] this enables the court to consider not only whether the ultimate harm was foreseeable by the accused at the time of his act but also whether the actual course of events has been 'outside all experience',[3] and hence to relieve from liability in the event of a coincidence.

The cases least catered for by any of the possible correctives to the theory of conditions are those in which accused does an act intended to produce the harm but the harm occurs through the intervention of a subsequent voluntary act or abnormal event or act; for example, A wounds B intending to kill him and B is on his way to consult a doctor when he is deliberately killed by C or struck by a falling tree, neither of which would have occurred but for the original wounding, since B would not otherwise have been at that place. The theory of conditions does not provide a satisfactory solution of this difficulty and in practice, as we have seen, common-sense causal limitations are introduced in a disguised form as part of the theory of fault.

XVII—THE GENERALIZING THEORIES: ADEQUATE CAUSE

The theory of conditions, described in the last chapter, has been accepted by the criminal courts of Germany and several other countries for the last seventy years. Not all writers, however, even in the field of criminal law, have been satisfied with it and in civil law it has failed to gain the allegiance of the courts, which have felt that it would lead to an undue extention of civil liability. Instead, civil courts have turned to the so-called generalizing theories[4] for guidance; of these the most successful and multiform has been the adequate cause or adequacy theory.[5]

The generalizing theories differ from the individualizing theories in that, though they also concentrate on the selection of one from among a set of conditions of an event as its cause, they select a particular condition as the cause of an event because it is of a kind which is connected with such events by a generalization or statement of regular sequence. Most individualizing writers, on the other hand, were satisfied to select a condition as the cause of an event if it 'contributed' more of the 'energy' needed to 'produce' the event on a particular occasion than any other condition. The generalizing writers, however, are not satisfied by the demonstration that if an identical set of conditions is assembled on another occasion then, at least when natural occurrences are involved, an event of the same kind will follow, and that in this sense every condition of an event is generally connected with it. They seek rather a general connexion between a condition and a subsequent event in the sense of a relation which will hold good although the condition is combined with a varying set of other conditions. So 'general' here primarily means 'not confined to a determinate set of conditions'.

Von Bar was the forerunner of the generalizing school. He took as his starting-point the theory of conditions as expounded by Glaser[1] but denied Glaser's conclusion that every condition is entitled to be called a cause. 'Every cause of an event', says von Bar, 'must necessarily be a condition but it is incorrect to call every condition a cause.'[2] The selection of causes is relative to the purpose of the inquiry; when a stone is dropped gravitation is the cause of its fall for the scientist, the act of letting it go for the lawyer or moralist. Our notion of cause, he asserts, is derived from our experience as children that our body regularly obeys our will and that, by exploiting a knowledge of regular sequences practical purposes can be achieved. But all such regular sequences, including statements of natural laws, presuppose the existence of auxiliary conditions which are regarded as being regularly present and the absence of counteracting conditions, which are regarded as exceptional.[3] These regular or normal conditions are not causes; on the contrary, their existence is presupposed by any causal statement. A cause is a condition which departs from the ordinary or regular course of events. 'A man is in the legal sense the cause of an occurrence to the extent that he may be regarded as the condition by virtue of which what would be otherwise regarded as the regular course of events in human experience is altered.'[4] On the other hand, one must not identify 'being the cause of an event' with doing an act which foreseeably will be followed by that event. Thus, a doctor undertaking a dangerous but necessary operation, which in fact results in the patient's death, foresees death but is not, according to von Bar, the cause of it.[5]

The example of the dangerous operation illustrates one of the weaknesses in von Bar's exposition: his failure to distinguish clearly between the requisites of fault, unlawfulness and causal connexion.[6] The doctor's act in performing the dangerous operation would, unless he failed to use due care, be necessary and not so unlawful. Hence he would not be legally responsible even if his act were causally connected with the patient's death.

However, von Bar's emphasis on the importance of the 'regular course of events'[7] in causal contexts marked an important advance, for the notion of the 'normal course of events' is indeed fundamental in the analysis of causation.

I. Rise of the Adequate Cause Theory

The theory of adequate cause appeared to offer both a justification for and a more precise formulation of von Bar's reference to the 'regular course of events'. It was the Freiburg physiologist von Kries who first advanced this theory in the 1880's.[8] Von Kries was interested in the mathematical theory of St. W.* ix. 528. Andolisel, op. cit., p. 117 advanced its Germanic origin as a reason for rejecting the adeqlate cause theory. Grispigni ('Ilnesso causale nel diritto penale', (1935) Rivista italiana di diritto penale 13. 31) replied that the theory of conditions was also of German origin and that the adequate cause theory had been adumbrated by the Italians Romagnosi and Carrara (Programma 1, s. 1093).

probability and also in the statistical aspects of sociology [1] and considered that the notion of probability could be applied to the law also. Objective probability [2] (Moglichkeit), he argued, must be distinguished from subjective probability (Warscheinlichkeit), for objective probability is a relationship between events independent of our knowledge.

Von Kries appears to use 'objective' to make at least three different points: (i) that a statement of the relative frequencies [3] of classes of events is independent of our knowledge or expectation. Thus if a die shaped as a regular cube is thrown a large number of times it is found that a six turns up approximately one-sixth of the total number of throws; hence the relative frequency of sixes to throws is about one-sixth. On the basis of a knowledge of this frequency one might assert that the probability of a particular throw being a six was about one-sixth; this would be to apply to a particular case a statement of regular frequencies and so to apply an objective relation between classes of events in making a particular probability statement. One important sort of particular probability statement is indeed a statement applying relative frequencies in this way and von Kries's point is therefore of importance; but this is not the only way in which the probability of a particular occurrence is estimated.[4]

It is important to realize that frequency generalizations, though 'objective', are relative to the class of events chosen for comparison and to the description of the class. Thus, though one might loosely speak of the 'frequency of deaths from tuberculosis', in order to estimate probabilities we must know the frequency as a proportion of some other class, e.g. deaths from all causes in Great Britain in a given year. This proportion will clearly not be the same as the relative frequency of deaths from tuberculosis to the total number of persons in Great Britain in a given year. There is nothing in the statement that the relative frequency of ordinary throws of a die and sixes is about one-sixth inconsistent with the possibility that a machine might be constructed which would always or nearly always throw a six. The relative frequency of throws with the machine and sixes would differ from the relative frequency of ordinary throws and sixes. Hence while statements of relative frequency are true, whatever our knowledge and expectation, statements applying such frequencies alone to determine the probability of a particular event are always based on incomplete information, since the person making the estimate knows only that there has been or will be an event of one class and is using the relative frequencies to determine the probability that this also was or will be an event of another class. If the person making the estimate knew more about the circumstances he would not need to rely merely on the relative frequencies of the two classes of events.

Von Kries's point is a good one; but the difficulty of ascertaining relative frequencies and of settling the description of the classes of events between which the frequencies hold is very great. Questions of description we leave for later consideration.[5]

(ii) Von Kries further treated statements of relative frequency as themselves merely the sign of more fundamental relations between classes of events; it is these more fundamental relations that are described by him as relations of objective probability. Thus, the objective probability, he says, of a regular die turning up a six is exactly one-sixth and the observed frequencies, which are not, of course, exactly one in six are merely signs of this. This part of his theory is open to criticism in so far as it assumes the existence of relations between classes of events which are real but not derived from observation. But for purposes of the legal theory of causation we may neglect this part of von Kries's theory and argue as if he was merely concerned with relative frequencies. We therefore speak henceforth of the (objective) probability of B given A as if this were derived merely from the relative frequency of events of class A and class B.

But the use of the term 'possibility' in this sense would be a source of confusion for the lawyer and we have therefore preferred 'objective probability'.

(iii) Von Kries also argued that statements of probability were 'objective' in the sense of not being based on a mistaken estimate of the frequencies, such as might be made by a person asked to estimate the probability of a die turning up a six who did not realize that the die was loaded. But this is a trivial point; a person making any estimate may be mistaken about the facts on which he bases it.

Von Kries's substantial point is that statements of relative frequencies are objective in sense (i). It is important, however, to realize that when we say that a particular event B is more or less probable given another event A we are not always merely applying our knowledge of the relative frequencies of events of classes A and B. We may instead be drawing a tentative conclusion from a generalization for which the evidence is inconclusive, as when we say that X who is suffering from a certain disease will probably become blind, because there is strong but not conclusive evidence for the generalization that everyone who suffers from the disease becomes blind. Common to both these instances is the fact that a particular probability statement is made on the basis of incomplete knowledge; but the knowledge may be incomplete either because the best generalization available is a statement of frequencies or because the evidence, either for a particular fact or for a universal generalization, is inconclusive. Particular probability statements may be called 'objective' in von Kries's sense so far as they merely apply frequency generalizations.

Von Kries applies the concept of objective probability as a constituent element of causal statements in the following way. A given contingency will be the adequate cause of harm if and only if it satisfies two conditions: (i) it must be a sine qua non of the harm, (ii) it must have 'increased the objective probability' of the harm by a significant amount.[1] The idea of increasing objective probability may perhaps be made clear by the following example: a certain proportion of human beings suffer from tuberculosis; from this is inferred the objective probability of a human being's suffering from tuberculosis. A higher proportion of miners suffer from tuberculosis and the objective probability of a miner's so suffering is correspondingly greater. Hence a man's becoming a miner is said to increase the probability of his catching tuberculosis and, if he would not have caught it but for becoming a miner, to be the adequate cause of his catching the disease.[2] The bare relationship signified by sine qua non or necessary condition is treated by von Kries as a causal relationship distinguished from adequate cause as 'non-adequate' or 'coincidental';[3] this non-adequate relation can be established, says Von Kries, by attending solely to the particular case without applying generalizations.[4]

Von Kries further claims that the results reached by applying his notion of adequacy are very similar to those which a layman, and still more a lawyer with a trained sense of justice[5] would reach by appealing to the teachings of experience and the regular course of events, and offers his theory as a rational reconstruction of these more intuitive notions. Indeed the adequacy theory itself is sometimes stated not in the strict form given above but in the loose form that a condition is the adequate cause of a consequence if it has a tendency, according to human experience and in the ordinary course of events, to be followed by a consequence of that sort.[6]

The results obtained by the two approaches will indeed often converge. Thus becoming a miner is the adequate cause of catching tuberculosis because of the substantially greater frequency with which miners catch it than human beings as a whole. It is also true that the conditions which together with being a man, &c., suffice to produce tuberculosis, e.g. prolonged exposure to coal-dust, are such as miners are frequently exposed to. Such conditions may be called normal for miners. Hence it will often be true that, when a condition has increased the objective probability of a consequence, the consequence will be found to have occurred in the ordinary course of events without the intervention of any abnormal contingency. There will, however, be a divergence if a consequence of the class of which there is a greater probability occurs, but only owing to the intervention of an abnormal contingency, e.g. a man takes a job as a miner in a certain town where he meets and marries a girl from whom he contracts tuberculosis. Here becoming a miner is the adequate cause of catching the disease but the disease has not occurred in the ordinary course of events (for a miner).

Von Kries gives an example of non-adequate causation the case of a coachman who in breach of duty falls asleep so that the coach deviates from the agreed route; during the course of the deviation the passenger is struck by lightning, which he would not have been on the correct route.[1] Here 'falling asleep' as opposed to 'keeping awake' does not significantly increase the probability of 'passenger being struck by lightning'.[2] The chances of being struck by lightning are in fact small whether the coachman is asleep or awake, and if the passenger is in fact struck by lightning this will ordinarily be described as something out of the ordinary course of events, and the fact that lightning struck at that particular spot will be treated from a common-sense point of view as a coincidence. Here a divergence between the two methods of approach is avoided only because the lightning is incorporated in the description of the consequence.

Hence, though there is not a complete correspondence between von Kries's theory and von Bar's appeal to the normal course of events, there is often a convergence. Von Kries indeed thinks that the use of the notion of the normal course of events has been well inspired and he admits that his stricter notion of increased probability cannot be applied with mathematical accuracy; there is no clear line between adequate and non-adequate causes.[3]

Von Kries does not explain whether by increasing the risk to a significant extent he is referring to an act which increases the risk considerably or to one which increases it to a considerable risk. This may be important in practice. Suppose that there is a rare disease, peculiar to bakers. The risk of a non-baker contracting the disease is nil and therefore A's act in becoming a baker increases the risk of it infinitely in relation to what it was for A previously. But becoming a baker does not entail any considerable risk of contracting the disease and therefore on a second possible interpretation A's act is not the adequate cause of contracting the disease. The second interpretation is more consistent with von Kries's general position.

Von Kries's work appeared to show that the promptings of common sense were scientifically reputable and his work was soon accepted and developed by those who felt the theory of conditions to be artificial and only tolerated it because of its supposed philosophical repute. The first to do this was a criminal law writer, Merkel.[4] Others soon followed suit; among the best known are Helmer,[5] Rumelin,[6] Leipmann,[7] and above all Trager.[8] The civil Senate of the Reichsgericht accepted the adequate cause theory in 1898[9] and it and the civil senate of the Bundesgerichshof have followed it since; it has also been accepted by the civil courts of Austria and Switzerland and to a varying extent of other continental countries.

Some have thought that von Kries's appeal to probability in solving causal now ceased to be even a theoretical idal of science to discover causal laws in science and by the fact that in quantum theory it appears impossible in principle to formulate them otherwise.[1] Hence some have maintained that it has now ceased to be even a theoretical ideal of science to discover causal laws in the sense of statements of conditions which are invariably followed by a given event without exceptions.[2] Other scientists maintain the contrary and whichever group is right, the causal priciples to which we appeal in everyday life, if particular causal statements are challenged, are not thereby invalidated,[3] though it is proper to point out that their supposedly invariable character depends on consequences and conditions being somewhat roughly described. The law is satisfied, in deciding whether the negligence of a motorist caused a collision with another vehicle, with a description of the positions of the two vehicles which would not be accurate enough for the purposes of atomic physics.

Von Kries's claim that the conclusions of the adequacy theory would largely coincide with those reached by a 'trained sense of justice', however, met with opposition. Tarnowski argued that 'a trained sense of justice' was too vague and uncertain a notion to vindicate the adequate cause theory;[4] for not merely does the ordinary man's sense of justice leave him in uncertainty in borderline cases, but even when it leads to a clear decision, no one can say whether the decision is based on fault, causation, or some other element in responsibility. These criticisms led not to the abandonment of the notion of adequacy but to its derivation from a new principle. Tarnowski, Grispigni, and others argued that both civil and criminal law involve 'normative' judgments. The law decides that a person should or should not have done a given act at a given time. But, it is argued, such a judgment is only rational so far as the person in question had at that time[5] the possibility of influencing the actual course of events. Hence the 'normative' judgment cannot extend to an event of which the actor did not increase the probability though his act was a necessary condition of it.[6] The relation of adequacy is therefore a presupposition of any 'normative' judgment.

According to Tarnowski adequacy belongs to the 'factual', not the 'normative' part of the legal process; according to Grispigni, it belongs to the normative part, and the notion of cause is to be understood in the law in a normative sense.[7] Otherwise Grispigni's argument is very similar. The object of many norms is to forbid conduct because of its tendency to produce certain 'consequences' (known usually to follow from it.)[8] Hence we must look to the moment when the law's threat operates or should operate on the mind of the actor; if the consequence was probable given the act, if the act was 'capable' of producing it, the norm forbids the act in relation to that consequence, otherwise not.[9]

These views presuppose that the law's 'normative judgment' relates not merely to whether defendant or accused should have done the original act but to the whole Tatbestand consisting of act, conditional connexion and consequence. This seems inconsistent with the wording of continental codes which appear, like Anglo-American statutes, to forbid certain acts because of their tendency, in general, to produce harm, but not conditionally upon their being a specific probability in a particular case that the harm will occur. There appears to be in the works of Tarnowski and Grispigni a confusion between the rationale and content of a norm forbidding certain conduct. The reason for the imposition of a norm does not always define the limits of its operation.

There are several possible cases in which the law may hold a person responsible for the consequences of his conduct although, in a certain sense, the conduct did not significantly increase the probability of the harm. In the first place the law may forbid conduct because, although the amount by which the conduct would increase or fail to decrease the risk of harm occurring is very small, the harm, if it did occur would be very great. Thus an employer may have a special duty to provide goggles for a one-eyed mechanic because, though his doing so would not greatly decrease the risk of blindness, which was small in any event, the possible harm is very serious.[1] Secondly the law may hold a person responsible for harm which is a consequence of his conduct although such conduct does not in general significantly increase the risk of such harm; the legislator may have miscalculated the probabilities. Finally, the act may, upon the description adopted by the legislator, significantly increase the risk of harm although in the light of the information available to the actor it does not do so. Thus 'administering poison' may be made a crime because of its tendency to injure health and life; yet on the information available to X, who gave Y poison, the risk may have been negligible, because X knew that Y regularly took an antidote. Suppose that on this occasion Y forgot to take the antidote and unexpectedly died. There seems no reason why X's conduct should not form the subject of a normative judgment; because the law may simply have forbidden the administration of poison, irrespective of whether on the information available to the actor on a given occasion the conduct would significantly increase the risk of harm.

This modern justification by Grispigni of the concept of adequacy means that adequacy is not necessarily now regarded as a theory of causation and the change has been marked by the fact that while the older generation spoke of the 'adequate cause' theory, recent writers speak of the 'adequacy' theory.[2]

Since the war the civil courts of the Federal Republic have emphatically interpreted the notion of adequacy as a means of setting fair limits to responsibility and in doing so have expressed themselves in terms to which many modern American writers would assent. 'Only if courts remain conscious of the fact', said the Bundesgerichtshof in the important Edelweiss case in 1951,[3] 'that the question is not really one of causation but of the fixing of the limits within which the author of a condition can fairly be made liable for its consequences, viz. basically one concerning a positive presupposition of liability, can they avoid schematizing the adequate cause formula and guarantee correct results.' The decision, however, did not depend on this view. Through defendant's negligence the Edelweiss jammed in a canal and there was evidence of subsequent mistakes on the part of professional persons in charge of the canal, of an unexpectedly sudden rise in the water level and of a failure of electric current. But for these contingencies the Edelweiss would not have sunk. The trial court 'ought to have examined whether the conjunction of these numerous conditions, partly set by incompetent persons and partly, perhaps, merely fortuitous, did not lie outside the normal range of experience,[4] since a wrongdoer is not responsible for the intervention of incompetent persons acting in a wholly unusual and inappropriate way. This is quite consistent with the common sense principles by which grossly negligent intervening acts or coincidental events negative responsibility.[5]

We discuss the detailed application of the adequacy theory later.

Variants of adequacy and cognate notions. Most of the other modern theories are variants of the adequacy theory or of von Bar's views. Some hold that an event is in law a consequence of a condition when the condition, i.e. the human act is suited to the production of the event in the sense that the event follows typically upon it.[6] This view has been more recently restated by the California writer Ehrenzweig,[7] as providing the key to a general theory of civil responsibility, not merely to the theory of causation. The notion of a typical consequence is a reformulation of von Bar's notion of a harmful consequence occurring 'in the normal course of events'. Much the same idea underlies the conclusion of Engisch who considers that the notion of causation can, for criminal law, be confined to that of a condition, but that there exist further essentials of liability, i.e. that the act of the accused should be dangerous and that the danger should have been 'realized'.[1] To say that an act is dangerous is much the same as to say that harm follows it typically or in the ordinary course of events. The reference to 'realization of the danger' is intended to exclude responsibility in those cases in which the ultimate harm is typical but the causal process involves laws different from those which would be involved in the typical case, e.g. the victim of a serious wound dies of cholera through drinking dirty water in the hospital to which he goes to have his wounds treated. This argument, of course, presupposes causal laws in a sense other than that of typical sequence.

Krückmann's view, that the essence of causation in the law is to be found in the control of the actor over the external world [2] is closely related to the modern defence of the adequacy theory as resting on the sense of justice of the ordinary man. A defendant is only to be held responsible for events over which he had control and this excludes coincidence and is primarily determined by the foreseeability of a consequence at the moment of acting.

The theory of relevance, whose leading exponent is now Mezger, is really a version of the adequacy theory, not applied to causation but regarded as an independent element in liability. For causation the theory of conditions is held to suffice, but this must be supplemented by the notion of relevance to the consequence designated by the particular rule of law (death, bodily injury, fire, &c.). An accused person is only responsible if, in addition to having caused the harm, his act was appropriate to it (Tatbestandsmassig).[3] On another version [4] a consequence, in the sense of the theory of conditions is relevant or imputable if it may be regarded as under the control of the will. This must presumably be interpreted not literally, for on a literal view consequences of which the act in question is a necessary condition could always have been avoided if the actor had refrained from doing what he did and in that sense the fact that his act was a condition of the harm establishes that the harm was under the control of his will. However, we are presumably intended to regard control as primarily depending on foreseeability.

None of these recent views therefore appears on examination to be more than a variant of von Bar's views or of one of the forms of the adequacy theory. Some of the writers treat the notions of 'typical', 'dangerous', 'subject to control', 'relevant', &c., as part of the meaning of the concept of causation in the law: others treat them as independent requisites of responsibility. Since most of the writers do not purport to be reproducing a notion of causal connexion which has an application outside the law and there is no explicit legislative authority for any of these views, the difference between these two methods of treatment is more apparent than real.

Policy. As we have seen, the Bundesgerichtshof has recently affirmed that the adequacy theory is a vehicle for giving effect to the policy of setting fair limits to civil responsibility. Even in the nineteenth century some writers laid the main emphasis on the role of considerations of justice and indeed of personal preference in the decision of causal issues while others advocated that the decision in such cases should be left to the unfettered discretion of the judge. To the first group belonged Hess, who stressed the importance of ethical feeling in causal judgments and pointed to the influence which the judge's taste: outlook, character, and political views would have on his decisions.[5] In modern times the French writer Esmein has come to the conclusion that causal connexion in the law falls into two parts: one is factual, i.e. the sine qua non relation: the other comprises imputability, which Esmein equates with 'moral causation'.[6] This exists when the defendant deserves to pay compensation for the harm. The main guide to its existence is foreseeability.

Of the advocates of judicial discretion we may mention Berner who regarded theoretical discussion of causation as so much scholastic learning enveloped in fruitless and confusing abstractions.[7] His contemporary Dernburg held that the decision of causal questions should be left to the reasonable discretion of the judge[1] and at the present day Enneccerus-Lehmann offers the same solution for doubtful cases.[2] Such views have a natural appeal in that they dispense the jurist from offering further guidance, but they cannot be regarded as characteristic of the continental views in either theory or practice.

Most recently Von Caemmerer has eloquently restated the modern American view that the notion of cause is really that of sine qua non and that any further questions 'are merely concerned with the purpose and scope of the rule imposing liability. The question of the limits of liability is to be solved by deploying the meaning and range of this particular rule, not by applying general causal formulae.'[3] However, he does not investigate, in his short description of this approach, cases where even after the purpose of a statute is identified questions of causation still remain. Criticisms of this too optimistic reliance on the scope or purpose of legal rules as a solution for all causal problems will be found in Chapter X. In any case courts have not yet ceased to take seriously the detailed formulation and application of the adequacy theory and it is this which we now consider.

II. Detailed Application of the Adequacy Theory

We have already considered the historical development of the adequacy theory.[4] Its details may be approached through a discussion of a famous case.[5] The owner of two lighters sued a contractor for breach of a contract by which the lighters were to be towed from Cuxhaven to Nordenham on 28 October 1909, on which day the weather was fine. The contractor began to tow on the 28th but despite the owner's objections returned to port. The weather forecast for the 29th was favourable and the lighters were towed on that day but during the voyage a storm broke out and they suffered severe damage. On appeal it was held that the delay by the contractor was the adequate cause of the damage. The court said that the damage need not be foreseeable; it was sufficient that the 'objective probability of a consequence of the sort that occurred was generally increased or favoured' by the breach. On the facts the delay had increased the risk of loss since, at the end of October, it is more likely that the weather will hold for a journey of six hours begun in good weather than it will hold on the following day, even if the weather forecast is favourable.[6]

The court also discussed the case from the standpoint of the common-sense or loose notion of the 'natural course of events'. It held that the consequence need not follow in accordance with a rule but that it must not occur only through the intervention of a contingency 'contrary to the natural course of events',[7] which could equally well have occurred without the breach of contract: a collision of the lighters with a steamer on the 29th, which would not have occurred in fact on the 28th since the steamer in question would then have been out of range, would have been such a contingency. But the storm was not unusual for the time of year.[8]

We deal first with the adequacy theory as strictly formulated and consider in turn: (i) the generalization (description) of the consequence; (ii) the generalization (description) of the condition; (iii) amount of the increase in probability required; (iv) alteration of risk; (v) calculation of probability; (vi) difficult cases; (vii) relation of the adequacy theory to the 'normal course of events'.

(i) Generalization of the consequence. The problem of the 'generalization' of the consequence, in the adequacy theory, is that of describing the class of events whose probability must be shown to have been significantly increased by the wrongful act. It is clear that the so-called concrete description of the consequence in 'all its details' advocated by some for the description of the consequence in order to ascertain whether an act is a condition,[9] cannot be applied here; the description must be 'abstract'.

The adequacy theory is concerned with the relation of probablity between the condition and the ultimate consequence, not between the condition and any third factor which contributes to produce the ultimate harm.[1] But the probability of the occurrence of the third factor can be made indirectly relevant to the adequancy of the condition by incorporating the third factor in the description of the ultimate consequence. If defendant gravely wounds the victim and leaves him under a tree where he is struck by lightning and killed, the wounding may be adequate if the harm is described as 'death' but possibly not if it is described as 'death by lightning'. The incorporation, in the description of the consequence, of such a third factor enables the adequacy theory to reach almost the same conclusions as would be reached by applying the common-sense principle that an intervening coincidental event negatives causal connexion,[2] for if the conjunction of a wrongful act and an intervening contingency is very unlikely, the wrongful act will not often have significantly increased the risk of a conjunction of the intervening contingency and the ultimate harm. It is very unlikely that a tree will be struck by lightning just at the moment that accused has left his wounded victim beneath it; it will also in general be true that the act of accused in leaving his victim under the tree has not significantly increased the risk of the victim's being killed by lightning. Hence there is a tendency among the theorist of adequate cause to incorporate in the description of the consequence such third factors as will enable the results of applying the theory to accord with common-sense judgments about coincidences.

Thus Radbruch says that while strictly it is only the ultimate consequence whose adequacy falls to be determined one should also, in fixing the description of the consequence, take account of the 'most important points of transition from the bodily movement to the final consequence', according to their class description.[3] Another solution is to require, in addition to adequacy, 'typical causal sequence at least when the case concerns a crime aggravated by its consequences.[4] A third is to require, in addition to adequacy, that the probability relationship should not be unsuited to explaning the configuration of events, in view of later contingencies not imputable to the actor.[5] Von Kries himself states the adequacy theory at times in a form which is inconsistent with the requirement that it is only the ultimate harm for which the condition must be adequate. Thus he says that the problem is whether 'the connection... with the consequence is a genralised one or merely a particularlity of the case in question, whether the factor (the conduct in question) . . . is generally apt, or possesses a tendency, to bring about a consequence of that sort, or whether it has merely occasioned it accidentally'.[6] His contrast between having a tendency to bring about a consequence and bringing it about accidentally can only be sustained if those factors which might lead one to say that the consequence had followed accidentally or by a coincidence are incorporated in the description of the consequence.

But this would make the notion of increased probabilities quite unworkable. For even if we can settle what are the 'important' third factors which must be incorporated into the description of the consequence the same difficulties of description are met again in describing these factors.[7] If 'death' must be replaced by 'death by lightning', why not by 'death by forked lightning'? Where will the process extending the description stop? It could not logically stop short of including every factor relevant to the probability of the ultimate harm. The court will then be asking questions such as whether a light blow on the head significantly increases the risk of death under an anaesthetic for an alcholic who has suffered gunshot wounds in the war—the sort of question for answering which there are likely to be no statistics and which is too complicated for common sense to estimate. The estimates of probability which the adequacy theory requries are practicable only if the description of the consequences remains fairly general. The only rule of description consistent with positive law is to adopt the description expressed or implied in the codes, 'death', 'bodily injury', &c., but subject to the proviso mentioned in our discussion of the notion of a condition, that this means 'death before it would normally occur', &c.[1] But this would at once reveal the divergence between the adequacy theory and commonsense judgments of causal connexion.

(ii) Generalization of the condition. Obviously whether the wrongful act increases the risk of the harm depends on its description. Thus, 'giving a man a light blow on the head' may not significantly increase the risk of death but 'giving a man with a weak heart a light blow on the head' might do so. One's first inclination is to favour a description of the act restricted to the terms of the statute: i.e. if the statute forbids 'wounding' to describe the act of an accused as 'wounding X'. But clearly the adequacy theorists need to distinguish between wounds of different degrees of seriousness, some adequate for their consequences, others not. Again, is one to stop short of an inclusion of all those factors which are relevant to the probability of a consequence of the class in question? If so, the reference to the weak heart of the victim must be incorporated in the description of the act, whether it was known or ascertainable at the time or not. Again, should we incorporate in the description of the act a reference to its relations with the future events, for example, speak of 'leaving a wounded victim under a tree about to be struck by lightning'? Most writers have felt the need to draw a line between a description restricted to the words of the rule of law in question and one which incorporates every feature of the act relevant to the probability of the consequence.

The problem what facts should be incorporated in the description of the wrongful act for purposes of the adequacy theory is called by the writers the problem of ontological considerations, to distinguish it from the problem what knowledge of laws or generalizations the person calculating probabilities is to be credited with (nomological considerations). The latter problem is discussed under (v) below.[2]

Wundt [3] held that only conditions existing at the time of the act should be incorporated in the description of the act. Radbruch objected that even if the conditions 'operated' later their causes existed earlier; from the point of view of determinism, they have been certain to 'operate' from eternity and, in any case, the notion of conditions 'operating' or 'intervening' is metaphysical; there is no particular movement at which the conditions other than the one in question 'receive it as a comrade in arms'.[4]

Von Kries's doctrine was that the act must be described in the light of what the actor knew at the time of his act; if he was misinformed, this should be taken into account. Thus, if accused set fire to what he mistakenly believed to be an empty house, the proper description of his act, for purposes of the adequacy theory, is 'setting fire to a house'; of course we cannot say 'setting fire to an empty house' for this would be a false description of his act. Others, such as Träger,[5] thought this too narrow and included in the description of the act those factors of which either the actor or an experienced man [6] or the most prudent [7] man, at the time of the act, should have known; Rümelin went further and included 'what was or has become known otherwise, for example, circumstances existing at the time of the wrongful act which have been discovered through the subsequent course of events'.[8] Rümelin's view involves a 'retrospective forecast',[9] or the use of 'hindsight'. Rümelin does not allow for the incorporation of future events, but if Radbruch's criticism of the distinction between existing conditions and future events is accepted, the description of the act would indirectly cover subsequent events and it would be rare indeed that it was not adequate for the consequence.

Rümelin attempted to meet this difficulty by an exception to his principle, viz. that, if the wrongful act merely brought the injured party to the place and at the time of a later event, then conditions existing at the time of the wrongful act are not incorporated in the description of the act if they were not known to or ascertainable by the actor at the time.[1] This view reflects indirectly the common-sense principle which confines the abnormal 'circumstances' which do not relieve a defendant of responsibility to conditions existing at the time and place of the wrongful act, but Rümelin's adoption of it appears arbitrary.

Rümelin's view has not met with general acceptance[2] and the prevalent opinion is that of Engisch[3] that the description should incorporate only circumstances known or knowable at the time of acting: it was at one time disputed whether this meant known or knowable to the actor[4] or, as Träger says,[5] to a 'most prudent man' who is 'the actor himself freed from the defects which hamper his powers of perception in any direction'. Thus, if the actor gave the victim a slight shove at the edge of a cliff and the victim fell over the cliff and was killed, von Kries's view would have been that for purposes of deciding whether the shove significantly increased the probability of death, the act should be described as 'giving a slight shove on the edge of a cliff' only if the actor knew that he was standing on the edge of a cliff; Träger would say that it must be so described if the most prudent of men would have realized this—as he might not if the events occurred in a thick fog; Rumelin's view was that the act should be so described, even though the most prudent of men would not have discovered the proximity of the cliff at the time. Träger's view has now been endorsed by the Bundesgerichtshof.[6]

Strictly speaking, the Träger principle of description should be stated in the negative, viz. that circumstances not known or knowable either to the actor or a most prudent man are excluded from the description. This caters for the possibility that the actor knows some circumstance which a very prudent man would not know. In this case what he knows should be taken into account in settling the description of his conduct.[7]

Apart from the description of the condition and consequence, a third problem of the same sort must be solved in order to apply the adequacy theory. This concerns the description of the initial class with which it is sought to compare the wrongful act; for the adequacy theory involves a comparison of the probability of the harm but for the act and given the act. This is not necessarily the same as a comparison of the probabilities before and after the act. Thus if the wrongful act consists in dispatching goods by the wrong aeroplane, this might well increase the risk of their destruction relatively to their not being dispatched at all, but not relatively to their being dispatched by the right plane, if the wrong plane was as safe as the right one. In this instance it is easy to make the right substitution, since it is clear what compliance with the law would have involved, and so to arrive at a description of the class of events with which comparison is sought. However, the same problems of the detail of description remain to be answered in this case too; thus, if the right plane had a leaking fuel tank, ought this to be included in a description of what compliance with the law would have involved, and if so should this be done in any event or only if the actor or a most prudent man would have noticed it?

For purposes of the adequacy theory the only general guide of value to the description of the wrongful act is the fact that, for causal purposes and for the calculation of relative frequencies, there is always an implied contrast which will often help toward an appropriate description of both; and in a legal context this contrast is usually between a wrongful act and the rightful act which should have taken its place.

On the problem of the degree of detail of description required there is no agreement among the continental writers. This is not surprising, for the problems are perplexing. In our discussion of the notion of a coincidence we pointed out that to make sense of this notion, the third intervening factor must be described as it would be by persons without special knowledge of the situation. This is more satisfactory than to make the description depend on the knowledge of the actor or of an 'optimal observer'.

The adequacy theorists are agreed that any special knowledge of the actor must be incorporated in the description of the act [1] but disagree whether this is an illogical exception to the adequacy theory. Thus H. Mayer asserts that imputability, not objective probability, is the test of causation, since otherwise the actor's special knowledge of extraordinary circumstances could not be taken into account, since this is 'nothing in the events themselves'.[2] However, this is to misunderstand the adequacy theory, for the probability of harm is no less 'objective' for being relative to the description of the condition.[3] There is of course a general justification for incorporating circumstances known to the actor in the description of an act, for the actor may be presumed to be exploiting them for his own purposes.

There is a great exaggeration of this truth about description in Antolisèi's doctrine of the 'sole human cause'. Antolisèi maintains that not only must all external factors, whether really instruments or not, taken into account by the actor be regarded as imputable to him [4] but also 'all the elements without distinction which he can employ for this purpose: in other words all the external factors which man can dominate'.[5] By this method the conclusion is reached that the act in question is often the sole cause of the harm, since all the other factors have been incorporated in it.[6] But causal problems are difficult enough without gratuitously introducing a fiction that the actor is exploiting or dominating circumstances of which he is in fact unaware.

(iii) How great an increase in probability is required? Von Kries, it will be remembered, held that the cause of an event in law was that condition which significantly increased the probability of the event. Not all subsequent theorists are agreed on this. Thus Tarnowski maintains that the slightest increase in probability is sufficient to make a condition an adequate cause.[7] His objection is partly to the vagueness of a 'significant' or 'considerable' increase.[8] This is part of his general objection to the application of common-sense distinctions in the law. He also complains, with a considerable measure of truth, that there is a confusion in many writings between the increase in the probability of harm attributable to the wrongful act and the resultant probability.[9]

Tarnowski's difficulty is the objection that if the slightest increase in probability makes a condition an adequate cause there will be no or few conditions which are not adequate. But the objection should not be overstated, for though there must have been some probability of the harmful consequence given the condition in question [10] this may have been less than the probability would have been without the condition. If one man snatches another from a lion's den there is no doubt some probability even outside the den that the man will be eaten by a lion but the act of snatching him from the den has certainly not increased the probability of this. If it is said that, since the harm has occurred, there must have been a very great probability of its happening at the time of the wrongful act in the particular case, this may be true on a description of the act which incorporates all the circumstances now known to have existed at the time, as in Rumelin's view, but may be quite untrue in relation to the ordinary man's or even the most prudent man's description.[11]

Even if a necessary condition does not always increase the risk of the harm that has occurred, it is argued that it does so in cases in which no one would think a causal connexion established. Von Kries gives the example of a railway accident caused by the fault of the defendant or accused; the victim is obliged by the accident to spend some time in a town where he would not otherwise have stayed, and he there catches typhus. Von Kries says that the risk of catching typhus is increased by the accident but that the accident is not the adequate cause of catching typhus. Tarnowski argues that in the absence of detailed knowledge about different places along the railway line, the probability of catching typhus is taken to be the same at the victim's original destination as at the place where he caught typhus; hence the accident has not increased the risk of catching typhus, and is, even on Tarnowski's view, non-adequate.[1] Of course all depends on the description of the wrongful act which caused the accident; normally this would not be described as occurring near a place where a typhus epidemic was raging[2] and hence Tarnowski's exegesis of this case seems preferable to von Kries's.

Von Kries gives another example of a condition which increases the risk of the harm but in his view not significantly. If accused leaves open the door of his house this slightly increases the risk that someone will enter and kill an occupant; but no one would say that accused had caused the death. Tarnowski replies that though the probability is increased by leaving the door open it is a question depending on the positive law of participation in crime whether the free and intentional intervention of a third person is inconsistent with liability.[3] This suggests that the theory often diverges from common sense views of causation. Going for a walk is not the cause of being run over in a road accident, though it increases the probability of this happening.[4] Even a considerable increase of risk may be consistent with facts in which no one other than a blind adherent of the adequacy theory would hold the condition to be the cause of the harm; climbing up a mountain considerably increases the risk of falling down a mountain[5] but would not ordinarily be called its cause. The only plausible version of the adequacy theory is, indeed, that which requires that the act in question should increase the risk of the harm to a considerable or significant risk. No numerical value can be given to this; but the harm need not be more likely than not.[6] It seems too much even to demand that the resultant probability should be such that the consequence is 'typical', i.e. frequently instantiated,[7] for if a revolver shot is aimed at someone at a great distance the probability of the victim's being hit may be very small, yet if he is hit the person aiming the revolver has undoubtedly caused the wound or death.

This last example perhaps serves to bring out the weakness in the whole attempt to represent causal judgments as depending on estimates of increased probabilities or risks; for the common sense of the matter is that firing a resolver is the cause of injury if the shot hits the victim, and not the cause if it does not, irrespective of the probability at the time of the firing that the victim would be hit. The probabilities depend on the competence of the marksman, the range, the type of revolver, the strength of the wind, and many other factors; but causal judgments do not, at least directly; for the probabilities are relevant to them only in that they affect our weighing of the evidence. The improbability of the event may make us disinclined to believe that it was a consequence of the act in question. We may doubt whether the victim really was wounded by the shot which the accused fired, and be inclined to believe that some other shot caused the wound. But if we assert that defendant's shot caused the wound we must be prepared to support our assertion with something more than foreseeability. We would trace the causal connexion with the aid of generalizations, no doubt loosely formulated, about ignition, the movements of bodies and the bodily tissues of human beings, and would attempt to distinguish cases in which the consequence did not follow the shot.

Of course, if causal connexion is established at all, the events must be explicable in retrospect and there must therefore be some description of the condition which involves a certainty or very high probability of the harm occurring.

But this consideration should not be allowed to obliterate the distinction between statements of causal connexion and statements of probability; for the use of the latter is to argue from one event to the other on the basis of limited knowledge, not to argue from one to another in the light of 'complete' knowledge. With the recognition of this distinction must disappear the whole claim to elucidate causal judgments with the help of the notion of increased probability, or indeed of probability at all.

(iv) Changing the risk. According to a version of the adequacy theory favoured by Enneccerus[1] a condition may be the adequate cause of an event, without increasing the risk of it, if it has changed the risk of it. 'Changing the risk' here means that, though the probability of the harm may not be greater than before, the factors other than the wrongful act which, in conjunction with it, will suffice to produce the harm, and which may be present, are different. Thus the seller who without urgent reason disregards the buyer's instructions as to delivery, by sending the goods by a different route, is responsible for the destruction of the goods on that route. This is intended to support Enneccerus's thesis that even when the law places the risk of loss on one of the parties, liability depends on the establishment of causal connexion between a breach of contract or tort and the loss.[2] But the words of the sections to which he refers are against this construction, for two of the three sections expressly state that the defendant is liable for loss even though it occurs through accident or coincidence in such cases.[3] Enneccerus says that although change of risk is sufficient to make a condition the adequate cause of an event, the condition is not an adequate cause if it is entirely indifferent or immaterial from the point of view of the event; an example of this is sending goods by one of two alternative rail routes from Frankfurt to Berlin. It is not easy to see why the risk is not changed in this case, for though the main possibility of harm to the goods may still be from, let us say, derailment, there is a difference between derailment on one line and on another. It is indeed difficult to imagine any condition of an event which does not 'change the risk' of it. Enneccerus's view can logically only lead back to the theory of conditions.

(v) The calculation of the probabilities. The matters here dealt with are the laws of principles available, the time at which the judgment of probability is to be made and the person making it.

The generalizations on the basis of which judgments of probability are to be made in order to apply the adequacy theory are discussed by the writers under the rubric 'nomological considerations'.[4] The view which clearly accords with von Kries's theory is that the estimate of probabilities should be based on the best available evidence; this includes all the known generalizations about the frequencies of the relevant classes. Thus the Reichsgericht said that adequacy must be judged from the standpoint of one who has at his disposal all the experience and knowledge of mankind,[5] and Engisch speaks of 'maximum knowledge of laws'.[6] The generalizations are not confined to the teachings of everyday experience but include those known only to experts and the Bundesgerichtshof has said that all experience available at the date of judgment should be taken into account.[7]

However, some writers consider that only those generalizations known at the time of the wrongful act should be taken into account, not those discovered later.[8] The reason given is the familiar one that for purposes of a normative judgment no attention should be paid to matters which could not have been taken into account by the actor.[9] But this also applies to expert knowledge of laws discovered before the act, which the actor did not know or could not discover. Rumelin therefore argues that all laws which were not available to ordinary human experience should be excluded and expert knowledge should be admitted for purposes of calculation only if an average expert would know them; for example, medical laws so far as an average doctor would know them.[1]

But these views strike at the roots of the adequacy theory, for they destroy its claim to base causal judgments on 'objective relations', which would require use of the best evidence of the relative frequencies available at the time of judgment, and not mistaken estimates of them which would have been made by a person with defective knowledge of natural laws. Hence to place typhus germs in one's wife's food was said not to be the adequate cause of her death when the bacillary theory of disease was not well established.[2] Surely this is an affront to the common-sense standards of judgment which the adequacy theory purports to respect, for a lawyer would ordinarily say that in such a case the husband's act was the cause of the death but that the element of fault or mens rea was lacking.

There has also been discussion of the person who is notionally to make the judgment of probability. According to Rumelin the judge, representing the average man, must estimate probabilities from his own knowledge of natural laws and his own experience, whereas Thon[3] considers that the judgment of a normal man should be taken. These are but further ways of restricting the evidence of the probabilities to be taken into account.

The only view really compatible with the adequacy theory is that all laws and all experiences should be used to make the best possible estimate of the probabilities; if a more accurate estimate is possible at the time of judgment than at the time of the wrongful act, so much the better. In the terminology of the German writers, 'ontological' restrictions, which affect the description of the wrongful act, can be admitted but nomological restrictions cannot.

(vi) Difficult cases. In this section we consider a number of cases which create real or apparent difficulty for the adequacy theory.

When the law places the risk of a defined loss on one of the parties[4] the adequacy theory cannot be applied; but if one abandons the view of Enneccerus[5] that in such cases causal connexion as analysed by the adequacy theory is an element and it is accepted that the wrongful act need only be a necessary condition of the harm, this difficulty is avoided.

The relation of the adequacy theory to intervening events, whether normal or amounting, in conjunction with the wrongful act, to coincidences, may create awkwardness. If accused gives the victim a slight wound and the wounded person is involved in a road accident on the way to the doctor, von Kries says that it is unjust to hold accused responsible for a crime aggravated by its consequences, such as malicious wounding with fatal consequences, and that the adequacy theory avoids this injustice.[6] In this case the light wound may not have significantly increased the risk of death and there is an intervening coincidence, so that the same result is achieved whether the adequacy theory or common-sense principles are applied. But if accused gives the victim a heavy blow which, however, does not immediately kill him and the victim is involved in a fatal accident on the way to the doctor, the adequacy theory requires that the death should be treated as the consequence of the blow. Such cases present difficulty on any theory of causation and responsibility.[7]

A problem of this sort arose in a case in which the defendant had undertaken to keep the plaintiff's goods 'absolutely dry'. He left them, however, at ground level in open sheds. A dam burst and the goods were flooded. The plaintiff claimed damages and alleged that the goods should have been stored on the first floor where they would have been safe. Here it would appear that the storage on the ground increased the risk of damage to the goods but the damage was caused by an act of God or coincidence, i.e. the bursting of the dam. The Reichsgericht held that the storage on the ground floor was wrongful, since there was a danger of humidity at ground level, but that the loss was not caused by the wrong.[8] The reason given was metaphorically expressed; the damage did not 'lie in the direction' of the obligation and the causal relation was 'broken' by an event amounting to force majeure. The decision, though supposed to be an application of the adequacy theory, appears easier to reconcile with common-sense causal principles than with the adequacy theory.

We have already set out the facts of a famous decision of the German courts in the case of the Cuxhaven lighters.[1] Here the court concluded that the delay of one day in the towing significantly increased the risk of damage to the ships. The case resembles the Monarch[2] case in English law, where it was held, though not in very clear language, that the outbreak of war and consequent diversion of the plaintiff's ship were not factors which negatived causal connexion between the wrongful delay caused by the defendants and the expenses incurred because of the ship's diversion. The Monarch can be justified on common-sense principles since the outbreak of war was much more likely when the ship arrived than when she should have arrived; and the Cuxhaven case could, perhaps, also be justified on the ground that the storm was much more likely on the 29th of October than on the 28th. On these facts the increase in the risk of the ultimate harm, which makes the condition adequate, and the increase in the likelihood of the intervening event, which is required for responsibility in common law systems, concur.

In other cases the wrongful act may not significantly increase the risk of harm but the harm may nevertheless occur without the intervention of an act of God or coincidence. Thus to give a man a slight scratch on the finger may not significantly increase the risk of death but nevertheless the finger might become infected; amputation might be necessary; the anaesthetist might be slightly careless and give the victim an overdose from which he died. It might be impossible to point to an intervening event which amounted to a coincidence and hence, from a common-sense point of view, the death might be treated as the consequence of the scratch although the scratch was not adequate for it. This is particularly likely when it is natural to describe the events in terms of a 'chain'—i.e. a series each connected to the preceding event as necessary condition to consequence. Some may feel that common-sense principles lead to injustice here; but the elements of fault or mens rea are intended to remedy any possible injustice.

Maurach propounds a difficult case.[3] Suppose that A and B each independently and without the knowledge of the other put half a lethal dose of poison in C's glass; C drinks the contents and dies. By the theory of conditions both A and B have caused C's death; by the adequacy theory neither has, since half a lethal dose does not significantly increase the risk of death. From a common-sense point of view the problem is to decide whether for each actor the fact that the other places a similar dose in the glass is to be treated as an intervening coincidental event or a circumstance of the act. One answer might be that the first actor has not caused C's death, since the act of the second was a coincidence negativing causal connexion; but the doctrine that an abnormal condition of the person or thing affected existing at the time of the act does not negative causal connexion might be extended to make the second actor liable.[4]

The difficulties of the adequacy theory in dealing with intervening coincidental events are also felt in dealing with unnatural or unreasonable reaction of animals or men. Thus, if A wounds B by a heavy blow and B is treated for his wound by a doctor in a way contrary to the most elementary rules of medicine, so that B dies, A's act is by the strict adequacy theory the cause of B's death; but the Reichsgericht made an exception to this when the doctor 'contrary to all medical rules and experience is guilty of a gross failure to take into account the elementary requirements of reasonable and reliable medical procedure';[5] in this case the further harm is not adequately caused by the orig-

The case concerned an action against a doctor for the injury done to the patient when, through his failure to make a proper diagnosis, the patient went to hospital where he received further unskilful, but not outrageously unskilful, treatment. inal injury. This illustrates the Protean character of the adequacy theory, for this result can only be reached by defining the harm as 'injury caused by gross medical mistakes'. Even so, it does not follow that, because such gross mistakes are happily rare, defendant's act did not appreciably increase the chances that one would occur. The increase in the risk may be great though the resultant probability is small; there is a standing danger of confusion, in the adequacy theory, between the notion of a substantial increase of the risk and that of increasing the risk to a substantial one. In any case it appears that the adequacy theory is once again surreptitiously filching the principles of common sense, for why should mistakes contrary to the nature of medicine be selected for incorporation in the description of the consequence rather than say, the routine mistakes of anaesthetists in administering anaesthetics or of nurses in handling round tea?[1]

Voluntary interventions may also be a source of difficulty for the adequacy theory. In one case[2] the security police wrongfully arrested deceased and while he was being transported under arrest he was (apparently) deliberately shot by a member of the force. It was argued that the defendant, who procured the arrest, was vicariously responsible for the act of arrest but not for the shooting. Hence plaintiff, widow of the deceased, argued that the shooting was the consequence of the arrest. The court rejected this argument, stating the adequacy theory in the form that conduct is only the adequate cause of an event if it has a tendency in the light of experience to bring about a consequence of the kind in question;[3] and decided that the arrest was not the adequate cause of the shooting; only the conduct of the security officers who shot deceased could be considered its cause.[4] This last observation is from a common-sense point of view correct but can hardly be derived from the adequacy theory. It is arguable that the arrest of someone during a time of civil disturbance does significantly increase the risk of his being shot, for example, while he or others are resisting arrest or while attempts at rescue are made; so that on the adequacy theory the decision should have been otherwise. If it is answered that arrest does not increase appreciably the risk of voluntary shooting, this, whether true or not, depends once more on the incorporation into the description of the consequence of a feature which is relevant to common-sense causal judgments.[5]

There is much the same divergence between the adequacy theory and common-sense principles in the case of voluntary interventions as for coincidences. The consequence may be of the same general kind of which the wrongful act increased the risk, yet may come about through a voluntary intervention. Thus accused may give the victim a heavy blow and leave him at the side of the road where a passing stranger murders him. On the other hand the wrongful act may not significantly increase the risk of the consequence, which may nevertheless occur through the concurrence of non-voluntary acts of others. Thus, the accused may give the victim a light blow which, owing to the victim's susceptibility, knocks him out so that he lies in the road where he is accidentally run over by a passing car, and killed. Here the death is the consequence of the light blow on common-sense principles[6] but not on the adequacy theory.

(vii) Relation of adequacy to the 'normal course of events'. It remains to note that the courts which apply the adequacy theory for the most part shift freely from asserting that causal connexion exists because the act significantly increased the risk of the harm to asserting that it exists because the harm occurred in the normal course of events and in accordance with human experience.[7] In cases of preexisting susceptibility of the victim the test of increased risk is more likely to lead to responsibility being affirmed than that of the normal course of events. Thus it has been held that when a horse hit a man on the head and he suffered damage to his health the previous morbid nervous predisposition did not affect causal connexion.[1] A similar result was reached when a man suffering from heart disease was unexpectedly killed through rough handling by a police officer.[2] The notion of increased risk is also used to explain why recovery is often allowed for neurosis following bodily injury to the plaintiff,[3] or a child of the plaintiff.[4] On the other hand when the court wished to deny recovery to the owner of a mink farm for his loss when, owing to the noise of the defendant's aircraft, the mother mink killed their young, it gave as a reason that under normal circumstances harm of this sort does not follow such noise and vibration,[5] thus making use not of the notion of increased risk but of that of the normal course of events and using a narrow description of the consequences.

[5] The decision in R.G.Z. 135 (1932), 144, 154, holding defendant vicariously liable for the negligence of an employee in failing to guard a car, so that an unlicensed mechanic drove it away and injured the plaintiff, turns on the existence of a duty to guard against the voluntary act of the mechanic.

In this way the courts preserve a certain flexibility of approach and are able to achieve results which on the whole are acceptable to common sense by applying at times the notion of increased risk, at others that of normality. But this proves only that the adequacy theory is tolerable provided it is supplemented by common-sense tests whenever it would give inconvenient results.

III. Limitation of Responsibility by Reference to Common-Sense Causal Principles

In the nineteenth century, Kostlin[6] was one of the few writers who stressed the importance in the law of a characterization of those factors which negative causal connexion. However, several writers and courts have attributed some importance to the breaking[7] or interruption[8] of causal connexion owing to the intervention of a new causal sequence.[9] Thus Ferrer[10] sums up the decisions of the Spanish supreme court in criminal cases as follows: 'This investigation leads us to the result that the objective nexus of production is negatived only when there has intervened later the wilful or gravely culpable act of a third person or the intentional or grossly negligent act of the victim.' On the other hand the Spanish courts hold that the preexisting susceptibility of the victim does not negative causal connexion,[11] as when he has suffered previous injuries.[12] The negativing factors are called 'extraneous accidents'[13] and one may assume that they would include acts of God and coincidences though there do not seem to be any clear criminal law decisions on this point. In much more metaphorical language, the Spanish supreme court in civil cases has recommended to inferior tribunals in solving causal problems to attend to the purpose of the rule of law in question and continued: 'or even, what is less difficult, it will be sufficient for the court to direct its course of action towards the evaluation of those conditions or circumstances which common sense in each case may mark as indicative of responsibility, within the infinite chain of causes and effects'.[14]

The Reichsgericht and several German writers[15] at one time appeared to take the view that a new 'causal sequence' negatives causal connexion. The Reichsgericht did this in certain cases of procedural fraud[16] at a time when the court was not bound to accept the uncontradicted evidence of a party to civil proceedings. In several prosecutions for the giving of fraudulent evidence in civil proceedings resulting in damage to the victim, the Reichsgericht held that the acceptance by the court of the evidence was an independent causal sequence which interrupted causal connexion between the fraud and the damage to the party who lost the action. Here of course the court was deceived by the false evidence, so that its acceptance of the evidence was not fully voluntary.[1] Later, the rules of procedure having been changed, the Reichsgericht decided differently in a similar case while repeating that the 'causal sequence' doctrine would apply to a case in which the judge decided not on the evidence but on other grounds. But then the false evidence would not be a necessary condition of the harm.

The argument about 'interrupting' causal connexion has mainly centred about voluntary acts. We discussed in connexion with the theory of conditions Frank's notion of Regressverbot,[2] that it is forbidden to inquire into the causes of a voluntary act and so to go behind a voluntary act in the search for a cause. Enneccerus is inconsistent in his attitude to the notion of 'breaking causal connexion' by voluntary acts; for, as a theory of causation, he condemns the notion,[3] yet he asserts that causal connexion is 'broken' when the immediate cause of a consequence is the 'independent act of a man resting on his own free decision',[4] though he makes certain reservations which, however, only amount to a preference for a narrow sense of 'voluntary' such as we ourselves propose. How this is reconciled with the adequacy theory or the theory of conditions remains obscure. In one case defendant's predecessor fraudulently misrepresented the earnings of a firm during the previous year and induced plaintiff thereby to purchase a business jointly with X. X defrauded the plaintiff in the management of the business and fled abroad. An action to claim compensation for the damage suffered through X's fraud failed, for though the fraudulent misrepresentation was a necessary condition of the loss the connexion was held so 'remote' that it could not reasonably be taken into account.[5] No reference was made in the Reichsgericht to the voluntary character of the intervening act.

From this survey it will be clear that though there are intermittent references by continental lawyers to certain factors negativing or interrupting or breaking causal connexion they are, so to speak, foreign bodies embedded in other material, and their presence is to be explained by the fact that it is impossible entirely to suppress the promptings of common sense.

Scandinavian Countries

Question 5:

Chapter 5 of the Proposed Federal Criminal Code[6] covers the age of criminal responsibility, mental diseases and defects, and intoxication. These subjects are also kept together in Scandinavian criminal law, but it is usually done under the heading of personal prerequisites for punishment, rather than under the Ango-American heading of a specific defense. This difference in terminology does not imply radically different concepts, but rather a somewhat different approach. Scandinavian linguistic usage indicates that the defendant does not have the full burden of proof for these matters. It also indicates that the physical person of the defendant (as represented through fingerprints, photographs, blood tests, etc.) in Scandinavian countries is considered on a par with the other evidence which is produced through the criminal investigation.[7] The Scandinavian defendant has the same right to refuse intellectual cooperation (e.g., to make incriminating statements, etc.) as has his Anglo-American counterpart. However, it cannot be said that he directly has the right to avail himself of the defense of insanity, or to reject a psychiatric examination. Hence, it is not usual in Scandinavia to directly classify these personal prerequisites for punishment as affirmative defenses, even though in practice they are often used in a somewhat similar way as is a defense in an Anglo-American court.

The Norwegian minimum age for criminal responsibility is 14 years, while the Danish and Swedish minimum age is 15 years.[1] The latter is rather close to the 15–16 years minimum age in Section 501 of the Proposed Federal Criminal Code.[2] Scandinavian juvenile delinquents (up to 18–21 years of age) are mostly dealt with by administrative agencies, rather than by the courts. The matter of intoxication (Sec. 502 of the Proposed Federal Criminal Code) is discussed under Question No. 6, and the main subject of this discussion under Question No. 5 will consequently be the defendant's mental diseases and defects (Sec. 503 of the Proposed Federal Criminal Code) Section A on mental diseases and defects describes how concepts such as insanity and unconsciousness in the Scandinavian countries are primarily understood to be medical, i.e., psychiatric, concepts. Norway, as Professor Andenaes discusses it in Appendix A,[3] prefers a strictly medical concept of insanity, while Denmark and Sweden use mixed medical-social concepts of insanity. Section B is a discussion of the actual provisions in the Scandinavian criminal codes, and the translations of these provisions are appended as Appendix B. Section C deals primarily with the procedural problems of producing psychiatric evidence in a practical way, and the relevant Norwegian and Swedish procedural provisions are appended as Appendix C. Finally, Section D contains a discussion of the Scandinavian reactions to the situation where the defendant has been acquitted, or where his criminal liability has been diminished, because of a lack of mental capacity.

A. Mental Disease and Defects

The idea that mental diseases and defects in their most outspoken forms ought to preclude criminal punishment has old roots in Scandinavian law. However, it was around the beginning of the 17th century that the opinion that insanity directly precluded criminal responsibility was generally accepted. Psychiatry developed into an independent discipline around 1800 and the philosophical theories about free will seem to have become generally accepted as the legal justification for exempting clearly insane persons from criminal responsibility at about the same time.[4] However, this philosophical concept of free will was generally rejected during the latter part of the 19th century. The German scholar Franz von Lizt,[5] who suggested basing criminal law on the best available results from the empirical sciences rather than on philosophical concepts, has had a very considerable impact on Scandinavian jurisprudence. There is, as implied by Andenaes,[6] a tendency in literature to define the reasons for irresponsibility as being either biological (also called medical) or psychological (also called metaphysical) or possibly a mixture of both. However, this report prefers narrower terms, such as medical (psychiatric).

The Scandinavian criminal codes do not attempt to define concepts such as insanity or unconsciousness. However, it is clear from legislative history, and from practice, that Scandinavian courts basically accept and apply the medical (psychiatric) criteria for mental diseases and defects. The courts usually prefer to use proper medical terms, such as psychosis, neurosis, psychopathy, defects of intelligence, and the like. The relatively minor differences between the individual countries are discussed below. It should be stressed here that Scandinavian courts normally impose measures for the purpose of safety, and this includes measures for the protection of public safety, when they omit or reduce punishment because of the lack or diminution of mental capacity. The question of insanity normally does not have quite the same importance in the Scandinavian courtroom, as it often has in the Anglo-American courtroom, because such safety measures may be, and very often are, applied to Scandinavian criminals who are mentally defective, even though they cannot be characterized as having been totally insane or completely without lucidity when they committed their crimes.

1. Norway

The full texts of the relevant provisions of the Scandinavian criminal codes are to be found in Appendix B. The most essential Norwegian provisions are repeated here, because they illustrate the Scandinavian approach to mental diseases and defects very well:

Sec. 44. An act is not punishable if committed while the perpetrator was insane or unconscious.

Sec. 56. Subsec. 1. The court may reduce the punishment below the minimum provided for the offense and commute it to a milder form of punishment:

(a) (irrelevant)

(b) when the act is committed in justifiable anger, under compulsion or imminent danger or during strong reduction of consciousness not due to voluntary intoxication.

Sec. 39. Subsec. 1. If an otherwise punishable act is committed in a state of insanity or unconsciousness, or if an act is committed during unconsciousness due to voluntary intoxication (Sec. 45) or during temporarily reduced consciousness or by someone with underdeveloped or permanently impaired mental capacity, and there is danger that the perpetrator, because of his condition, will repeat such an act, the court may decide that, for the purpose of safety, the prosecution shall:

(a) assign or forbid him a certain place of residence,

(b) place him under supervision of the police or a specially appointed probation officer and order him to report to the police or the probation officer at designated intervals,

(c) forbid him to consume alcoholic beverages,

(d) place him in reliable, private care,

(e) place him in a mental hospital, sanatorium, nursing home, or workhouse, where possible, in accordance with general provisions promulgated by the King,

(f) keep him in custody [in prison].

Subsec. 2. If such condition involves danger of acts of the kind covered by sections 148, 149, 152 par. 2, 153, pars. 1–3, 154, 155, 159, 160, 161, 192–198, 200, 206, 212, 217, 224, 225, 227, 230, 231, 233, 245, par. 1, 258, 266, 267, 268 or 292 the court must decide to apply the security measures mentioned above.

Subsec. 3. These measures are terminated when they are no longer regarded as necessary, but may be resumed if there should be reason to do so. The security measures listed under (a)–(d) may be employed concurrently.

The court shall determine the maximum period for which security measures may be imposed without its further consent.

Subsec. 4. If the court has not decided otherwise, the prosecution may choose between the above-mentioned security measures.

The decision to terminate, resume or alter a security measure is made by the ministry [of justice] Before a decision about security measures or their termination is made, the opinion of a medical specialist must ordinarily be obtained. The same procedure should be followed at regular intervals during the period in which security measures are in force.

Subsec. 5. If security measures, as mentioned in Subsection 1 above, are imposed, the Ministry [of Justice] may decide to forego all or part of the punishment to which a transgressor might be sentenced.

(See Appendix B for the remainder of Sec. 39 a & b).

These Norwegian provisions date back to 1929, and are discussed in some detail by Professor Andenaes in Appendix A. Here it is only mentioned that it seems generally agreed that Norway uses a clearcut medical (psychiatric) criterion for mental diseases and defects, and that the Norwegian Government issued the following official justification for the 1929 amendment of the Penal Code:[1]

. . . This old idea of punishment as an ethical retribution is now abandoned by most, and is quite unfit as a basis for the foundation of a rational penal law. Punishment should not provide retribution but a method of protecting society, and any decision as to the nature and amount of the punishment must therefore be based upon the determination of what best protects society. . . . Under this principle, it is easy to see that there is no reason to punish partially defective persons less than others. Defective persons are often the most dangerous ones, and of course it is not possible to argue that they will be more easily influenced by punishment than full normal persons, and therefore need less.

2. Denmark

The primary provisions on mental diseases and defects in the Danish Criminal Code are Sections 16, 17, and 70. The wording differs from the Norwegian provisions, but very similar approaches exist. The main difference is the concept of mental diseases and defects which, in Danish jurisprudence, is normally described as being a mixed medical-social criterion. The majority of the Royal Commission which prepared the draft of the present Criminal Code of 1930 suggested a clearcut medical criterion similar to the Norwegian. However, the Danish legislature followed a minority of the commission which wanted to give the courts more latitude. The minority used the term "social evaluation" and explained it by referring to the concept of normalcy which is generally accepted by society, and which at times differs from the medical (psychiatric) concept. The minority also referred to cases where it had been proved that certain insane persons could react completely normally to punishment or to the prospect of punishment. The minority preferred punishment in such cases and also in borderline cases where there was a possibility that punishment would serve its purpose. It also preferred the least burdensome solution for the defendant in case there was a choice between security measures and regular punishment.[1] It is quite clear that Denmark (and Sweden) use a mixed medical-social criterion in the described sense, but it is also quite clear from case law that by far the largest number of cases are decided squarly on the basis of the medical evidence alone.

The leading Danish writers state correctly that this freedom of the courts has not been used to attempt to reintroduce the previous theories about free will, or to introduce psychological criteria such as the psychological criteria suggested by Section 21 of the proposed (1960) German Criminal Code or the English M'Naughten rule.[2] However, even the very limited Danish and Swedish use of social evaluation does, from a theoretical point of view, justify Andenaes' statement[3] that practically all systems other than the Norwegian apply mixed biological (medical) and psychological criteria. Hence, this report states that Scandinavian courts basically accept and apply the medical (psychiatric) criteria for mental diseases and defects.

3. Sweden

It has already been mentioned that the basic Swedish approach to mental diseases and defects is similar to that of Denmark and Norway, and that the Swedish courts, like the Danish, apply a mixed medical (psychiatric)-social concept of insanity. The key Swedish provision is to be found in Chapter 33, Section 2, of the Swedish Penal Code: (See Appendix B)

For a crime which some one has committed under the influence of mental disease, feeblemindedness or other mental abnormality of such profound nature that it must be considered equivalent to mental disease, no other sanction may be applied than surrender for special care or, in cases specified in the second paragraph, fine or probation.

Fines may be imposed if they are found answering the purpose of deterring the defendant from further criminality. Probation may be imposed if in the view of the circumstances such sanction is considered more appropriate than special care; in such cases treatment provided for in Chapter 28, Section 3, may not be prescribed.

The defendant shall be free of sanctions if it is found that a sanction mentioned in this Section should not be imposed.

This provision is to be found in Chapter 33 on "Reduction and Exclusion of Sanctions." In other words, Sweden, from a theoretical point of view, considers mental diseases and defects as merely an exclusion from punishment while the absence of more serious mental diseases and defects in Denmark and Norway are considered as a prerequisite for punishment. The Swedish Penal Code of 1965 is the newest of the Scandinavian codes, and it seems to contain the best description of Scandinavian law about this matter. The Scandinavian choice is practically always between general imprisonment, specialized imprisonment, or treatment. It occurs extremely seldom in Scandinavian criminal cases concerning a defendant with mental diseases and defects, that there is a choice between general punishment or no sanctions whatsoever.[1]

C. Psychiatric Examinations

Scandinavian criminal procedure is, as a general rule, based on the principle of adversary proceedings in a way which is rather similar to Anglo-American criminal procedure. Scandinavian criminal procedure before the reforms in the middle of the 19th century was greatly influenced by church law, and was definitely based more on the inquisitorial principle than was its Anglo-American counterpart. It is probably a result of this historical development that Scandinavian judges seem to be more inclined to ask questions directly of parties and witnesses than Anglo-American judges. There are a very few and strictly limited areas where it is primarily the court which has the duty to produce the evidence. The most important of these may be said to be expert evidence, even though it somewhat oversimplifies the problem. Scandinavian parties do have a right to produce their own evidence, but this right is practically never used. Normally the experts are appointed permanently, e.g., a district physician (public health), or they are appointed by the court for the individual case. Much emphasis is placed on the fact that both kinds of experts owe their loyalty to the court, rather than to the parties, and they are normally renumerated by the judiciary rather than by the prosecution or the defense.

Psychiatric examinations in Norway are described in some detail by Professor Andenaes in Appendix A (p. 259–260), and this discussion is representative of Denmark and Sweden as well. It should especially be noted that written reports from experts in more serious cases are sent to the statewide Commission on Forensic Medicine, and that the Commission provides guidance about the pros and cons if the examining experts should not be in complete agreement. The court is still free regarding the weight it will give to the medical evidence, but experience has shown that courts are inclined to follow the advice of their own experts.

The Norwegian[2] and the Swedish[3] procedural provisions about expert witnesses are included in Appendix C. The rather similar Danish provisions are not available in translation.

D. Does the Scandinavian Administration of Criminal Justice in regard to Mental Diseases and Defects Work?

Scandinavian criminal law, as described above, relies heavily on the medical (psychiatric) expert testimony on the question of mental diseases or defects, but how does the system work in practice? The answer is that it is probably impossible to design a completely perfect system, but that the Scandinavian approach, in the opinion of this writer, works better than the Anglo-American. However, at least two preconditions for this answer exist, and it may be impossible to meet these preconditions in the Anglo-American system. It would probably be difficult to win acceptance of procedural rules which completely eliminate the possibilities of provoking a "battle by experts" in the courtroom. We are traditionally more bound to the adversary principle, and not even the Scandinavian countries have gone as far as to prohibit the parties completely from producing their own medical (psychiatric) evidence. The other precondition refers to an attitude that some reaction or sanction normally has to be implemented in dealing with insane criminals. Denmark and Norway still formally provide acquittal because of insanity, while as discussed above, Sweden merely considers insanity as a reason for exemption from punishment. At any rate, well established Scandinavian practice, indicates that extremely seldom does a choice exist between general punishment on the one hand and complete acquittal without any sanctions or reactions on the other. The normal situation in the Scandinavian courtroom for more serious offenses is a choice between general imprisonment, specialized imprisonment (with good treatment facilities) or treatment.[1] The latter is normally given in a hospital and in such a way that consent by the court is necessary before any release may be implemented. The confined person has the right to a remedy which is similar to our habeas corpus proceedings.

(By Johannes Andenæs, Dr. Jur.; Translated by Thomas P. Ogle, LL.B.)

Personal Prerequisites for Punishment

I. The concept of responsibility

Criminal responsibility assumes a certain degree of mental health and maturity in the actor. If a person fulfills these requirements, he is criminally responsible; otherwise, he is not. The Penal Code does not use the expressions responsible and irresponsible, but they are part of traditional legal terminology. Instead of responsibility, we could speak about the faculty of punishable guilt. Only protective measures without penal character may be imposed on criminally irresponsible persons.

Attempts have been made to give a positive description of the nature of responsibility. The best known among these is the definition by v. Liszt: "Responsibility is the normal ability to be influenced by motives."[2] This points in the right direction, but it gives little help because it does not say how great the departure from the normal must be before irresponsibility can be said to exist. Both our laws and foreign laws confine themselves to stating what special circumstances preclude responsibility. Thus, responsibility is the norm; irresponsibility is something which requires special reasons. The delimitations of irresponsibility are different in various jurisdictions, and thus it is impossble to give a universal definition of responsibility and irresponsibility.

Various systems

One usually distinguishes between three different systems of defining the reasons for irresponsibility: the biological (also called the medical), the psychological (also called the metaphysical), and the mixed. According to the biological systems, the law describes the conditions which preclude responsibility by biological and medical terms (age, insanity, unconsciousness). According to the psychological system, the determining factor is the person's capacity for insight and free decision—the expressions vary greatly. According to the mixed system, both types of characteristics are used.

The Penal Code of 1902 originally had a mixed system. After the 1929 revision of the provisions on responsibility, however, it rests completely on a biological basis. It recognizes three reasons for irresponsibility: (1) insanity, including extreme feeble-mindedness; (2) unconsciousness, except when it is a consequence of voluntary intoxication; (3) age of less than fourteen years. According to Norwegian law, therefore, a person is responsible if he is over fourteen years of age, and is neither insane nor unconscious because of reasons other than voluntary intoxication.

Most foreign legal systems have a mixed system. A typical example is the German Penal Code of 1871, which has the following provision on responsibility in its § 51: "1. No act constitutes an offense if its perpetrator at the time of its commission was incapable of appreciating the unlawfulness of his deed or of acting in accordance with such appreciation, by reason of derangement of the senses, morbid disturbance of mental activity or mental deficiency." The Swiss Penal Code of 1937 has a very similar provision.

Such a definition limits the area of irresponsibility more than does our law. Illness must not only exist, but it must in addition either exclude understanding of the unlawfulness, or of the ability to act according to the understanding. Insight into the illegal character of the act can be said to be of a psychological nature. The ability to act according to this insight is a metaphysical matter. The law presupposes that the normal person has such a power, and thus it builds upon an indeterministic hypothesis. It further presupposes that the insane person may lack this power, but it gives no real assistance to the determination of when this is the case. In some respects, the German concept of irresponsibility is broader than ours. It does not require insanity or unconsciousness; moreover, mental disturbances of a lesser kind may exempt from punishment if they have excluded the appreciation of the unlawfulness of the act, or the ability to act in accordance with such appreciation. Furthermore, it treats disturbances of consciousness caused by intoxication according to the exact same rules which govern other disturbances of consciousness.

The reasons for irresponsibility recognized by our law are of a greatly different nature. While insanity and unconsciousness are conditions of illness, or at least of abnormality, youth is a part of the normal development of the individual. Only in a comparison with the fully developed individual can one say that the child lacks normal qualifications. Unconsciousness is in a special position because it is usually a transitory condition, in contrast to the other reasons for irresponsibility. Unconsciousness due to voluntary intoxication does not preclude responsibility according to our law, not because it is psychologically different from other forms of unconsciousness, but purely for policy reasons.

The reason for the requirement of responsibility

The requirement of responsibility can be justified in different ways.

The starting point can be that it is unjust to punish one who acts under the influence of illness or disturbances of the consciousness. He cannot be regarded as responsible for his acts. And almost the same reason applies to one who has not yet reached a certain degree of maturity. This concept rests, consciously or unconsciously, on an indeterministic view. The thought here is that the normal person "can be blamed" for his acts, while the irresponsible person cannot. Thus, if society must be protected against the irresponsible person, provisions must be used which are not condemnatory and which do not have the infliction of suffering for their purpose.

However, one may also take practical policy considerations as a starting point. From an individual preventive point of view, punishment is not suitable to the groups which are involved here. Insane and feeble-minded persons can be more effectively cared for in special institutions than in prisons. As to delinquent children, education is more apt than punishment. From a general preventive point of view, the imposition of punishment upon persons who lack the capacity to be influenced by the penal threat serves no reasonable purpose. The exclusion of such persons from criminal liability will not lessen the effectiveness of punishment as a means of social control.

Thus, different points of view lead to the same result: certain mental conditions must exist before punishment may be imposed. On the other hand, the precise definition of irresponsibility may differ according to which viewpoint is adopted. Our prevailing rules have been created on the basis of an historical development, in which considerations of justice, general prevention, and individual prevention, have all had an influence.

II. Responsibility must exist at the moment of action

Responsibility must exist at the time the offence is committed. If the actor was insane, unconscious or under fourteen years of age at the moment of action, he cannot be punished even though the state of irresponsibility ends before the case comes before the court. By the same reasoning, if he was responsible at the moment of action, criminal liability will not terminate if he later becomes insane. The fact that the time of action is always determinative shows that treatment considerations have not been the primary basis for the formation of the rules.

As long as the perpetrator is insane, however, procedural rules preclude prosecution against him (Code of Criminal Procedure, § 285). If he becomes insane after sentencing, but before execution of the sentence, the punishment cannot be executed (Code of Criminal Procedue, § 474). If the serving of the sentence has already started when he becomes insane, he should be transferred to a mental institution (see the Prison Act of December 12, 1958, § 33).

A strange case is adjudicated in a Supreme Court decision in Rt. 1948, p. 1107. A Norwegian who worked as an interpreter for the German security police during the occupation was sentenced to death by the Assize Court for his participation in serious acts of torture. He had been insane for a while during custody, but he had not been insane at the time of the act, nor during the hearing of the case before the Assize Court. After he was sentenced to death, he again became insane, and the medical experts stated that there was no hope for a lasting improvement as long as the possibility of the death sentence lasted. In other words, there was no possibility of executing the death penalty unless the fact of his insanity at the moment of execution were to be disregarded. In accordance with this finding, the Supreme Court commuted the punishment to hard labour for life. The prisoner then recovered, so that the prison sentence could be executed.

It may happen that the criminal act itself is committed in a state of irresponsibility, but that the perpetrator could have foreseen this course of events at the outset. A traditional example is the following: A mother who knows that she usually throws herself back and forth in bed while asleep, nevertheless takes her child to bed with her, and crushes it to death in her sleep. She can be held liable for the course of events which she set into motion in a conscious state, just as a person who sets forces of nature in motion. In such cases one generally speaks about actiones liberae in causa, "acts which are free in their origin." One may impose liability for both intentional and negligent causation, depending on the actor's state of mind when setting the course of events into motion. Liability for an omission which has occurred while a person was in an irresponsible state may also be caused by a previous free action. Example: A railroad worker goes to sleep during working hours, the warning signal is not given, and an accident occurs.

§ 28. The Age of Criminal Responsibility

Children below fourteen years of age cannot be punished

"Nobody may be punished for an act committed before he has completed his fourteenth year" (Penal Code, § 46).

No personality change occurs, of course, at the moment a person becomes fourteen. The time of maturity varies from individual to individual; a boy of twelve or thirteen may be as mature as another of fourteen or fifteen. But there must be some limit, and the law has set it at a certain age for reasons of expedience, regardless of the individual's degree of maturity.

Educative measures for children

Obviously, the law must also have the opportunity to intervene when children below the age of criminal responsibility commit punishable acts, but this occurs in the form of educative measures, and not in the form of punishment (see the Child Welfare Act of July 17, 1953). Punishment of children by imprisonment is unfortunate and inhumane; fines imposed upon children will actually be a punishment of their parents. To a great extent, educational measures will also be used instead of punishment, even for children over fourteen years of age. Imprisonment of a fourteen-fifteen-year-old is hardly heard of any more. The criminal minimum age could be raised to sixteen or perhaps even higher, but in certain instances it can be expedient to have the possibility of imposing punishment, especially fines, for lesser offenses. If a fifteen-year-old messenger boy persistently violates traffic rules, it would be too drastic to place him in a reform school, but perhaps it is not enough merely to give him a warning. A reasonable fine which he would have to pay from his own earnings, however, would be remembered.

The opportunity to employ educative measures expires when the child has reached eighteen years of age (Child Welfare Act, § 16). Here the age when the sanction is imposed is determinative, not the age at the time of the action. If a thirteen-year-old commits a murder which is not discovered before he has become eighteen, the authorities have no basis for acting against him. However, if he is placed in a reform school before he becomes eighteen he can be held until he is twenty-one (Child Welfare Act, § 48).

§ 29. Insanity and Unconsciousness

I. Insanity

"An act is not punishable if committed while the perpetrator was insane or unconscious" (Penal Code § 44). 'Insanity," as the term is used in the law, has a wider meaning than it has in its ordinary usage. The expression includes the markedly mentally retarded as well as the actually insane. We shall consider first insanity proper, the psychoses.

1. Psychoses

A psychosis is an illness which affects the mind. Our knowledge about its causes is still rather limited. We know that certain psychoses are caused by purely organic processes in the brain, such as paralysis generalis, a psychosis which sometimes appears following syphilis. Head injuries and brain tumors may also cause psychic illnesses which must be classified as insanity.

In other cases, such as the most frequent forms of insanity, schizophrenia and manic-depression, external causes cannot be found. These mental diseases are connected to hereditary tendecies, but there are grounds for believing that purely emotional factors can also play a substantial part in their inception and development, without our knowing exactly what significance such factors have. Insanity is sometimes a mentally weak person's reaction to particular stresses, the so-called reactive psychoses. For example, there is the prison psychosis which may develop in susceptible indivduals in response to the fear, loneliness and insecurity which an imprisonment, especially a first imprisonment, may entail. Senility is also considered a mental disease when it is severe enough (dementia senilis).

I must refer to psychiatry for a description of the different psychoses. Insanity often attacks the intellectual faculties, the patient becomes dull and confused. In other cases intelligence may remain more or less intact, but the illness affects the person's emotional life. The patient may be heavily burdened with fears and guilt feelings without any ascertainable reasons. Or he may be unduly gay, cheerful and uncritical, and given to commit rash acts which bring him into conflict with the law. Moral decay is sometimes the most predominant trait. Older psychiatric textbooks even regard "moral insanity" to be a special form of insanity. This no longer corresponds to professional opinion; if the person shows no other signs of insanity, a poorly developed moral sense may rather be regarded as a psychopathic personality trait. In certain forms of insanity the patient has hallucinations; he sees visions or hears voices.

Mental illness varies just as much in degree as it does in kind. Many slightly psychotic persons get along reasonably well in free society. A layman might not even be able to observe anything unusual about their behavior, and therefore will be quite surprised when such a person is pronounced insane. These less serious forms of insanity have the greatest significance in criminal law, because the more obviously insane persons are often under treatment in some institution, and are thus excluded from free society.

Odegaard, in describing a mental hospital, gives a vivid picture of the great variations among the insane. "In some rooms, the deeply affected patients sit, unclean, unkempt, and practically without any ordered activity. One cannot converse with them; only when their empty expressions and withdrawn bearing are broken by a fit of rage can one suspect what is going on in their minds. Here, ethical decay is at its height: they take their neighbor's food, and, if the theft is discovered at all, the response may be a curse or a blow; they masturbate without embarrassment. Such conditions, however, are rare even here, and what characterizes the group is its maximum ethical passivity.

"But these rooms constitute the smallest part of the hospital. Communal life in many other sections can hardly be distinguished from that of any other well-organized dormitory, and the moral problems are the ordinary ones, neither more nor less. Theft is very rare despite the fact that, on the male side, 10–15 per cent. can have been convicted. Breaches of agreements are exceptions: promises to doctors and fellow patients are kept. Politeness and consideration are no more uncommon here than elsewhere. If something goes wrong, only a few would inform on a fellow patient, and solidarity is sometimes almost burdensome. If a conflict breaks out, self-control will not be lost any more than would be the case outside the walls. During the enemy occupation, the spirt was just about the same among the pateints as among the general population, although a few chronically querulous patients sought support from the new authorities."[1]

There is no clear line between insanity (psychosis) and other types of mental illness. "In the majority of cases, we can say with great certainty on which side of the line the patient is, and it would be quite wrong to say that there is an imperceptible transition between the normal and the insane. But there are nevertheless states where the transition is progressive, and where the dividing line is only a matter of opinion and judgment. And the worst part about this is that the uncertainty is not due to an imperfect examination technique (which could be corrected with time). There is no plain biological distinction between normal senility and a senility amounting to insanity, or between the reactive depression which must be considered neurotic and that which must be considered insane."[1] In addition to this uncertainty in the concept of insanity itself, there is the uncertainty resulting from the fact that the psychiatric expert has incomplete or unreliable materials on which to build. This is especially so when the expert must determine a person's mental condition at some earlier point in time, such as when the punishable act was committed. Similar difficulties arise in the civil law, as where, for example, the mental condition of a testator as of the time of signing the will must be determined.

Who is to be declared insane depends upon the current viewpoints and skills of psychiatry. The concept of responsibility thus shifts with the development of psychiatry. In older days, only the more extreme forms of insanity were recognized, and much of the idea that an insane person is one whom everybody recognizes to be mad still lingers on among the general public.

Insanity as a cause of criminality. The significance of insanity as a cause of criminality varies greatly among the different offenses. There is a large proportion of insane persons among the murderers in our country. A Norwegian study covering the twenty year period from 1930 to 1949 revealed that out of 104 murderers (of whom ninety-two had been psychiatrically examined) the experts found twenty-eight to be insane at the time of their acts.[2] Eighteen of these twenty-eight suffered from schizophrenia. Some of the insane suffered from a persecution complex and killed as a defensive measure against the imagined enemies. In other cases, the sick person had delusions of grandeur, believed that he was in direct communication with God, and acted on His behalf. Sometimes the motive for the killing is unexplainable from a normal psychological point of view; one of the patients explained that he killed because he wanted to be arrested so that he could be placed in a small room where he could survey his problems. Manic depressive murderers often regarded the future as so burdensome and gloomy that they thought it best to exterminate their whole family, and sometimes themselves as well.

As a rule, mental disease plays a much lesser role in offenses other than homicide, but each of the various forms of insanity has its typical criminal expression. Many paranoids make themselves persistently guilty of defamations and threats. In this category we find the incurable trouble-maker who fully believes that the whole world has ganged up on him, and who is strengthened in this belief with each new defeat he suffers. Senility due to old age (dementia senilis) not infrequently leads to indecent acts with small children. Other types of insanity can lead to theft or embezzlement, but such cases occur only infrequently.

2. The medical diagnosis is determinative

If the medical diagnosis is clear, then, under our penal law, penal inculpability is also clear, without any necessity of determining whether or not there is any connection between the mental illness and the punishable act. On the other hand if a disturbed mental condition cannot be characterized as insanity, the person is imputable even though the offense is a consequence of the condition (see Rt. 1940, p. 342). Both propositions are a consequence of the purely biological viewpoint of the law.

Objections to the biological principle. Certain objections can undoubtedly be raised against this solution. First, it is true that modern psychiatry rejects the concept of partial insanity. If a person is insane, the whole personality is affected. Nevertheless, it is far from true that insanity affects all areas of the mind in the same disturbing way, or that every act which the sick person performs is abnormally motivated. In some instances there is little likelihood of any connection between the mental affliction and the punishable act. Chronic querulants or insanely jealous persons may have such a highly developed system of delusions that the condition is characterized as insanity by the psychiatrists, although the person shows no other insane traits. If such a person is guilty of illegal distillation of spirits or price-transgressions, there is little reason to suppose that there is any connection between the mental illness and the act. The same is true if an habitual thief becomes insane and continues to steal as before. In civil law, the judge determines in the individual case whether or not the act of the insane person was precipitated by the sickness. Why cannot the same principle be followed in the penal law? When Sweden revised its rules on responsibility in 1945, it was made a requirement for impunity that the act be committed under the influence of the mental illness.[1]

Secondly, a person may be harmed as well as aided by a declaration that he is legally irresponsible. Many insane persons can get along well in free society, but if they are declared legally irresponsible, their freedom may have to be limited. "One can see persons with obvious, although minor, psychoses take care of their store sensibly and well, and it would thus seem somewhat unreasonable to declare them irresponsible if they start to cheat in their sales for the purpose of gain."[2] It seems especially odd, where breaches of the normal rules of daily life are involved, that a psychiatric examination should determine whether or not an individual can be fined.

The reasons for the principle. These objections have not been considered decisive in our law. Two main arguments to the contrary are advanced. First, one can never be sure that the insane person's act is normally motivated, even though it may appear to be, and the mere possibility of an insane motivation ought to be enough when such a serious matter as punishment is concerned. Secondly, from a treatment point of view, an insane person should never be put in a prison, but should rather be taken care of in a mental hospital, if necessary. This latter consideration does not apply, however, when only fines are involved, nor where the perpetrator has been cured of his mental illness by the time the case comes before the court.

Insanity may create a danger of new offenses. In such a case, the insane person will usually be kept in a mental hospital without any necessity of having a trial, according to the rules of the Mental Health Act of April 28, 1961, but he may also be sentenced to protective measures, according to the Penal Code, § 39.

II. Feeble-mindedness

Feeble-mindedness (oligophrenia) is an innate intellectual defect, or one acquired in earliest childhood. Certain mental diseases also affect the intellectual faculty, so that the individual's previous history must determine whether there exists insanity in the strict sense of the word, or feeble-mindedness. The causes of feeblemindedness can vary. The lesser degrees are most often hereditary, while the more serious types are generally due to external factors, such as brain-damage to the embryo, or to the child during birth, inflammation of the brain and hormone disturbances.

It is usual to set the limit for feeble-mindedness at an IQ of about seventy-five. But not all feeble-minded persons are criminally irresponsible. Only the extreme cases fall within the insanity concept of the penal law. Here, even more than in the case of mental illness, there are uncertain distinctions without any natural delimitation. In forensic psychiatric practice the limit has traditionally been drawn around an IQ of fifty. But this figure is not adhered to strictly; the decision in the individual case is made after an evaluation of the total personality, where the individual's character and ability for social adjustment also play a part. Feeble-mindedness which is not so pronounced as to free the perpetrator of imputability falls under the heading of "underdeveloped mental capacity," and may lead to the imposition of protective measures, instead of, or in addition to, punishment (Penal Code, § 39).

For the feeble-minded as well as for the insane, the diagnosis is made by general standards and not in relation to the perpetrator's ability to understand and evaluate the individual act. If he is penally imputable at all, he is so in all areas. However, intellectual development may be of significance in determining whether or not the perpetrator has acted with that guilt (intention of negligence) which the penal provision requires. For example, a person has bought stolen goods on the street at a very low price, and because of that is accused of receiving stolen goods. The judge will usually disregard the claim of good faith, if the accused is normally gifted, but he will not do so where an intellectually inferior person of the naive and simple-minded type is before him. Similarly, in cases where the normal person would be found negligent, the mentally defective person may be acquitted because he did not adequately understand the situation.

III. Unconsciousness

Unconsciousness is used in Penal Code, § 44, in a wider sense than in daily conversation. Normally, one thinks primarily of the unhealthy or abnormal conditions of unconsciousness, while sleep is also implied in the penal law. And while in daily usage one thinks about that condition where all ability of movement and perception is lacking, the complete coma, the expression in the penal law also includes a relative unconsciousness where the individual has his ability of movement intact, and also reacts to certain stimuli from his surroundings, but is otherwise blind and deaf, and acts without normal inhibitions. It may also be said that there is no functioning of the normal ego. These relative states of unconsciousness have the greatest significance in criminal law, since, under absolute unconsciousness, usually only offenses of omission can exist. Both the sleepwalker and the hypnotized person are unconscious according to the law. Other examples can be mentioned, such as fever deliria, exhaustion, epileptical confusion, disturbed consciousness in cases of concussion, hysterical fits, and abnormal intoxication. To a certain extent it is a matter of opinion where the line is to be drawn between reduced consciousness and unconsciousness.

Except for those states of intoxication which fall within Penal Code, § 45, unconsciousness makes for impunity regardless of whether it is self-imposed or not. But one who consciously places himself, or allows himself to be placed, in a state of unconsciousness, by hypnosis, for example, even though he knows or should know that he may commit offenses in such an unconscious state, may be held responsible (see § 27, II).

IV. Psychiatric examinations

If doubts arise as to the mental state of the accused at the time of his act, the court will appoint psychiatric experts to conduct examinations. Private experts who are called by the parties are very rare with us, even though the parties are expressly allowed to call them. There are two experts in an ordinary judicial examination (see Code of Criminal Procedure, § 191). But in the first stage the prosecution often obtains a so-called preliminary declaration from a person such as the police or prison physician who, on the basis of a summary examination, states only whether or not there is any reason to have a judicial examination. The Commission of Forensic Medicine acts as the highest authority of psychiatric expertize. It receives transcripts of all psychiatric statements submitted to the court, and indicates any serious defects which it finds in them.

The application of the biological principle leads to a situation where, practically speaking, the statements of the psychiatric experts are binding on the judge. Here, as elsewhere, the experts are principally only advisers, and the court is free in its decisions, but it could hardly be expected that a judge would overrule the appointed experts in a question of psychiatric diagnosis. The court will resolve any dispute between the two experts by ordering further examinations, and possibly by reference to new experts (see Code of Criminal Procedure, § 210).

Burden of proof

Nevertheless, there may be a difference between the experts and the courts as the the conclusions. In the practice of forensic psychiatry, the usual rule is that a person will be declared insane or unconscious only if the condition unambiguously is clear. If there is doubt, the conclusion will be "not insane (unconscious)," following the principle that it is the mental illness which must be proved, not its absence. The court, however, follows the ordinary criminal law principle that a doubt must be resolved in favor of the accused. If it is shown by the psychiatric report that the state of mind is doubtful, the court will have to acquit. The situation is different in a civil case on the invalidity of an agreement or a will, where it is irresponsibility which must be proved (see Rt. 1900, p. 629 and 1927, p. 273).

V. The rules about irresponsibility are exhaustive in principle

The legislature has undoubtedly considered the rules on irresponsibility in Penal Code, § 44, as exhaustive. A permanent or temporary disturbance of the mind cannot create irresponsibility unless it amounts to insanity or unconsciousness in the meaning of the law.

Possible exceptions

It is doubtful, however, whether one can follow this through completely. Situations can exist where it would seem to offend the sense of justice to use punishment, although neither insanity nor unconsciousness could be said to exist.

Compulsion

Such a situation can be imagined for acts committed under serious compulsion. We can take as an example a situation which occurred frequently during enemy occupation, when the German security police had caught a member of the underground and tried to torture him into informing on his comrades. In such a case the arrested person might have known that his information would lead to the arrest of many of his friends, who will also be tortured and perhaps shot. He is conscious but has reached the point where his power of resistance is broken; he cannot take any further maltreatment, and thus he reveals the names. Neither unconsciousness nor the necessity situation (Penal Code, § 47) can be claimed in that case and, according to the provisions on compulsion (Penal Code, § 56, No. 1(b)), the punishment may only be reduced. A special provision of the Treason Act of February 21, 1947, § 5, however, provides for the possibility of remitting punishment completely.[1] But this possibility of acquittal applies only to giving aid to the enemy, not to charges of imprisonment and mistreatment to which he exposed his comrades (see R. Mbl. 56, p. 182).

Post-hypnotic conditions

The post-hypnotic state can also create difficulties. During hypnosis, the hypnotist can give his subject order to be followed after awakening. The subject has no recollection of what happened during hypnosis; after he awakens and fulfills the order, he will often find some apparently rational explanation for his behavior. Usually only harmless acts can be suggested in this way. But there are examples from abroad of unscrupulous hypnotists who, under very special circumstances, attain such power over their subjects that the latter commits serious offenses, otherwise alien to his nature, while in the post-hypnotic state. The hypnotist, of course, is liable for causing the offenses. But what is the position of the hypnotized subject? It is difficult to characterize the post-hypnotic state as insantiy or unconsciousness; what exists is an abnormal motivation of a special nature. And on the basis of the provisions of the law, it is difficult to justify an acquittal. Danish justice is more flexible here since it provides for the opportunity to find irresponsibility due to situations which may be equated to insanity.[2] Swedish law has a similar provision.

VI. Diminished responsibility

The law's grounds of irresponsibility do not correspond to any sharp borderlines in actual life. There are innumerable transitional states between the insane and the normal, the idiot and the normally gifted, the unconscious and the clearly conscious, and where the line should be drawn is often a question of both precedent and expediency.

If the lack of moral responsibility in the abnormal mind is considered as the basis for the rules about irresponsibility, one is therefore led to recognize a category of diminished responsibility, which stretches from the borderline of the completely normal to the borderline of the completely irresponsible. A lowered moral responsibility should result in a lowered punishment, which in borderline cases of irresponsibility should be very low.

The Penal Code of 1902 built upon this point of view. It provided that the court could reduce the punishment below the usual minimum and to a milder type when the perpetrator suffered from "underdeveloped or pathologically disturbed mental capacity" but "not to such an extent, however, that penal guilt is excluded" (Penal Code, § 56; compare with Penal Code, § 44).

Strong arguments, however, can be made against such a provision from a treatment point of view. As the Penal Law Committee of 1922 says (S.K.I., 1925, p. 96): "It must be remembered that many of these persons are the most dangerous, or at least the most troublesome, habitual offenders. And if they are to be punished at all, it is not expedient to regard their offenses as insignificant. It could properly be argued that a more intensive punishment than otherwise is required if the penal threat is to deter them, and if the imposition of punishment is to induce them to conform; and if hope for such effects is abandoned, then long-term imprisonment at least has the undoubted advantage that it gives more protection than short-term imprisonment."

This view found certain opposition during the subsequent discussion of the Bill. It was held, according to guilt principles, that the poorly developed and permanently defective should receive a milder punishment than others, because of their poorer abilities, and that if they presented a special danger, protection against them should be attained by protective provisions. In any case, it was unreasonable, so it was argued, that the poorly endowed individuals should not only be punished according to the same scale as others, but should also be subjected to special protective measures because of their defects.

The result, however, was in accordance with the proposals of the Committee. The provision permitting the imposition of reduced punishment for those with diminished responsibility was removed from the law (amendment 1929). The present Penal Code, § 56, provides for decreased punishment where the act is committed during a temporary strong reduction of consciousness, but not by permanent states of defective functioning or mental impairment. Thus, the expression "diminished responsibility" no longer has any basis in the Code. Another matter, however, is that where offenders are of "underdeveloped or permanently defective mental capacity" protective measures may be imposed, and can take the place of punishment (Penal Code, § 39, No. 8, 1 and 5, and § 39(b), No. 1).

While it was general preventive considerations which served as justification for a departure from the principle of guilt in the drafting of Penal Code, § 45, individual preventive considerations were determinative in this case. The various views on punishment appear with particular clarity in the Government Bill to the amendment (Ot.prp. nr. 11 for 1928, pp. 6–7). After explaining that the retribution viewpoint must lead to reduced punishment for the partially defective because of their lowered moral guilt, the Ministry of Justice continued: "This old idea of punishment as an ethical retribution is now abandoned by most, and is quite unfit as a basis for the formation of a rational penal law. Punishment should not provide retribution but a method of protecting society, and any decision as to the nature and amount of the punishment must therefore be based upon the determination of what best protects society. . . . Under this principle, it is easy to see that there is no reason to punish partially defective persons less than others. Defective persons are often the most dangerous ones, and of course it is not possible to argue that they will be more easily influenced by punishment than fully normal persons, and therefore need less."

§ 30. Liability for Acts Committed under Intoxication

I. The problem

As previously mentioned, intoxication is a substantial cause of criminality. It is therefore important to determine how criminal acts committed while intoxicated will be punished. Alcohol intoxication creates the most important problem, but similar problems also arise from the use of other intoxicants (cocaine, morphine, opium, marijuana, etc.).

Lowering of the consciousness

As long as it merely lowers the consciousness and thus weakens moral inhibitions, intoxication will never preclude criminal liability. This applies also to involuntary intoxication. Suppose that an inexperienced young boy at a party is tricked into drinking a strong cocktail in the belief that it is an innocent fruit drink, and that under the influence of the alcohol he becomes guilty of assault or attempted rape. He is liable for his acts. The intoxication will only be taken into account in the measure of punishment, as a possible factor in mitigation.

"Normal" and atypical alcohol-intoxication

Intoxication, however, can also lead to unconsciousness. As far as alcohol is concerned, one distinguishes between "normal" and pathological alcohol intoxication. In normal alchool intoxication, the consciousness is gradually lowered as the amount of alcohol is increased, and the capacity for purposeful movement is at the same time impaired; when the point of complete unconsciousness is reached, the intoxicated person generally has no ability to commit offenses other than those of omission. The picture is different with pathological intoxication. The mental disturbances here often arise suddenly and after consumption of relatively small quantities of alcohol. The general signs of intoxication, such as an uncertain walk and slurred speech, are lacking, but perception is seriously disturbed. Delusions and hallucinations may also appear. The individual usually does not remember anything that happened while he was intoxicated. Pathological intoxication generally occurs only in those individuals who are predisposed to it (epileptics, neurotics, psychopaths, persons with brain damage); but even persons who otherwise react normally to alcohol may sometimes under the influence of illness, exhaustion or serious mental stress, react abnormally. A person may commit serious crimes, such as rape or murder, while in an unconscious state. It is obvious that not all ideas and sensations ceased during pathological intoxication. Perhaps a more accurate picture of the situation is to be found in Swedish forensic psychiatry, which describes it as temporary insanity.

We must also suppose that there are many gradations between the completely normal and the obviously pathological intoxication.

A Swedish case provides an illustrating example of an offense committed during pathological intoxication.[1]

A twenty-five-year-old man had been with his wife and small son at a Christmas dinner with relatives and had taken a few drinks. He became brutal and unpleasant to his wife on the way home. Weeping, she begged him to desist until after they had come home and put the boy to bed. When they arrived at home, the man grabbed his wife by the throat with one hand and seized a big butcher knife with the other. The wife tore herself free and ran out of the house, screaming for help. Before the neighbors could come to her aid, the man had killed his son with the knife, and had jumped out of the window, inflicting serious injuries on himself.

It was later learned that when the man was about eighteen, he drank a few glasses of wine at a family party and suddenly became rebellious and acted indecently. After that, he abstained from alcohol until the fatal day when he made this one exception. He had then been married for a few years. The marriage was a happy one, the husband enjoyed his home life, and the little boy was the apple of his eye. Afterwards, he became deeply depressed over his conduct, which he could not explain, and he contemplated suicide. On the way home that fatal night an enormous rage had overcome him. "It was as if everything became red in front of my eyes." He could not remember what had happened from that moment on until he jumped out of the window. He hazily recalled the sound of the broken glass and the stinging pains from the glass splinters.

The original provision of the penal law

If the law had no special rule on acts committed during intoxication, the result would be the following:

If the perpetrator became intoxicated for the purpose of committing the punishable act, he would be fully liable if he performed the act in an unconscious state caused by the intoxication (see § 27, II). If he knew, or should have known (on the basis of past experience, for example), that he might commit punishable acts while intoxicated, he would be liable for negligent causation. But if he neither considered, nor should have considered, this possibility, he would be free from liability.

This was largely the situation under Penal Code, § 45, in its original form. But it increased the liability on one point; it provided that a person who becomes unconscious through his own fault should always be punished for negligence if, while in this state, he commits an act which is punishable in its negligent form. Thus, liability for negligence would exist regardless of whether or not any actual negligence with respect to the harm caused could be proved in the concrete case.

The reason for Penal Code, § 45

When the law was revised in 1929, it was agreed that the earlier rules were too mild. The first objection was that many serious offenses were not punishable in their negligent form. The law has no punishment for negligent rape or negligent sexual offenses against children, because the negligent commission of such acts rarely occurs. As a result, a person who was unconscious because of intoxication and who committed such an offense could not be punished under Penal Code, § 45. Thus, there was very little logic in the rules: a person who committed assaults and malicious destruction of property while intoxicated could be punished, because the law applied to the negligent commission of such offenses, but one who committed the most serious sex offenses could not be punished. The second objection was that impunity benefited not only one who had actually been unconscious, but also one who could create such doubts about his condition that he would have to be acquitted under the principle that doubt must be resolved in favor of the accused. It was further argued that it would have a general educative effect, if a person were to be held fully responsible even for acts committed while intoxicated. But the strongest argument was the assertion that the general sense of justice, or at least the sound sense of justice, required full responsibility for intoxicated persons. The sense of justice, which was strongly expressed during the debate, is probably connected with the idea of retribution in its more primitive form, which concentrates on the act and its effects without going into deeper psychological considerations. Fundamental objections against all alcohol consumption undoubtedly influenced the views of certain groups.

Long debates resulted in the formulation of the present Penal Code, § 45: "Unconsciousness due to voluntary intoxication (produced by alcohol or other means) does not exclude punishment." In Penal Code, § 56, No. 2, we obtained at the same time a rule providing that the punishment in such cases can be reduced under especially extenuating circumstances.

The rule constitutes an important exception to the principle of proportionality between guilt and punishment. What the perpetrator can be blamed for is the fact that he has become intoxicated; what he does later, while unconscious, he cannot help. On one occasion he falls peacefully into sleep and thus will incur no punishment; on another occasion he kills a person, and will then be punished under Penal Code, § 233, with a minimum of six years' imprisonment, unless the provisions in Penal Code, § 56, No. 2, on especially extenuating circumstances, come into play. The rule is effective, but harsh, and because of this, it has been attacked by many.

During the debates on the Penal Code of 1902 there was a controversy over the evaluation of acts committed under intoxication, and some persons made demands for stricter rules. By the time the question was taken up by the Penal Code Commission in 1922, there had been some acquittals which had created an uproar. One of the political parties went as far as to put demands for increased punishment of acts committed while intoxicated into its party platform. The Penal Law Commission split into a majority and a minority. The majority proposed the solution which became law, but some within the majority wished to eliminate the possibility of reducing the punishment (Penal Code, § 56, No. 2), and even proposed to impose full liability upon acts committed during involuntary intoxication. The minority, on the other hand, proposed a special provision covering the person who, during unconsciousness because of voluntary intoxication, commits an otherwise punishable act; the punishment should be graduated according to the seriousness of the offense.[1] The final result—full liability under Penal Code, § 45, with a strictly limited recourse to decrease of punishment according to Penal Code, § 56—represents a compromise between the opposing views. The rule in Penal Code, § 45, was discussed by a number of speakers during the meeting of the Norwegian Association of Criminalists in 1935, and all opposed it. The psychiatrist Ragnar

Vogt called it a stain on the law because it violated one of the basic rules of ethics: guilt as a basis for punishment.

The question is solved in various ways in foreign countries. In English and American law, the rules seem to lead on the whole to the same result as our Penal Code, § 45, while most countries on the continent treat unconsciousness due to intoxication as a reason for precluding liability, some having special provisions which correspond to the minority proposal of the Penal Law Commission of 1922.

The practical significance of the question

The practical significance of the question tends to be overrated. A study by Ornulf Odegaard of all forensic psychiatric statements which came into the Commission of Forensic Medicine in the years 1901 to 1926,[1] shows that there were only thirty cases, or about one per year, in which the experts had concluded that the perpetrator was unconscious because of intoxication at the time of commission of the act. The figures were as follows: less serious offenses of violence, threats, assaults, etc.: eleven; thefts: eight; sex offenses: seven; murder and infliction of serious harm: four. The statistics show that even if unconsciousness due to intoxication was often claimed, the plea usually did not succeed, even under the earlier system. In some cases, the accused may have been acquitted on the basis of unconsciousness, without a preceding psychiatric examination, but this hardly occurred with the serious offenses.

II. More about § 45

After this survey, we shall now look a little more closely at the question of interpretation which Penal Code, § 45, raises.

1. The same rule for all types of self-imposed intoxication

The provision applies to all kinds of voluntary intoxication regardless of what intoxicant is used, and how it is consumed (by drinking, by inhalation, or by injection). Nor does the law distinguish between normal and pathological intoxication. It cares only whether the intoxication is voluntary or not. However, a pathological intoxication, more easily than a normal intoxication, may be involuntary because it can occur after the consumption of a smaller quantity.

The problem, however, can sometimes be a difficult one. Let us imagine that the consumption of alcohol by an epileptic causes an epileptic state of fuzziness, and that he commits murder while in this state. It can be held that here the unconsciousness was not due to intoxication, but to epilepsy, and that it must therefore lead to an acquittal, regardless of whether or not it was self-imposed. But this is to read more into the word "intoxication" than is reasonable. The most accurate interpretation of the provision is probably that a condition is regarded as voluntary intoxication when it is caused by the use of alcohol or other intoxicants in such quantities that the person can be blamed for having lost control over himself (see below, under 4).

2. When can the unconscious person be punished as an intentional perpetrator?

Thus, unconsciousness due to voluntary intoxication does not preclude liability. But the law requires subjective guilt for punishability; usually intention, sometimes negligence, and sometimes a definite purpose. What influence will unconsciousness have on this requirement?

As we have mentioned before, "unconsciousness," like insanity, does not lead to the end of all activity of the mind. And one can conceive of the possibility of judging the perpetrator on the basis of the ideas which he actually had in his troubled state of mind.

If a person committed murder because of an ungovernable state of anger, but otherwise knew what he was doing, he should then be punished for intentional homicide. If, however, he was so confused that he thought that it was a lion with which he was dealing, or that he was the victim of an assault and that he was merely protecting himself, the result should be an acquittal.

It is difficult, however, to determine what has gone through the "unconscious person's" mind, and there seems to be little reason for basing a decision on the type of the conceptions he entertained. Nor has judicial practice gone into any such examination. Penal Code, § 45, must be interpreted as an acceptance of the proposition that, despite intoxication, the perpetrator should be adjudged as if he had been sober. The deciding factor, then, is how a sober man would have been treated in a similar situation. If, for example, the intoxicated person has raped a woman, he will be convicted of intentional rape. A similar act by a normal person would be intentional. As examples from decided cases, we may cite Rt. 1934, p. 1096 (rape) and 1939, p. 20 (indecent acts against minors). If the intoxicated person has taken a stranger's car, driven negligently and killed someone, he can be sentenced for intentional car theft (Penal Code, § 260), but only negligent homicide. A sober person would also be sentenced in this manner.

But difficulties arise in some cases. The intentional, the negligent and the innocent act are not always easily distinguishable; intention and negligence may depend on factors in the mind of the perpetrator which are not discernible in the actual situation. If I cut someone with a knife, I may have done so for the purpose of homicide, but my intention may have been only to wound, not to kill. Which alternative shall be chosen when the perpetrator was unconscious at the time of the act? The comments on the draft Bill state that the mildest solution must be chosen (S.K.I., 1925, p. 91), and this seems to be correct. The unconscious person cannot be convicted of an intentional offense unless the circumstances surrounding the act would clearly have marked it as intentional if it had been committed by a normal person. In the example of the knifing, the perpetrator could generally be punished for causing bodily injury, perhaps with death as its consequence (Penal Code, § 229; compare with Penal Code, § 232), but not for murder or attempted murder (Penal Code, § 233). Similarly, the unconscious person cannot be punished for negligence either, unless the surrounding circumstances would have marked the act as negligent if it had been committed by a normal person. Thus, the court must disregard those circumstances to which a sober person perhaps, but not certainly, would have paid attention.

These rules apply to persons who have acted in a state of unconsciousness. How is a person to be judged who is less intoxicated and merely misunderstands the situation by reason of his intoxication? For example, an intoxicated man sees a person advancing toward him with an object in his hand; in his hazy condition he believes that the other intends to attack him, and he strikes the imagined attacker. If the intoxicated person is unconscious, he will have to accept being treated as a normal person, and thus he will be held for intentional assault. If he is not unconscious, the Code gives no authority for departing from the general principle that the defendant must be judged according to his own perception about the actual situation (Penal Code, § 42). If the act, in his view of the situation, would be a justified act of self-defense, he can then be punished only for negligence (see Penal Code, § 45). It can be argued, however, that there is so little logic in this that, even as to the intoxicated person who is not unconscious, the mistake caused by the intoxication must be disregarded. This is the view taken by the Supreme Court (Rt. 1961, p. 547). Such an analogized use of the law to the detriment of the accused is of doubtful validity, especially when such a controversial rule as the provision in Penal Code, § 45, is involved.

The perpetrator's own perception of the situation must be used as a basis if, after the intoxication has ended, he acts under a mistake caused by the intoxication. He believes, for example, that he has been the victim of an assault, and accuses his supposed assailant. He then cannot be punished under Penal Code, § 168, for false accusation.

3. Penal provisions requiring purpose cannot be used

The comments in the draft Bill to Penal Code, § 45, seem to suggest that the rule cannot be applied to violations of penal provisions which require a definite purpose (S.K.I., 1925, p. 91). This is by no means obvious. No such limitation appears in the words of the law, and there is no inherent obstacle to the use of the same principle here as elsewhere. If the surrounding circumstances would characterize the act as purposeful if it had been committed by a sober person, it should be characterized in the same manner when committed by an unconscious person. As it is often stated: If the law can feign intention, it can also feign purpose.

The principle which the draft Bill comments express, however, has been accepted by the courts, and must now be regarded as settled law (Rt. 1933, p.

1180, and 1935, p. 52). If a person who is unconscious because of voluntary intoxication attacks another, and forcibly takes his watch and wallet, he cannot be punished for robbery unless he purposely became intoxicated in order to commit the act, because the law's provision on robbery (Penal Code, § 267) requires the specific purpose of obtaining for oneself or another an unlawful gain. However, the perpetrator can be punished for assault (Penal Code, § 228), for coercion (Penal Code, § 222) and for having unlawfully placed himself in possession of the objects (Penal Code, § 392), since all these provisions require only ordinary intention. And if he later sells the watch or spends the money which was in the wallet, he can be punished for embezzlement committed in a sober condition.

Apart from those provisions which require a definite purpose, cases can also be conceived where the rule in Penal Code, § 45, does not apply. We can imagine that A lies dead-drunk on a beach, where B is drowning. If A had been sober, and neglected to rescue B, he would have been guilty according to the general provision in Penal Code, § 387, about a person's duty "to help according to his ability a person whose life is in obvious and imminent danger." But when he does not actually have the ability to help, it would serve little purpose to invoke the penal provision.

4. What does voluntary mean?

Only an unconsciousness resulting from voluntary intoxication does not preclude punishment. Where shall the line be drawn?

Voluntary does not mean the same as intentional, but comes close to negligent. Intoxication is voluntary as soon as the perpetrator can be blamed for becoming intoxicated. Such is the case when he consumes such a large quantity of alcohol that he must know that he might lose full control over himself. How strict one is to be is a question of opinion. It is sufficient that the intoxication is voluntary; it makes no difference that the accused had no reason to belived that he would become unconscious. The general rule is that intoxication is voluntary, and special circumstances must exist before the contrary will be accepted. One can imagine, for example, that an inexperienced young boy is tricked into drinking champagne in the belief that it is ginger ale. It can also be imagined that a person consumed a small amount of alcohol which would not intoxicate him normally, but which has a special effect because of sickness, fatigue, or other reasons. Here he can be free from liability unless the situation is such that he should have counted on having less resistance than before.

APPENDIX B

The Danish Criminal Code

(With an Introduction by Dr. Knud Waaben, Professor A.I. in the University of Copenhagen)

Chapter III

CONDITIONS REGARDING LIABILITY TO PUNISHMENT

13. (1) Acts commited in self-defense are not punishable if they were necessary to resist or avert an imminent or incipient unlawful attack, provided that such acts do not manifestly exceed what is reasonable, having regard to the danger inherent in the attack, the person of the aggressor, or the social importance of the interests endangered by the attack.

(2) Provided that any person who exceeds the limit of lawful self-defence shall not be liable to punishment if his act could in fairness be excused by the fear or excitement brought about by the attack.

(3) Similar rules shall apply to acts necessary to enforce lawful orders in a rightful manner, to carry out a lawful apprehension, or to prevent the escape of a prisoner or a person committed to an institution.

14. An act normally punishable shall not be punished if it was necessary in order to avert impending damage to a person or property and if the offence can only be regarded as of relatively minor importance.

15. Acts committed by children under 15 years of age are not punishable.

16. Acts committed by persons being irresponsible owing to insanity or similar conditions or pronounced mental deficiency are not punishable.

17. (1) If, at the time of committing the punishable act, the more permanent condition of the perpetrator involved defective development, or impairment or disturbance of his mental faculties, including sexual abnormality, of a nature other than that indicated in sect. 16 of this Act, the court shall decide, on the basis of a medical report and all other available evidence, whether he may be considered susceptible to punishment.

(2) If the court is satisfied that the accused is susceptible to punishment, it may decide that a penalty involving the deprivation of liberty inflicted on him shall be served in an institution or division of an institution intended for such persons. If appropriate, the Prison Commission may alter the decision as to where the penalty of imprisonment shall be served. If, during the term of imprisonment, it becomes evident that a continuation of such imprisonment will be useless or will be likely seriously to aggravate the condition of the convicted, then, at the request of the Director of the Prison Service, the case shall again be brought before the court which passed sentence in the last instance. This court shall decide, on the basis of a medical report, whether the penalty shall continue to be served or not.

(3) If a person in respect of whom preventive measures are taken under sect. 70 of this Act (cf. subsect. (1) of this section) for an offence committed by him has committed another offence, and if he is considered susceptible to punishment for offences of that nature, then, where the latter offence is of minor importance in relation to the offence in respect of which preventive measures are applied, the court may decide that no penalty shall be imposed.

18. Intoxication shall not preclude punishment being awarded, except where the perpetrator has acted while in an unconscious condition.

19. As regards the offences dealt with by this Act, acts which have been committed through negligence on the part of the perpetrator, shall not be punished, except where expressly provided. As regards other offences, the appropriate penal sanction shall apply, even where the offence has been committed through negligence, unless otherwise provided.

20. Where the statutory penalty, or aggravation of a penalty, refers to an intentional offence resulting in an unintentional effect, then that penalty shall take effect only where such consequence may be attributed to the negligence of the perepetrator or if he has failed to avert it to the best of his ability, after becoming aware of the danger.

Chapter IV

Attempt and complicity

21. (1) Acts aiming at promoting or carrying out an offence shall be punished as attempts, when the offence is not accomplished.

(2) The penalty prescribed for the offence may be mitigated in the case of attempts, particularly where the attempt gives evidence of little strength or persistence in the criminal intention.

(3) Unless otherwise provided, attempts shall be punished only where the offence is subject to a penalty more severe than simple detention.

22. Attempts shall not be punished if, spontaneously and not because of extraneous or independent obstacles against either completing the wrongful action or achieving his intention, the perpetrator desists from carrying further his intended act, or prevents its accomplishment or acts in such manner that his intervention would have prevented its accomplishment, even if, without his knowledge, the act had not failed in its purpose or otherwise been averted.

23. (1) The penalty in respect of an offence shall apply to any person who has contributed to the execution of the wrongful action by instigation, advice or action. The penalty may be mitigated in respect of a person who has intended to give assistance of minor importance only or to strengthen an intention already existing and, again, if the offence has not been accomplished or if an intended assistance has failed.

(2) Similarly, the penalty may be mitigated in respect of a person who has contributed to the breach of a duty in a special relationship in which he himself has no part.

(3) Unless otherwise provided, the penalty for participation in offences that are not subject to a penalty more severe than simple detention shall not take effect if the accomplice had intended to give an assistance of minor importance only or to strengthen an intention already existing or, again, if his own complicity is due to negligence.

24. The accomplice shall not be punished if, under the conditions laid down in sect. 22 of this Act, he prevents the accomplishment of the punishable act or acts in such manner as would have prevented its accomplishment, even if, without his knowledge, the act had not failed in its purpose or otherwise been averted.

Chapter IX

Other legal effects of a punishable act

70. (1) Where an accused is acquitted under sect. 16 of this Act or where punishment is considered inapplicable under sect. 17 of this Act, while having regard to public safety it is deemed necessary that other measures be applied to him, the court shall decide on the nature of such measures. If public safety is unlikely to be guaranteed by imposing less rigorous measures, such as sureties, directions as to or prohibition against residence in a particular place, orders of the nature dealt with in sect. 72 of this Act, appointment of a supervisor or relegation to a state of minority, the person concerned shall be placed in a mental hospital, an institution for feeble-minded or other curative institution, an asylum for inebriates or in a special detention centre. Within the limits set by the court, the competent administrative authority shall decide upon any further arrangements that may be required by such measures.

(2) Where the accused is likely to be sentenced to placement in a hospital or an institution, the court may appoint a supervising guardian for him, if possible one of his near relatives, who is qualified for that task and has accepted it. The supervising guardian shall, on the one hand, assist the accused during the proceedings together with the counsel for the defence and, on the other hand, keep himself informed of his condition and see to it that his stay in the hospital or the institution be not extended beyond what is necessary.

(3) At the instance of the Public Prosecutor, of the director of the institution concerned or of the supervising guardian, the court which passed sentence in the first instance may at any time alter the earlier decision made concerning the nature of the measure or may, on the basis of a medical report, cancel it temporarily or absolutely. If a request on the part of the supervising guardian for cancelling or modifying the measures of security is not allowed by the court, the supervising guardian may submit a second request only after the expiration of one year: provided that, if warranted by special circumstances, such a request may be submitted at the expiration of not less than six months.

71. Where the perpetrator of a punishable act, after carrying it out but before having sentence passed on him, becomes more seriously affected by the conditions referred to in sect. 16 or sect. 17 of this Act, the court shall decide whether a penalty shall be inflicted or whether the penalty incurred shall be remitted. If deemed necessary, having regard to public safety, the court shall provide in the sentence that measures in conformity with the provisions of sect. 70 of this Act shall be applied in lieu of punishment or until the punishment can be carried out.

72. (1) Where a person is sentenced to a penalty involving the deprivation of liberty in respect of an offence covered by this Act, and if the court is satisfied that the offence has been committed under the influence of intoxicants, the convicted may be ordered by the court not to taste or buy intoxicants, on pain of being dealt with under the provision of sect. 138, subsect. (2), of this Act, for a specified period not exceeding five years as from his final release; a similar order may be made if the person concerned is acquitted under sect. 18 of this Act, where a penalty involving the deprivation of liberty would otherwise have been incurred. If, moreover, the person concerned is regarded as being addicted to intoxicants, such an order shall be made in all cases by the court.

(2) The Police shall, as far as possible, instruct restaurant keepers, tradesmen and retailers, on pain of liability of sect. 138, subsect. (3), of this Act, not to serve, sell or distribute intoxicants to a person convicted under subsect. (1) of this section.

73. Where it appears from a medical report and other available evidence that any person covered by sect. 72, subsect. (1), of this Act or any person liable to punishment under sect. 138, subsect. (1) or (2), of this Act is addicted to intoxicants, it may be provided in the sentence that he shall be placed, after the penalty has been served or, in the case of suspended sentence, immediately, in a curative institution for inebriates, if necessary in a public institution or division of an insitution established for that particular purpose, until he can be regarded as having been cured. The maximum period of such detention shall be fixed in the sentence at 18 months, or in the case of recidivism at three years. If, prior to the expiration of the specified period, the person concerned is deemed to be cured or if the commitment appears to be ineffective, the Minister of Justice shall, on the recommendation of the governing body of the institution and on the basis of a medical report, decide whether the detention shall be discontinued.

74. Provisions may be made by Royal Order concerning the treatment of the persons detained in an institution under sect. 70 or sect. 73 of this Act concerning, inter alia, their employment at appropriate work.

75. If a person threatens death, fire or other misdeed, and if punishment is precluded or is not considered to afford adequate safety, the court may by a sentence passed after trial initiated by public prosecution, at the request of the person threatened or, if general considerations so require, without such request, order him to comply with the measures which the court finds necessary for obviating the apprehended menace and, if necessary, decide that he shall be taken into custody; if so, the court shall also decide whether the detention shall take place under the provisions governing arrest or in one of the institutions referred to in ss. 64, 67, 70 or 73 of this Act. The orders made or the measures taken may be rescinded by the Public Prosecutor if he deems it unnecessary to maintain them and if the person threatened agrees, or otherwise by a decision of the court which passed sentence in the first instance. At the request of the convicted, the case shall be brought before the court again, unless the Public Prosecutor is satisfied that the situation is exactly the same and if less than one year has passed after the promulgation of sentence or of a subsequent judicial decision.

76. (1) Where a foreigner, who during the last five years has not been permanently resident within the territory of the Danish State, is sentenced to imprisonment for two years or more, the court shall, except where special circumstances militate against it, order him to be expelled from the Kingdom after he has served his penalty. In other cases, where a foreigner is sentenced to imprisonment, the court may make such order, if appropriate in the circumstances.

(2) Prior to his expulsion, the convicted shall be notified of the criminal liability involved in any unlawful return, and this notification shall be entered in the records of the Police.

77. (1) Unless otherwise expressly provided, the court may decide that the following objects shall be confiscated for the benefit of the Exchequer:

(i) Objects produced in pursuance of a punishable act or which have been used or intended to be used for an intentional offence, provided they belong to any of the persons responsible for the act; or

Section 39

1. If an otherwise punishable act is committed in a state of insanity or unconsciousness, or if an offense is committed during unconsciousness due to voluntary intoxication (section 45) or during temporarily reduced consciousness or by someone with underdeveloped or permanently impaired mental capacity, and there is danger that the perpetrator because of his condition will repeat such an act, the court may decide that, for purposes of safety, the prosecution shall:

(a) assign or forbid him a certain place of residence,

(b) place him under the supervision of the police or a specially appointed probation officer and order him to report to the police or the probation officer at designated intervals,

(c) forbid him to consume alcoholic beverages,

(d) place him in reliable, private care,

(e) place him in a mental hospital, sanatorium, nursing home, or workhouse, where possible, in accordance with general provisions promulgated by the King.

(f) keep him in custody.

[2–22–1929]

2. If such condition involves danger of acts of the kind covered by sections 148, 149, 152 para. 2, 153 paras. 1 to 3, 154, 155, 159, 160, 161, 191, 192, 193, 195, 196, 197, 198, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 206, 212, 217, 224, 225, 227, 230, 231, 233, 245 para. 1, 258, 266, 267, 268 or 298, the court must decide to apply such security measures as are mentioned above.

3. These measures are terminated when they are no longer regarded as necessary, but may be resumed if there should be reason to do so. The security measures listed under (a)–(d) may be employed concurrently.

The court shall determine the maximum period for which security measures may be imposed without its further consent.

4. If the court has not decided otherwise, the prosecution may choose between the above-mentioned security measures.

The decision to terminate, resume or alter a security measure is made by the ministry. Before a decision about security measures or their termination is made, the opinion of a medical specialist must ordinarily be obtained. The same procedure should be followed at regular intervals during the period in which security measures are in force.

5. If security measures, as mentioned in No. 1 above, are imposed, the ministry may decide to forgo all or part of the punishment to which a transgressor might be sentenced.

6. If the perpetrator is placed in a mental hospital and the court has not in advance decided that security measures are to be employed, the prosecution shall be notified before discharge. Discharge shall not take place until there has been opportunity to obtain the decision of the court on the imposition of further measures in accordance with this section. The offender may not be kept in the hospital waiting for such decision for more than three months after the director of the hospital has notified the prosecution that he will be certified as recovered.

7. If the perpetrator is not a Norwegian citizen, the ministry may decide to deport him instead of subjecting him to security measures according to this section, unless otherwise agreed by treaty with a foreign state.

Section 39a

1. If the defendant is guilty of several attempted or completed felonies punishable according to sections 148, 149, 152, para. 2, 153, paras. 1–3, 154, 159, 160, 161, 174, 178, cf. 174, 191, 192 193, 195, 196, 197, 198, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 206, 207, 212, 217, 224, 225, 227, 230, 231, 233, 245, para. 1, 258, 266, 267, 268, or 292, and the court has reason to assume that he will again commit a felony of the kind named above, the court shall decide that he is to be kept in preventive detention after he has served all or part of his sentence, so long as this is necessary.

The court shall determine the maximum period for which preventive detention may be imposed without its further consent.

2. If the defendant is a person with underdeveloped or impaired mental capacity, the court may decide to employ security measures in accordance with section 39 instead of punishment and preventive detention in accordance with this section. Such decision may also be made by the ministry.

3. The ministry may decide to transfer the convict from prison to preventive detention when he has served at least one-third of the term to which he was sentenced.

4. The ministry may release the convict on probation when the punishment to which he is sentenced has been fully served, or when the punishment served and preventive detention together equal at least the prison term to which he was sentenced. As a condition for the release the ministry may assign or forbid him a certain place of residence, order him to report at regular intervals to the police or an appointed probation officer, forbid him to consume alcoholic beverages, and order him, within his financial capacity, to pay the victim compensation for economic loss and suffering.

If during the five years following his release on probation the convict has not committed any intentional felony and has acted in accordance with the conditions set, the release becomes final.

5. If the stipulated punishment has been served in part, it is regarded as completed as of the time the convict is released from preventive detention, unless he is again confined.

6. If the convict is not a Norwegian citizen the ministry may decide to deport him when the punishment to which he is sentenced is served, unless otherwise agreed upon by treaty with a foreign state.

Section 39b

1. The prosecution may proceed according to section 39 without demanding punishment, provided the right to prosecute has not expired. In such a case proceedings may be brought regardless of whether the conditions mentioned in section 87 of the Code of Criminal Procedure are present. Request for prosecution by the victim is not required. Such proceedings must always be brought in the City or County Court, and must be treated according to the rules in the Code of Criminal Procedure.

2. In a criminal case, if no decision is made about security measures according to sections 39 or 39a, the prosecution may, where there are special reasons, bring the question before the court within one year after sentence has been served. The provisions in the last sentence of No. 1, above, apply in such cases.

3. When the court provides that security measures shall be imposed, or when a court denies a request for such measures, the decision shall be in the form of a judgment.

In cases before the Court of Appeals, security measures may not be imposed unless the jury, by more than six votes, has affirmed that the conditions listed in section 39, Nos. 1 and 2, or section 39a, No. 1, are present.

4. When a person is released on probation from a jail, sanatorium or nursing home, and the question of recommitment arises, the prosecution may have him arrested and, on specific instructions from the Magistrate's Court, keep him in custody until the matter is decided.

5. Detailed rules about the security measures mentioned in sections 39 and 39a, and about the questions to be presented to the jury as provided in No. 3, above, may be issued by the King.

[2-22-1929]

Chapter 3

Conditions determining punishability

Section 40

The penal provisions of this code do not apply to an act committed unintentionally unless it is explicitly provided or unmistakably implied that a negligent act is also punishable.

A misdemeanor consisting of omission to act is also punishable when committed by negligence, unless the contrary is explicitly provided or unmistakably implied.

Section 41

In cases where a superior cannot be punished for a misdemeanor committted by somebody in his service, the subordinate can always be held responsible, even if the penal provision, according to its wording alone, is directed against the superior.

Section 42

To a person who has committed an act in ignorance of circumstances determining the punishability of the act or increasing his liability for punishment, these circumstances are not attributable.

Where the ignorance can be ascribed to negligence, the punishment provided for a negligent act is applied, if negligence is punishable.

Error regarding the value of an object or the estimated amount of damages caused will be taken into account only when punishability depends thereon.

Section 43

Where the law provides that an unintentional consequence of a punishable act entails increased punishment, the more severe punishment applies only where the offender could have foreseen the possibility of such a consequence, or where, in spite of his ability to do so, he has failed to prevent such a consequence after having been made aware of the danger.

Section 44

An act is not punishable if committed while the perpetrator was insane or unconscious.

[2–22–1929]

Section 45

Unconsciousness due to voluntary intoxication (produced by alcohol or other means) does not exclude punishment.

[2–22–1929]

Section 46

Nobody may be punished for an act committed before he has completed his fourteenth year.

Section 47

Nobody may be punished for an act committed to save the person or property of another from an otherwise inevitable danger, where the circumstances justified him in regarding this danger as extremely significant in relation to the damage his act might cause.

Nobody may be punished for an act committed in self-defense.

Self-defense exists when an otherwise punishable act is committed for the prevention of, or in defense against, an unlawful attack, as long as the act does not exceed what is necessary; moreover, in relation to the attack, the guilt of the assailant, and the legal values attacked, it must not be considered absolutely improper to inflict so great an evil as intended by the act of self-defense.

The above rule concerning the prevention of unlawful attack applies also to acts performed for the purpose of lawful arrest or for the prevention of a prisoner's escape from prison or custody.

Anybody who has exceeded the limits of self-defense is nevertheless not to be punished if the excess is due solely to emotional upset or derangement produced by the attack.

Section 54

When a suspended sentence is read to or served on the convict, he shall be acquainted with the meaning of a suspended sentence and with the consequences of not complying with the conditions. The judge should also give the convict such warning and admonition as his age and general circumstances might require. For this purpose the convict may be summoned to a special session of the court.

If the convict is placed under supervision, the judge shall explain to him the significance of the supervision and his duty to comply with the instructions provided under the supervision.

[6–3–1955]

Section 55

For offenses committed by a person under eighteen years of age, confinement for life may not be used and punishment of the kind specified may be reduced below the minimum provided for the act.

If the convict is under eighteen years of age at the time of sentencing, the court may refrain from imposing punishment and, instead, provide in the sentence for the Child Welfare Board to take action in accordance with the Child Welfare Law.

[6–3–1955]

1. The court may reduce the punishment below the minimum provided for the offense and commute it to a milder form of punishment:

(a) when the act is committed in order to save the life or property of a person, but the limits for the right, as stated in sections 47 and 48, are exceeded;

(b) when the act is committed in justifiable anger, under compulsion or imminent danger or during temporary strong reduction of consciousness not due to voluntary intoxication.

2. When the act is committed in a state of unconsciousness due to voluntary intoxication (section 45), the punishment may, under extremely extenuating circumstances, be reduced to less than the minimum provided, unless the convict had become intoxicated for the purpose of committing the act.

Chapter 33

of reduction and exclusion of sanctions

Sec. 1. No one may be sentenced to a sanction for a crime he committed before he reached fifteen years of age.

Sec. 2. For a crime which some one has committed under the influence of mental disease, feeblemindedness or other mental abnormality of such profound nature that it must be considered equivalent to mental disease, no other sanction may be applied than surrender for special care or, in cases specified in the second paragraph, fine or probation.

Fines may be imposed if they are found answering the purpose of deterring the defendant from further criminality. Probation may be imposed if in view of the circumstances such sanction is considered more appropriate than special care; in such case treatment provided for in Chapter 28, Section 3, may not be prescribed.

The defendant shall be free of sanctions if it is found that a sanction mentioned in this Section should not be imposed.

Sec. 3. If some one is sentenced to imprisonment for a fixed term, fines, suspension or disciplinary punishment in a case for which he has been detained in jail, it may be decided, if deemed reasonable in view of the circumstances, that the sentence shall be considered as having been wholly or partly served by such detension of the defendant.

If some one, who has begun to undergo youth imprisonment, internment or, subsequent to a sentence to probation, treatment provided by Chapter 28, Section 3, is instead sentenced to a punishment mentioned in the first paragraph, it may be decided, if deemed reasonable in view of the circumstances, that the sentence shall be considered as having been wholly or partly served by such institutional care or treatment.

A decision on a matter referred to in this section may be changed by a higher court when considering an appeal of the sanction imposed, even though the decision was not appealed.

Sec. 4. If some one has committed a crime before reaching the age of eighteen, a milder punishment than that provided for the crime may be imposed, depending on circumstances. If special reasons dictate it, a milder punishment may also be imposed for crime which some one committed under the influence of mental abnormality.

If very strong reasons dictate it and no obvious obstacle exists with reference to public law-obedience, a milder punishment than that provided for the crime may be imposed in other cases as well.

A sanction may be completely dispensed with, if because of special circumstances it is found obvious that no sanction for the crime is necessary.

APPENDIX C

Norwegian Laws

The taking of oath shall be effected subsequent to the examination.

§ 186. In no case shall the taking of oath be demanded of:

(1) witnesses who have not reached the age of 15 years, or who on account of mental deficiency or defective development cannot have any clear understanding of the significance of the oath;

(2) witnesses who are convicted as principals or accessories to the act which forms the subject matter of the investigation, or on whom there rests suspicion of such guilt.

In cases relating to infraction of the customs legislation, persons who have aided in the act can, irrespective of the provision in item (2), be sworn, if prosecution against them has been waived.

§ 187. The court may refrain from having witnesses sworn who pursuant to § 176 might have claimed exemption from giving evidence, or whose evidence by reason of its content or for other reasons must be deemed to be particularly unreliable.

The court may always refrain from administering the oath to private plaintiffs and aggrieved parties who have supported the public prosecution.

§ 188. Persons who belong to a religious community which does not permit the taking of oath, shall with the same liability as if oath had been administered, affirm on their honour and a good conscience that they have spoken the unadulterated and whole truth and nothing concealed. The same applies to anyone who refuses to be sworn because this is contrary to his religious conviction, or because he does not believe in an almighty and omniscient God.

§ 189. If a witness refuses to give evidence, oath or affirmation after this has by final ruling been enjoined on him, the court may rule that the witness shall be kept in custody until he complies with the injunction. But in no circumstance shall he in the same case or in another relating to the same subject matter be kept in prison for a period exceeding a total of 3 months.

If a witness meets in a state of intoxication, the court may decide that he shall be kept in custody until he is sober.

CHAPTER XVI. EXPERTS AND INQUIRY.

§ 190. Anyone who is under an obligation to witness in the case is on appointment by the court bound to perform service as expert.

But the court should as far as possible absolve from this duty a person who shows that he cannot perform such service without considerable inconvenience to himself or to functions which he is discharging.

Before the court appoints anyone who is not a regular expert, it should be a rule ask him if he is willing. If he states his unwillingness, he should not be appointed, if there is a possibility of appointing someone else.

Experts are entitled to remuneration under a special statute.

§ 191. The number of experts should as a rule be at least two, unless the parties are agreed on requesting only one.

In urgent cases, or when it relates to questions of minor significance, or if it would be connected with special difficulty or inconvenience or with disproportionate costs to procure several experts, one is sufficient.

The court may appoint new experts in addition to the one first appointed, if it finds this necessary.

The decisions of the court under this section cannot be challenged.

§ 192. Where experts have been permanently commissioned for certain kinds of cases, these shall serve, unless special circumstances render this impossible or inadvisable.

Otherwise the court shall take the experts from among those who in public office or by vocation practise a science, art or other activity which postulates the special knowledge which is needed, or among those who are entered on the panel from which judicial surveyors shall be taken, conformably with the Act relating to the courts of justice, § 79.

When regard for skill or impartiality makes it necessary, the court may appoint experts outside the panels or outside the judicial circuit. If experts are to be appointed outside the judicial circuit, the presiding judge may make application to the court concerned.

In the examination of women, for example in questions of pregnancy or birth, women should serve, when this is found to be sufficiently safe.

§ 193. In so far as can be avoided, no one should be employed as expert if under the Act relating to the courts of justice, §106 or §108 he would be excluded from serving as member of the court.

Autopsy must, where it can be avoided, not be entrusted to the physician who has treated the deceased during his last illness. But this physician may be summoned if it is found desirable.

§ 194. Before an expert is appointed, the court shall as far as possible give the parties opportunity of stating their opinion in respect of the choice.

§ 195. A written statement may be demanded from the experts or, according to the rules applying to witnesses, they may be called before the court for examination.

The fact that they have made a statement earlier, either in court or in writing, is no obstacle to their being called in for examination during the main hearing. When the statement is given by a group of experts appointed for that purpose, it cannot be demanded, however, that more of the members of this group shall meet than one member for each of the different opinions into which it has been divided. The group shall itself select the members who are to meet.

§ 196. The examination is performed according to the rules for examination of witnesses. But the experts may in general be present during the examination of the other experts; likewise it may be allowed them, at request, to take counsel with one another before they answer.

§ 197. The experts shall by oath declare that they will perform (have performed) their assignment conscientiously and according to their best conviction.

Permanently commissioned experts may, when they are not summoned to the main hearing, make reference to their oath once given.

In case of a judicial inquiry, the oath shall be given prior to the court sitting. Otherwise it shall be given after the examination.

If it is uncertain whether an inquiry will take place, the experts may be summoned to a court sitting for giving a sworn confirmation of their written statement.

In the cases mentioned in § 188 an affirmation on honour and good conscience may take the place of an oath.

§ 200. For an inspection and therewith connected survey which is to be held in court sittings other than the main hearing a judicial inquiry may be undertaken by the judge of the Court of Examination in unison with the court witness.

§ 201. When in the opinion of the court an inquiry requires special skill, or on account of the doubtfulness or importance of the question it is deemed proper, experts shall be summoned. The summoning of court witness may in such case be omitted.

§ 202. In judicial inquiries, witnesses may be called in respect of the subject matter of the inquiry.

§ 203. In the court minutes a complete statement of the conditions found shall be entered, and it shall be noted, for example, whether there are clues or marks to which, according to the nature of the case, attention ought to be directed.

Where it will serve as a substantial help, effort should be made to procure drawings, plans and diagrams.

The conclusions gained by the inquiry shall be set forth. But the court may decide that it shall be left to the experts within a given time-limit to announce these, conformably with § 205.

§ 204. If an inquiry requires further investigation or observations, or if undertaking thereof by the court for other reasons, such as regard for decency, makes this inconvenient or unnecessary, undertaking or continuation thereof may according to the decision of the court be entrusted to experts.

The court shall in that case stipulate a time-limit for the submitting of a report concerning the inquiry undertaken, prescribe its subject matter and purpose and communicate all necessary information which it possesses. If the experts find that something is lacking in this respect, they shall advise the court thereof. The latter shall as far as possible give to the accused timely notice of the investigation.

§ 205. In the cases mentioned in § 204 a written statement shall as a rule be submitted, which shall be drawn up according to the rules in § 203, and in addition contain a recital of the procedure followed and, in the event of a difference of opinion, an account of this. Points in respect of which no question has been asked, shall be included, in so far as the experts find them significant. If the court finds the statement defective, it may enjoin on the experts to revise or amplify it.

§ 206. To experts who are permanently commissioned to undertake certain inquiries, the prosecuting authority can apply directly, and in that case it takes the place of the court with respect to the matters dealt with in § 204 and 205.

§ 207. If an inquiry results in the subject matter thereof being destroyed or altered, a part of the subject matter should as far as possible be excluded from the investigation.

If the accused asks that a part shall be entrusted to him for independent investigation by an expert engaged by him, this shall as far as possible be granted him.

The accused is, besides, always entitled to allow an expert selected by him to attend in order to take part in the inquiry, when this can be done without major inconvenience.

§ 208. The fact that an inquiry has been held does not preclude a new inquiry from taking place regarding the same subject matter, either by the same or other persons.

§ 209. If there is any risk that it will not be possible for the subject matter to be preserved sufficiently unchanged, until an inquiry conformably with the above rules can be effected, the prosecuting authority shall take the place of the court, but without access to administer oaths.

§ 210. If the statement of the experts leaves doubt whether an accused person is mentally sound, the court may, after a defending counsel has been appointed and heard, decide that he shall be placed in a mental asylum for further observation and examination.

If such decision is challenged within three days, the challenge shall have postponing effect.

§ 211. When there is reason to assume that a person has not died a natural death, and that the death has been caused by a punishable act, an inquest, and, where the circumstances are suspicious, an autopsy shall at once be held, and persons who are able to give information concerning the deceased and the circumstances surrounding his death, shall be examined on the spot.

The Swedish Code of Judicial Procedure

Translated and with an Introduction by Anders Bruzelius, City Court Judge, Lund, Sweden, and Ruth Bader Ginsburg, Associate Professor of Law, Rutgers.

Section 5

Anyone possessing an object that can be brought conveniently to the courtroom, and that can be assumed to be of importance as proof, is obliged to make the object available for inspection at a view; however, in criminal cases, such an obligation is not imposed upon the suspect or upon any person related to him as stated in chapter 36, section 3. The provision in chapter 36, section 6, as to the privilege of a witness to refuse to testify shall correspondingly apply to the privilege of a party, or any other person, to refuse to make an object available for inspection at a view. As to the duty to produce a document for inspection at a view, the provisions in chapter 38, section 2, shall apply.

The provisions in chapter 38, sections 3 to 8, shall correspondingly apply to objects and documents which are to be made available for inspection at a view.

CHAPTER 40

EXPERTS

Section 1

If, for the determination of a matter, the appraisal of which requires special professional knowledge, it is found necessary to call upon an expert, the court may obtain an opinion on the the matter from a public authority or officer, or from any person specially licensed to furnish opinions on the matter, or commission one or more persons known for their integrity and their knowledge of the subject to deliver an opinion.

Section 2

A person whose relationship to a party or to the matter in controversy is such as to cast doubt upon his reliability may not be called as an expert.

Section 3

Before appointing an expert, the court should invite the parties to state their views thereon. If the parties agree upon an expert, he shall be used, provided that he is found suitable, and that there is no impediment to his appointment; however, the court may commission an additional expert.

Section 4

Except for persons who in their official capacity are obliged to assist as experts and those specially licensed to furnish opinions, no person is required to perform the commission of an expert unless he voluntarily undertakes to do so. A person who has undertaken such a commission may not avoid its performance without valid excuse. No expert, however, is obliged to disclose a trade secret, unless extraordinary cause requires that he give an opinion which would entail such disclosure.

Section 5

When, for the elucidation of a circumstance of importance for the task of the expert, a party or any other person should be examined, or any other investigation occur in court prior to the main hearing, the court may so order. The provisions on proof-taking outside a main hearing shall correspondingly apply.

If inspection is required of immovable property, objects that cannot be moved conveniently, or the scene of a special occurrence, the court may direct that the expert make an on the site inspection. At such inspections trade secrets may not be disclosed unless the court finds that there is extraordinary cause for such disclosure.

The court may direct that objects which, pursuant to chapter 39, section 5, a possessor is obliged to produce in court, shall be made available to the expert for inspection.

Section 6

If the presence of the parties at an expert's inspection is found appropriate, the court may direct that they shall be notified by the expert to attend the inspection. If a party has been so notified, his absence does not constitute an impediment to the occurrence of the inspection.

A record shall be made at the inspection which shall state the persons present and what occurred thereat.

Section 7

As to the reports of public authorities, or officers, or of persons specially licensed to furnish opinions, the specific provisions thereon and in other respects, established practice, shall govern.

Unless the court prescribes otherwise, any other expert shall submit a written opinion. The court shall direct the expert to submit the report within a fixed period.

The report shall state the reasoning and circumstances upon which the conclusions in the report are founded.

After the report is filed with the court, it shall be held accessible to the parties.

Section 8

An expert who has submitted a written opinion shall also be examined orally, if a party requests it, unless examination of the expert is plainly without importance, or if the court finds it necessary. As to a report obtained from a central administrative board, an academy, or any other official society, neither the board or society nor any person who participated in preparing the report may be examined orally, unless such examination is found unavoidably necessary; if several persons have cooperated in preparing the report, only one representative of each view expressed in the report may be called.

Section 9

Prior to testifying in the court, the expert, placing a hand on the Bible, shall take this oath:

"I (name) promise and assure before God Almighty and on his holy word that I will perform the expert task assigned to me to the best of my ability."

If the expert has submitted a report prior to his examination, the oath shall be adjusted accordingly.

After the expert has taken the oath, the court shall remind him of its significance.

As to substitution of an affirmation on honor and conscience in place of an oath, the provisions on the oath taken by witnesses shall apply.

Section 10

When an expert is examined orally, the examination is conducted by the court. However, with the consent of the court, an expert may be examined by the parties. The court and the parties may put questions to the expert.

The court shall exclude questions that are plainly irrelevant, confusing, or otherwise inappropriate.

If the expert has submittted a written opinion, and the court finds it suitable, all or part of the opinion may be read aloud.

Section 11

The provisions in chapter 36, section 7, paragraph 1, section 9, paragraph 2, and sections 15, 18 and 19 concerning witnesses shall correspondingly apply to experts.

Section 12

If a person who has undertaken to serve as an expert fails to submit his written opinion within the fixed period without a valid excuse, the court may order him to submit the report on penalty of fine.

Section 13

If an expert served with a notice to appear for examination does not appear, he shall be fined. If the case is postponed to a later date, the expert may be directed to appear on that date on penalty of fine.

Section 14

If an expert refuses without a valid excuse to take an oath or affirmation, to testify, or to respond to a question, the court shall direct the expert to perform his duty on penalty of fine.

Section 15

If the commission of an expert is withdrawn or otherwise discontinued, he may not thereafter be subjected to punishment or coercive measures under sections 12, 13 or 14.

Section 16

If an expert is liable for negligence or contumacy as stated in sections 12, 13 or 14, and a party occasions litigation costs thereby, the court, even if not requested to do so, may order the expert to furnish compensation for such costs to the extent found reasonable. Further, if a party was ordered by the court to compensate his adversary for such costs, upon payment, the party may claim reimbursement from the expert to the extent of the sum ordered by the court to be paid by the expert.

The prescriptions as to the liability of an expert to reimburse a party for expenses shall correspondingly apply to expenses paid out of public funds.

When a report has been submitted by a public authority or officer, or by a person specially licensed to furnish opinions, compensation shall be paid only to the extent special provisions so prescribe. Any other expert is entitled to compensation for expenses accruing in the execution of his duties, and for expenditure of his time and effort in an amount found reasonable by the court.

In civil cases amenable to out of court settlement, and in prosecutions for offenses not within the domain of public prosecution, the compensation shall be paid by the parties jointly and severally or, if only one of the parties has requested employment of the expert, by that party alone. In all other cases, the compensation shall be paid out of public funds.

Section 18

An expert is entitled to advanced payment of his compensation in an amount found reasonable by the court. The advance payment shall be made by the party, or parties, or out of public funds, as stated in section 17.

Further regulations concerning advance payments are issued by the King.

Section 19

As to experts not appointed by the court, but claimed by a party, the provisions in sections 7 and 8 shall apply to the extent relevant.

In other respects, when such an expert is orally examined, the provisions concerning witnesses shall apply; however, if the court finds it suitable, all or part of a written opinion may be read aloud.

Section 20

Specific regulations prescribed by law or decree on the examination of experts in particular situations shall govern.

Chapter 41

PERPETUATION OF PROOF FOR THE FUTURE

Section 1

If there is a risk that proof concerning a circumstance of importance to a person's legal right may be lost, or difficult to obtain, and no action concerning the right is pending, a lower court may take and perpetuate for the future proof in the form of witness testimony, expert opinions, views, or documentary evidence. However, proof may not be taken pursuant to this chapter for the purpose of investigating a crime.

Section 2

Anyone desiring to take and perpetuate proof for the future shall apply to the court.

The application shall state that fact expected to be established by the proof, the nature of the proof, the grounds claimed by the applicant in support of the proposed proof-taking and, if possible, the other persons whose interests may be at stake.

Questions 11 and 12:

I. INTRODUCTION

Extraterritorial criminal jurisdiction is sometimes referred to as international criminal law. However, Scandinavian writers prefer to use this term only for the criminal laws which have originated from international institutions and from agreements between individual states.[1]

This report deals with the applicability of national provisions in respect to space, because it is difficult to discuss the somewhat narrower subject of extraterritorial jurisdiction alone. The basic jurisdictional principle of Scandinavian criminal law, as of Anglo-American criminal law, is the territorial principle. However, the Scandinavian countries have had supplementary provisions on extraterritorial jurisdiction for more than a century. There are also Scandinavian provisions which make it possible to consider that a criminal act has been committed where the actual or intended consequences of the act have taken effect, and it may be doubtful whether such jurisdiction should be considered as territorial or extraterritorial jurisdiction.[2]

Part II, about the historical development, deals briefly with the relative place of Scandinavian criminal law within the Western World, because it is desired to stress that the current Scandinavian codes are closely related both to Anglo-American and to Continental European criminal law. The Scandinavian emphasis on territorial jurisdiction points to the relationship with English law.

Part III, about the current criminal codes, discusses the actual Scandinavian provisions in some detail. The Scandinavian experience with dual territorial and extratorritorial jurisdiction has been good, and the current Scandinavian provisions have, in principle, great similarty to the jursdictional provisons of the proposed Federal Criminal Code.[3]

Appendices A, B, and C contain the translations of the jurisdictional provisions in the current criminal codes of Denmark,[4] Norway,[5] and Sweden[6] respectively. Appendix D is a copy of Chapter 10 on criminal jurisdiction in the English version of Professor Andenaes' standard text on Norwegian criminal law.[7] This appendix was included because it is representative of the way in which Danish, Norwegian, and Swedish writers normally present the rationale of the Scandinavian provisions on criminal jurisdiction. It also illustrates how easy it would be to apply this approach to Chapter 2 of the proposed Federal Criminal Code.[8] It is probably this kind of systematic or rational approach which Professor Damasks has in mind when he states that: "Continentals would consider traditional common law jurisdictional notions less rational than their own."[9]

II. THE DEVELOPMENT OF SCANDINAVIAN CRIMINAL LAW

The historical basis for Scandinavian criminal law is the same as that for Anglo-American criminal law, namely, the laws of the North Germanic peoples who settled around the North Sea. There was much interaction between these peoples who had excellent means of seaward transportation while their means of overland transportation were poor. This common development lasted up to the Norman invasion of England in 1066. Two American scholars have discussed the later developments in such a way that they supplement each other. Orfield wrote in 1953:[1]

A study of the growth of criminal law in the Scandinavian states indicates that there are many close parallels with the growth of the criminal law in England. Concepts of private vengeance existed contemporaneously in both groups. There were outlawry, ordeals, and the use of compurgations and oath helpers in both groups. Movements to eliminate the wide use of the death penalty occurred side by side in both groups. A century ago the Scandinavians became interested in American methods of prison administration. During the past century all the Scandinavian states have developed modern codes of substantive and of procedural criminal law, which deserve study in other states when modernization of the criminal law is being attempted. The Scandinavian states have developed a unique alternative to the juvenile courts, namely, the use of committees and boards instead of courts. Criminal penalties are light, yet the Scandinavian states have a much lower percentage of crime than the United States. Scandinavian criminal procedure has moved away from the inquisitorial principle to the accusatorial.

Gerhard O. W. Mueller wrote a decade later:[2]

Here was a legal system which had spawned our own common law, which was thoroughly continental, yet, because of its historical ties with the British Isles, and a stubborn resistance against mid-European imperialization, had stayed somewhat aloof of the Roman law influences which had reshaped the law of the continent proper. Norwegian law, perhaps like Scandinavian law generally, has therefore become a virtual link between the Roman based continental legal systems and the common law though, without question, its legal ties, like its geography, are much closer with Central Europe than with England and America.

Professor Mueller seems to reflect the school of thought that it is possible to divide the entire Western World up into either common law systems or civil law systems. A Swedish writer has defended this view in some detail,[3] even though he also agrees with the late Professor Max Rheinstein that "the differences between the several families of the civil law group are so considerable that it might be justified to regard Nordic [i.e., Scandinavian] laws as another, though peculiar different, family of the civil law group."[4] However, most Scandinavian writers simply reject the idea that Scandinavian law can be classified as either civil law or as common law,[5] primarily because they feel that the so-called civil law group is too fragmentated to be considered one group.[6] The general Scandinavian (and to a large extent European) trend seems to be to consider all the legal systems of the Western World as belonging to one large group of relatively closely related legal systems. As it has been pointed out by the Swiss Professor Schnitzer,[7] all the legal systems of this Euro-American group are mixtures of Roman and Germanic law.

Schnitzer clarifies his theory further by stating that this whole group has "developed out of a mixed Roman and Germanic civilization imbued with Christianity."[1]

The Swedish Professor Malmström has written a good article in English[2] about the different comparative approaches, and his opinion seems to be representative of a rather generally held Scandinavian view when he accepts Schnitzer's proposal about organizing the individual legal systems in a way similar to that of a color scale according to the relative importance of Roman or Germanic elements. This would, according to Malmström, lead to the following arrangement:[3]

		CONTINENTAL EUROPEAN GROUP
Common law (England, U.S.A., etc.)	Scandinavia	Germany Switzerland Austria	France Belgium Luxemburg Holland	Italy Spain Latin America
			LATIN GROUP

Malmström himself admits that his grouping of the Euro-American legal systems is not a perfect solution, but it seems to be a more useful tool for comparative purposes than is the mere division of the Western World into "civil law systems" and "common law systems."

III. THE CURRENT CRIMINAL CODES

The jurisdictional provisions in the current criminal codes of Denmark,[4] Norway,[5] and Sweden[6] are all arranged in the same way: (A) the territorial principle is first established as the general jurisdictional principle; (B) the personality principle is then applied to fill in certain lacunae which have been left by the territorial provisions; (c) the universality principle is finally applied to fill in the lacunae which were left by the two previous principles. The provisions apply to all criminal offenses, regardless of whether they are described in the special part of the criminal codes or in other statutes.

The wording of the current Norwegian jurisdictional provisions has remained practically unchanged since 1951,[7] and the present provisions have much likeness to the corresponding provisions in the Norwegian Criminal Code of 1902.[8] Differently worded provisions which made the territorial, the personality, and the universality principles applicable to most serious crimes had already been introduced in the Norwegian Criminal Code of 1842.[9] The wording of the current Danish jurisdictional provisions has remained virtually unchanged since 1930,[10] and is quite similar to the original, somewhat weaker, provisions which were enacted in 1866.[11] The wording of the present Swedish jurisdictional provisions dates back to 1965,[12] and they were, in principle, introduced by the Swedish Criminal Code of 1864.[13] This Code was divided into a general and a specific part, as is usual in European criminal codes. However, the general arrangement of the Swedish Criminal Code was changed in 1965 in order to make it conform better with the original arrangement of 1754.[1] The Swedish Criminal Code is, technically, a chapter of the general Swedish lawbook or code, Sveriges Rikes Lag, which has been uninterruptedly in force since 1734.

A. Territorial jurisdiction

Scandinavian criminal law has from olden times recognized the territorial principle in the sense that the national criminal law (legal competence) applies to, and the national courts have jurisdiction (judicial competence) over, any crime committed within the national territory, regardless of the nationality of the perpetrator.[2] It is this territorial principle which the criminal codes of Denmark,[3] Norway,[4] and Sweden[5] have established as their basic jurisdictional principle. The Scandinavian words which have been translated as "territory" or "Realm" clearly include both the sea and air territory, and it seems to be generally agreed that the provisions also cover pursuit in continenti from the air or sea territory.[6] Denmark and Norway are extending the territorial principle to apply to Danish or Norwegian ships and airplanes respectively, while Sweden[7] considers such jurisdiction as extraterritorial.

B. Extraterritorial Jurisdiction

The territorial principle developed historically as a pragmatic and practical principle which reflected the traditional concept of sovereignty. It was never, in Scandinavia, accepted as a negative principle in the sense that a crime could be prosecuted only if it had been committed within the territorial jurisdiction.[8] The Scandinavian discussion in the middle of the 19th century indicates that it was not doubted that the state had the right to exercise extraterritorial jurisdiction, but that there was considerable doubt as to the practicability of the suggested version of the personality principle, because different countries had different concepts of what constituted a crime. Controversial subjects of the time, such as dueling and bigamy, were discussed.[9] It is interesting to note that the Royal Swedish Commission in its report of 1840 included a response from the law faculty at the University of Uppsala about the hypothetical prosecution of a returning Swedish citizen who, perfectly lawfully, had owned and sold slaves in the United States.[10]

1. The Personality Principle.—The personality principle fills in lacunae left by the territorial principle by extending jurisdiction to include crimes which have been committed abroad by citizens or permanent residents of the respective Scandinavian country. The Danish[11] and the Swedish[12] criminal codes describe the personality principle in sweeping terms, while the Norwegian code[13] describes exactly to which criminal acts the principle applies. The Norwegian method of drafting is probably preferable from an American point of view.

It appears, from the legislative history dating back to the middle of the 19th century, that the Scandinavian personality principle can scarcely be said to have been motivated by the allegiance that citizens and permanent residents owe to their country. The main motivation for the enactment was that the Scandinavian countries, as the general rule, do not extradite their citizens or permanent residents to non-Scandinavian countries, and that consequently, it had to be made possible to prosecute citizens or permanent residents for crimes which they had committed abroad. The 19th century discussions also indicate that it was felt that the general preventive effect of the criminal code would be undermined if it should become impossible to prosecute a person present in the country for a crime which he undoubtedly had committed. It is a consequence of this philosophy that the relevant time for deciding citizenship or permanent residency, at least in Denmark, is the time when the criminal investigation is initiated, rather than the time when the crime was committed.[1]

The Danish and the Norwegian personality principle is limited to criminal acts which were also punishable in the country where they were committed, while Sweden does not extend this benefit to its citizens or permanent residents. These provisions reflect the discussions previously referred to about the different concepts of such crimes as duelling, bigamy, and slavery, and criticism has been made that the relatively new Swedish Criminal Code of 1965 does not follow Danish-Norwegian law on this point.[2] However, the present Swedish solution is motivated by the desire to offer international legal assistance by being able to prosecute criminals, rather than to extradite them.[3] The shortcoming of the Danish-Norwegian provisions is that prosecution becomes impossible, if the respective foreign country does not have a criminal offense which corresponds closely to an offense described in the Danish or the Norwegian Criminal Code. For instance, it has proved impossible to prosecute Danish citizens in Denmark for defrauding innkeepers in France, because France does not have any criminal offense which corresponds close enough to Section 298, No. 3, of the Danish Criminal Code.[4]

The Swedish reference to international legal assistance refers to the fact that European international cooperation within the field of law enforcement has greatly increased within the later decades. It has been a long-standing Scandinavian practice to prosecute for crimes committed in another Scandinavian country, and to execute criminal judgments handed down by the courts of the other Scandinavian countries. The latter field is now regulated by uniform Scandinavian laws,[5] while the former is based on informal agreements and mutual understandings. A very similar trend can be seen for all of the European countries, and this is reflected by the recent European convention on the international validity of criminal judgments.[6] Normally it is this body of law which Scandinavian writers refer to when they use the term "international criminal law."[7]

2. The Universality Principle.—The real[8] or universality[9] principle denotes that nonresidents/aliens may be prosecuted for acts committed abroad when the state has a special interest in protecting itself or its citizens against such acts. The universality principle is generally accepted in Scandinavia as an unavoidable supplement to the territorial and the personality principles.[10] The Swedish[11] and the Danish[12] provisions are drafted in sweeping terms, while the Norwegian,[13] as for the personality principle, describes accurately the crimes for which the universality principle applies.

C. Where Shall the Crime be Deemed Committed?

It is generally accepted principle within Scandinavian criminal law that a crime may always be considered to have been committed at the place where the crime was executed, regardless of where the consequences of the act occurred. It is on this background that the criminal codes of Denmark,[1] Norway,[2] and Sweden[3] have provisions that a crime under certain circumstances may be "deemed" or "considered" as committed also where an actual or intended consequence took place. These provisions are not considered as mere extensions of the territorial principles, but as independent jurisdictional provisions, e.g., the unlawful mailing of a bomb is considered a committed crime both where the bomb was mailed and where it was received.[4]

It is generally agreed that the Scandinavian provisions about where a crime shall be deemed to have been committed also apply to attempts, cooperation, and crimes of omission.[5]

D. The Applicability of Foreign Law

The recognition of extraterritorial jurisdiction greatly enlarges the possibility of conflicts with foreign criminal codes. The Danish,[6] Norwegian,[7] and Swedish[8] codes state rather categorically that the national courts should apply national law. However, this recognition of lex fori does not prevent foreign law from being applied in a number of situations. For instance, it is a matter of course that questions arising in the civil law area, such as the question about marriage in a bigamy case, are always decided in accordance with the appropriate legal system.

The Scandinavian countries do not have any absolute prohibition against double jeopardy. However, Section 10, Subsection 3 of the Danish Criminal Code states expressly that foreign judgments for acquittal prevent prosecutions based on the personality principle. The same rule may normally be deduced from Sections 12 and 13 of the Norwegian Penal Code, and the rule seems also to be followed in the Swedish administrative practice based on Section 5 of the Swedish Penal Code.[9] The criminal codes of Denmark,[10] Norway,[11] and Sweden[12] also have provisions which make it mandatory for the courts to deduct punishment which has already been served abroad.[13]

E. International Law

The Scandinavian criminal codes[14] expressly state that their jurisdictional provisions are limited by generally acknowledged exceptions of international law. It is generally agreed that these provisions confer immunity to certain persons, such as foreign diplomats, the crews from foreign warships on visits, and the like. Scandinavian writers claim that, apart from such rules of immunity, it is disputable whether international law limits the right of individual countries to punish acts committed outside their territory by aliens. They often refer, in this connection, to the Cutting case of 1886 where the United States disputed that Mexico had jurisdiction over the United States citizen, A. K. Cutting.[15]

F. The Protected Interest

It should finally be mentioned that extraterritorial jurisdiction may be limited by the fact that the criminal offense is described in such a way that it, as a practical matter, has to have been committed inside the territorial borders.[16] For instance, Section 128 of the Danish Criminal Code provides:

> Any person who within the territory of the Danish State undertakes to recruit for war service with a foreign power shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years.

Question 13:

The Anglo-American crime of criminal conspiracy is described in Section 1004 of the Proposed Federal Criminal Code. The Scandinavian Criminal Codes do not have any provisions in their special parts which can be described as the crime of conspiracy. However, the general provisions on attempt and complicity (cooperation) in the Scandinavian criminal Codes make it normally possible to establish a criminal offense which, as a practical matter, has much likeness to the Anglo-American concept of criminal conspiracy. The main difference seems to be that each participant in Scandinavia has to be considered individually. The relevant Scandinavian provisions are to be found in Sections 21–24 of the Danish Criminal Code, Sections 49–51, and 58, of the Norwegian Penal Code, and Chapter 23, "Of Attempt, Preparation, Conspiracy and complicity," of the Penal Code of Sweden.

It is against this background that Professor Andenaes discusses conspiracy in 3 Working Papers 1457–1458 as a subquestion in his coverage of Part A (the general part) of the Proposed Federal Criminal Code. The Norwegian (and Scandinavian) law on attempt and complicity is well covered by Andenaes in Appendix A (Part 2, p. 273–303), while Professor Damaska gives a broad survey of the different European approaches to the crime of conspiracy in 3 Working Papers 1498–1499.

Question 14:

The Anglo-American "felony-murder rule" is described in Section 1601, Murder, Subsection (c), of the Proposed Federal Criminal Code. This common law rule has been sharply criticized by Anglo-American legal writers,[1] and there does not exist any corresponding provision in Scandinavian criminal law. The Scandinavian law on attempt and complicity, which was discussed under Question 13 above, will, as a practical matter, often lead to a severe sentencing of a defendant who would fall under the Anglo-American felony-murder rule, but the Scandinavian judgment would always, technically, be based on acts or omissions committed by the defendant personally. Especially, the defendent would not be held responsible for murder, or attempted murder, unless it was proved that he had some intent to kill. A reference should in this connection be made to the broad Scandinavian concept of intent which was discussed under question 3 above. It includes not alone wilful acts, but also acts committed knowingly, and even some situations of reckless conduct. The latter was illustrated by a brief summary of a Swedish case about two defendants who were accused of attempting to kill a police officer with their car.

Professor Andenaes has not commented directly on the proposed Section 1601, but it is well known that he has a critical attitude to the common law felony-murder doctrine. This appears from a very broad Norwegian outline of American criminal law which he wrote in 1964:[2]

An important difference in comparison to Norwegian law is that the American criminal law does not have quite the same regard for the subjective guilt of the man who has broken the law. Admittedly, the general American rule is that punishment requires intent. This intent does not, however, have to be directed at all the elements of the crime in question, such as is usual in Norway. If the defendant has killed another person while he committed an intentional crime [felony], then he may be punished for murder even though the death was not caused by any intentional act. This is [a part of] the-so-called felony-murder doctrine. . .

It appears from the context that Andenaes probably oversimplified the problem in order to make it comprehensible for his audience. On the other hand, Professor Damaska is making a very good point when he states in 3 Working Papers 1502–1503 about felony murder that the main difference between the American and the European attitude is that practically all Europeans are very reluctant to label as a murderer a man who, no matter how violent, did not intend to kill. It should, in this connection, be mentioned that vicarious criminal liability is recognized in Scandinavian criminal law within such areas as employment relations,[1] and that Section 241 of the Danish Criminal Code is a good example of a Scandinavian provision where punishment depends on an unintended consequence (death) which may have occurred a long time after the criminal offense in itself was committed.

Question 15:

The subquestion about federal systems does not apply to the Scandinavian region. The Scandinavian countries have full independence of each other. However, this does not prevent them from cooperating very closely within the field of the administration of criminal justice.

Professor Damaska states in 3 Working Papers 1505 that the provisions in the Proposed Federal Criminal Code about riots etc. are very acceptable to one trained in the Continental systems. This statement applies also to the Scandinavian systems. The original codes were drafted in the middle of the 19th century which was a very unruly time in all of Europe. The pragmatic experience of the turmoil crystalized in provisions which strongly protect the right to free speech and the right to assemble, and which also, at the same time, protects society from abuses of these same rights. This is illustrated by, for instance, Sections 79–80 of The Danish Constitution:[2]

Sec. 79.—The citizens shall without previous permission be entitled to assemble unarmed. The police shall be entitled to be present at public meetings. Open-air meetings may be prohibited when it is feared that they may constitute a danger to the public peace.

Sec. 80.—In case of riots the armed forces, unless attacked, may take action only after the crowd in the name of the King and the Law has three times been called upon to disperse, and such warning has gone unheeded.

The Scandinavian provisions which most closely resemble Chapter 18 of the Proposed Federal Criminal Code are to be found in the Danish Criminal Code, Section 111, and Sections 133–143; the Norwegian Penal Code, Section 98, Sections 135–147 and 347–376; and the Penal Code of Sweden, Chapter 16. However, provisions which protect against riots and public disorder are spread out all over the Codes. For instance, Section 180 on arson in the Danish Criminal Code states:[3]

Any person who sets fire to his own property or to the property of others under such circumstances as must make him realize that the lives of persons are thereby exposed to imminent danger, or if it is done for the purpose of effecting extensive damage to the property of others or to incite sedition, looting or other similar disturbance of the public order, shall be liable to imprisonment for not less than four years.

It should be noted also that some of the misdemeanors in Sections 347–356 of the Norwegian Penal Code are covered by other regulatory statutes than the criminal codes in Denmark and Sweden.

Question 16:

The Scandinavian Criminal Codes do not have provisions which directly resemble Section 1104 about para-military activities in the Proposed Federal Criminal Code. However, other provisions make it rather impossible to establish para-military groups, and also private police or security forces are regulated to such an extent that they are close to being non-existent. The Scandinavian countries do not allow their citizens to carry arms, and the use of uniforms is closely regulated by, for instance, Sections 132–132 (a) of the Danish Criminal Code:[4]

Sec. 132, Subsec. 1. [as amended in 1961]—Any person who, intentionally or through negligence, makes use of

(1) any badge, uniform or clothing that is restricted to any Danish or foreign public authority or military persons,

(2) any badge or designation which is restricted to any personnel, institution or material designed to give assistance to wounded or sick persons in case of war, or

(3) identifications or names of international institutions, shall be liable to a fine.

Subsec. 2.—The provision in Subsection 1 applies also to copies or resemblances of the mentioned badges, uniforms, clothings, and designations.

Sec. 132(a). [See appendix B]—The provisions in Section 132 (a) on unlawful associations is the most effective and it reflects directly Section 78 of the Danish Constitution:[1]

Sec. 78. Subsec. 1.—The citizens shall be entitled without previous permission to form associations for any lawful purpose.

Subsec. 2.—Associations employing violence, or aiming at attaining their object by violence, by instigation to violence, or by similar punishable influence on people of other views, shall be dissolved by judgment.

Subsec. 3.—No association shall be dissolved by any government measure. However, an association may be temporarily prohibited, provided that proceedings be immediately taken against it for dissolution.

Subsec. 4.—Cases relating to dissolution of political associations may without special permission be brought before the highest court of the Realm.

Subsec. 5.—The legal effects of dissolution shall be determined by statute.

Question 17:

One of the most popular American casebooks on criminal law[2] spends its first 25 pages on "What Conduct Should Be Made Criminal? Crime and Morals," and these rather philosophical considerations are the introduction to the discussion of the most basic criminal law principle, the principle of legality. This writer employs a similar philosophical approach to the discussion of "Crimes without victims." At any rate, he would like to add the willing and consenting victims of a loan shark and of a confidence man, if the purpose of the philosophical discussion is to establish a norm on how far society ought to go in order to limit abuses of unbridled freedom.

It is not usual to find this type of philosophical discussions in Scandinavian criminal jurisprudence. It is easy to identify discussions about changes and improvements of the criminal codes, but they have a much more subordinate place. They are normally made either as comments de lege feranda (i.e. with future legislation in mind), or they are part of the continuing discussion of the policy on crimes. Especially the policy on crime approach (German: Kriminalpolitik) has contributed much to shape the Scandinavian criminal codes of today. The policy on crime approach is very pragmatic, and it prefers the results of the empirical sciences for philosophical considerations, if there exists such a choice. The theories of the German philosophers, such as Immanuel Kant and Nietzsche, cannot be said to be rejected as such by the Scandinavian criminal law reformers. There is rather a feeling that such philosophical theories contribute only little to the evolutionary process or continuous improvement of the Criminal Codes.

It was mentioned above under Question 11 that the Danish Ministry of Justice recently called a large number of experts in for a conference on the policy on crimes. A single example from the Conference, the discussion on the provisions on homosexuals, illustrates the difference between the philosophical and the policy on crime approach. The Danish Criminal Code, Section 225, subsection 3, about homosexual relations with a person below 21 years has been repealed, but Section 225, Subsection, still provides:

Any person who commits an act of sexual immorality with a person of the same sex under eighteen years of age shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding four years; provided that, where the persons concerned are of approximately the same age and development, punishment may be dispensed with.

The Danish homosexual minority is complaining bitterly, because this provision is much stricter than the age limitations on normal sexual relations. One point of view would be to find that this is an unreasonable discrimination which only adds to the many other social difficulties of a homosexual, and that

[2] Sanford H. Kadish & Monrad G. Paulsen, Criminal Law and Its Processes, 2nd ed., Boston, Little, Brown and Comp., 1969, p. 3–28.

Section 225, Subsection 2, consequently ought to be repealed. The policy on crime approach is not adverse to such a repeal for philosophical reasons, but it does ask the question about what the effect of the lowering of the age limit would be. Especially, to which extent young men who become part of the homosexual milieu will be more likely to become involved in social difficulties than those seeking normal sexual relations. The Danish Ministry of Justice has just commissioned an up-to-date study on this subject.[1] However, previous and rather convincing research does indicate that there exists a substantial need for special provisions for the protection of the young male.[2]

Question 18:

Possession and transfer of firearms and explosives are prohibited in Scandinavia. Violations are mostly punished by high fines, and requirements for licensing to carry a firearm, or to possess explosives, e.g., for construction work, are strict. However, these provisions are in statutes other than the Criminal Codes, because they are considered more of a regulatory nature than a criminal nature. Certain provisions, such as the Danish Criminal Code, Section 286 on larceny and burglary, authorize much higher punishment if the perpetrator was in possession of a weapon or another dangerous implement when he committed the crime. However, an act such as arming rioters would rather be prosecuted for violation of Section 111 of the Danish Criminal Code. The authorized punishment here goes up to life, and capital punishment might be possible, if the distribution was on behalf of a foreign power.

Question 19:

The highest punishment in the Scandinavian Criminal Codes is imprisonment for life. However, separate statutes make it possible to use capital punishment for treason under conditions of war. For instance, the Danish Act Nr. 227 of June 7, 1952, provides:[3]

Sec. 1. Subsec. 1.—The sentence of capital punishment may be used when the defendant during war, or during occupation by a foreign power, cfr. Section 99, Subsection 2, of the Criminal Code, for the promotion of a foreign interest and otherwise under aggravating circumstances has committed any of the crimes mentioned in Sections 98, 99, 102, Subsections 2, 111, or 237 of the Criminal Code.

Subsec. 2.—A person who had not reached 21 years of age when he committed the punishable act cannot be given the sentence of capital punishment.

Scandinavian courts do not have separate proceedings for capital cases, but the defendant would be entitled to a jury trial where the question on guilt is first decided by the jury. Most criminal cases in Scandinavia are decided by courts with lay judges (normally 2 lay judges and 1 law judge), rather than by jury trials. However, it is quite usual also in these cases to establish the guilt during the first stage of proceedings, and then to decide the sanctions. It was explained under Question 5 that sanctions or reactions normally are imposed, if the defendant is found to be insane, and the criminal code provisions, such as Section 16 of the Danish Criminal Code, directly require that the criminal act be proved. It is, consequently, most practical first to concentrate the proceedings on whether a criminal act, objectively speaking, has been committed.

The Scandinavian law on evidence is not burdened with restrictive rules, such as the law on hearsay evidence, which developed in order to protect the juries of Medieval England. Basically, the Scandinavian courts decide whether they feel the offered evidence is relevant or irrelevant. They are completely free as to the weight they will assign to, for instance, hearsay evidence. That Professor Andenaes has a rather critical attitude toward the Anglo-American law on evidence appears from his mentioned earlier article (in Norwegian) of 1964.[4]

These [hearsay] and similar rules on evidence have produced a voluminous literature and a very large number of court decisions. "Evidence" is a large and independent discipline at all American law schools. The classical textbook on the subject is: Wigmore on Evidence, an enormous work of ten heavy volumes. There are probably some who are inclined to think that if the jury really is so eminently suited to decide questions of fact, as it is usually claimed to be, then it is remarkable that it, at the same time, should be necessary to treat the individual juror as a child who has to be protected against undesirable influence. The rules are such that it some times must be extremely difficult for the jury to use simple common sense. . . .

Question 20:

The problems covered by Sections 703 and 704 of the Proposed Criminal Code are most often solved by a "joint judgment" in Scandinavia, as was explained under Question 9, Subquestion 13, above. It follows under the principle of res judicata that a previous and final acquittal would have to be accepted during later proceedings.

The types of jurisdictional conflicts which are described under Question 20 would in Scandinavia have to occur between a national and a foreign legal system. The decision to prosecute, or not to prosecute, lie in Scandinavia with the highest state prosecutor for each country. His decision would override that of any lower prosecutor. It seems possible to construe a conflict only in the very few and relatively unimportant cases where the private citizen has been directly given a right to prosecute. The practically important question is the situation where a foreign court already may have decided the case. This situation was discussed under Question 11–12: Section D. The Applicability of Foreign Law. Normally, the result would also here be a "joint judgment."

Appendix A

The General Part of the Criminal Law of Norway

(By Johannes Andenaes, Dr.jur.; Translated by Thomas P. Ogle, LL.B.)

Editor's Preface

I

In the fall of 1963 the brotherhood of American archaeologists finally decided to extend official recognition to excavations of a Viking settlement on the coast of Newfoundland,[1] thereby ultimately settling the old dispute on whether the Vikings had or had not reached our continent a millennium ago. Professor Andenaes happened to be in town, and I paid him my compliments on the accomplishment of his forebears. He smiled and answered wryly: "It sure took Americans a long time to face the fact; you know, we have known that for a thousand years."

Yes, it was a thousand years ago that the seedling was planted which was to grow rapidly into what we now know as the Common Law. The seedling was carried on a Viking ship from a Norwegian fjord to a French peninsula, thereafter known as Normandy. The fleet was under the command of Rolf, or Rollo, who had been banished from Norway for ravaging the countryside.[2] Rolf's was just one of many fleets of the Norsemen, or Normans, who set out in all directions of the compass to start colonies, from the Black Sea to the Ice Sea, from Greenland to Africa. Some did manage to survive, like those in Greenland or Iceland, some did not, like that on our shores. But none of these was to have as much of an impact on world history as that founded by Rolf, the outlaw. Rolf became Duke of Normandy in A.D. 911. Within a century and a half his descendant William—appropriately given the appellation The Conqueror—was to send the mightiest army of Norsemen ever assembled across the channel. The rest is familiar. The law of the Normans, just like their customs, became the law of England and of nearly the entire English-speaking world. This is the Horatio Alger story of legal history: From a mere faint trace of order—which is barely discernible among the violence, mayhem, murder and retribution of the sagas—to the proud legal system of the common law.

As I stood on a hill overlooking Oslo Fjord a few years ago, having just visited a few of the graceful millenarian Viking ships, musing about the men and ideas which had sailed from these waters to affect the destiny of human civilization, I wondered whether I should not endeavor to tell my criminal law colleagues in America what those Vikings who returned or stayed home had done with their law of wrongs.

Besides, the time was ripe for publishing a work on the general principles of continental criminal law in America, for none had ever been published in the English language. The desire to make this first continental criminal law text in English a Norwegian one increased, the more I learned about Norwegian criminal law. Here was a legal system which had spawned our own common law, which was thoroughly continental yet, because of its historic ties with the British Isles, and a stubborn resistance against mid-European imperialization, had stayed somewhat aloof of the Roman law influences which had reshaped the law of the continent proper.[1] Norwegian law, perhaps like Scandinavian law generally, has therefore become a virtual link between the Roman-based continental legal system and the common law though, without question, its legal ties, like its geography, are much closer with Central Europe than with England and America. If, therefore, our first text on continental criminal law were to be a Norwegian one, so I reasoned, would that not ease the difficulties of the common lawyer in finding his way into an alien system?

All these considerations clearly pointed to Norway. Yet there were other considerations. The experience of the Scandinavian countries in trading ideas on matters of criminal law has made for an amazing amount of theoretical uniformity, a first step toward peaceful, gradual, and voluntary unification in this constantly shrinking world. Whether we like it or not, we in the United States are sitting on the same shriveling globe and will do well to learn from the Scandinavian experience of international accommodation. Moreover, we had better open our doors to the criminological and legal ideas of that other system, for we will have to work together, unless the world is to return to the days before Rolf.

Lastly, and most importantly, in choosing Professor Andenaes' The General Part of the Criminal Law as our gate to the continental system of criminal law, it was the mind of the man himself which prompted our selection. As has been mentioned on previous occasions,[2] Professor Andenaes is a man of two worlds, at home in both, and thus an ideal writer on one legal system for the benefit of the other. Paternal and fraternal ties to our country, repute in our journals and universities nearly as great as in his own, the esteem of his students and colleagues on two continents, all these add up to the fact that his book is not really that of an alien.

II

The task began as a straight translation of the Norwegian edition, Alminnelig Strafferett.[3] But it soon became apparent that our common law reader should be told both less and more than a Norwegian one, and thus a process of editorial revision began which, in many respects, made this a new book. But what most certainly has not been changed is the general approach and the systemacy of presentation of the subject-matter, in the finest continental tradition. What has not been changed is the universality of outlook. This is a book of European as much as of Norwegian criminal theory, of which the constant references to primary and secondary sources of the other Scandinavian countries, of Germany, and of other nations are symptomatic; and the references to Anglo-American sources render this book virtually a global work.

What will strike the reader is the thorough methodology and classificatory skill of the continental scholarly mind. Even after the works of Hall in the United States,[4] and of Williams in England,[5] most Anglo-American criminal lawyers are as yet distrustful of that jurisprudential culture which is second nature to continental criminologists. More than anything, we hope that the instant book will bring fresh thinking into the dimensions of Anglo-American criminal law theoreticians and practitioners. The very idea of a "General Part," with theoretically arrived-at generalizations for controversial legal issues, may still strike most Anglo-American readers as odd. A century ago the shock of exposure to a systematic continental criminal law treatise might have been too much for Anglo-American lawyers to bear. Today, we simply have proof that we are moving pretty much in the same direction as our continental confrères. Perhaps we are soon to meet at the fork in the road.

It is not, however, that change is all onesided, for as we become more systematic, continental jurists are more and more discovering the significance of the case. On this point, too, Professor Andenaes gives us ample evidence. From all this change there may well emerge—though not a uniform penal law of global dimensions—a world-wide system of criminal law among civilized nations.

Unlike an insurance release, which ends with a clause disclaiming all future liability, an editor's preface must end with the acceptance of all liability:

Professor Andenaes' graceful style could not be faithfully reproduced. Our book is a translation, and no amount of effort could change that fact. Translator, editorial assistants and editor have worked many months on the book. They have reached points at which they came close to discarding the enterprise altogether, and the author himself, I fear, was haunted by similar thoughts on many occasions. If Professor Andenaes had only written a novel, our task would have been simple.

Nevertheless, we now dare face the world. The editor himself, as the last one to revise the translation, assumes all responsibility for assaults upon the English and rape of the Norwegian languages.But the credit for the volume itself unquestionably belongs to two of my former students, Mr. Thomas Ogle, who made the original translation, and Dr. Patrick M. Wall, who prepared the first revised draft. Others have rendered editorial and secretarial assistance from time to time, among them Mr. Edward Wise, and the Misses Judith Chazen and Margaret Montana. To all of them and to our esteemed publishers, Messrs. Fred B. Rothman & Co., and Messrs. Sweet & Maxwell, Ltd., the editor extends his heartfelt thanks. He speaks for all of them when he salutes the author himself, Professor Johannes Andenaes, of the University of Oslo, Visiting Professor at the University of Pennsylvania and at New York University, scholar of two worlds—which just may turn into one for criminal science.

From the Preface to the Norwegian Edition

* * * That a legal textbook contains so much material not of a directly legal nature is perhaps one of the points which will first strike the reader.[1]

This is the expression of a deliberate program. To be steeped in the law and capable of solving the problems of interpretation which it poses is not sufficient for the criminal lawyer of today. He should know the realities behind the law: what kind of people are affected by punishment and other measures of criminal policy, what brings them into conflict with the penal code, how do the reactions of society influence them and members of the society at large? In our course of law study we have no separate required course in criminology. For this reason it becomes the object of the course on penal law to give the necessary synthesis of legal and factual knowledge.

The lawyer should study the background of the rules from another viewpoint. Opposed to the lawbreaker stands the punishing society. Within this society the opinions on crime and punishment are neither uniform nor unchangeable. Rational and emotional elements are interwoven in an often mysterious manner. In our time penal law—or criminal law as many prefer to call it—is in a stage of fermentation. The traditional system is under review in the light of new developments within psychology, psychiatry, and sociology. Basic concepts such as guilt and responsibility are debated. Requests for medical, psychological, and pedagogical treatment of lawbreakers in lieu of punishment are advanced. Some would go as far as abolishing punishment altogether. Others would prefer the course of cautious reform. Experiments are made, experience is reaped. A study of the law in force that takes no account of the debate on issues of criminal policy becomes less rich than it should be.

I am convinced that this program is right. But he who wishes to adopt such a program must venture into fields where he is not a specialist and where he must build on the material of other persons. Even an elementary presentation involves the unavoidable risk of error and misunderstanding. A criminal lawyer is neither a philosopher nor a sociologist, nor is he a psychologist, a psychiatrist, a prison specialist, or a social worker. But he needs access to all these special fields when attempting to form a balanced picture of the problems surrounding crime and punishment.

I have tried to reduce the risk of error and mistake by enlisting the assistance of experts in these various fields. * * *

GROUNDS OF IMPUNITY

§ 14. GENERAL EXPLANATIONS

I. Definitions of offenses and grounds of impunity

In formulating a penal provision, not every special circumstance which may be of importance in characterizing the prohibited act can be taken into consideration. Thus, it sometimes happens that an act is covered by the description of a penal provision, but nevertheless is not punished. A ground of impunity exists. § 233 imposes punishment upon "anybody who causes a person's death, or is accessory thereto." This may seem clear enough. But by its terms the enactment applies not only to the usual murderer, but also to one who acts in self-defense, the hangman who executes the death sentence, and the soldier who kills the enemy in war-time. Numerically these legalized homicides have played a much larger role than criminal ones in Europe during the past century.

The Penal Code itself contains many rules which expressly make exceptions to the penal provisions when such grounds of impunity exist. Some of these rules apply only to one or a few penal provisions. An example is Penal Code, § 167, which states, among other things, that punishment for false testimony and perjury will not apply to a person accused of a crime. Other rules of exception are of a general nature, especially those applying to necessity (§ 47) and self-defense (§ 48).

Not all grounds of impunity are set out in the Code. The consent of the victim is mentioned as a ground of impunity in some provisions, but there is no doubt that consent will have the same effect in many other situations. Other grounds of impunity not set out in the law include execution of public duty, forcible redress of a wrong and negotiorum gestio. During wartime, not only homicide and the infliction of bodily harm but also material destruction, coercion and other acts, ordinarily punishable, can be justified as acts of war.

It is natural to treat those grounds of impunity which have a more general application in the general part of the criminal law, while special grounds are better handled in the special part in connection with those provisions to which they apply. It is impossible to draw up an exhaustive list of all the grounds of impunity, because all the factors which might justify limiting the provisions cannot possibly be foreseen. One cannot be satisfied with ascertaining only that the act falls within the words of a penal provision and that there is no question of self-defense, necessity or any other well-known ground of impunity. For the main types of common felonies, such as homicide, assault and larceny, this is generally sufficient, since the circumstances excluding liability—even though the situation falls within the words of the law—have been laid down in established rules of exception in the course of many years. This is different in so far as the more unusual penal provisions are concerned. These statutes are often formulated with less care than the common offenses, and often without any clear general picture of the situations which are to be regulated. All the various reasons which may justify an acquittal contrary to the words of a statutory provision cannot possibly be collected in an exhaustive theoretical category.[1]

To decide whether an act falls within a penal provision but should be treated as non-punishable because of some special ground of impunity, or regarded as outside the statutory provision in the first place, may be a matter of discretion in many instances. When a doctor amputates a leg in order to save a patient's life, one may say that the doctor inflicts a bodily injury which is not culpable because of the curative purpose. But one may also say that he does not "injure another in body or health" at all (Penal Code, § 229). The only real judicial question is whether or not a reasonable interpretation of the law leads to the decision that such an act is not punishable. How the result should be expressed is merely a question of terminological utility.

Lack of criminal responsibility and guilt (mens rea) will also lead to impunity. In order to make clear the contrast between these subjective grounds of impunity and those of which we are speaking here, many authors use the expression objective grounds of impunity to describe the latter.[2] But there is a slight catch to this terminology. Subjective elements can also play a certain role in determining whether an otherwise objective ground of impunity exists. For example, it may be important to determine the purpose of an infliction of bodily harm which takes place with the consent of the other party (see below, § 17, III, 1; see also below, § V). I therefore prefer to call them merely grounds of impunity, implying, however, that we are keeping the questions of responsibility and guilt apart.

The grounds of impunity could be divided into two groups: Grounds of justification and grounds of excuse. In the first group the act is not unlawful, it may even be highly desirable from a social point of view. In the second group the act is still considered a wrong, but the circumstances are such that the law does not find it just or expedient to punish the wrongdoer. This distinction is of significance in some relations. Thus, if the act is lawful, it cannot be met with self-defense, since according to Penal Code, § 48, self-defense consists in prevention of or defense against "an unlawful attack." If there only exists a ground of excuse, the act is still unlawful and can be met with self-defense. In a prosecution against the actor, however, the distinction between justifications and excuses is of no legal significance. Whether the alleged defense is one of justification or merely one of excuse, it leads to acquittal if it is accepted, and no procedural differences attach to the distinction. It is, therefore, not necessary for the court to decide whether the defense belongs to one group or another, e.g., whether the rule exempting the accused person and his near relatives from punishment for false testimony in court is a rule of justification, implying a right to lie, or merely a rule of excuse.

Distinguishable from the grounds of impunity are those grounds upon which a judge may decide to remit punishment in an individual case. See, for example, Penal Code, § 58 and § 392, para. 2. Here it is the legal viewpoint that the offender is guilty and should be punished, but that the court can exercise a kind of pardoning power. In a jury trial the jury would have to return a verdict of guilty; it would be for the judge to decide whether punishment should be remitted or not.

II. The concept of illegality and its ambiguity

In German and Scandinavian legal writings it is usual to deal with the grounds of justification under the heading: The requirement of illegality. Illegality is then considered a general condition of punishability in addition to the requirements that the act must be covered by a particular penal provision and that responsibility and subjective guilt must exist.

There are no doubt practical advantages in having a positive expression to denote the absence of any grounds of justification. But at the same time, the use of the term "illegality" creates certain dangers. From a purely linguistic point of view, illegality means the opposite of legality; that is, it signifies that which is contrary to the legal system. If the expression is used in this manner, as it often is, it points to an absolute limit. The act is either in conflict with the law or it is not; that which is unlawful in one part of the legal system cannot be lawful in another; it also seems self-contradictory to say that an act is in accordance with the law in relation to A, but not to B.

The use of such a concept in the treatment of the positive law would be unfortunate. It should not be taken for granted that an act which leads to liability in one direction also leads to liability in another direction. To take an example.[1] Assume that I have for safe-keeping a valuable Stradivarius and smash it on the head of a burglar. This may be an unlawful destruction in relation to the owner if I could have chosen a less valuable object, but my action will not be a punishable assault on the thief, as long as I did not hit him harder than necessary. Self-defense makes the act impunitive and justified in relation to the thief, but not to the violin owner who has suffered a loss. Nor can one suppose that always the same requirements exist for punishability as for the duty to pay damages or other sanctions. The legislator may have reasons for counteracting certain types of conduct with one sanction, but not with others. And the courts which have to fill the void left by the legislator must have a similar freedom. For example, one cannot take it for granted that the conditions which have to be met to make consent a ground of impunity are identical to those required to make it a defense in a damage action. And to mention an example where legislation itself uses the concept of illegality: § 29 of the Contracts Act and Penal Code, § 222, both require that coercion be illegal (unlawful) to make the contract voidable and the act punishable, respectively. Good arguments can be made in favor of requiring more serious conditions to exist before punishment may be imposed, while being satisfied with less in order merely to release a person from a promise. A well-known decision in Rt. 1874, p. 484, illustrates the point. A prosperous merchant in a small town had been surprised one evening in the private garden of another, while sitting there and eating gooseberries. To avoid prosecution, he signed an I.O.U. for 1,200 kroner to the owner of the garden, who donated the instrument to the town treasury to be used for charitable purposes. The merchant later changed his mind, and a suit was brought for the money, as a result of which he was required to pay. Taking modern legal opinion into account, I would think today that the result would have been the opposite because of the amount of money involved. However, it would hardly be appropriate to punish the owner of the garden.

At times the term illegality is used in a more technical sense: That an act is illegal will then mean that it meets the objective requirements of liability. It is, in other words, merely another way of expressing the fact that there is no ground of impunity. By this terminology, an act can be illegal in relation to one interest but not in relation to another, illegal in relation to the law of torts but not in relation to criminal law, etc.

Whether the word "illegal" is used in one sense or the other, one may say that in either case it remains a formal term. The definition does not say which acts are illegal. However, the discussions on illegality have also probed into the question of whether it is possible to find any common denominator for those acts which are contrary to the law, something which distinguishes them from the lawful acts. The definitions which try to set up such criteria for the distinction between illegal and legal acts can be said to aim at a substantive concept of illegality. Obviously, such definitions must become worthless if they tried to encompass the entire legal system, or large parts of it.

Experience has shown that the use of the term "illegality" within the systematical structure of the concept of crime will easily lead to confusion. It can cause one to overlook the fact that the general conditions of criminal liability must be formulated with the special legal sanction in mind. And it can lead to the false conclusion that the question of illegality and thus of punishability is determined by rules which exist independent of the text of the penal provision, while in reality, when the ground of impunity has no special basis in legislation, a reasonable interpretation of the provision itself must be the determining factor. To steer away from the dangers of confusion and false conclusions one had better avoid the terminology of illegality as far as possible, and rely instead on the negative formulation that the absence of a ground of impunity is a condition of punishability.[1]

III. Absolute and relative penal provisions

That punishabliity should be precluded when the requirements in the provision are met and responsibllity and guilt are present is almost unthinkable for some penal provisions. This applies, for example, to Penal Code, § 192, on rape. It is hard to believe that under any circumstances a person "who, by using force or by causing fear for life or health, compels somebody to indecent relations, or is accessory thereto," might be acting permissibly. In such circumstances, the term absolute penal provisions has been used in contrast to the rest, the relative ones.[2] Extreme care must be used, however, before a penal provision is declared absolute; peculiar combinations of circumstances which may make the penal provision non-operative can usually be imagined.[3]

But certainly there are great differences between various penal provisions in this respect. In some instances, the words of the provision and its meaning coincide so exactly that there is little or no room for exceptions; at other times the conflict between the words and the meaning is much greater. The penal provision would often be misleading if it did not contain a reservation stating that it is not meant to apply to every situation which falls within the general definition of the crime.

IV. Express reservations in the penal provisions

We now turn to the fact that many penal provisions themselves contain such reservations as "illegal," "unlawful" and "unwarranted," while similar reservations are absent in many other provisions. What significance is there in this differentiation?

The meaning of the expression "illegal" or "unlawful" in a penal provision may vary greatly. In some instances, it refers to rules in other areas of the law. Such is the case, for example, with Penal Code, § 410: "Anybody who unlawfully refuses to receive somebody or discharges somebody from his service,

[1] The literature on the concept of illegality is voluminous, but the results of the discussions are not in proportion to the effort. I will confine myself to pointing out some of the latest works on the subject: Ussing, Retstidighed [Illegality]. Memorial monograph published by the University of Copenhagen (Copenhagen, 1949); Ross, "Opgor med retstridighetslaeren" [Settling the theory of illegality] (1951) Tidsskrift for Rettsvitenskap, pp. 205–231. The present author has treated the subject-matter in greater detail in Straffbar unnlatelse [Criminal omissions], p. 14 (Oslo, 1942).

[3] The law of marital relations imposes a duty on the wife to share board and bed with her husband, and a number of legal systems take the position that the husband cannot be punished for rape of his wife. In these jurisdictions even rape is not an absolute criminal offense. [Translator's note.]

shall be punished by fines." Here the Penal Code refers to the law of contracts and supplies it with penal sanctions. When "unlawfully" is mentioned in the provisions within chapter 8 ("Felonies against the independence and safety of the state"), this is mainly for the purpose of showing that these penal provisions must be understood in the light of all those limitations which follow from the general rules of International Law.

At times, even in the comments to the Draft Penal Code, one comes across the theory that the question of illegality is always determined by a system of norms taken from ouside the penal law; in other words, the use of the concept of illegality always refers to other areas of law.[1] This does not hold true. To seek the solution in other fields of law is of no avail in determining, e.g., whether there exists an illegal coercion (Penal Code § 222, para. 2), or an illegal inducement (§ 270). It is no use, for example, in the interpretation of § 222 to seek the solutions in the rules on coercion established in the civil law; first, because one cannot suppose that the lines are drawn in the same manner in the two areas, and secondly, because the Contracts Act, § 29, also refers to the fact that the coercion must be illegal. The cases must be solved by an interpretation of the penal provision itself. The expression must be understood as a general reservation by the legislature to the effect that the provision was not intended to cover all the situations which would otherwise be included in its definition. Precisely how the limits are to be drawn is left to be decided by the judges. As Alf Ross has stated, the use of the reservation of illegality is often a sort of admission of helplessness on the part of the legislator: "In cases where it is difficult to find an adequate term to express the prerequisites of the sanction, the word 'illegal' or something similar is used as a buffer, a concept which is empty enough to be used as one wished under the pressure of the concrete circumstances."[2] The expression can often be translated into "undue," "unwarrantable," "reprehensible" or something expressing a similar characterization.

As has been mentioned before, a penal provision must often be given a more limited meaning than the words require, even though the term illegality has not been mentioned in the provision. The incorporation of "illegal" into the penal provision therefore has no great significance. "Illegal," "unlawful" "unwarranted" or similar limitations are generally incorporated into the penal provision when it is obvious that the definition would otherwise reach further than intended. Such a reservation can occasionally be significant for purposes of interpretation; the fact that the legislature itself has expressed the necessity of a qualification makes it easier to lay down a limitation in cases of doubt, than would have been the case had the words of the law been absolute. However, such a limitation would generally have been read into the law even in the absence of an express reservation. The presence or absence of a reservation often seems a rather arbitrary matter. For example, any real reason for inserting this reservation in § 246 (slander of personal honor) but not in § 247 (slander of reputation) is difficult to see. The circumstances which may make the act non-punishable are to a large extent the same for the two offenses (the truth of the statement, necessity, consent, etc.).

The effect of the reservation must in principle be determined by an interpretation of the individual penal provision. Similarly, when the reservation is used in one of the provisions in the general part of the Penal Code, as is done in § 48 which limits the right of self-defense to defenses against unlawful attacks, and in § 57 which speaks about ignorance of the illegal nature of an act.

V. The permissible risk

Even common and normal acts may often create a certain risk of harm. But one would not consider prohibiting them, or making the acting person liable for the harm, merely for this reason. As a rule, lack of criminal liability will follow from the doctrines of adequacy or guilt. But this is not always the case. A manufacturer of cars, planes or weapons cannot be blind to the fact that a certain number of accidents will occur by the use of his products; yet this is no ground for making him liable. A cigarette manufacturer must know that a substantial number of people will get lung cancer from using his products. Life in modern society is based on the fact that a certain causation of danger is legal. The determining factor, as Getz expressed it in his famous treatise on cooperation in crimes of 1875, is "the general judgment which again stems from common practice."[1] Using an expression from Germany theory, one may speak of the permissible risk.

This must not be interpreted to mean that there is a certain degree of danger to which a person may always expose the surroundings. The estimate of the permissible risk varies with the nature of the act and its object. But, as Skeie expressed it, "one must leave to people a right to do also those acts which have no special beneficial purpose, a right to ordinary freedom of action."[2]

Impunity also for intentional harm

The question of the permissible risk arises most often in the study of negligence, and we shall return to it there (see below, § 23, II). But the rule of lack of liability may apply even if the harm is intentional, and the doctrine of permissible risk has significance as an independent ground of impunity precisely in these instances.

It is often a matter of personal taste whether the result should be expressed in such a way that liability is precluded because the damage is not adequate (compare above, § 12, V), or because the act is not unlawful (illegal). But, as mentioned, absence of liability exists even in those cases where the result was adequate. And not only will criminal liability be precluded but it is also precluded to resist or counter the act (prohibitions, self-defense, or damages). The act must therefore be characterized not only as impunitive but as absolutely legal.

Significance of purpose

Getz held as an absolute rule that the purpose of the actor can have no effect upon the question of legality. According to his views, if an act undertaken without evil purpose would not have been judged negligent, it could not entail liability, even if it were undertaken with the purpose of creating harm.[3] This view was strongly attacked by Knoph in his famous first work, Hensiktens betydning for grensen mellem rett og urett [The importance of purpose for the distinction between right and wrong] (1921). And it is now the prevailing opinion that purpose and other subjective elements may be of significance to the judge in determining whether or not an act is legal.[4]

But in the area which we are now discussing there is little doubt that the general rule must be that the act which objectively is within the general limits of freedom of action will not be punishable even if it is committed for the purpose of doing harm or from other bad motives. Everyone who arranges boxing matches or auto races because of a sick desire to witness accidents, is acting lawfully as long as there is nothing wrong with his conduct from an objective point of view. This rule has been justified on the ground that an objective criterion is necessary for protection against malicious prosecutions.[5] This argument hardly has much bearing. The prosecuting authorities have more important matters to do than to maliciously prosecute the individual. But other considerations of legal policy can explain the rule. Neither from an individual preventive nor from a general preventive point of view is it of any great interest for society to react against one who remains within the normal limits of freedom of action. In many instances this could be in direct conflict with the interests of society, because the act is socially beneficial, even though its motives might be bad. And since evidence of a person's evil purpose in such cases really can be obtained only by his own confession, an adjudication on this basis would be extremely haphazard. However, under present law a person who commits an objectively normal and harmless act may incur criminal liability for attempt to commit an offense, when he assumes that his act is likely to produce a harmful result, due to a mistake of fact. This applies for example, to one who puts sugar in another person's coffee, believing it to be arsenic, or to the thief who mistakenly removes a thing which turns out to be his own. We will return to these questions when considering the doctrine of attempt (see below, § 34, V).

A German decision (Entscheidungen des Reichsgerichts in Strafsachen, p. 321, Vol. 37) is instructive in many ways. A prisoner escaped with the aid of his wife, who distracted the attention of the police guard. She had previously mentioned her plan to her lawyer, who had told her not to do anything but who had also stated (incorrectly, by the way) that as the wife of the prisoner, she could not be punished for aiding him to escape. The lawyer was prosecuted as an accomplice in the escape, and was convicted in the lower court on the theory that his statement had strengthened the wife in her illegal purpose. The conviction was reversed by the Reichsgericht, which held that a lawyer or other expert who does nothing more than give his professional opinion cannot generally be punished for intentional cooperation even though he realizes that his statement will lead to an offense. Much can be said about the reasoning of the Reichsgericht, but the decision illustrates both the question of permissible risk, and the role which motive and purpose may play in the process of adjudication.

I. A form of personal enforcement of the law

It is a natural principle that one who is attacked has a right to defend himself, even to the extent of harming the aggressor. A person cannot be expected to accept an attack calmly and confine himself to holding the assailant liable after the harm is done. Self-defense is a type of personal enforcement of the law. Penal Code, § 48, states that no one can be punished for acts committed in self-defense. But the law undoubtedly means that the act of self-defense is not only unpunishable but also lawful. This is also presupposed in § 24 of the Act on the coming into force of the Penal Code, which mentions harm lawfully inflicted in the prevention of a threatening danger. That the act of self-defense is lawful is shown by the fact that it does not entail liability for damages, and also by the fact that the aggressor cannot counter it by self-defense on his own part.

Preventive, not re-establishing

Self-defense is a preventive enforcement of the law, as distinguished from forcible redress of a wrong. It is not self-defense when the owner recovers the stolen object from the thief, at least not unless the thief was caught in the act. Neither is it self-defense when a person entitled to a negative easement starts to tear down a building which has been erected contrary to the easement. This is taking the law into one's own hands (forcible redress) which otherwise may be lawful under certain circumstances (see below, § 18, III).

II. The attack

The type of self-defense which primarily comes to mind is self-defense against an attack upon the person. But Penal Code, § 48, goes much further, for it permits self-defense against every unlawful attack.

1. Self-defense to protect any type of legal right

The right of self-defense applies regardless of the type of legal right attacked. A person has the right of self-defense not only to protect his person, but also to protect his property, his honor (see Rt. 1936, p. 740) and his other legal rights.

The law does not distinguish between an attack on the defender or on a third party. If I witness an assault, I have the same right to ward it off as the offended party himself.[2] This shows clearly that self-defense is a form of legal enforcement and not merely a subjective ground of excuse. Self-defense may also be asserted to protect public interests, as where, for example, I see a traitor or spy about to flee to the enemy with military secrets.

[1] Augdahl, Nodverge [Self-defense] (Kristiania and Copenhagen, 1920).

[2] Admittedly the term "self-defense" is not very adequate in these cases, but it is used here for lack of a term more exactly corresponding to the Norwegian concept "nodverge" which literally may be translated into "need-ward" or "emergency-defense" (German: Notwehr). [Translator's note.]

In practice, the issue of self-defense arises most often in cases of physical assaults. It is very common for an accused to assert that he was attacked or threatened by the other party, and therefore acted in self-defense. He must be acquitted if there is a reasonable doubt on this issue. Here, as elsewhere, the doubt must be resolved in favor of the accused, who does not have the burden of proving self-defense. Compare above, § 9, II.

2. "Attack" normally presupposes an active violation of interests

Occasionally there may be doubts as to what is meant by an attack. Generally it presupposes an active violation of interests. If a person refuses to fulfill a duty, e.g., to return an object or pay a sum of money, this is not what the law considers an attack which would justify self-defense on the part of the person aggrieved. Exceptions can be imagined, however. The comments to the Draft Penal Code mention, as examples, cases where one who has imprisoned another refuses to release him, or that a person, in order to prevent a rescue, remains sitting in such a place that he obstructs the opening through which the rescue work would have to be performed (S.K.M., pp. 87–88). The same would be true in other circumstances where omission is equivalent to an act causing harm, such as where a guide refuses to rescue a tourist from a dangerous situation, or where a mother refuses to feed her child. This question of interpretation has no great practical significance. In such cases the doctrine of necessity (Penal Code, § 47) will generally provide the basis for that compulsion or use of force which is necessary to ensure that the duty is fulfilled.

A more practical problem is dispute about the use of real property. A not too infrequent example is this: A and B are in constant dispute about a right of way which A claims he is entitled to on B's land. One day, B builds a fence across the road. A sees it and tears it down. If A has actually used the road then the building of the fence must be regarded as an attack by B, even though he builds it on his own road. A then has the right of self-defense while the fence is being built. But once it is erected, a new situation is created, so that A would be guilty of an attack if he should tear down the fence. This does not solve the case, however, for it must be determined whether there is lawful forcible redress of a wrong on either side (see below, § 18, III).

Attack against public interests. As mentioned before, self-defense can also be exercised in defense of public interests. However, a mere violation of a police regulation will not be considered an attack which provides the proper basis for self-defense. That would imply granting to private individuals extensive police powers over each other.

3. Self-defense against future attacks

The law does not require that the attack should have begun or that it is imminent. Self-defense can also be necessary against future attacks, for example, the comments to the Draft Code mention the case where a skipper has learned of a conspiracy among the sailors to murder him in a few days when the ship is expected to arrive at a certain spot well suited for this purpose (S.K.M., pp. 86–87). He certainly cannot be required to wait until the ship has arrived at the place where the murder is planned to be committed. A more practical example of preventive acts against a future attack is the setting up of trap guns and similar preventive measures which are directed toward an indefinite group (see below, V).

4. The attack must be unlawful

A condition for the right of self-defense is that the attack is unlawful (illegal). It need not be punishable, however.

Whether the act is unlawful depends on the rules of public and private law. As a starting point it can be said that every attack against a legally protected interest is illegal in the absence of any special ground which makes it legal, such as emergency, official acts of authority, and lawful forcible redress of a wrong. If such a special ground does exist, the assaulted party must accept the attack and has no right of self-defense.

Rt. 1948, p. 75: During the German occupation in World War II, a garage was visited by saboteurs from the Resistance Movement, who came to destroy the machines of the garage, which was working for the German forces. The owner defended his garage and hit one of the saboteurs in the shoulder with a bullet. After the war he was indicted and convicted of treason and attempted murder. He was held not to have the right of self-defense since the saboteurs were engaged in a lawful enterprise from a Norwegian point of view, and the owner knew this. See also, R.Mbl. 38, p. 58 (77), and 49, p. 150 (157): A justifiable act of self-defense cannot be met with self-defense from the assailant.

According to prevailing jurisprudence, illegality is valued objectively. Even though the assailant acts in good faith so that he cannot be blamed, this will not preclude the right to self-defense but will affect only the question of how drastically the victim may react (see below, III). But if there is time and opportunity, obviously the victim must try to clarify the matter before he resorts to defense measures. The right of self-defense is not precluded by the fact that the assailant is not responsible for his acts because of insanity, for example.

Attacks from animals. It is generally understood, however, that there is no right of self-defense against an attack by an animal unless the animal is used as a tool by some human being. This is based on the proposition that the law is written for people, and not for animals; thus, an animal cannot act "unlawfully." The authority for the defense here could only be § 47 (emergency). When a human being is attacked, the rules of emergency will generally suffice. But these rules are not completely satisfactory when the attack is directed towards another animal, or other types of property. According to § 47, necessity will serve as justification for an otherwise punishable act only in those instances where it protects a considerably higher value in comparison with the interests sacrificed by the act. If I have to kill my neighbor's German police dog in order to prevent my small Pekinese from being harmed, this would be punishable unless the latter was a much more valuable animal than the former. Much could be said in favor of interpreting § 48 analogically, making the defense act legal at least in all cases where the value which is saved is as great as or greater than the harm inflicted on the attacking animal.

The term "unlawful" is understood as a reference to the remainder of the legal rules. But this can hardly be interpreted so strictly that there can be no "unlawful attack" in relation to § 48, unless the act entails other legal sanctions. The courts must be able to declare an attack illegal in relation to § 48 when the attack is commonly considered clearly improper, even though the legal system contains no judicial sanctions against it. This can be especially significant for violations of a psychic nature—legally, the soul is not so well protected as body and property. The individual's religious feelings are not protected by the criminal law—Penal Code, § 142, applies only to one who publicly insults religion, and because of the nature of the offense the question of payment of damages or other legal sanctions cannot very well arise. But if a person enjoys hurting a devout Christian by showering him with the rawest insults about his faith, the insulted person should not be denied the right to put an end to the insults by a box on the ear, for example, even though one must agree with Augdahl that a milder form of self-assertion would generally be more natural in such a situation because of the nature of the interests involved.[1]

5. Provocation

Whether or not the attack is provoked is immaterial as far as the right of self-defense is concerned, as long as it is unlawful. The rules of self-defense do not protect only the blameless. If I taunt a man until he loses control of his temper and attacks me, I will nevertheless have the right to self-defense, but my provocative conduct will have significance both on the question of damages and on how far I may go in defending myself. I may also be criminally liable because of my act of provocation. Suppose I tease an intoxicated person so that he attacks me with a knife, and I do so with the purpose of being able to hit him in self-defense. Even though the act of self-defense is considered legal because it is the only way in which I can save my life, I should be liable for assault (or homicide if death ensues) since it was my intentional act of provocation which caused the further course of events.

[1] Augdahl, op. cit., p. 27.

6. Penal Code, § 48, para. 3

According to Penal Code, § 48, para. 3, the rules on self-defense will also apply to acts performed for the purpose of lawful arrest or for the prevention of a prisoner's escape from prison or custody. Without such a special provision, one could not have applied the right of self-defense in such a case, for a fleeing prisoner could not reasonably be regarded as an attacker. According to Code of Criminal Procedure, § 232, a private person can also make a lawful arrest when the suspect is met or is pursued after a recently committed act or in hot pursuit. It follows from § 48, para. 3, that the rules on self-defense are also applicable in this case. Example: I awaken one night because a thief is breaking into the house. He flees, and I follow him, managing to stop him by a shot in the leg. Whether this is to be considered a punishable causing of physical damage or a justifiable act of self-defense will have to be judged according to the principles of Penal Code, § 48.

III. The act of self-defense

The act of self-defense must not go further than is necessary to prevent the attack. This applies both to the degree of force used and to the time when it is used. The assaulted cannot shoot the assailant in the heart if a shot in the leg would be sufficient to make him harmless. And it is not self-defense if I give him a good beating after I have prevented the attack.

Opinion has been divided on the issue whether the assaulted always may do what is necessary to prevent the attack no matter how small the violation of the law and no matter how hard the act of self-defense will affect the assailant. Should a certain proportionality be required between the interest which is endangered and the damage which will be done by the act of self-defense? Such a requirement may cause the assaulted to submit to the violation because the only defense which he has is too powerful. The penal law takes a middle course. It does not recognize any absolute right of self-defense, but at the same time it gives the assaulted a rather large margin of safety. The defensive act is permissible provided it "does not exceed what is necessary; moreover, in relation to the attack, the guilt of the assailant and the legal values attacked, it must not be considered absolutely improper to inflict so great an evil as intended by the act of self-defense" (Penal Code, § 48, para. 2).

It is evident from this provision that the determining factor is not an evaluation of the objective values of the interest which is attacked and the damage which is caused by the act of self-defense, but rather the ethical judgment of the act of self-defense. That legality should not have to yield to illegality is an important consideration; it must not be possible for an aggressor to use force, relying on the victim having no right to use the only method by which he can defend himself. In this evaluation one must therefore consider whether the attack is made maliciously or in good faith, whether the attacker is a mature person, fully responsible for his acts, or a child or insane person, and whether the attack is unprovoked or brought about by the victim himself. Where a conscious and planned breach of the law is concerned, one would only in the exceptional case deny the victim the right to defend himself, even though the assailant might be injured quite seriously. But such examples can be imagined. If a farmer discovers that two men have taken his boat and are now out on his lake fishing illegally, he has the right to shoot warning shots to induce them to stop, but if that does not suffice, he could hardly be allowed to shoot for the purpose of hitting them. Here there is too great a disparity between the conflicting interests.

The same viewpoints must apply to the solution of the disputed question of the significance of a possibility of escape. The fact that the victim can avoid the attack by fleeing does not in itself preclude the right to self-defense. "Fleeing is the opposite of self-defense, and nobody is required to behave cowardly," says Augdahl.[1] But on the other hand, in the adjudication of the act of self-defense we cannot always disregard the possibilities of escape. Here as elsewhere, there must be an evaluation of the concrete conditions compared with the directives which the law has given. The question is whether it was "absolutely improper" for the attacked to choose defense instead of flight (see Rt. 1938, p. 828). Both the nature of the attack and the identity of the victim (his position as an official, for example) will be significant factors.

As experience shows, the opinions on how far one may go to assert one's right vary quite considerably. The man of quiet nature would rather suffer injustice than do injustice; another man stands firmly on his rights. The law has taken these differences into consideration when providing that the act of self-defense is illegal only when it is absolutely improper. It has, as the Penal Commission expressed it, "taken care that no normal person who has truly acted in good faith, that is, who could defend his conduct in his own conscience, can be prosecuted and sentenced" (S.K.M., p. 86).

The language used raises the question whether the impunitive and the lawful coincide, or whether there is a certain border area where an act is perhaps impunitive, but nevertheless unlawful from an objective point of view. If unlawful, it could be met with self-defense and would not automatically be exempted from the duty to pay damages. Such a distinction, however, would hardly coincide with the meaning of the law. If the act is impunitive according to the rules of self-defense, it is thus also lawful, in contrast to the act which is impunitive according to the rules on exceeding the limit of self-defense (Penal Code, § 48, para. 4).

IV. Self-defense against official acts

Both according to the words of the law and its legal history, the right of self-defense under § 48 also applies to illegal official acts by public authorities. Here, the act of self-defense will generally take the form of violence toward a civil servant (§ 127) or the prevention of the performance of his duties (§ 326).

Self-defense against official acts creates, however, its own special problems. A factual or legal error by the civil servant cannot be considered in the same manner as a similar error by a private person. If every official act which is based on a misunderstanding of the facts or on an incorrect interpretation of the law could be met with self-defense, this would lead to the dangerous consequence that a person who acted in the belief that such an error existed, would have to be acquitted because of a lack of the necessary intent (see Penal Code, § 42), a situation which could seriously undermine the authority of the official.

A distinction must be made between judicial and administrative decisions.

1. Judicial decisions

A judicial decision—provided it does not suffer from such serious defects that it must be considered a nullity—must be respected until reversed or altered. The very basis of the right to self-defense—that it is a private enforcement of the law in instances where the aggrieved could not be expected to satisfy himself with resorting to ordinary legal remedies—is absent here. A judicial decision is generally enforced by an administrative official. The person to whom the decision applies cannot oppose enforcement with the argument that the decision was incorrect. For example, one who resists the enforcement of a judicial warrant of arrest (Code of Criminal Procedure, § 231, cpr., §§ 228–229), can be punished for violence against the police (Penal Code, § 127), even though it is later decided on appeal that there was insufficient ground for the arrest.

2. Administrative acts

If the error lies in administrative acts, the question becomes more difficult. Most often acts are done without any connection with a foregoing judicial decision; for example, an arrest or a search is made without previous authorization from the court. But a mistake can also be made in the enforcement of a judicial decree; the police may erroneously arrest a person other than the one named in the warrant of arrest, or the officer executing a civil judgment may erroneously seize the objects of a third person.

One group of cases could be easily disposed of, namely, those where the legality of the official acts does not depend upon the existence of certain conditions, but rather upon whether there is reason to believe that they exist. According to Code of Criminal Procedure, § 228, a person who is "reasonably suspected of having committed a punishable act," can be arrested under conditions set out in the section. Even though the arrested person is innocent, the arrest itself is legal when there was reasonable ground for suspicion.

But if an official act is contrary to law, then under a literal interpretation of Penal Code, § 48, self-defense should not be precluded even if the civil servant acts in good faith because of a factual or legal error. This would be significant only for the question of how far the victim is allowed to go in self-defense. The suspected person should then have the right to oppose by force an arrest or a search made without sufficient legal authority. However, various attempts have been made to limit this rule. Hagerup holds that self-defense is never permissible against a civil servant acting within his formal official capacity,[1] Augdahl discards this limitation, but holds instead that the subjective legality of the official act must be the determining factor. "What the law can require is that the civil servant acts in conformity with his duty. The normally endowed civil servant who, in the conscientious performance of his duties makes a mistake, does not thereby commit any illegal act which can give the aggrieved a right to self-defense."[2] Consequently the enforcement of an illegal order cannot be met with self-defense if the subordinate who carries out the order acts in good faith.

§ 48 was not formulated with any special thought of self-defense against official acts, and one can hardly solve this problem by an analysis of its terms. Anyway, judicial practice has not placed any great weight on the wording of the provision. There is room, however, for considerable difference of opinion if one wants to solve the problem on the basis of policy considerations. And judicial practice has been so vacillating that it is not possible to point to any definite solution as settled law.

V. The act of self-defense affecting third persons

An act of self-defense may harm not only the assailant but a third person as well. For example, I may use a third person's chattel to defend myself, or I may set off a fire alarm in order to call for help against the attacker. Here, the lawfulness of my action in relation to the third party is not determined by § 48, but by the emergency rule in § 47.

A special case of this nature is the setting of trap guns or the use of other mechanically functioning defense methods in places such as hunting cabins or fruit gardens. The use of dangerous watch dogs falls into the same category. Whether such preventive measures are lawful in relation to a trespasser is determined by the principle of § 48. But at the same time, they can be dangerous for anyone who enters the area with no illegal purposes, such as a lost mountain climber seeking protection in the cabin against the storm. Here, the determining factor for the legality of the act will be a consideration of the reasonableness of the act. Whether a sufficient warning of the danger has been given, such as a sign that a trap gun has been set out or that the dog is loose, will be an important factor in the decision.

VI. Mistake on the part of the actor

A person may make a mistake about the actual situation. He may wrongly believe that he is being attacked or misjudge the degree of danger. He may also be mistaken as to the effect of the defensive action; he intends merely to render the attacker unconscious, but kills him instead.

It is evident from Penal Code, § 42, that the perpetrator in such cases cannot be punished for an intentional offense if his action was justifiable according to his understanding of the actual situation. If he has shown carelessness in his evaluation of the situation, punishment for negligence can be applied (Penal Code, § 42, para. 2). Thus, if he kills the aggressor in such a situation, he can be punished for negligent homicide (Penal Code, § 239). If he only strikes the supposed aggressor, without causing any serious harm, he commits no criminal offense since the Code has no provision against negligent assault.

The solution is different if he is correct about the actual situation but makes an error as to how far he may go. This is an error of law which is governed by Penal Code, § 57. The fact that the attacked thought he had the right to an act of defense which the law finds "absolutely improper" will hardly be recognized as a ground of impunity.

VII. Exceeding the limits of self-defense

According to § 48, para. 4, one who has exceeded the limits of self-defense is not to be punished "if the excess is due solely to emotional upset or derangement produced by the attack." The nature of the emotion is immaterial: it can be anger as well as fear. Nor does the fact that the attacked person knew that he exceeded the limits preclude impunity (see Rt. 1906, p. 342). As the Penal Code Commission expresses it: It is "offensive that the final result of an illegal attack should be that the attacked person is punished although he has disclosed a mental temper which is dangerous only to those who violate his rights, not to those who themselves keep within the limits of the law and leave him in peace." (S.K.M., p. 88.) The rule gives the attacked another margin in addition to the one given by the law which uses the expression "absolutely improper." But the provision promises only impunity: it does not make the excess legal. This means that the act can be met with self-defense from the original attacker and that, under the Act on the coming into force of the Penal Code, § 25, there exists a basis for an apportionment between the two parties of the damage the act creates. It is doubtful, but of little practical importance, whether § 48, para. 4, can be used in the examples which are discussed in § 48, para. 3 (see above, II, 6).

[1] Hagerup, Strafferettens almindelige del [General Principles of Criminal Law], pp. 235–236 (Kristiania, 1911).

The rule in § 48, para. 4, applies to cases where the victim inflicts on his attacker a greater suffering than is necessary or proper, but hardly has any application to an excess with respect to time, such as where the victim has hit the attacker so that he falls to the ground, and then, in his excitement, starts to kick the fallen aggressor. Here, when the act was perpetrated, no situation of self-defense existed at all. However, the provision on provocation (§ 228, para. 3) or the provision on decrease in punishment where an act is committed in justifiable anger (§56, No. 1(b)) may be applicable.

An excessive act of self-defense which is not due only to emotion or consternation can lead to a decrease in punishment according to the conditions set out in § 56, No. 1 (a).

§ 16. Necessity and Negotiorum Gestio

I. The nature of necessity

The rules which apply to necessity in Penal Code, § 47, are in some ways similar to and in other ways different from those which apply to self-defense. Both apply to emergency situations and extend freedom of action beyond the usual limits. But while the rules on self-defense refer to an emergency which is caused by an illegal attack and define the legal position towards the attacker, the rules on necessity refer to every type of emergency situation and regulate the actor's legal position to the outside world in general. While self-defense can be considered a form of enforcement of the law, the act of necessity can be compared to an expropriation where greater interests push minor ones aside. The difference between self-defense and emergency rights is often expressed in the following manner: In the former, legality stands against illegality; in the latter, legality against legality. The difference, of course, brings with it certain legal consequences. The right to save oneself at a third person's expense must be limited more strictly than the right to protect oneself against an aggressor. Moreover, a person must generally pay damages for the harm which he caused by the act of necessity, whereas no such duty exists where self-defense is concerned.

According to some foreign laws the necessity situation is considered a basis for excuse only, which makes the act impunitive but not lawful. Other foreign codes regard an act of necessity lawful in certain circumstances, and in others merely impunitive. Thus, the German Draft Code of 1960 has one provision (§ 39) on "Justifiable necessity" and another (§ 40) on "Excusable necessity." The difference has significance first of all on the questions whether the person affected by the act of necessity has the right to self-defense. The Norwegian law deals expressly only with punishability. But the law presupposes that the act of necessity is as objectively legal as the act of self-defense (see the Act on the coming into force of the Penal Code, § 24).

It has been argued that a special rule applying to necessity situations is unnecessary because necessity rights should follow from the general principle that the legality of an act ought to depend on a weighing of its utility against its dangerousness.[1] This is not tenable. In general, the limits of freedom of action are not determined by a concrete weighing of utility against danger, but rather by general rules. The rules which apply to necessity rights form a sharply limited exception. That we are dealing here with special rules is also demonstrated by the fact that damages must be paid. When an act is otherwise legal, even though it creates a certain danger, it ordinarily does not entail the duty to pay damages.

II. The necessity situation

In accordance with § 47, a necessity presupposes "an otherwise inevitable danger." How the danger has been created is of no importance. It can be by an unlawful attack (I borrow someone's boat in order to save myself from the attacker). But it can also apply to acts of nature, sickness, fires, or other situations. A special case exists where a person is coerced into committing an illegal act, e.g., theft; here, he gets out of the situation at the cost of the third person. Many foreign codes have special provisions about this,[1] but under Norwegian law the general rules on necessity govern the case. It makes no difference whether the necessity was self-caused or not. If my house is on fire, I have the right to break into my neighbor's house to get water and fire-extinguishers, even though my own carelessness was the cause of the fire.

The requirement that the danger be "otherwise inevitable" cannot be interpreted strictly. An act of necessity may be warranted even though I could have prevented the danger by myself, if this should require unproportional difficulties or expense. This must be determined according to the same principle which § 47 sets up: the value-relationship between that which is saved and that which is sacrificed. I may also have a choice of using A's property or B's in the rescue. The rule here is that I must use the property of lesser value.

According to the law, the danger must threaten "the person or property of somebody." This means first of all that the necessity act can be performed for the benefit of a third person as well as of the actor himself. This is a natural consequence of the law's viewpoint that the necessity measure is objectively warranted because it saves more than it destroys. On the other hand, in laws which regard the necessity condition as a subjective reason for excuse, impunity is sometimes limited to the case where the danger threatens the actor himself, or someone close to him.

What the rule will be where the third person has prohibited or disapproved of the emergency measure is a moot question. The answer is doubtful. On the one hand, it can be argued that no one should have the right to force assistance on someone who does not want it and which, among other things, imposes upon him the duty to pay damages. On the other hand, it can be argued that an act which saves something of value to society should not be punished, even though the person who directly benefits from the act does not wish it done. A condition for precluding the necessity right in this instance must in any case be that the necessity concerns only the interests over which the individual has the right of disposition. If I take a boat in order to save a drowning person, I cannot be punished for illegal use of the boat, even though the person I save is attempting suicide and protests vehemently against his rescue.

"Person or property" includes all individual legal benefits. However, it does not include public interests. Public officials, such as policemen and health officials, generally have some other basis for those interventions which are necessary for the protection of society's interests, and thus need not use the rules which apply to emergency situations. But interventions for the protection of public interests can also be made by a private person. In order to prevent an act of treason about which he has learned, it may, for example, be necessary for a person to break into a house to reach a telephone, or forcibly to take a bicycle which the owner himself is using. There can hardly be any doubt that § 47 applies analogously in such cases.[2]

III. The necessity measure

The law imposes no limits on the nature of the necessity measure. Most often it will involve an encroachment on another person's property, but it may [1] See, for instance, German Penal Code, § 52. The German Draft Code of 1960 has omitted this provision, since the general rules on necessity also cover the cases of duress.

[2] See (1947) Norsk Retstidende, p. 612, esp. the pronouncement of the lagmannsrett (court of assize), p. 634.

also consist of a physical assault, an imprisonment, or a violation of public interests. As examples of the latter, consider the following: A person is threatened with death unless he engages in enemy war activities; a witness gives false statements to the police in order to prevent the accused, who is despondent, from committing suicide (see Rt. 1949, p. 503).

The prerequisite for the necessity rights is always the existence of a situation which justifies the actor in considering the danger extremely significant in comparison to the damage which could be caused by his act. The law is not concise in its method of expression when it sets up against each other a danger and a damage. This means that both the degree of danger and the probability of its occurrence should be considered on both sides. Suppose that the threatened goods are worth 10,000 kroner, but the degree of danger is only 25 per cent.; on the other hand, the rescue will certainly create a damage of 1,000 kroner. Here the sums 2,500 and 1,000 kroner must be compared, not 10,000 and 1,000. In most instances, of course, such an exact calculation cannot be made, but an approximate estimation must be used.

The act of rescue can be called socially useful when what is saved is more valuable than what is lost. This, however, is not enough according to the law. The thing saved must be extremely significant in comparison to the damage done by the act. By setting up this requirement, the law shows that strong reasons must exist before such a departure from general rules will be accepted.

It is difficult to determine what is meant by the requirement of extreme significance, even when purely economic values are involved on both sides. It becomes far more difficult where also unmeasurable benefits are concerned; when, e.g., it is necessary to sacrifice economic values in order to prevent a danger to life or health, or on the other hand, to set life or health at stake in order to prevent damage to economic values. Here one must consider the propriety of the act. The Penal Code Commission states that in evaluating whether or not the damage avoided is especially significant in comparison to the damage caused, "the courts will naturally consider whether one should reasonably cause the one in order to prevent the other" (S.K.M., pp. 80–81). It cannot be said that a danger to life or body must in all cases be given a preference over economic values. The answer must depend both on the significance of the encroachment and on the position of the acting person. Some occupations, such as that of a policeman or fireman, require a person to face certain dangers. It is not the general rule of emergency rights but the special (written or unwritten) norms applying to each individual occupation which determine the extent of the danger to which a person must expose himself. Military Penal Code, § 26, expressly provides that fear of personal danger cannot be pleaded to justify the omission of an official duty.

It is possible that a definite limit, in addition to the relative one of § 47, should be set up. Skeie (I, p. 151) mentions the case where an immediate blood transfusion must be made in order to save an injured person; the only one who has the same blood-type as the injured refuses to give blood. Can he be overpowered and the blood taken from him? From an objective point of view there is no doubt that saving the injured person's life is extremely significant in comparison to the temporary depletion of the strength of the donor, which is the normal consequence of a blood transfusion. Nevertheless, there will probably be divided opinions on whether or not such a serious encroachment of bodily integrity should be approved, especially if the person in question had reasonable grounds for his refusal, such as the fact that the blood transfusion would have more severe effects than usual because of a recent sickness.

Where life is concerned, there can be no gradation of its value according to age, health, intelligence, obligations of support, or similar factors. Even though many lives could be saved by the sacrifice of one, this would hardly be justifiable. It would conflict with the general attitude toward the inviolability of human life to interfere in this way with the course of events.

The same danger threatens both

Special questions arise where the same danger threatens both the interest which is sacrificed and the one which is saved. If only economic values are involved, this danger must be taken into consideration when the comparison is made. An example of this type is regulated by the maritime rules applying to general average (Maritime Code, chapter 7), which speaks about damage "which is purposely inflicted on ships or cargo in order to seek safety from a danger which threatens both." Another example involves fires in densely populated neighborhoods where it is necessary to blow up a house in order to prevent the fire from spreading (see the Fire Act of November 19, 1954, § 35).

The question is more difficult when human lives are concerned. We have such an example in Act 5 of Ibsen's Peer Gynt, where, after the shipwreck, Peer and his cook both seek refuge on the upturned boat which is able to support only one of them.[1] Neither has any greater rights than the other and neither wishes to give in; but if both hold onto the boat, it will sink and both will drown. As we know, Peer forces the cook to let go. It is difficult to consider Peer's conduct legal, for this would mean that the cook had no right to defend himself. On the other hand, it is not very appealing to punish a person for what he does in a situation such as this. Here it would seem reasonable to extend the necessity condition a bit further as a basis for excuse, rather than as a basis of justification, but there is little authority to support such a solution.

Rt. 1950, p 377: During the evacuation of the northernmost districts of the country in the last moments of World War II, three Norwegian policemen were forced to participate in the execution of a compatriot who was sentenced to death by a Nazi special court. After the war they were prosecuted under Penal Code, §§ 86 (treason) and 233 (murder), but argued in their defense that they had acted in a necessity situation; had they refused to follow the order, they, as well as the sentenced person, would have been shot. The court found that this was most probable, but nevertheless did not find it proper to call their act lawful: "And when this is so, the Penal Code will not allow punishment to be dispensed with merely because the accused acted under duress, even where it was of such a serious nature as in the case at bar, since according to the decision of the court of assize it must be deemed clear that the force did not preclude intentional conduct on the part of the accused." The solution would have been different under German law, which regards the state of duress as a basis for excuse and provides for impunity when the act is performed under a threat "entailing an immediate and otherwise not avertable danger to his own or one of his family members' body or life" (Stragesetzbuch, § 52). See the case in Entscheidungen des Reichsgerichts in Strafsachen, Vol. 64, p. 30. See also below, § 29, V.

A similar example is one which was not uncommon in former times: A group of shipwrecked sailors manage to survive by the use of lifeboats, but run short of food and water. They save themselves by killing and eating one of their shipmates. The Penal Code Commission accepts this as legal: "When all human logic and reason tells us that the death of not only the victim but of all the others would occur within a few hours if the killing were not done, the harm caused—a few hours shortening of the victim's death struggle—must surely appear immaterial in comparison to the good achieved—the saving of all the rest" (K.M., p. 80, n. 1). This is rather hardboiled justice. In dealing with human lives, merely quantitative evaluations cannot be accepted. From a qualitative point of view, a murder is quite different from an ordinary death. Moreover, there will, as a rule, be a possiblity of rescue; no one knows if or when the rescue ship will appear. And who is to determine which one is to be sacrificed? Someone may voluntarily offer himself. Even though consent generally has no impunitive effect in murder (Penal Code, § 235, para. 2), the situation is different when there is both a necessity situation and consent. But aside from this case, the act cannot be considered justified unless, at the very least, a fair method of selection, such as the drawing of lots, is employed. The strong cannot be allowed to save themselves at the expense of the weak.

This question was considered in England in the famous Mignonette case in 1884 (R. v. Dudley and Stephens; see Turner and Armitage, Cases on Criminal Law, pp. 51–55 (Cambridge, 1953)). Three seamen and a mess boy drifted about on the sea after a shipwreck without food or water. Two seamen finally agreed to kill the boy; the third protested. Four days after the killing they were picked up by a ship. It was apparent that none of them would have lived had the boy not been killed. The court found that, no matter how excusable the act may have been, it could not be declared legal. The two defendants were sentenced to death, but the penalty was later reduced to six months' imprisonment.

[1] Such a situation has, by the way, been commented on as far back as Cicero (De Officiis, III, XXIII).

An American case, decided in 1841 (U.S. v. Holmes), presented the following situation: After a shipwreck, one of the lifeboats drifted about, crowded with survivors, some passengers and some crewmen. Rain and storms caused the boat to take in water through a leak, and there was no way to scoop out the water effectively. At the mate's order, the crew threw overboard the male passengers, fourteen in number. The next morning two men who had hidden themselves were discovered, and were both put overboard. Shortly afterwards the boat was saved. The court stated that such a measure was permissible only if the victims were determined by drawing lots. Moreover, the passengers had the right to be saved before the crew, except the captain and so much of the crew as was necessary to navigate the craft. The result was a conviction of manslaughter under extenuating circumstances, and the sentence of six months' hard labor. A reference to the case and a detailed discussion may be found in Jerome Hall, General Principles of Criminal Law, pp. 427 et seq. (2nd ed., 1960).

During childbirth, a doctor may be faced with the choice of saving the mother's life or that of the child, or—if he does nothing—of letting them both die. Here there is a well-established judicial attitude that the mother's life must prevail (see S.K.M., p. 212). A highly controversial problem is what grounds can justify the termination of a pregnancy. Most would agree that not only a danger to the mother's life, but also a danger to her health should be recognized as a sufficient reason for a therapeutic abortion. To a certain extent, a similar attitude will apply to other dangers, such as the danger that the child will suffer from a serious and incurable disease or other defects. The judicial attitude towards these issues was uncertain, however, until the question was solved by a special law of November 11, 1960, dealing with the termination of pregnancy under certain circumstances. In other Scandinavian countries, special laws regulating the termination of pregnancy already existed.

IV. The saved and the sacrificed goods belong to the same person

It may happen that the goods which are in danger and those which are sacrificed by the emergency measure belong to the same person. A fire breaks out in one of the buildings on a farm while the owner is away. A neighbor breaks into the main house in order to get water so that the fire can be extinguished; to prevent the fire from spreading to the main house, he takes some wool blankets which he finds, soaks them in water and places them on the roof. A pedestrian is hit by a car and while unconscious is driven to the hospital; in order to save his life, the doctor immediately amputates both legs. No doubt the emergency measure is legal in so far as it is covered by the rule in Penal Code, § 47. But here, one is hardly restricted to the normal limits. § 47 is directed toward a conflict of interests belonging to different persons, while the interests here belong to a single individual. To the extent that the rules on negotiorum gestio go further than the emergency rules, they will be decisive. If the action in question is an obviously sensible measure of which one must assume that the owner of the threatened goods would have wished it done, had he been able to make the decision himself, the act will be warranted according to the rules on negotiorum gestio even though there is not such a preponderance as § 47 requires.

V. Mistake

As to the legal effects of a factual or legal mistake by the perpetrator, the same rules will apply as in self-defense (see above, § 15, VI). However, there is a greater possibility here than there is in self-defense that a mistake of law regarding the limits of permissible action will lead to impunity because of good faith.

Exceeding the rights of necessity

The law has no rules granting impunity when necessity rights are exceeded, as it does where the rights of self-defense are concerned (penal Code, § 48, para. 4). However, in such cases it is possible to decrease the punishment below the usual minimum, and to a milder type (Penal Code, § 56, No. 1 (a)).

§ 24. Mistake of Law

I. Survey

The defendant in a criminal case sometimes wishes to exculpate himself by stating that he acted in good faith, because he did not know that his action violated any law. It may be that he did not even know that any rules of law existed in this area. Or he may have known that rules existed but had been given incorrect information about the contents of the rules, by a lawyer whom he asked for advice, for example. Or perhaps he both knew of and studied the provision, but interpreted it in a way which the court finds erroneous. In all these cases, we speak about mistake of law.

The issue of mistake of law arises most often with respect to misdemeanors and legislation outside the Penal Code, less often when more serious crimes, such as assault, murder, defamation and theft are involved. These penal provisions are generally known by all normal adult persons. But a person can undoubtedly make a mistake as to the age limits in the sections on sex offenses, or a businessman, because of his hard-boiled business morals, may not realize that his behavior constitutes a fraud. A person may also make a mistake with respect to a ground of impunity. He may believe that the law gives him greater right to self-defense or use of necessity measures than it actually does, or he overestimates the legal significance of consent of the victim.

Conscientious Offenders

No mistake of law exists where the actor believes that he has a moral or religious obligation to violate the law (such a person is called a conscientious offender). The pacifist who publicly urges the refusal of military service (Rt. 1918, I, p. 465), and the worker who supports an illegal strike (Rt. 1939, p. 602), are perhaps acting in the belief that they are following a higher law. The same may be true on a larger scale in political offenses. In all these cases, the actor knows what the law of the land forbids or requires, and thus no mistake of law exists.

The conscientious offender represents a tragic conflict for the legal system. As far as possible, rules should be formed so that no one is forced to choose between them and his own conscience. As examples of legal attempts to avoid such conflicts, we can mention the rule which allows a person who, on religious grounds, does not want to take an oath, to use an affirmation (on his honor and conscience), and the rule which allows a pacifist to do civilian work instead of military service. But when serious attacks on the interests of society are involved, society finds it necessary to protect itself with punishment, even though the offender honestly believes his action to be morally right. His motive may then have a bearing on the measure of punishment solely.

II. Penal Code, § 57

Mistake of law is treated very differently in different countries,[1] the rule in many jurisdictions is that a mistake of law will not make for impunity at all, or will do so only in very exceptional cases. In other jurisdictions punishability presupposes the mistake of law to have been incurred at least negligently. Some make no distinction as to whether the mistake of law is negligent, but solve the problem according to the nature of the mistake. Thus, the earlier German Reichsgericht in practice stressed whether the mistake was of a penal or non-penal nature; the latter type of mistake exculpated, but not the former. In the writings on criminal law, it has often been held that knowledge of punishability or act least of illegality is part of the intent; if such knowledge is lacking no conviction for intentional breach should take place.

Penal Code, § 57, provides: "If a person was ignorant of the illegal nature of an act at the time of its commission, the court may reduce the punishment to less than the minimum provided for such an act, and to a milder form of punishment, provided the court does not decide to acquit him for this reason."

The expression "ignorant of the illegal nature" gives no clear picture of the scope of the provision. One who acts in good faith because of a factual mistake, also errs with respect to the illegal nature of the act, such as where a person takes someone else's property, mistaking it for his own. But Penal Code, § 57, was not meant to apply to cases of factual mistake. It is Penal

[1] A detailed discussion is found in Thornstedt, Om rattsvillfarelse (Stockholm, 1956). See also Andenaes, "Ignorantia Legis in Scandinavian Criminal Law," in Essays in Criminal Science, p. 215 et seq. (ed. Mueller, 1961).

Code, § 42, which applies to them. We will later consider in greater detail the distinctions between these two provisions (see IV).

The provision speaks only about mistake as to illegality, not as to punishability. If the actor knows that the act is unlawful, it can never be impunitive merely because he does not know that it is punishable as well. A farmhand may break a contract of employment because he has received a better offer. He knows that it is unlawful to break the contract, but he does not know that it is also punishable (Penal Code, § 409; see Rt. 1921, p. 510; 1924, p. 702). However, when the acts do not appear to violate any interests, the mistake as to punishability and the mistake as to illegality generally coincide. This is the case with respect to many violations of the penal provisions outside the Penal Code. If I do not know of the penal provision, I also do not know that the act is forbidden.

What Penal Code, § 57, directly provides is that a mistake as to illegality may lead to a decrease in punishment. The section also permits the court to refuse to grant such a decrease. And the paragraph presupposes that the court can acquit completely because of the mistake. There are, then, four alternatives from which the judge can choose: he may: (1) acquit completely; (2) reduce the punishment below the general minimum or to a milder form; (3) consider the mistake as an extenuating circumstance within the general framework of the law; (4) attach no significance to the mistake at all.

The law sets up no definite guiding principle for the choice. The natural interpretation of the provision is that the judge is given complete power to decide in the individual case whether or not to decrease or omit the punishment, just as he is given similar powers of decision in other cases (see, for example, Penal Code, §§ 58, 228, para. 3, 250 and 392, para. 2). This interpretation also coincides for the law to provide general rules on the difference between the cases, and that it therefore has left it to the considered discretion of the court to determine when punishment should be decreased or omitted.[1]

However, ever since enactment of the Penal Code, it as been generally understood that there must be a definite principle for this determination.

Hagerup laid down the rule that conviction for an intentional offense presupposes knowledge of the illegality, while conviction for negligence presupposes that the mistake as to illegality can be looked upon as negligent. The reasoning is as follows: Punishment for intentional offenses should react against the conscious criminal mind, and there is no conscious criminal mind when the perpetrator was ignorant of the law on the subject. The punishment for negligence, however, is society's reaction against a lack of care on the part of the actor. And this lack may be due to the fact that the actor has neglected to obtain correct knowledge of the legal rules which apply to his conduct.[2] There are some decisions which adopt this interpretation (see Rt. 1919, p. 312; 1930, p. 1061).

From a practical point of view, however, strong objections can be made against this solution; moreover, it does not coincide with the intention of the legislature (see S.K.M., p. 98). Where general offenses (such as larceny, murder and fraud) are concerned, it would probably not make much difference if knowledge of the illegality was required. This is a knowledge which every normal adult has, and which the court would therefore assume to exist unless very special circumstances demonstrated the contrary. The situation is different when we deal with the numerous demands and prohibitions in the business law, the traffic law, the alcoholic beverage law and the police regulations. Here it will usually be almost impossible to prove that the perpetrator knew about the legal provision. The judge will often have to say: "He should have learned the rule, but whether he actually has done so, it is impossible to determine." If such an uncertainty should result in an acquittal, the difficulties of proof would lead to acquittals in many cases where the perpetrator actually knew about the penal provision. Such a rule could create a temptation not to keep informed about the prevailing regulations. All this would weaken the effectiveness of the law. Many of these legal provisions, it is true, also apply to negligent violations, and thereby of course to negligent mistakes of law. But merely because the law requires intent (not having found it necessary to react against negligence in general), this does not mean that it is less important than otherwise to inculcate the knowledge of the legal provision.

Only excusable mistake of law is impunitive

It is now definitely established in practice that, even with respect to intentional offenses, mere negligence with respect to the legal norm is sufficient. Or, as it is often stated, only the excusable mistakes of law leads to acquittal. The term "excusable mistake of law" is perhaps a bit misleading; "excusable" does not stand as a contrast to "inexcusable," but to negligent. It is only the mistake of law for which the perpetrator cannot be blamed at all which is impunitive. A negligent mistake of law can have significance for the degree of punishment, but not on punishability itself.

The rule also applies where the penal provision contains the expression "illegal," "unlawful" or a similar term. This mode of expression does not mean that knowledge of the illegality is required. What is required, here as always, is knowledge of the actual circumstances which are the basis for the law's characterization, not knowledge of the meaning of the expressions which the law uses (see above, § 22, II, and S.K.M., p. 98).

III. When is a mistake of law excusable?

The question then is: What is required to make a mistake of law excusable? The general rule is undoubtedly that a mistake of law will not be accepted as excusable in the absence of special circumstances. This seems unreasonable at first sight. The number of legal provisions are so overwhelmingly today that no person could have knowledge of more than a fraction of them. How, then, can one hold it against a defendant that he does not have knowledge of a particular provision? To this one can say that no one need know all the rules. There are two requirements: First, knowledge of the general legal rules governing community living which apply to all persons; Secondly, knowledge of the special rules of the trade or occupation in which the individual is engaged. One who wishes to build a house, drive a car, or start a trade must obey the rules which apply to the activity concerned. But a fisherman does not have to know the rules pertaining to industry, and a farmer can live happily without any knowledge of maritime law.

An examination of the cases in this area reveals a certain discrepancy between the judge and the lay judges.[1] We often come upon decisions in country or city courts which acquit a person because of his mistake of law, the lay judges having outvoted the judge, but which are reversed by the Supreme Court (see, for example, Rt. 1959, pp. 105, 796; 1953, p. 459.) The lay judges clearly place themselves in the position of the accused, and find it natural that he did not know about the provision in the law; perhaps they themselves learned about it for the first time in the courtroom. The professional judge thinks more about the necessity of an effective enforcement of the law. Actually, this is but a simple example of the general conflict between professional and lay judges. The layman looks chiefly at the individual case; the lawyer considers the wider implications. In the years from 1954 to 1958, there was only one reported case in which the Supreme Court upheld an acquittal because of an excusable mistake of law. During the same period, eight cases were reported where the lower court acquitted on this ground, but where the decision was reversed by the Supreme Court. In six of the eight cases, the lay judges had outvoted the judge.

The accused's position

Great weight must be given to the position of the accused. Strong demands must be made on the owner or manager of an enterprise. On the other hand, the subordinate must generally be free from liability when he has acted according to his superior's instructions, without having any special reason for suspicion.

The accused's education and mental abilities

One must also take into consideration the accused's education and mental abilities (see Rt. 1926, p. 948). This is so at least with respect to general rules of community living. Where special rules for a profession are involved, it will probably be more difficult to acquit because of lack of intelligence or experience.

[1] Country and city courts in Norway are composed of one professional judge and two lay judges, the laymen having equal votes with the professional judge.

The rule is new

One reason for holding the mistake of law excusable is that the rule is new (see Rt. 1939, p. 430). Here, however, the general situation of the times must be considered. During war, when provisions of a serious nature are constantly being enacted, the excuse that the provision is new carries less weight; the people must be required to keep informed (see Rt. 1940, p. 514).

The actor is a stranger

Another reason for excuse is that the actor is a stranger to the jurisdiction. A foreign tourist cannot be required to acquaint himself with the mysteries of our liquor law, but a foreign trawlfisher can be required to learn our rules on territorial waters and foreigners' rights to fish (see Rt. 1934, p. 727). It can also be excusable for Norwegian citizens to be unfamiliar with regulations in force in a place to which they have recently moved or through which they are travelling.

The meaning of the law has been doubtful

A third reason for excuse is that the meaning of the law has been doubtful. The accused may have relied on an interpretation of the law which was expressed in the draft bill, in earlier practice, or in statements by public authorities. Because of this, he cannot be blamed if the court now adopts another interpretation.

However, the main question is not whether the meaning was more or less legally doubtful, but whether or not the accused acted faithfully according to his understanding of the purpose of the law. A person who has set out to exploit the loopholes in the law cannot expect any charity if he makes a mistake, even though the interpretation was quite doubtful from a judicial point of view.

Rt. 1906, p. 562: It was forbidden to serve liquor in connection with selling and buying. A country merchant who had previously been fined for serving liquor to his customers, conducted himself in such a manner that he did not serve in connection with the customers' purchase, but when they came to settle their monthly accounts; he then took them into a private room next to the store and served them there. One of the judges felt that this conduct was outside the scope of the law. But the majority felt that the law also covered a serving of this nature and upheld the lower's court's finding of guilt. Only one of those voting wanted to reverse because of good faith.

The total judgment of the method of action is of the essence

Not an isolated judgment as to whether the mistake of law is excusable, but a total judgment of the method of action is of the essence. Only that mistake of law which makes the act itself justifiable will generally be accepted as excluding punishment. Thus, the phrase "excusable mistake of law" does not give a completely accurate picture of what actually happens in practice.

IV. The distinction between § 42 and § 57

At times the distinction between the areas to which Penal Code, §§ 42 and 57, apply is doubtful.[1] If the mistake in the concrete case is accepted as excusable, it makes no difference which of the two sections was applicable; the result must be an acquittal in either case. The question is of importance, however, if negligent mistake exists with reference to a penal provision which requires intent. Here, the mistake will result in impunity if Penal Code, § 42, applies, but not if Penal Code, § 57, applies.

1. Penal Code, § 57, also applies to special rules for limited areas or groups

Penal Code, § 57, applies not only to ignorance of general laws and provisions, but also of special rules for a limited area or a limited group, such as a community, a part of a city, or the University of Oslo.

Rt. 1939, p. 623: The accused fished in an inlet which by royal decree was preserved from fishing. He knew about this preservation law (Act No. 20 of June 25, 1937), but he did not know that the inlet in question had been preserved. The Supreme Court decided that this was a mistake of law under Penal Code, § 57.

[1] Some modern judicial decisions on this point are referred to in Skeie, Den norske strafferett, I, pp. 475–479 (Oslo, 1946). See also Skeie, Afhandlinger om forskjellige rettsspørgsmål, pp. 134–136 and 191–193 (Kristiania, 1913).

Territorial limits and community limits. A mistake as to jurisdictional boundaries must be decided under Penal Code, § 57, when the boundary is determinative for the punishability of the act. Example: An English trawler is caught within territorial waters; the skipper excused himself by saying that he kept outside of the territorial waters as they were marked out on his English chart. This is a mistake as to how far the Norwegian prohibition against trawl-fishing extends, and is judged according to Penal Code, § 57. The result would be different if he knew about the boundaries, but made a mistake as to his actual position. That would be a mistake of fact which would be judged acording to Penal Code, § 42 (Rt. 1953, p. 1537; 1954, p. 679).

2. Existence or contents of a judicial or administrative decision

A mistake concerning the existence or contents of a judicial or administrative decision in an individual case, such as a restraining order, a divorce decree, or an importation permit, however, is judged according to Penal Code, § 42, as a mistake of fact (Rt. 1950, p. 242). The decision becomes more difficult if the actor knows about the existence and contents of the decision but, because of a mistake of law, errs about its judicial effects. On this point, see below under 3.

3. The distinction between mistake of situation and mistake of norm

It is presupposed both in theory and in practice that not every mistake of law should be judged according to Penal Code, § 57, and this concept finds some support in the legislative history.[1]

A misconception of legal rules, according to this interpretation, may also cause a person to err with respect to "circumstances determining the punishability of the act, or increasing his liability for punishment" (Penal Code, § 42). In judicial practice, this is generally called a mistake of the situation, as distinguished from a mistake of the norm, which falls under Penal Code, § 57.

Mistakes as to rights and status. Thus, a mistake of the existence of the right or the legal status which the penal provision seeks to protect, is judged according to Penal Code, § 42, and not according to Penal Code, § 57, regardless of whether the mistake concerns the actual circumstances or a legal rule. The mistake may concern property rights, contractual rights or family rights. Example 1: A man who has received a deathbed gift from a friend accepts and uses the gift, not knowing that such gifts are invalid. He cannot be punished for larceny, embezzlement or the unlawful use of another man's property Example 2: A woman has been deserted by her husband, and she has not heard from him since. She has been told that the marriage ends automatically when the spouses have not seen each other for seven years. She cannot be punished for bigamy if she remarries when the seven years are over.

Skeie wishes to limit the doctrine to apply only to mistakes about legal rights or status.[2] Hagerup expresses the rule more generally: "Penal Code, § 42, applies to the concrete circumstances which determine the criminal nature of the act, and which are a condition for the judgment passed on the act by the law; § 57 refers to this very judgment itself."[3] The line of thought behind this abstract formula is the following: For penal provisions which seek to protect property rights, it is a requirement of punishability that the property actually belongs to someone else. One who commits an error with respect to the property law is not unfamiliar with the commandment "thous shalt not steal," but he errs with respect to "a circumstance determining the punishability of the act." (Penal Code, § 42.) Similarly, a penal provision which seeks to protect the marital relationship presupposes that a marriage exists; one who believes that the marriage has terminated is not ignorant of the prohibition against bigamy, but of a condition determining punishability. The same reasoning applies in other cases.

The distinction lacks a logical basis. This may seem both simple and reasonable at first sight. However, upon closer analysis, one must arrive at the conclusion that the distinction lacks any logical basis. It becomes a question of linguistic formulation whether one should say that a mistake of law concerns a condition for the judgment passed on the act by the law or this judgment itself. Let us discuss the examples mentioned above: Objectively, the law prohibits appropriation of deathbed gifts; it prohibits remarriage as long as the other spouse is alive, even though he has been gone for seven or eight years. Thus, a mistake concerning the property law or the law of domestic relations is also a mistake as to how far the penal norm extends, or, in other words, a mistake about the judgment which the law passes on the act. On the other hand, however, it is not difficult to phrase the rule so that a mistake concerns the conditions for the judgment of the law even in cases where it is agreed that the mistake should be judged under Penal Code, § 57. A man, for example, sells goods in violation of a rationing provision which he does not know about. He is, to rephrase Hagerup's words, not ignorant of the commandment "You shall not sell rationed objects without coupons," but he is ignorant about the condition for application of this commandment, that this particular object is rationed.

When the actor knows about the actual relevant conditions, but believes the act is legal, this is always a mistake with respect to the scope of the penal provision, regardless of whether the mistake pertains directly to the extent of the provision's descriptive expressions, or the extent of the legal concepts with which it operates. However, the thoughts of the actor will often concern the existence of the right or the legal status without any knowledge of the legal ground on which it builds. A son, for example, hears from his father that their farm has timber rights in a neighbour's woods, but he has no knowledge about the basis of the right. A mistake of this type must be considered a mistake of fact.

An examination of judicial practice shows that the distinction between a "mistake with respect to situation" and a "mistake with respect to norm" is often obscure, and that a reason for deciding such matters one way or another is hardly ever given. And this should come as no surprise: the distinction pretends to be of a fundamental conceptual nature while, as we have seen, there is no logical basis for it.

Policy considerations. It may be asked whether there are any important policy reasons for segregating certain groups of legal mistakes, such as those regarding rights and legal status, for special treatment, despite the difficulties in making the distinction.

From a practical point of view, there may be a difference between an ordinary mistake of law and a mistake about rights and legal status. But in the more serious crimes there is very seldom an issue of good faith due to a general mistake of law. Even though the perpetrator does not know positively that the act is forbidden, he at least knows its character as a violation of interests. Because of a mistake as to legal right or a legal status, however, he may violate an interest which he does not know exists. It may seem unreasonable to convict a person of a serious felony when he is in good faith, even though his good faith can be held against him as negligent.

Secondly, with respect to the penal provisions's effectiveness, it is less necessary to inculcate knowledge of legal rules which have only a peripheral significance for the scope of the provision, than it is to inculcate knowledge about the penal provision itself.

All mistakes of law ought to be encompassed by Penal Code, § 57. In jurisdictions which do not give mistake of law an impunitive effect, or do so only under very strict conditions, unreasonable results can be avoided by separating certain groups of judicial mistakes and by treating them as factual mistakes. A strict adherence to the traditional doctrine that only the excusable mistake of law can be impunitive, would require that such a method of avoidance also be recognized under the Norwegian law.

There is, however, a more natural and more satisfying solution. Both according to its wording and according to the legislature's intentions, Penal Code, § 57, gives the judge the authority to decrease the punishment or acquit completely according to his own opinion in the individual case. By relying on Penal Code, § 57, the judge can go right into the matter and decide whether it is necessary and reasonable to impose punishment despite the mistake of law, instead of seeking the solution in an obscure distinction between "mistake with respect to situation" and "mistake with respect to norm." Such an interpretation of the law, of course, does not exclude the possibility that court practice can develop more definite rules in typical cases. The formula "excusable mistake of law" provides a satisfactory solution in the great majority of cases where a question about the significance of mistake of law arises, such as cases of violation of provisions for the public order, business regulations and other legislation outside the Penal Code. But it is an untenable generalization to say that the contents of Penal Code, § 57, are exhausted by this. With offenses of a more serious nature, one ought to rely upon the freedom which the law gives the judge, so that he can determine more carefully what significance the mistake of law should have in light of the letter and spirit of the penal provision.

That the question cannot be solved by a completely general formula is confirmed by a scrutiny of the individual penal provisions.

The formulation of some penal provisions clearly indicates that a mistake of law will be deemed impunitive even if it is negligent. The provisions on larceny and other offenses for gain require a purpose of obtaining for oneself or for others an unwarranted gain. A person who is in good faith with respect to his right, lacks this purpose and thus cannot be punished for larceny. But even under the Criminal Code of 1842, which (until an 1889 amendment) did not require a purpose of gain, the courts consistently acquitted for larceny when the perpetrator had acted in good faith.[1] This was so even though he did not believe that he exercised a personal right, but only a public right, such as an alleged right to free seaweed harvesting on another person's property. This practice is well founded. It would seem offensive to convict for larceny when the defendant did not act dishonestly. On the other hand, the Supreme Court has not accepted as impunitive such a mistake as to public right when the accusation concerns the violation of an owner's right to hunt or fish (Penal Code, § 407)[2]

From a practical point of view it could hardly be criticized that the belief of exercising a public right is given an impunitive effect with respect to an accusation of larceny, but not with respect to the violation of hunting or fishing right under Penal Code, § 407.

Another instance where the penal provision clearly presupposes knowledge of e illegality is Penal Code, § 110, which decrees punishment for the judge who acts "against his better judgment." It is not sufficient for a finding of guilt that the judge has negligently committed an error as to legal rules.

§ 30. Liability for Acts Committed under Intoxication

I. The problem

As previously mentioned, intoxication is a substantial cause of criminality. It is therefore important to determine how criminal acts committed while intoxicated will be punished. Alcohol intoxication creates the most important problem, but similar problems also arise from the use of other intoxicants (cocaine, morphine, opium, marijuana, etc.).

Lowering of the consciousness

As long as it merely lowers the consciousness and thus weakens moral inhibitions, intoxication will never preclude criminal liability. This applies also to involuntary intoxication. Suppose that an inexperienced young boy at a party is tricked into drinking a strong cocktail in the belief that it is an innocent fruit drink, and that under the influence of the alcohol he becomes guilty of assault or attempted rape. He is liable for his acts. The intoxication will only be taken into account in the measure of punishment, as a possible factor in mitigation.

"Normal" and a typical alcohol-intoxication

Intoxication, however, can also lead to unconsciousness. As far as alcohol is concerned, one distinguishes between "normal" and pathological alcohol intoxication. In normal alcohol intoxication, the consciousness is gradually lowered as the amount of alcohol is increased, and the capacity for purposeful movement is at the same time impaired; when the point of complete unconsciousness is reached, the intoxicated person generally has no ability to commit offenses other than those of omission. The picture is different with pathological intoxication. The mental disturbances here often arise suddenly and after consumption of relatively small quantities of alcohol. The general signs of intoxication, such as an uncertain walk and slurred speech, are lacking, but perception is seriously disturbed. Delusions and hallucinations may also appear. The individual usually does not remember anything that happened while he was intoxicated. Pathological intoxication generally occurs only in those individuals who are predisposed to it (epileptics, neurotics, psychopaths, persons with brain damage); but even persons who otherwise react normally to alcohol may sometimes under the influence of illness, exhaustion or serious mental stress, react abnormally. A person may commit serious crimes, such as rape or murder, while in an unconscious state. It is obvious that not all ideas and sensations cease during pathological intoxication. Perhaps a more accurate picture of the situation is to be found in Swedish forensic psychiatry, which describes it as temporary insantiy.

We must also suppose that there are many gradations between the completely normal and the obviously pathological intoxication.

A Swedish case provides an illustrating example of an offense committed during pathological intoxication.[1]

A twenty-five-year-old man had been with his wife and small son at a Christmas dinner with relatives and had taken a few drinks. He became brutal and unpleasant to his wife on the way home. Weeping, she begged him to desist until after they had come home and put the boy to bed. When they arrived at home, the man grabbed his wife by the throat with one hand and seized a big butcher knife with the other. The wife tore herself free and ran out of the house, screaming for help. Before the neighbors could come to her aid, the man had killed his son with the knife, and had jumped out of the window, inflicting serious injuries on himself.

It was later learned that when the man was about eighteen, he drank a few glasses of wine at a family party and suddenly became rebellious and acted indecently. After that, he abstained from alcohol until the fatal day when he made this one exception. He had then been married for a few years. The marriage was a happy one, the husband enjoyed his home life, and the little boy was the apple of his eye. Afterwards, he became deeply depressed over his conduct, which he could not explain, and he contemplated suicide. On the way home that fatal night an enormous rage had overcome him. "It was as if everything became red in front of my eyes." He could not remember what had happened from that moment on until he jumped out of the window. He hazily recalled the sound of the broken glass and the stinging pains from the glass splinters.

The original provision of the penal law

If the law had no special rule on acts committed during intoxication, the result would be the following:

If the perpetrator become intoxicated for the purpose of committing the punishable act, he would be fully liable if he performed the act in an unconscious state caused by the intoxication (see § 27, II). If he knew, or should have known (on the basis of past experience, for example), that he might commit punishable acts while intoxicated, he would be liable for negligent causation. But if he neither considered, nor should have considered, this possibility, he would be free from liability.

This was largely the situation under Penal Code, § 45, in its original form. But it increased the liability on one point; it provided that a person who becomes unconscious through his own fault should always be punished for negligence if, while in this state, he commits an act which is punishable in its negligent form. Thus, liability for negligence would exist regardless of whether or not any actual negligence with respect to the harm caused could be proved in the concrete case.

The reason for Penal Code, § 45

When the law was revised in 1929, it was agreed that the earlier rules were too mild. The first objection was that many serious offenses were not punishable in their negligent form. The law has no punishment for negligent rape or negligent sexual offenses against children, because the negligent commission of such acts rarely occurs. As a result, a person who was unconscious because of intoxication and who committed such an offense could not be punished under Penal Code, § 45. Thus, there was very little logic in the rules: a person who committed assaults and malicious destruction of property while intoxicated could be punished, because the law applied to the negligent commission of such offenses, but one who committed the most serious sex offenses could not be punished. The second objection was that impunity benefited not only one who had actually been unconscious, but also one who could create such doubts about his condition that he would have to be acquitted under the principle that doubt must be resolved in favor of the accused. It was further argued that it would have a general educative effect, if a person were to be held fully responsible even for acts committed while intoxicated. But the strongest argument was the assertion that the general sense of justice, or at least the sound sense of justice, required full responsibility for intoxicated persons. This sense of justice, which was strongly expressed during the debate, is probably connected with the idea of retribution in its more primitive form, which concentrates on the act and its effects without going into deeper psychological considerations. Fundamental objections against all alcohol consumption undoubtedly influenced the views of certain groups.

Long debates resulted in the formulation of the present Penal Code, § 45: "Unconsciousness due to voluntary intoxication (produced by alcohol or other means) does not exclude punishment." In Penal Code, § 56, No. 2, we obtained at the same time a rule providing that the punishment in such cases can be reduced under especially extenuating circumstances.

The rule constitutes an important exception to the principle of proportionality between guilt and punishment. What the perpetrator can be blamed for is the fact that he has become intoxicated: what he does later, while unconscious, he cannot help. On one occasion he falls peacefully into sleep and thus will incur no punishment; on another occasion he kills a person, and will then be punished under Penal Code, § 233, with a minimum of six years' imprisonment, unless the provisions in Penal Code, § 56, No. 2, on especially extenuating circumstances, come into play. The rule is effective, but harsh, and because of this, it has been attacked by many.

During the debates on the Penal Code of 1902 there was a controversy over the evaluation of acts committed under intoxication, and some persons made demands for stricter rules. By the time the question was taken up by the Penal Code Commission in 1922, there had been some acquittals which had created an uproar. One of the political parties went as far as to put demands for increased punishment of acts committed while intoxicated into its party platform. The Penal Law Commission split into a majority and a minority. The majority proposed the solution which became law, but some within the majority wished to eliminate the possibility of reducing the punishment (Penal Code, § 56, No. 2), and even proposed to impose full liability upon acts committed during involuntary intoxication. The minority, on the other hand, proposed a special provision covering the person who, during unconsciousness because of voluntary intoxication, commits an otherwise punishable act; the punishment should be graduated according to the seriousness of the offense.[1] The final result—full liability under Penal Code, § 45, with a strictly limited recourse to decrease of punishment according to Penal Code, § 56—represents a compromise between the opposing views. The rule in Penal Code, § 45, was discussed by a number of speakers during the meeting of the Norwegian Association of Criminalists in 1935, and all opposed it. The psychiatrist Ragnar Vogt called it a stain on the law because it violated one of the basic rules of ethics: guilt as a basis for punishment.

The question is solved in various ways in foreign countries. In English and American law, the rules seem to lead on the whole to the same result as our Penal Code, § 45, while most countries on the continent treat unconsciousness due to intoxication as a reason for precluding liability, some having special provisions which correspond to the minority proposal of the Penal Law Commission of 1922.

The practical significance of the question

The practical significance of the question tends to be overrated. A study by Ornulf Odegaard of all forensic psychiatric statement which came into the

[1] For a similar rule, see German Penal Code, § 330(a).

Commission of Forensic Medicine in the years 1901 and 1926,[1] shows that there were only thirty cases, or about one per year, in which the experts had concluded that the perpetrator was unconscious because of intoxication at the time of commission of the act. The figures were as follows: less serious offenses of violence, threats, assaults, etc.: eleven; thefts: eight; sex offenses: seven; murder and infliction of serious harm: four. The statistics show that even if unconsciousness due to intoxication was often claimed, the plea usually did not succeed, even under the earlier system. In some cases, the accused may have been acquitted on the basis of unconsciousness, without a preceding psychiatric examination, but this hardly occurred with the serious offenses.

II. More about § 45

After this survey, we shall now look a little more closely at the questions of interpretation which Penal Code, § 45, raises.

1. The same rule for all types of self-imposed intoxication

The provision applies to all kinds of voluntary intoxication regardless of what intoxicant is used, and how it is consumed (by drinking, by inhalation, or by injection). Nor does the law distinguish between normal and pathological intoxication. It cares only whether the intoxication is voluntary or not. However, a pathological intoxication, more easily than a normal intoxication, may be involuntary because it can occur after the consumption of a smaller quantity.

The problem, however, can sometimes be a difficult one. Let us imagine that the consumption of alcohol by an epileptic causes an epileptic state of fuzziness, and that he commits murder while in this state. It can be held that here the unconsciousness was not due to intoxication, but to epilepsy, and that it must therefore lead to an acquittal, regardless of whether or not it was self-imposed. But this is to read more into the word "intoxication" than is reasonable. The most accurate interpretation of the provision is probably that a condition is regarded as voluntary intoxication when it is caused by the use of alcohol or other intoxicants in such quantities that the person can be blamed for having lost control over himself (see below, under 4).

2. When can the unconscious person be punished as an intentional perpetrator?

Thus, unconsciousness due to voluntary intoxication does not preclude liability. But the law requires subjective guilt for punishability: usually intention, sometimes negligence, and sometimes a definite purpose. What influence will unconsciousness have on this requirement?

As we have mentioned before, "unconsciousness," like insanity, does not lead to the end of all activity of the mind. And one can conceive of the possibility of judging the perpetrator on the basis of the ideas which he actually had in his troubled state of mind.

If a person committed murder because of an ungovernable state of anger, but otherwise knew what he was doing, he should then be punished for intentional homicide. If, however, he was so confused that he thought that it was a lion with which he was dealing, or that he was the victim of an assault and that he was merely protecting himself, the result should be an acquittal.

It is difficult, however, to determine what has gone through the "unconscious person's" mind, and there seems to be little reason for basing a decision on the type of the conceptions he entertained. Nor has judicial practice gone into any such examination. Penal Code, § 45, must be interpreted as an acceptance of the proposition that, despite intoxication, the perpetrator should be adjudged as if he had been sober. The deciding factor, then, is how a sober man would have been treated in a similar situation. If, for example, the intoxicated person has raped a woman, he will be convicted of intentional rape. A similar act by a normal person would be intentional. As examples from decided cases, we may cite Rt. 1934, p. 1096 (rape) and 1939, p. 20 (indecent acts against minors). If the intoxicated person has taken a stranger's car, driven negligently and killed someone, he can be sentenced for intentional car theft (Penal Code, § 260), but only negligent homicide. A sober person would also be sentenced in this manner.

But difficulties arise in some cases. The intentional, the negligent and the innocent act are not always easily distinguishable; intention and negligence may depend on factors in the mind of the perpetrator which are not discernible in the actual situation. If I cut someone with a knife, I may have done so for the purpose of homicide, but my intention may have been only to wound, not to kill. Which alternative shall be chosen when the perpetrator was unconscious at the time of act? The comments on the draft Bill state that the mildest solution must be chosen (S.K.I., 1925, p. 91), and this seems to be correct. The unconscious person cannot be convicted of an intentional offense unless the circumstances surrounding the act would clearly have marked it as intentional if it had been committed by a normal person. In the example of the knifing, the perpetrator could generally be punished for causing bodily injury, perhaps with death as its consequence (Penal Code, § 229); compare with (Penal Code, § 232), but not for murder or attempted murder (Penal Code, § 233). Similarly, the unconscious person cannot be punished for negligence either, unless the surrounding circumstances would have marked the act as negligent if it had been committed by a normal person. Thus, the court must disregard those circumstances to which a sober person perhaps but not certainly, would have paid attention.

These rules apply to persons who have acted in a state of unconsciousness. How is a person to be judged who is less intoxicated and merely misunderstands the situation by reason of his intoxication. For example, an intoxicated man sees a person advancing toward him with an object in his hand; in his hazy condition he believes that the other intends to attack him, and he strikes the imagined attacker. If the intoxicated person is unconscious, he will have to accept being treated as a normal person, and thus he will be held for intentional assault. If he is not unconscious, the Code gives no authority for departing from the general principle that the defendant must be judged according to his own perception about the actual situation (Penal Code, § 42). If the act, in his view of the situation, would be justified act of self-defense, he can then be punished only for negligence (see Penal Code, § 45). It can be argued, however, that there is so little logic in this that, even as to the intoxicated person who is not unconscious, the mistake caused by the intoxication must be disregarded. This is the view taken by the Supreme Court (Rt. 1961, p. 547). Such an analogized use of the law to the detriment of the accused is of doubtful validity, especially when such a controversial rule as the provision in Penal Code, § 45, is involved.

The perpetrator's own perception of the situation must be used as a basis if, after the intoxication has ended, he acts under a mistake caused by the intoxication. He believes, for example, that he has been the victim of an assault, and accuses his supposed assailant. He then cannot be punished under Penal Code, § 168, for false accusation.

3. Penal Provisions Requiring Purpose Cannot Be Used

The comments in the draft Bill to Penal Code, § 45, seem to suggest that the rule cannot be applied to violations of penal provisions which require a definite purpose (S.K.I., 1925, p. 91). This is by no means obvious. No such limitation appears in the words of the law, and there is no inherent obstacle to the use of the same principle here as elsewhere. If the surrounding circumstances would characterize the act as purposeful if it had been committed by a sober person, it should be characterized in the same manner when committed by an unconscious person. As it is often stated: if the law can feign intention, it can also feign purpose.

The principle which the draft Bill comments express, however, has been accepted by the courts, and must now be regarded as settled law (Rt. 1933, p. 1180, and 1935, p. 52). If a person who is unconscious because of voluntary intoxication attacks another, and forcibly takes his watch and wallet, he cannot be punished for robbery unless he purposely became intoxicated in order to commit the act, because the law's provision on robbery (Penal Code, § 267) requires the specific purpose of obtaining for oneself or another an unlawful gain. However, the perpetrator can be punished for assault (Penal Code, § 228), for coercion (Penal Code, § 222) and for having unlawfully placed himself in possession of the objects (Penal Code, § 392), since all these provisions require only ordinary intention. And if he later sells the watch or spends the money which was in the wallet, he can be punished for embezzlement committed in a sober condition.

Apart from those provisions which require a definite purpose, cases can also be conceived where the rule in Penal Code, § 45, does not apply. We can imagine that A lies dead-drunk on a beach, where B is drowning. If A had been sober, and neglected to rescue B, he would have been guilty according to the general provision in Penal Code, § 387, about a person's duty "to help according to his ability a person whose life is in obvious and imminent danger." But when he does not actually have the ability to help, it would serve little purpose to invoke the penal provision.

4. What Does Voluntary Mean?

Only an unconsciousness resulting from voluntary intoxication does not preclude punishment. Where shall the line be drawn?

Voluntary does not mean the same as intentional, but comes close to negligent. Intoxication is voluntary as soon as the perpetrator can be blamed for becoming intoxicated. Such is the case when he consumes such a large quantity of alcohol that he must know that he might lose full control over himself. How strict one is to be is a question of opinion. It is sufficient that the intoxication is voluntary; it makes no difference that the accused had no reason to believe that he would become unconscious. The general rule is that intoxication is voluntary, and special circumstances must exist before the contrary will be accepted. One can imagine, for example, that an inexperienced young boy is tricked into drinking champagne in the belief that it is ginger ale. It can also be imagined that a person consumed a small amount of alcohol which would not intoxicate him normally, but which has a special effect because of sickness, fatigue, or other reasons. Here he can be free from liability unless the situation is such that he should have counted on having less resistance than before.

Cooperation, Attempt and Plurality of Offenses

§ 31. General Remarks about Cooperation

Various forms of cooperation

It sometimes happens that many persons cooperate in the commission of an offense. This cooperation may take many forms.

A number of persons may act together in the execution of the offense. They may cooperate on an even basis, as where two persons break into a house and carry away the stolen goods together. Or one may be the leader while the other is only a helper, as where one person breaks into the house and perpetrates the theft itself, while the other stands guard outside.

It may also happen that one of them is alone in the actual execution of the offense, but was aided in his preparations, as where one person executes the theft, having been supplied with burglary tools and false keys by the other.

Up to now I have spoken about physical cooperation in the preparation or execution of the offense. But cooperation can also be of a psychic nature. I talk someone else into committing the offense, I encourage him to execute his plans, or I give him good advice about how to commit the crime. It is also a form of cooperation if I threaten someone into committing an offense.

Cooperation can also exist after the commission of the punishable act. I help the thief conceal the stolen goods, or assist the murderer in escaping. The Criminal Code of 1842 included in its chapter on participation a provision about such subsequent participation (Chapter 5, § 9). Under our present penal law, these cases are separated from the doctrine of cooperation, and considered independent offenses (see Chapter 13 of the Penal Code on receiving stolen goods and subsequent assistance, and § 132, on assisting the evasion of prosecution). But if the aid is promised in advance, this promise will be treated as a psychic cooperation in the offense.

Offenses in which many participate are often of a dangerous character. This is especially true when the participation is not casual, but rather constitutes an organized criminal activity, such as in a criminal syndicate, or in a revolutionary or traitorous conspiracy. On the other hand, the individual member's subjective guilt may often be less than if he had committed a similar act by himself. Psychological experience generally shows that the individual is capable of asserting greater courage, for both good and evil, when he knows that he has others by his side. This applies especially to weak and dependent persons who, under the influence of a strong will or mass-excitement, may commit acts which they never would have committed alone.

De lege ferenda, two problems arise in the area of cooperation. First, how far should punishability be extended? Should the law confine itself to reacting against the principal, or should it also penalize the less significant participants? Secondly, should all participants be punished to the same extent as the principal, or should the law provide a milder punishment for them, or at least for some of them? A glance at foreign codes shows that the solutions can vary greatly with respect to both substance and form.

§ 32. The Area of Criminal Liability for Cooperation

I. The solution must be found in the individual penal provision

Penal Code, § 58, the only provision on cooperation in the general part, reads as follows:

"Where several persons have cooperated in committing an offense, the punishment may be reduced to less than the minimum provided for the act and to a milder form of punishment if the cooperation was due essentially to dependence on other guilty persons or has been of little significance in comparison to others. Where the penalty otherwise could have been restricted to fines and in the case of misdemeanors, punishment may be entirely remitted."

As we can see, the provision does not reveal when cooperation is punishable. It provides only a rule for the measure of punishment in cases where liability itself is clear. The Penal Code, unlike the Criminal Code of 1842, solves the question of liability in the individual provisions of the special part. This is a legislative technique which seems to be used only in Norway.

II. The extent of the penal provision when cooperation is not mentioned

The individual penal provisions can be divided into two main groups: those in which cooperation is explicitly mentioned, and those where it is not. Some penal provisions are in a middle position, where certain types of cooperation are mentioned. In a special position we find placed such activities as "misleading or prompting" (see, for example, Penal Code, §§ 219 and 242), or simply "misleading" (Penal Code, § 170). We shall first look at how far the penal provisions extend where cooperation is not mentioned.

Whether a penal provision applies only to the person who has actually committed the prohibited act or whether, to a greater or lesser extent, it also applies to the cooperators, will depend on an interpretation of the provision itself. In some cases the act is described in such a limited way that a cooperator will not be affected. When Penal Code, § 385, provides punishment for one who "uses a knife or any other specially dangerous tool during a fight," it does not penalize an outsider who urges one of the participants to use a knife. Similarly, when Penal Code, § 337, directs itself against one who, contrary to law, "changes his own or his children's name," cooperation will fall outside the words of the law. In some cases, the scope of the penal provision is limited because the provision is directed only against persons in certain positions (see, for example, Penal Code, Chapters 11, 30, 33 and 42), or having certain duties (see for example, Penal Code, §§ 240 and 241). When cooperation is not mentioned in the definition of such offenses, it is clear that an outsider is not covered by the penal provision even though he may have instigated the offense.

In other instances, however, the law is so general in its expression that it includes cooperative acts. Thus, when Penal Code, § 206, speaks about one who "furthers the indecent relations of others," or when Penal Code, § 239 refers to one who "causes the death of another as a result of negligence," liability is not limited to the principal participant. The deciding factor for liability, therefore, is not whether an act can be characterized as a principal act or as mere cooperation, but whether, according to a normal interpretation, the words of the penal provision extend to cooperative actions.

The theory of the indirect perpetrator

It has been held that even though cooperation is not mentioned in the penal provision, a cooperator or at least an instigator must be liable when the actual perpetrator cannot be punished because he was not responsible or acted in good faith. The instigator, it is said, has acted as an indirect perpetrator; he has used the innocent agent as his tool.

De lege ferenda much can be said in favor of such a solution. Even though the law may see fit to exempt the cooperator from punishment when the principal can be reached, it by no means follows that the law should relinquish its penal power with respect to subordinated parties, as it does in those cases where the exemption is extended to cases where the principal is not punishable. An interpretation of the Penal Code, however, can hardly justify the proposition. The provisions on cooperation do not distinguish between instances when there is a punishable principal, and instances when there is not. And the comments to the draft code state that the punishability of the principal actor should not have any bearing on the punishability of the cooperator. Although there may be good reasons for punishing the indirect perpetrator even when cooperation is not mentioned, this will not justify the imposition of criminal liability without authority in the law and contrary to the legislature's intent. Judicial practice has not taken any definite position on the question (see Rt. 1910, p. 901; 1938, p. 21; 1956, p. 738).

III. Penal provisions where cooperation is mentioned

Where the penal provision expressly includes cooperation—and the law does so in dealing with most of the more serious offenses—it not only penalizes the principal, but also all those who have cooperated in one way or another. Whether the cooperation is of a psychic or physical nature, or whether it occurred before or simultaneously with the principal's act, is immaterial. The range of punishment is almost always the same for cooperation as it is for the principal act. Whether the defendant is guilty as a principal or a cooperator is merely a factor to be considered in meting out punishment, and there is no judicial interest in drawing a sharp line between the two. In only a few instances does the law have special penal provisions on cooperation with a different punishment for the principal.

There has been much debate as to whether or not the cooperation must have caused the prohibited result. Much of the controversy is due to the fact that the concept of casual relationship has various meanings. That the cooperation was essential for the result (a conditio sine qua non), is not required for liability. If we wish to retain the theory that the cooperator's act must be a cause of the prohibited result, it must be pointed out that the only requirement is that the act, in one way or another, has played a part in the chain of events. If a burglar on his way to the scene of the planned burglary bumps into an old friend, and persuades him to stand guard during the burglary, the friend will be liable for cooperation even though the burglary would have taken place without his cooperation. He has been in on the act, and that is enough.

This also applies to the psychic cooperation which consists of "prompting" or giving advice. Proof is not required that the principal would not have committed the act without the cooperation; it is sufficient that his intention was strengthened or that the advice was important in the planning or execution of the act. Even if the advice was bad and the perpetrator would have been better off without it, this is no ground for acquitting the person who gave it. If the advice has influenced the execution of the offense, the adviser was a cooperator. If, however, the suggestions are immediately discarded as useless, there exists only an attempt to cooperate. Here, the advice has played no part in the course of events.

The question as to what constitutes cooperation was widely discussed during the prosecutions after World War II for unlawful executions or other actions resulting in death during enemy occupation. It is supposed that all participants in a firing squad are liable for cooperation in murder without necessity of proof of the significance of the act of each individual. The liability also applies to the person who did not fire a shot, having forgotten in his excitement to release the safety catch on his rifle, and even applies to one who purposely did not shoot (Rt. 1947, p. 742). It also applies to one who participated as a guard, or cooperated in transporting the victims to the place of execution (Rt. 1948, p. 162). Everyone who cooperates in such a joint action is liable for the consequences to the extent that they were intended (see Rt. 1932, p. 224).

Usually the cooperation which exists between the participants is conscious. But it may also happen that aid is given without the principal's knowledge, such as where I stand guard during a burglary on my own initiative, and without the burglar's knowledge. If the guarding was of no actual importance to the principal, it would seem most natural to regard it only as an attempt to cooperate.

In certain cases there may be doubts as to what is needed for psychic cooperation. The fact that a person indicates by words or deeds that he is not opposed to the commission of the act is insufficient. A positive prompting is generally required. Of course, it is often difficult to distinguish between passive approval and direct prompting (see Rt. 1881, p. 850; 1907, p. 333, and 1926, p. 581). The last decision concerned a woman who, in the presence of her husband, and without his interference, had sold liquor from their joint apartment. The lower court convicted the man for cooperation, stating that his conduct had to be regarded as a consent to the sale. The Supreme Court reversed, on the ground that passivity could not be regarded as punishable cooperation, even though approval or acceptance of the act could be inferred. See also Rt. 1933, p. 620.

Even though a person has a special duty to prevent the punishable act, mere passivity on his part usually cannot be punished as cooperation. If the night watchman fails to act when he hears burglars in the cellar, he cannot be punished for cooperation in the burglary, although he may be held for breach of confidence (Penal Code, § 275). But where a person who has such a special duty is concerned, positive prompting is not required for joint liability; it is sufficient if he indicates to the guilty party that he has nothing against the act. The servant, for example, asks the master whether he should cut some timber on the neighbor's land, and the master answers, "it's all right with me." And to go a bit further, even a superior's failure to step in can be interpreted by a subordinate as consent, and if the superior knows this, his passivity must be regarded as psychic cooperation. A superior police officer, for example, becomes guilty of cooperation if he does not prevent a subordinate from mistreating a person being questioned.[1] Silence or an express agreement from one who has a special duty to prevent the punishable act means that one of the normal obstacles to the offense is eliminated, and thus cannot be regarded in the same way as a similar agreement from an outsider.

Cooperation is also declared a punishable in certain cases where the principal's offense consists of a punishable omission (see, for example, Penal Code, § 172). Cooperation here will usually be of psychic nature (misleading or prompting), but it can also take the form of obstructing the fulfillment of the duty. One who prevents an act of rescue, however, may incur a greater liability. If A and B see a third person drowning and do nothing, they are both guilty of a misdemeanor for their omission under Penal Code, § 387. But if A tries to save the drowning person and B prevents him from doing so, B will not get away with mere liability under Penal Code, § 387; he has caused the death of another and can be punished for murder.

Sometimes an offense requires a certain cooperation from the victim. In usury (Penal Code, § 295), for example, there is a contract between the usurer and his victim. But the victim, of course, cannot be punished for cooperation.

Penal provisions penalizing certain types of cooperators

In the above discussion, we had in mind all those cases in which the penal provision is directed against cooperation generally. Similar principles apply when the penal provision does not mention cooperation in general, but only certain types of cooperation, such as "misleading" or "prompting." Here, all those who fall under the legal description of the act are penalized, whether it is natural to call them principals or not.

IV. Evaluation of the system of the Code

A survey of the rules of the Code shows that cooperation is generally punished in all offenses of a more serious nature, while quite a few penal provisions against lesser offenses confine themselves to penalizing the principal. When the act of the perpetrator consists of a breach of a special duty, the law has largely exempted the cooperator from criminal liability. Thus, cooperation in a civil service offense is not punishable unless the cooperator himself is a civil servant (Penal Code, § 125). But certain forms of such cooperation are made special offenses by provisions like Penal Code, § 128, which imposes punishment upon one who by threats or bribery "seeks to induce a civil servant illegally to perform or omit to perform an official function, or is accessory thereto."

[1] See Rt. 1947, p. 69 (73). See also the Danish decision in UfR 1938, p. 964. There a woman was convicted of assault resulting in death, because she had let her husband mistreat her six-year-old illegitimate child in her presence.

The advantage of having mentioned cooperation in the individual penal provision should have been a careful deliberation in the drafting of each provision regarding the extent and scope of accessorial liability. It cannot be denied, however, that inclusion or exclusion of cooperation in the Code seems rather accidental. Moreover, the description of offenses becomes more complicated when one has to deal with cooperation in the definition of each single offense, instead of determining the punishability of cooperation by provisions in the general part of the Code. As a modern example of the contrary system, we can mention the Danish Penal Code of 1930 which provides in § 23 that "the penalty in respect of an offense shall apply to any person who has contributed to the execution of the wrongful action by instigation, advice or action." The Swedish Code of 1962 (Chap. 23, § 4) has a similar formulation.

V. Cooperation in offenses outside the Penal Code

The principles which apply to the punishability of cooperation in the Penal Code itself also apply to penal provisions in other laws. This cannot be deduced from the Penal Code, § 1, providing that the first part of the Code applies to all offenses, because the Code does not state in its first (general) part to what extent cooperation can be punished. That must be established by an analysis of the special part. But the same principles of interpretation which apply within the Penal Code also apply outside. Where cooperation is expressly mentioned, there is no trouble. Where cooperation is not mentioned, a natural interpretation of the individual penal provision will determine its applicability: whether it applies only to the principal or also to all the participants or to some of them.

VI. Cooperation in offenses involving printed matters

When a punishable act is perpetrated by printed matters—e.g., a newspaper article contains a defamatory statement, a disclosure of military secrets, or an invitation to rebellion—rules other than the general ones apply to liability for cooperation, according to many laws. This was also the case with the Criminal Code of 1842. The Code attempted to make freedom of the press as effective as possible by declaring the editor, the printer and other agents free from liability, if there existed an author who could be held liable (the Belgian system of substitution). But if the author could not be held, e.g., where he was unknown, or a minor, or because he resided in a foreign country, the liability passed to the editor, the printer and, if necessary, ultimately to the dealer.

This system was repealed by the Penal Code of 1902. The general rules on cooperation are now fully applied to offenses involving printed matters. If the subjective conditions for punishment exist, everybody who has taken part in the production and distribution of the printed matter will be liable as a cooperator, not only the editor (the publisher), but also the printer, the compositor and the delivery boy (see Rt. 1947, p. 351). It should be added that the law will not impose on technical helpers any duty of investigation with respect to the contents of the writing, such as a duty to investigate whether or not a defamatory statement is true (see Rt. 1930, p. 1383).

In addition to these general rules on liability, however, Penal Code, §§ 431 and 432, provide certain special rules which attempt to increase the publisher's (or editor's) duty of care.

§ 33. Additional Comments on Criminal Liability of the Individual Participant

I. The criminal liability is evaluated independently for each participant

The Criminal Code of 1842, like many foreign Penal Codes, built upon what has been called the principle of the accessorial character of liability for cooperation. This means that punishment for cooperation requires a punishable principal act to which the liability is related. If the principal has not even gone so far as a punishable attempt, or if he is free from punishment for some other reason, the cooperator will also be free. The Penal Code of 1902 abandoned this concept. Each of the participants is judged only according to his own connection with the offense in which he cooperated or attempted to cooperate.

Thus, the cooperator may be subject to punishment even though the principal has not attempted to commit a punishable act. According to the Criminal Code of 1842, an unsuccessful attempt at instigation was free from punishment, but under present law it is punished as attempted cooperation. The same applies to attempted cooperation of other types. Suppose that A, who is planning a burglary, obtains false keys and other tools from B. Even though A does not attempt to commit the burglary, B can be punished for attempted cooperation. At first it may seem strange that the cooperator can be punished for attempt in such a case, while the principal goes completely free because he never left the preparatory stage. But the explanation is that the cooperator has already done his part; whether or not the offense he committed no longer depends upon him. The principal, however, has not taken the decisive step; additional actions on his part are required before the offense has materialized.

The question of criminal responsibility is also resolved independently for each of the participants. If one of them is insane, or below the criminal minimum age, he is free from punishment, but this has no effect upon the liability of the others.

The same applies to subjective guilt (mens rea). If the principal goes further than the planner or the helper had expected, the latter will not be held liable for the excess. If I aid in a robbery, I will not be held liable for cooperation in homicide should the robber kill his victim. If I participate in a theft, I will not be held liable for grand larceny in the event that one of the other participants is armed without my knowledge (Penal Code, § 258). On the other hand, if the principal does less than the cooperator had expected, the latter will be convicted of only an attempted cooperation, as far as the non-committed acts are concerned.

Moreover, when the law requires a definite purpose for punishability, liability depends on whether the purpose exists in the individual participant, unless otherwise provided by the penal provision in question. This does not lead to natural results in all cases. When a person cooperates in another's theft, it would seem to make little difference, as far as his actual culpability is concerned, whether he acts for the purpose of gain or merely for the purpose of damaging the owner of the property. Since the principal has the required purpose, the act has obtained its character as larceny, and it does not seem reasonable that a person who has aided the thief, with knowledge of his purpose, should be liable only under the much milder provision of Penal Code, § 392, for trespass to personal property.

Questions involving other conditions of punishability are also determined in relation to the individual participant. One person may merit impunity because he withdrew from an attempt (Penal Code, § 50), without that impunity applying to the others. The act of one might fall outside the jurisdiction of the Norwegian penal law (Penal Code, § 12), while the acts of the others fall within it. The statute of limitations may benefit one, but not the others.

When there are grounds which make the act objectively legal, such as self-defense, necessity, or consent, they will generally apply to all participants. But this is not always the case. If I, by threats against another's life, force him to give a false report to the police, he may be exempt from punishment because of the necessity situation, while I will naturally be liable for having induced the report. In wartime, an act may be a legal act of war for one of the participants, who is an enemy soldier or civil servant, while it may be criminal for the other, who is a Norwegian citizen. This question was considered many times after World War II in criminal trials against citizens who had given information to the German occupation authorities, resulting in sentences of imprisonment or death for those informed against. As far as the Germans were concerned, the arrests and death sentences were a lawful exercise of official authority; an occupation force has the right to punish attacks against its military security. On the other hand, it was unlawful for a Norwegian citizen to aid the enemy in his suppression of Norwegian resistance. And such an informer became criminally liable not only for treason (Penal Code, § 86), but also for cooperation in the crimes of deprivation of liberty (Penal Code, § 223), and homicide (Penal Code § 233).

II. The measure of punishment for the individual participants

Penal Code, § 58, states the rule for meting out the punishment for the individual participants. The law allows for a reduction of punishment for those whose "cooperation was due essentially to dependence on other guilty persons or has been of little significance in comparison to others." This method of expression could be taken to signify that it is only the cooperators and not the principal who could benefit from the reduction in punishment. But this was not the meaning, nor has the provision been so interpreted. The last part of the provision—the insignificance of the act—cannot well be applied to the principal but the first part, concerning the dependent position of the actor, can (Rt. 1911, p. 32). The classic example here is the thief who takes his young son with him and uses him to creep in and take the goods.

In certain instances punishment may be omitted completely, according to the terms of the last paragraph. This is the case when the conditions for reduction of punishment mentioned in the first part of the provision exist, and the penal provision involved either permits fines as an alternative punishment, or defines only a misdemeanor. In such cases the court is given complete discretion. If it decides to remit the punishment, this does not mean that the act is considered lawful.

While Penal Code, § 58, provides for a punishment milder than usual in cases of cooperation, Military penal Code, § 28, contains a contrary rule: when two or more soldiers have participated in a military offense, the punishment may be increased by up to one-half. Penal Code, § 58, is motivated by considerations of the lesser subjective guilt of the individual participant, while Military Penal Code, § 28, considers the increased danger involved when an offense is committed by more than one. According to Military Penal Code, § 1, the general part of the (civil) Penal Code applies to military offenses in the absence of any provision to the contrary. One cannot say that Military Penal Code, § 28, precludes the use of Penal Code, § 58. The result must therefore be that both can be used; the court may exceed the usual maximum for the leader of the plot, and may go below the usual minimum when dealing with a person who only reluctantly allowed himself to be talked into cooperating.

Within the area of the Penal Code there is usually no such opportunity to increase the punishment beyond the normal maximum. But in determining the amount of punishment to be actually imposed, the fact that the accused has persuaded an immature young boy to be his accomplice will be an aggravating factor.

§ 34. Attempt

I. Completed offense, attempt, preliminary acts

An offense may fall short of completion for many reasons. The attempt may not succeed—the perpetrator shoots at someone but misses. Or he may give up the plan because of repentance, fear of being discovered, or for other reasons. Or he may do his best, but is discovered and stopped. The perpetrator may have made a mistake about the situation: the conditions which would make his act an offense exist only in his mind, not in reality. He may destroy his own property, for example, believing it to be that of a third person.

General penal provisions on attempt belong to a rather late stage of legal development. Older law considered primarily the result of the act and the harm to the victim; if there was no such harm, it was felt that there was no need for a reaction. Neither our old Norwegian laws nor the Norwegian Law of 1687 contained general provisions on attempt, but certain especially dangerous attempts were made punishable by special penal provisions. The existence of general provisions against attempt shows that interest has been directed more toward the conduct and guilt of the perpetrator.

The main rule under our Penal Code is that an attempt to commit a felony is punishable, but less severely than a fully completed offense (Penal Code, §§ 49 and 51). An attempted misdemeanor, however, is not punishable at all (Penal Code, § 49, para. 2). In felonies, the distinction between attempt and completed crime has significance only for the amount of punishment; in misdemeanors, it becomes decisive for punishability itself. The distinction may have significance even for felonies, however, where the question of withdrawal from attempt is involved (Penal Code, § 50).

Not every preparation for an offense is a punishable attempt under our law. It is therefore necessary to distinguish between three stages in the realization of the offensive intent: The impunitive preliminary act, the punishable attempt and the completed offense. Penal Code, § 49, gives a definition of attempt which denotes the limit both upwards toward the fully completed offense and downwards toward the impunitive preliminary act. It states: "An attempt is an act purposively directed at, but falling short of, completion of the felony."

The doctrine of attempt is an area where there exist rather significant differences between the Scandinavian countries. Denmark goes a long way toward punishment for attempt: preliminary acts are considered punishable attempts, and the law does not say that an attempt is to be punished less severely than a fully completed offense, only that it may be. Sweden, on the other hand, has no general rule on punishment for attempt; the attempt can be punished only where the individual penal provision expressly so states. Through legislative amendments during recent years, however, the number of offenses which are punishable even at the stage of attempt has increased substantially, so that the difference is not so great as before. The so-called impossible attempt (see below under V) is generally not punishable under Swedish law.

II. The distinction between attempt and complete offense

The distinction between attempt and completion is in principle easily made. The offense is completed when all the requirements of the individual penal provision are present. How much is needed depends on the definition in the penal provision in question.

For provisions which direct themselves toward the causation of a harmful result, the offense is not fully completed until the result has occurred. And it must not be too remote from the act (see above, § 12, V). If it has been caused by other factors, or if it has come about in a completely unpredictable manner, only punishment for attempt can be imposed.

For danger offenses, however, nothing more is required than that a danger shall have been caused, which is not too remote from the act.

Where the penal provision describes the method of action itself, the answer will depend upon the expressions which the law has used. Larceny (Penal Code, § 257) is completed at the moment when the object is carried away. Usury (Penal Code, § 295) is complete at the moment the offender has "achieved or conditioned" the unproportional return. Rape (Penal Code, § 192) is completed at the moment the indecent relationship is consummated. Doubtful borderline cases can arise in practice, of course, but the principle itself is clear enough: the decision must be made by an interpretation of the individual penal provision. A more detailed discussion, therefore, belongs in the special part of the criminal law, dealing with the different offenses.

Some penal provisions describe the offense in such a way that it is fully completed by an attempt. Penal Code, § 98, for example, is directed against "anybody who attempts to bring about the alteration of Norway's Constitution by illegal means" (see, further, Penal Code, §§ 83, 105, 127, 168). In these cases the distinction between attempt and completed offense does not arise as an issue. Whenever the perpetrator goes beyond merely impunitive preliminary acts, there exists a completed offense (Rt. 1948, p. 531). The question has special significance for the possibility of achieving impunity by withdrawal (see below, § 35).

In offenses of omission there is seldom any question of attempt. As long as it is not too late to act, there exists nothing punishable, and when it is too late, there usually exists a completed offense. Exceptions may exist, however, especially with respect to those penal provisions which require a harmful result. A mother, for example, has decided to kill her newly born baby by depriving it of food and care. The child is then rescued in a state of exhaustion by an outsider. The mother can be punished for attempted murder. Attempt is theoretically possible in the pure omission offenses as well. It may happen, for example, that a person who has a duty to act is forced by a third party to do the act at the last moment.

Where cooperation is punishable, Penal Code, § 49, also applies to attempted cooperation. Even though the cooperator has done everything required of him, he can be punished only for attempt if the offense is not fully completed. For example, I supply a thief with tools and maps of the place in question, but he is caught by the police before breaking in. Whether the term which applies to such a case is attempted cooperation or cooperation in an attempt is immaterial.

III. The distinction between attempt and preliminary acts

The Danish Penal Code diverts its provision on attempt (§ 21) generally against "acts aiming at promoting or carrying out an offense." Our Penal Code, like most others, defines punishable attempt more narrowly. The definition contained in § 49 uses the expression "act, purposively directed at, but falling short of, completion of the felony." The term "completion" is here in contrast with preliminary acts. A conspiracy to commit crimes is only a preparatory act under our law.

When purely preliminary acts have not been made punishable, the first reason is probably that they are not a sufficiently reliable expression of a definite criminal mind. The actor may toy with the idea of committing an offense and make his plans for it without having made any definite decision. And even though he has made up his mind, it may be uncertain whether or not the determination will persist when the time of performance arrives. In good as in evil, there is a deep human truth in the words of Peer Gynt: "Ay, think of it—wish it done—will it to boot—but do it! No, that's past my understanding" [1] It can also be said that purely preliminary acts seldom come to the attention of the police, and that it makes no great difference for the effectiveness of the penal system whether or not punishment is imposed in the rare cases when they become known. Experience shows that even if all preliminary acts are punishable, such as is the case in Denmark, it is only seldom that remote preliminary acts come before the courts.[2]

But where, then is the limit to be drawn? The statutory requirement that the act be directed at completion of the offense could be interpreted to mean that the accused must have begun the very act which the penal provision describes. Thus, attempted larceny would not exist until the perpetrator had commenced to "carry away" the object, and that would at least require that he had placed his hand upon it. Attempted indecent relations (Penal Code, §§ 191–193, and others) would not exist until the perpetrator had commenced an indent act; or attempted bigamy (Penal Code, § 220), until the perpetrator had commenced entering into the new marital relationship, and that would probably mean when the marriage ceremony itself had started. To draw such restricted limits around the concept of attempt would neither be natural nor expedient. And it is agreed, both in theory and in practice, that so much cannot be required.

The decisive question, as Hagerup states it, must be "whether the act, when the offensive activity is considered in connection with and in light of all accompanying circumstances, shows that the perpetrator has now set straight out for an offensive goal." [3] Or to say the same in a slightly different way: the behavior of the perpetrator must show that the time of preparation and contemplation is over, and that he is now proceeding to realize his goal. We shall look a bit more closely at what this means.

The perpetrator must always have the intention to carry out the offense. He must have made his decision. Even though objectively he has come fairly near the completion of an offense, no punishable attempt exists if the intention to complete the offense is lacking. One who swings an axe toward the head of his opponent is not guilty of attempted homicide if he intends to change the course of the swing at the last moment so that the other is merely frightened. One who enlists with the enemy for war service cannot be sentenced for attempted aid to the enemy if he knows that he will not be accepted as fit for duty (R.Mbl. 37, p. 60). Whether or not an offensive intention exists is a question of proof and a reasonable doubt must lead to acquittal. The judge's knowledge of the character and history of the accused would be significant for this facet of the decision.

But it is also required that the completion of the offense should, according to the perpetrator's assumptions, occur in a fairly proximate connection with the activity in question. Obtaining tools, making agreements with other participants and investigating the scene of the proposed crime are impunitive preliminary acts under Norwegian law—in contrast to Danish law. The promise or offer to commit an offense is generally also merely a preliminary act. Opening a window with the intent to enter and steal must generally be held to be attempted grand larceny. But it is only a preliminary act if the actor's purpose is to make everything clear today and then return to complete the theft tomorrow.

Uncertainty of the time when the result will occur is in itself without significance. Example: A wants to take B's life with poison. He succeeds in placing a couple of capsules of strong poison among B's sleeping pills which are of similar appearance. He knows that B does not often use sleeping pills and that therefore a long time may elapse before the murderous plan succeeds. Here, A has done everything which he deems necessary, and there is no question about preparation for a later offensive act. He can therefore be punished for attempted homicide.

The question of the distinction between attempt and impunitive preparation is not infrequently raised in practice, and I shall mention some legal decisions as illustrations:

Rt. 1939, p. 890: The accused had enticed a five-year-old girl to the house where he lived, but was prevented from taking her into his room because a person who knew him arrived and took the child away. The accused was convicted of attempt to commit an indecent act (Penal Code, § 212, para. 2). The Supreme Court held "that the behavior of the accused goes so far toward completion of the offense that there is no doubt but that in immediate connection with the already effected acts he would have completed the offense had he not been prevented by the intervention of a third party. And our Penal Code, § 49, must be interpreted in such a way that this is sufficient for punishable attempt." See also Rt. 1898, p. 717.

Rt. 1926, p. 716: A man who had bought 147 bottles of wine with the intention of reselling them pleaded guilty to a charge of attempted unlawful sale. The Appellate Division of the Supreme Court reversed the decision, holding that a purchase for the purpose of sale is not, without more, an attempted sale. In itself, it does not go beyond the limits of a non-punishable preliminary act.

Rt. 1880, p. 641: Two prisoners planned to set fire to the prison. They had prepared some cases with ignitable materials, and had equipped them with an igniting mechanism which could be set for a definite time. The cases were to be placed in the sleeping quarters, so that the fire would break out there while the prisoners were at work. The plan was discovered before the cases were completely ready. The two accused were acquitted of attempted arson, on the ground that obtaining materials for an offense could be considered only as a preliminary act.

Unforeseen completion

An act which the perpetrator assumes to be only in the stage of preparation may cause the harmful result through an unforeseen development. A woman who wishes to kill her husband obtains a bottle of poison which she intends to mix with his food. Before she can do this he drinks from the bottle, believing it to contain cough drops, and dies. The woman cannot be punished either for attempt or for completed homicide. Subjectively, she had come no further than impunitive preparation; the further development was not encompassed by the intention. However, there may be a question of negligent homicide (Penal Code, § 239).

But it may also happen that the act which the perpetrator assumes to be in the stage of attempt is sufficient to bring about the result. Suppose that the woman with the poison wants to kill her husband by giving him a number of small doses in his food, and has commenced to do so. Contrary to her assumption, her husband dies after but a few doses. She must be convicted of completed homicide. Here she has crossed the borderline of crime, and death has resulted from her act. The fact that it took place at a different time than she had counted on makes no legal difference.

IV. Preliminary acts as independent offenses

The determination of the precise point at which the law should step in is a policy question. An act which would be merely an attempt or an impunitive preliminary act under one penal provision is often a completed offense under another penal provision. In such a case it is frequently said that the preparation is made punishable as delictum sui generis. The rules concerning forgery of documents constitute a typical example. If fraud is committed with the aid of a false document, the fraud is not completed until the victim has been tricked into making a disposition which causes loss or danger of loss (Penal Code, § 270). Fully completed documentary forgery already exists, however, at the moment the document is "used," even though the perpetrator has not succeeded in deceiving the other party (Penal Code, § 183). The law, however, goes further. Suppose that the perpetrator has not gotten so far as to use the document, but is discovered immediately after the forgery. In relation to the provision on the use of false documents, this would merely be an impunitive preparation. But the law has made the falsification itself a separate offense (Penal Code, § 185). And it even goes one step further: one who prepares for the forgery of the document, by obtaining a copy of a genuine stamp for example, is reached by a special penal provision (Penal Code, § 186).

As other examples of preliminary acts which are made independent offenses, we can mention conspiracy to perform certain serious crimes (see, for example, Penal Code, §§ 94, 104, 159), and the procurement of explosives or other objects with which to commit felonies (see, for example, Penal Code, § 161). It is usually especially dangerous preliminary acts which also more or less outwardly bear the characteristics of the offensive purpose, which the law places in a special position in this way.

Once the preliminary act is made a special offense, it is treated as an ordinary offense in every way. There can be an attempted offense, and it becomes necessary to distinguish between impunitive preparation and punishable attempt. Penal Code, § 186, as mentioned, provides punishment for anyone who "in preparation of the forging of a document, fabricates or acquires a false seal, stamp, sign or other objects which appear designed for use in forgery or falsification. . . ." One who tries but fails to obtain such a false stamp can be punished for an attempted violation of that provision. But if he does no more than seek contact with an engraver in order to ascertain his willingness to undertake the fabrication of the false stamp, only impunitive preparation exists.

V. Impossible attempts

A question which has been widely discussed is whether an attempt, in order to be punishable, must have created the danger of a completed violation, or whether the subjective conceptions of the actor are absolutely decisive. This is the problem of the so-called impossible attempt. A distinction is made between attempts with impossible methods (such as attempt at murder or criminal abortion with means which are actually quite harmless), and attempt against impossible objects (such as attempted theft from an empty pocket, or attempted murder by shooting at a stump which is thought to be a person). Both the method and the object may be impossible; from foreign jurisprudence we have the example of a woman who, erroneously believing that she is pregnant, attempts criminal abortion with a completely ineffective substance.

To a certain extent, it can be said that every unsuccessful attempt has been impossible; if we had complete knowledge of all the factors of causation which play a part, we could predict that the attempt would not succeed. What can be considered to exempt from punishment is only the absolutely impossible attempt, that is, the attempt which because of the nature of the method or the object could under no circumstances lead to the result. Legal theory as well as legislatures have endeavoured to set up limitations in this direction in order to preclude from punishability attempts which do not deserve to be taken seriously. The Swedish Penal Code limits punishability to those attempts where "there existed danger of the act leading to the completion of the offense, or where such a danger has been excluded only by purely accidental circumstances."

Ørsted, in contrast to Feuerbach, was a definite follower of the subjective attempt theory. His argument was that the criminal mind has manifested itself in action, whether or not the attempt was possible.[1] The Criminal Code of 1842 took the same viewpoint, and the same applies to the present Code. The expression "purposively directed at completion" in Penal Code, § 49, was meant to manifest that the impossible attempt is also punishable. This is assumed in practice as well.

Rt. 1932, p. 1034: A man had attempted to open up a cash-box by striking it with a roofing-tile. He was sentenced for attempted grand larceny (according to the then prevailing provision in Penal Code, § 258, No. 3), but appealed on the ground that the attempt was impossible. The appeal was dismissed, and the Supreme Court mentioned that according to the legal history of the Code "punishability does not depend on whether the act was really possible but only whether it appeared possible to the accused." Rt. 1947, p. 346: A woman who thought that she was pregnant turned to a "wise woman" who administered treatment for abortion. According to the information in the case, she was not actually pregnant. She was convicted of attempted abortion (Penal Code, § 245). "The accused, believing herself pregnant, allowed treatment for abortion to be administered which she knew was for the purpose of killing the foetus, and which could not have had any other purpose. She has thus committed an act purposefully directed at the completion of an offense under Penal Code, § 245, para. 1, and thus, through her act, has unquestionably disclosed her desire to commit this offense." According to the Supreme Court, this was sufficient to make conviction of attempt mandatory. One judge dissented.

The Report of the Penal Law Commission states that one must be aware of "the limiting principle that acts which are in themselves legal and lawful must always be regarded as unpunishable, even though they are committed in order to cause harm, and even if the harm is thereby caused" (S.K.M., p. 93, note 3).

This statement is aimed at those instances where the actor does not cause or count on causing a greater danger than he is entitled to. The Commission itself mentions the case where a doctor performs on a patient in whose immediate death he has a great interest, a dangerous, but fully warranted operation, which he would not have performed had he not hoped that the operation would fail and the patient die. When the operation is medically warranted, the criminal intention will not make the act punishable. The same applies to acts which do not create any proximate danger, such as convincing someone to make a journey by train. It becomes an attempt, however, if the perpetrator believes that he is creating a danger to which it is unlawful to expose the other person. He has, for example, heard someone bragging about having blown up a railroad bridge on the line in question.

Acts which are due to mere superstition

Traditionally, the law is supposed to exclude from punishment for attempt acts which are due to mere superstition, such as the attempt to kill one's neighbor by prayers or curses. Today, it is difficult to imagine such attempts being committed by responsible persons. But as late as 1900, the German Reichsgericht had a case where a woman had given two other women money to kill her husband by calling on the assistance of the devil.[1] The result was an acquittal.

VI. Putative offense

The actor may have known the actual circumstances but wrongfully considered the act to be punishable. He believes, for example, that it is criminal to marry or have sexual relations with his brother's daughter (see Penal Code, §§ 220 and 207). Punishment for attempt cannot be applied here. It can be said that he has exhibited an intention to break the law. But he has not committed an act which any penal provision forbids, nor has he attempted to do so. Thus, there is no authority for the imposition of punishment. Here one often speaks about a putative or imaginary offense. The expression putative offense is sometimes given the same significance as impossible attempt.[2]

VII. Intention is required for punishment for attempt

One might well imagine punishment being imposed for attempt to commit negligent offenses. For example, a man undertakes blasting operations on his property without taking reasonable precautions to prevent damage to the life or property of his neighbor. Whether the blasting is prevented by the intervention of a third party or occurs without causing damage, we could imagine the imposition of punishment for attempt to commit negligent homicide and negligent destruction of property. It is clear, however, from the definition of attempt (an act purposely directed at completion of the offense) that this is not the position of the law. Where the law wishes to impose punishment for negligence without regard to whether the harmful result occurs, it does not punish the act as an attempt to negligently cause the harm, but it directs itself either against the negligent behavior itself (see for example, Penal Code, § 361), or against the creation of a danger (see, for example, Penal Code, §§ 351 and 352).

Purpose is not required

The expression "purposively directed" might suggest that ordinary intent is not enough and that purpose is required before punishable attempt can exist.

---

[1] See, Entscheidungen des Reichsgerichts in Strafsachen, p. 321, Vol. 33.
[2] See Hurwitz, op. cit., p. 466.

This, however, has not been considered the object of the law. It is settled practice that nothing more than ordinary intention is required (Rt. 1934, p. 1096). Attempt and completed felony are thus identical on the subjective side; the difference lies on the objective side.

VIII. The punishment for attempt

1. The general rules of Penal Code, § 51

Attempt is punished less severely than the completed offense (Penal Code, § 51). It is not merely a discretion which is given to the court; it is a mandatory provision. That means first of all that the maximum punishment which the penal provision sets out for the offense cannot be imposed for an attempt. This has no great practical significance, for very seldom is there any question of passing the maximum sentence, with the possible exception of homicide (Penal Code, § 233). But the provision which prescribes a milder treatment of attempt must also be regarded as a directive as to the choice of punishment. Even though pure coincidence prevented the offense from being completed, the punishment imposed should be milder than that which the judge would have found suitable if the harmful result had occurred.

Penal Code, § 51, para. 2, also opens the possibility for reducing the punishment below the usual minimum and to a milder form. This means that even for the most serious offenses punishment for attempt can be reduced to a small fine. Reduction below the minimum can be of great significance if the penal provision has a high minimum penalty, as in homicide, for example.[1] In certain instances, where special considerations come into operation, the law provides that the act is non-punishable if no serious consequences have followed (see Penal Code, § 236, on cooperation in suicide, or that the punishment may be remitted (see Penal Code, § 234, on infant killing).

Penal Code, § 51, para. 2, provides a special rule in the event that the attempt leads to unexpected consequences which are as serious as those which the act set out to create. For example, a person plans to kill his neighbor by an explosion, but by a coincidence it is the neighbor's little daughter who is killed. The maximum punishment for intentional homicide can be imposed here. The possibility of a reduction of the punishment, however, also exists.

Some penal provisions expressly provide that attempt is to be punished in the same manner as the completed offense (see, for example, Penal Code, § 100, para. 2). This is actually the same result as where the offense is described as being completed by an attempt (see, for example, Penal Code, §§ 83 and 105). In other cases it is held that the attempt may be punished in the same way as a completed offense (Penal Code, § 148). Here the court can go all the way up to the maximum, but it also has access to an unlimited reduction of the punishment.

2. Discussion of the rule in Penal Code, § 51

The rule prescribing milder punishment for attempts has been strongly criticized. It is argued that the criminal mind is often exactly the same for the attempt as it is for the completed crime. The fact that the offense has not been completed or that it has failed can of course be an indication that the offender did not have the firm criminal mind or the thoughtfulness and foresight possessed by the really dangerous criminal. But it is no more than an indication. "A plan most cleverly prepared and executed with the greatest possible coldbloodedness foresight and ruthlessness, may fall because of quite unforeseeable and unexpected obstacles, and conversely, a crime most loosely planned and awkwardly and hesitantly accomplished may often achieve its goal."[2] It must therefore, so the argument runs, be sufficient that the law provides a possibility to punish attempt milder than the usual offense. This is the rule in § 21 of the Danish Penal Code of 1930 as well as in Swedish and German law. According to this view, our law is considered a throwback to the primitive concept of revenge, which does not look at the criminal mind but rather at the result of the act.

[1] The general minimum punishment according to Penal Code, § 233, is imprisonment for six years, but the punishment is often substantially less for attempted homicide. See, for example, Norsk Ex Rt. 1931, p. 814 (two years and six months); 1949, p. 371 (three years); 1951, p. 1166 (one year as suspended sentence). The difference between attempt and the completed offense is of less importance in other offenses such as larceny. See V. Eyben, Straffundmaling, p. 77 and pp. 230–231 (Copenhagen, 1950).

[2] See Torp, Den danske Straffercts almindelige Del, p. 547 (Copenhagen, 1905).

It is probably true that the rule prescribing a milder punishment for an attempt is connected historically and psychologically to emotional reactions which even legislatures and judges share (see above, p. 64). But it does not follow that abolition of the rule would be rational. The criticism which has been advanced is unanswerable if we rely upon a principle of moral retribution or on a purely individual preventive viewpoint. But this is not so if we take the general preventive effect of punishment as a starting point. A person who is thinking about committing an offense such as theft or murder is as a rule interested in the result of the act. If he considers the question of punishment at all, it is therefore punishment for the completed offense which he takes into account. Should he know that the punishment is milder where the attempt fails, this will generally have no effect on his contemplations.[1] And it is usually the completed offense which causes the greatest concern among the general public, and the strongest demands for punishment. It is less noticed, and more easily accepted if noticed, that the law deals leniently with the offender when no harm has been caused than when his act has had fateful results. For these reasons it is less dangerous to treat the attempt leniently than the completed offense. It may be mentioned in this connection that the courts, in determining the amount of punishment, take the harmful results of the act into account even where those results have no significance for the legal subsumption. Moreover, the rule that negligent offenses are punished only when completed demonstrates that our law attaches importance to the consequences of an act even though they do not correspond to any difference in the guilt of the actor.

3. Attempted misdemeanor is not punishable

Similar considerations may be advanced in favor of the provision in Penal Code, § 49, para. 2, which states that attempted misdemeanors are not punishable. This applies to offenses which are not of a substantial character. When they have not even come to completion, they can be allowed to go unpunished according to the old maxim de minimis non curat lex.

Attempted misdemeanors are often made punishable in statutes outside the Penal Code, and sometimes are given the same punishment as the completed offense (see, for example, Liquor Act § 43). This most often applies to penal provisions which have a higher maximum than that which the Penal Code provides for misdemeanors (Penal Code, § 2). Thus, the strange thing is actually not that the attempt is punishable, but that in spite of the possible punishment, the violation is characterized as a misdemeanor (see above, pp. 6–7).

§ 35. Withdrawal from Attempt

I. Termination of criminal liability by withdrawal from attempt

According to Penal Code, § 50, punishability of an attempt disappears when the perpetrator abstains from further activities or prevents the harmful results of the act. In such cases we speak about withdrawal from attempt.

The legal justification for the rule is, first of all, that a person who has withdrawn has thereby shown that he does not have a definite criminal intention. Neither individual preventive nor general preventive considerations militate against leniency toward the repentant offender. But there is another policy reason which comes into play. The promise of impunity may give the perpetrator a positive motive to withdraw. Such effect, however, presupposes that the offender knows about the rule, and this is probably not often the case.

Penal Code, § 50, presupposes that the perpetrator has come as far as a punishable attempt. In other words he has incurred criminal liability, but this liability is wiped out by his subsequent conduct. If he has not gone beyond the preparatory stage, he has not incurred any liability at all. Example: A persuades B to accompnay him on an automobile trip, so that he can kill him. During the trip he changes his mind and gives up the plan. A is impunitive, not because of withdrawal from an attempt, but because he has committed nothing but an impunitive preparatory act.

The impunitive withdrawal, on the other hand, is impossible once the crime is completed. Where the offense is described as an attempt, there can thus be no impunity by withdrawal. As soon as the actor has gone beyond the limits of impunitive preparation, the offense in such a situation is completed (see above, § 34, II). The rule is different where the law provides that an attempt shall be punished in the same way as the completed offense (see, for example, Penal Code, § 100). Even though the law places the attempt and the completed offense on the same level as far as punishment is concerned, it still retains the principal distinction between the two, so that there may be impunity by withdrawal from the attempt.

[1] This argument is advanced by Krabbe, Betragtninger over forbrydelser og straf [Reflections on crime and punishment], pp. 117–119, 2nd ed. (Copenhagen, 1939). But as Krabbe himself points out (pp. 123–126), the reasoning does not apply to all types of offenses.

Rt. 1924, p. 1149: The accused had taken a suitcase from a railroad station in the belief that it contained liquor, but brought it back when he discovered, much to his dismay, that it contained other things. The theft was completed by the carrying away, and there was thus no question of impunity by withdrawal. See also Rt. 1913, p. 268.

Rt. 1948, p. 531: A person who was under the influence of alcohol got into his car, put the gear shift to neutral, turned on the motor and was about to drive off. He was warned by two observers, and he eventually left the car without driving. He was nevertheless deemed to have violated Motor Vehicle Act, § 17, para. 2. The Supreme Court held that he had gone further than the preparatory stages, and since the law prohibits "driving or attempted driving," the violation was complete and impunity through withdrawal was thereby precluded.

II. The conditions of impunity when the attempt is incomplete

With respect to the more detailed conditions for impunity, the law distinguishes between incomplete and completed attempts. The attempt is incomplete when the perpetrator still has something left to be done before the offense is constituted. He has, for example, opened up the cash register in order to steal, but has not yet taken the money; he has assaulted a woman in order to rape her, but has not yet achieved his goal; he has declared himself willing to confirm a false declaration on oath, but has not yet taken the oath.

To obtain impunity in such cases, the offender must "by his own free will desist from the continuation of the felonious act." A positive act is not required. But the condition for impunity is that he gives up the attempt even though he knows that he could have achieved his goal by continuing. He does not refrain by his own free will if he throws away the burglar's tools, and runs when he sees the police coming, or if he gives up when he realizes that he cannot fulfil the plan with the tools which he has at his disposal. The law does not require that the abstention is due to actual repentance. The effect will be the same if the attempt is abandoned for fear of discovery, or because the perpetrator realizes that the gain will be smaller or the difficulties greater than he had expected. A man who abandons a rape attempt when he discovers that the woman offers serious opposition will nevertheless obtain impunity if he thought he might have been able to attain his purpose despite the opposition.

The fact that the perpetrator realizes that he is discovered does not necessarily preclude impunity. The provision on discovery contained in the last sentence of the section refers only to completed attempts. It is not made very clear by the text, but the legislative history shows that this is the meaning and it is generally accepted. A discovery, however, will often preclude an actor from desisting "by his own free will." If he believes that he could complete the offense and get away without being caught, it could perhaps be said that he desists by his own free will despite the discovery. But it would be otherwise if he fears apprehension in case he completes the offense. This determination is often bound to be uncertain, because the perpetrator himself makes up his mind rapidly and impulsively, without making any well-reasoned calculations of the possibilities. If he becomes panic-stricken and flees because he believes that someone is coming, this cannot be regarded as a voluntary withdrawal.

III. Impunity for completed attempt

The attempt is completed when the perpetrator has done everything which he thought necessary on his part, though the result has not occurred anyway. This can happen when the attempt has failed (the shot missed). But it may also happen that a course of events which has been started simply has not yet ended. The insurance defrander has arranged a fire by placing a burning candle in a box filled with combustible material and has then taken a trip in order to have an alibi. It is precisely in these cases where there is a period of time between the act and the result, that an impunitive withdrawal may take place. Completed attempt is only possible when the completed offense requires a result which can be distinguished from the offensive conduct itself. With some other offenses, such as incest, perjury and document forgery, the attempt is incomplete until the offense itself is complete.

In case of completed attempt, the fact that the perpetrator abstains from further action when he realizes that the attempt is failing is, of course, not sufficient for impunity. He must positively "prevent the result which could constitute the completed felony."

It is a condition for impunity that he actually prevented the result by his act. If he does not succeed in that, punishment for a completed offense will be imposed. Thus, if the insurance defrauder who has arranged the fire repents and turns back in order to prevent the accident, but finds a smoldering burned-out area, he is liable for the completed offense. The damage may be prevented in other ways—the candle is blown out by the wind, or the plan is discovered and thwarted by a third person. The condition for impunity has not been fulfilled in these cases either, but here, of course, punishment for attempt is imposed with the possibility of unlimited reduction of punishment. The same applies, according to the words of the law, where the attempt was impossible from the outset: A puts into B's food a substance which he believes to be a highly dangerous poison, but which in reality is quite harmless; he repents and warns B before the latter has eaten the food. In this case, Penal Code, § 50, should be used analogously; A should not be put into a worse position than he would have been in if the substance had been poisonous. To a certain extent, foreign laws place a greater weight on the demonstrated good intention, regardless of the result.

It is a further condition for impunity that the perpetrator prevent the consequence "before he knows that the felonious attempt has been discovered." Impunity is precluded if the offensive act is discovered; it is not necessary, however, that the identity of the perpetrator be discovered as long as the act itself, as well as its character as a criminal offense, have been revealed. Example: A person places a case of explosives in front of the door of his enemy's house. The igniting mechanisms is fixed so that the explosion will take place as the door is opened from the inside. The neighbors see him place the case in front of the door, but believe that it is an errand boy delivering goods from the store. Before the explosion occurs, the assassin returns and removes the case. He will obtain impunity according to Penal Code, § 50.

IV. Withdrawal where several persons have participated

If more than one person were engaged in the attempt, the question whether the requirements for impunity exist will be determined individually for each participant. A and B have planned a burglary together; while they are breaking into the house, A repents and withdraws, while B continues. A will be free from punishment, but not B. The same holds true in the case of a completed attempt. A and B have jointly made arrangements to set a house on fire. A returns and prevents the fire.

A completed attempt may also consist of the instigation of an offense. In order for the instigator to be impunitive, he must prevent the offense from being completed. For one who has rendered only preliminary aid to the offensive plan of another, it will be sufficient if he neutralizes his own cooperation, even though he does not succeed in preventing the offense. He has supplied the thief with burglary tools, for example, but retrieves them before they are used.

V. For qualified attempt, only the punishment for attempt terminates

It is the punishment of the attempt which terminates by reason of the withdrawal. If the attempt is a completed breach of other penal provisions at the same time (qualified attempt), the punishability of the completed offense does not cease (see Rt. 1938, p. 26). A person who breaks in to steal but leaves without taking anything can be punished for completed breaking and entering (Penal Code, § 147). A man who abandons a rape attempt can be punished for assault (Penal Code, § 228) and the coercion (Penal Code, § 222) which he has already committed.

§ 36. Plurality of Offenses

I. "Realkonkurrens"

It often happens that the defendant is charged with more than one offense, all of which are adjudicated in the same trial. In such cases we speak of real- konkurrens. Usually, crimes of the same or at least of a related type are involved: the accusation, for example, includes rape, robbery and the unlawful sale of liquor. In the former case we speak about homogeneous, in the latter case about heterogeneous realkonkurrens. Penal Code, §§ 62–63, contain rules on the determining of punishment when a person is convicted of more than one offense. If offenses of the same or closely connected types are committed in a close relationship to one another, the question may occasionally arise as to whether there exists realkonkurrens, or idealkurrens of several offenses.

Here, we can first distinguish those cases where the law covers a continuous or compound activity, such as where it penalizes one who "by neglect, maltreatment or similar conduct, frequently or gravely violates his duties toward spouse or children" (Penal Code, § 219), or "participates in an association" (Penal Code, § 339), or "carries on an activity" (Penal Code, § 332), or "participates . . . a fight" (Penal Code, § 384). As long as the activity continues, it is but a single offense, even though punishable acts may have been accomplished many times. A fight is a fight, whether it takes only two minutes or continues for the entire night. Here we use the term collective offenses.

In practice it is customary to treat several acts as only one offense also in those cases when they are committed in immediate connection to one another. A number of degrading words spoken at the same time will be regarded as only one defamation, many blows as one assault (see Rt. 1912, p. 215), and the carrying away of many objects as one theft.

It is more doubtful whether we can go further and say that a series of punishable acts can be regarded as one continuing punishable activity, even though they are not committed in immediate connection with one another. The servant who each day steals cigars from his master (Penal Code, § 262), the cashier who each day takes money from the cash register (Penal Code, § 255), the doctor who each day writes out false prescriptions for morphine (Penal Code, § 189)—are they to be punished for one continuous offense, or for several offenses in realkonkurrens? The question has both substantive and procedural significance. Substantially, it will usually be to the accused's advantage if the punishable acts are judged as one offense, since the possible punishment is increased where more than one offense is involved (Penal Code, §§ 62–63). But in some cases it may be to his advantage if the offenses are separated, such as where an addition of the value of the stolen goods would place him under a more severe theft provision, instead of under the milder provision relating to pilfering. The question as to whether the acts of the accused are to be regarded as one continuous offense or as a number of separate offenses may also have significance for determining the date on which the period of limitations begins to run (Penal Code, § 69), and for the issue concerning the applicability of Norwegian law (Penal Code, § 12). Procedurally, the determination has significance on the drafting of the accusation (indictment) (Code of Criminal Procedure, §§ 286, 342), for example, and on the posing of questions to the jury in cases heard in the court of assize (Code of Criminal Procedure, § 343, para. 3).

The practice of considering many punishable acts as one offense was well established under the Criminal Code of 1842. Since the introduction of the new Penal Code it has often been suggested in theoretical writings that such a concurrence can no longer take place.[1] Neither in the Penal Code itself nor in the legislative history, however, is there anything to suggest that any changes on this point were intended, and practice has continued largely on its former path. It has been regarded as one continuous offense where a cafe owner has sold beer illegally over a period of time (Liquor Act, § 47; see Rt. 1940, p. 25), and where a father has had indecent relations with his under-aged daughter many times (Penal Code, §§ 196 and 207; see Rt. 1938, p. 614 and also Rt. 1929, p. 762). If there is a greater time span and a looser relationship between the individual acts, however, they may be regarded as independent offenses, see, for example, Rt. 1923, p. 609 (five unlawful sales of liquor at different times and to four different persons were regarded as independent offenses).

II. "Idealkonkurrens"

Penal Code, § 62, also mentions the case where someone commits more than one offense by the same act (idealkonkurrens). This can happen because the act is covered by more than one penal provision. One who accomplishes a fraud with the aid of a false document is punished both under Penal Code, § 270, for fraud and under Penal Code § 183, for the use of a false document. The father who rapes his fifteen-year-old daughter, infecting her with syphilis, is punished under Penal Code, § 192 (rape), Penal Code, § 196 (indecent relations with children under sixteen years of age), Penal Code, § 207 (incest) and Penal Code, § 155 (communicating a venereal disease). This is heterogeneous idealkonkurrens. But it may happen that the same provision is breached many times by one act. A man throws a bomb and kills a number of people, or he writes defamatory statements about a number of people in a newspaper article. This is homogeneous idealkonkurrens.

It is sometimes said that idealkonkurrens does not really constitute a concurrence of offenses, but a concurrence of penal provisions. The law posits, however, that every violation of the law is an independent offense. That is the terminology both in the Penal Code (§ 62), and the Code of Criminal Procedure (§ 95).

In some cases, the actual distinction between idealkonkurrens and realkonkurrens becomes very small. When I defame more than one person, it is idealkonkurrens if I include them all in a defamatory statement, and realkonkurrens if I defame first one and then the other. If I kill a number of people with a bomb or a hand grenade, it is idealkonkurrens; if I shoot them down one by one with a pistol, it is realkonkurrens; and if I kill them with a volley from a machine gun, the question as to which type exists is a matter of personal taste. If a person gives burglar's tools to another for use in two burglaries which the latter has planned, there exists realkonkurrens for the thief and idealkonkurrens for the cooperator.

With idealkonkurrens, just as with realkonkurrens, doubts occasionally arise as to whether we should speak about one offense or several offenses.

1. Homogeneous Idealkonkurrens

This applies first of all to homogeneous idealkonkurrens. In the case of personal violations such as murder, assault and defamation, it will always be assumed that there are as many offenses as there are victims. On the other hand, it will not be considered more than one offense if the same person is exposed to more than one violation, such as by a defamatory newspaper article. Violations of property rights, such as theft or destruction of objects which belong to a number of people, are not so certain to be regarded as independent offenses as are violations of personal rights. The offense is no more serious if the objects in question have several owners than if they belong to only one. From the point of view of substantive criminal law, there is thus no reason to regard this situation as one involving several offenses. Procedural reasons, on the other hand, may favor this solution. If the objects all belong to one and the same person, only one offense will be deemed to exist.

2. Heterogeneous Idealkonkurrens

Doubts occasionally arise in connection with heterogeneous idealkonkurrens as to whether all the penal provisions which are violated by the act shall apply, or only one of them.

If the provisions aim at different aspects of the punishable act, then they all apply in idealkonkurrens. Recognition is thereby given to the act's increased culpability as compared with a breach of only one of the provisions. Such is the case in the examples mentioned above (forgery of documents and fraud, rape and incest, etc.). It makes no difference that the penal provisions have a common ground. Vagrancy Act, §§ 16 and 17, both aim at the person who intentionally or negligently drinks himself into a state of intoxication. But the elements of the offenses are otherwise somewhat different: § 16 requires that the intoxication be obvious, and that the person be seen in this condition in a public place; § 17 does not require any of this, but rather that the guilty person disturbs the general peace and order or the lawful flow of traffic, or annoys or causes danger to others. If the perpetrator fulfills the requirements of both provisions, then both must be applied (Rt. 1929, p. 566).

In other cases, an act which falls under one of two penal provisions necessarily falls under the other one as well. Here, it is the law that only that provision which most fully considers all the aspects of the act is to be used. A characteristic example is the compound offense. Penal Code § 147, imposes punishment for breaking and entering, Penal Code, § 257, for theft, while Penal Code § 258, provides that in determining whether a theft amounts to grand larceny, emphasis shall be placed upon whether it was committed in connection with a breaking and entering. If the accused is convicted of grand larceny under this provision, he cannot at the same time be convicted under Penal Code, §§ 147, and 257. Other examples include violations which are similar in nature, but different in degree. A bodily injury to the person (Penal Code, § 229) is always an assault (Penal Code, § 228), but of course the provisions cannot be used simultaneously. See also Rt. 1925, p. 328.

THE DANISH CRIMINAL CODE

The Danish Criminal Code has been revised more times since the translation in 1958. However, none of the cited provisions have been changed in the substance, unless this is indicated in the text of the report.

PREFACE

The Danish Committee on Comparative Law thought it useful to have the Danish Criminal Code translated into English. Translations into French and German already exist.

The translation has been made by Miss Else Giersing, sworn interpreter and translator, and Dr. M. Grunhut, M. A. Reader in Criminology, University of Oxford, has been good enough to supervise the translation and give the Committee his valuable advice on the subject.

To enable lawyers of the English speaking countries to acquaint themselves with this modern Criminal legislation and its underlying principles in the Committee has asked Dr. Knud Waaben, professor A. I. in Criminal Law in the University of Copenhagen, to write a short introduction to the Code.

G.E.C. Gads Fond has undertaken to publish the translation; the Committee expresses its heartiest thanks.

N.V. BOEG,
Chairman of the Committee.

INTRODUCTION

I. The Danish Criminal Code of April 15, 1930 entered into force on January 1, 1933. It superseded the Criminal Code of 1866 which had long proved inadequate. Work preparatory to a reform of the Criminal Law began about 1905 with—inter alia—the setting up of a Criminal Law Commission. In 1912 the Commission published a report in the form of a first Draft Criminal Code. This draft was examined and criticised by Professor Carl Torp. His own report in the shape of a second draft code appeared in 1917. Finally a new Commission, of which Professor Torp was a member, studied both drafts and published in 1923 a third Draft Criminal Code. Between 1924 and 1930 the Ministry of Justice and Parliament examined the abundant material contained in these three drafts, in the Records of Proceedings of the Danish Association of Criminalists and in other technical publications. It can fairly be claimed, therefore, that a most thorough juridical preparation preceded the new Act of 1930 which was essentially based on the second and third draft codes.

In form, the Code is drawn up on the lines usually followed in continental Criminal Codes. It is divided into a General Part, dealing with the general principles of liability, attempts, complicity, the system of penalties and other measures, etc., and a Special Part, defining particular crimes.

The Special Part of the Criminal Code comprises only a selection of all offences punishable in Danish law. The field covered broadly corresponds with the range of offences indictable in English law. Most petty offences are dealt with by other acts—particularly by legislation passed in recent years for the regulation of commerce, road traffic, public health, customs duties, taxation and the like. The Criminal Code is primarily concerned with those types of offence which have been known for time immemorial and which are of such gravity as to make it natural to characterise them as crimes: offences against the State and the public authorities, offences against property, forgery, arson, offences of violence against the person, etc. The individual provisions of Chapters XII–XXIX will show to what extent the provisions of Danish law correspond to the felonies and misdemeanours known in English law. In practice, of course a small group predominates. Of all types of offence, those of Chapter XXVIII of the Criminal Code are of the greatest importance. This Chapter covers all offences against property which are characterized by a willful and unlawful transfer of property: a gain for the perpetrator and a corresponding loss to the victim of the offence. The description of these offences is on the whole much simplified, as compared with the Criminal Code of 1866. For example, no distinction is made between different types of theft, but ss. 285–87 gives the courts a rather great latitude in assessing the gravity of a theft.

Cases concerning violation of the Criminal Code are as a general rule tried by a court of first instance consisting of a professional judge and two lay judges. The defendant or the prosecutor may appeal to one of the two High Courts sitting with three professional judges and three lay judges. Appeal to the Supreme Court as a third instance may take place only by special permission granted by the Minister of Justice. However, the Supreme Court is bound by the fact-finding of the High Court. A more summary trial by the court of first instance, without the co-operation of lay judges, may take place where the accused has made a full confession. A small number of cases concerning grave offences (in particular homicide) are heard by a High Court sitting with a jury.

In so far as the General Part of the Code is concerned, particular mention should be made of the penalties and other measures applied to offenders. First, however, some observations seem called for on the principles of criminal liability.

The Criminal Code does not provide exhaustive rules governing the objective and mental elements in criminal liability; in essential points, however, the system in force is defined or implied. Thus, it appears from sect. 1 that the maxim "nulla poena sine lege" is laid down as a fundamental principle in Danish law. Provisions on the plea of necessity etc. are laid down in ss. 13 and 14. Sect. 15 fixes the minimum age of criminal responsibility at 15 years, and ss. 16 and 17, which are discussed in detail below, deal with the legal consequences of mental abnormality.

As it appears from sect. 19, liability to punishment is subject to the existence of a form of "subjective guilt". As in the other Scandinavian countries and in Germany, the doctrine of "mens rea" is in Danish law defined somewhat differently than in English law. It is assumed that the subjective relation to an "actus reus" will always take the form either of dolus (intention), of culpa (negligence) or of casus (accidental). In principle, an offence which cannot be described as intentional, nor due to negligence, is not punishable. The so-called absolute liability is little known in Danish law. The question whether a certain legal provision requires intention or only negligence is decided under Sect. 19 of the Criminal Code: as regards the Special Part of the Criminal Code, intention is required, unless negligence is expressly mentioned in the text (e.g., ss. 182, 226, 242); in the special legislation on the contrary negligence is punishable unless the liability is expressly confined to intentional offences.

II. A description of the system of penalties and other measures prescribed in the General Part of the Criminal Code would be incomplete without some account of the historical background of the Code itself.

At the end of the nineteenth century penalties based on deprivation of liberty were chiefly relied upon for the prevention of crime. Under the Criminal Code of 1866 these penalties were imposed in various forms, but there was little provision for measures of a reformatory character. The view that it is the deterrent effect of punishment that counts for most in putting down crime was generally accepted. The fight against crime, it was thought, would risk to be lost if society instead of marking its disapproval of the offence by imprisoning the offender were to impose some measure related to the circumstances of the individual case. The personality of the offender generally evoked little interest. With the turn of the century other views began to prevail. They were visible in the adoption by a number of countries of the "suspended sentence". The Danish Criminal Law was amended in this sense in 1905 and the amending act was historically significant in that it made provision for supervision and other care of the offender. The International Association of Criminalists, founded in 1888 by Van Hamel of Holland, Von Liszt of Germany and Prins of Belgium, became a motive force in the field of reform. Torp effectively advocated the adoption in Denmark of the Association's programme, and it was largely due to the authority of his name that in the drafting of the New Code every effort was made to include in it provisions enabling the sanction to be adjusted to the individual offender.

The Criminal Code of 1930 maintained the deprivation of liberty as the primary legal consequence; its application in practice, however, was made on more modern lines inter alia through a simplification of the types of penalty and the introduction of rules for release on parole. At the same time, consideration was given to some categories of offenders for whom special forms of treatment ought to be available: young offenders, mentally abnormal persons, persistent offenders, alcoholics, etc. The considerations underlying this development may briefly be expressed in the following way: The deterrent effect of the penalties involving deprivation of liberty is an essential factor, but its importance should not be overestimated. The fact that punishment is to some extent replaced by other measures or that the classical features of imprisonment are blotted out implies no weakening in the fight against crime. On the contrary, the offender is more likely to abstain from further criminal activities if the measure applied bears some relation to his own personality. A non-penal sanction may well serve both as a deterrent and a means of curing or helping the convicted person, or of adding stability to his character. Furthermore, the requirement that justice must prevail in the criminal field does not mean that all offenders must be treated alike, irrespective of their age, their mental state, their need for social assistance, and so on.

(a) The most important special category is that of the young offenders. Acts committed by children under 15 years of age are as mentioned not punishable (sect. 15), but measures of care may be taken on the part of the child welfare authorities. As regards the age group 15–18 years, a charge is brought in relatively few cases. The Public Prosecutor will generally withdraw such a charge, in pursuance of section 30 of the Criminal Code, provided the Authorities responsible for children's welfare exercise supervision over the offender or place him in a special institution. In this respect the Code draws upon an administrative principle of long standing, and it is highly satisfactory that progress in this century has made it possible virtually to abolish the imprisonment of offenders under the age of 18.

Young offenders, between 15 and 21 years of age at the time of their offence, may be committed to a training establishment called youth prison (sect. 41). Here provisions for the Criminal Code have been influenced by the English Borstal system. An effort has been made to adopt the basic characteristics which in England account for the peculiar status of the Borstal system as the alternative to an ordinary prison. The chief and original institution is housed in a former country house called "Sobysogaard". It has excellent facilities for the general educational and vocational training. A second youth prison was established in 1954. There is no institution for girls. In practice, offenders under the age of 17 are rarely sent to a youth prison. The sentence is indeterminate, the term being between one and three years; in the case of recommitment because of non-observance of the conditions for release on licence, the term may be extended to a total of four years (sect. 42).

(b) Sections 16 and 17 of the Criminal Code deal with the important subject of the criminal responsibility of mentally abnormal persons. The system applied has in practice proved fully adequate. It permits the courts, to a wider extent than do the Criminal Codes of most other countries, to make an order for special treatment in lieu of punishment. In addition the provisions of the Code have stimulated close co-operation between the legal profession and the psychiatrists and largely averted that conflict between "legal" and "medical" views which arises so easily in this particular sphere.

The principal rule is found in sect. 16, dealing with the most pronounced states of mental abnormality, in particular insanity and pronounced mental deficiency. It is primarily for the psychiatrist to say whether at the time the offence was committed the condition of the accused was of that nature. It has not been desired, however, that the courts should be bound to exempt the offender from punishment where according to the medical report it is a case, say, of insanity. Under section 16, impunity also depends upon the answer to the question whether the defendent has been "irresponsible" which is a question for lawyers rather than doctors. The term "irresponsible" has not been intended to indicate a clearly defined requirement to the abnormal personality, and the Criminal Code imposes no rigid theoretical construction on the controversial concept of "irresponsibility". The term is used in order to emphasize that the final decision rests with the Court. If the evidence as to "insanity" so warrants, the Court may deem the accused to be "responsible" and punish him. This has been done in practice in some cases, in particular where persons who have committed financial frauds have been insane (e.g., suffering from a psychotic depression), but not so affected by the mental disease as to have been unable to carry on their business and in this connection make financial dispositions. In the vast majority of cases, however, the courts hold the accused to be irresponsible, if the psychiatrists have diagnosed a mental disorder which medically amounts to insanity. Persons who are pronounced mentally deficient are always deemed to be irresponsible.

In connection with insanity, sect. 16 also mentions "similar conditions". This addition means that the possibility of exempting an condition is one of "defective development, or impairment or disorders which in medical language are termed psychoses. Certain conditions falling outside this concept, but which have had a quite similar influence on the judgment and power to act of the person concerned, may justify exemption from criminal responsibility. In practice, however, this is of rare occurrence.

An important supplement to sect. 16 is given by the provision of sect. 17 (1). The section refers to persons whose more permanent condition is one of "defective development, or impairment or disturbance of their mental faculties". While sect. 16 is applicable also to abnormal conditions of short duration, provided they were present at the time the offence was committed, sect. 17 requires that the conditions shall be of some duration. Among the conditions covered by sect. 17 (but not by sect. 16) the most important are ordinary mental deficiency and psychopathy. Here, too, it is for the psychiatrists to find out if such a condition exists. The court has, however, to decide whether the accused may be considered "susceptible of influence through punishment". The question as to whether the mental abnormality shall justify exemption from punishment is thus decided by the court. According to court practice, account may be taken not only of the influence a punishment may have on the offender, but importance may be attributed also to other circumstances. If a psychopath has committed wilful homicide, a heavy prison sentence will often be preferred for reasons of general prevention. If, conversely, a psychopath has committed a trifling offence, he will be sentenced to a short term of imprisonment because, in such cases, it is considered undesirable to submit the offender to the indeterminate sentence of detention in an institution for psychopaths. On the whole, however, the courts have made extensive use of sect. 17 and thus avoided the application of penalties which would be inappropriate to psychically abnormal persons. In addition to ordinary mental defectives and psychopaths, persons suffering from severe neuroses or from a state of deficiency owing to abuse of alcohol or narcotics may be exempted from punishment under sect. 17, and instead required to undergo some form of treatment likely to meet the purpose.

The measures to be applied to persons covered by sect. 16 or sect. 17 are indicated in sect. 70. In the choice of measures the regard to public safety shall be of primary importance. As a rule the nature of the abnormal condition will justify placement in an institution. However, the court may confine itself to, say, appointing a supervising guardian, or order psychiatric treatment in freedom; and, where an insanity has been completely cured, the court may take no measure. All in all, then, sect. 70 largely permits the courts to adapt the legal effect to the nature of the individual case. The measures dealt with in sect. 70 are indeterminate. Any alteration or cancellation of the measures is decided by the court.

The treatment and detention of insane and mentally deficient offenders fall to the ordinary hospital and public welfare services. In the case of criminal psychopaths, on the other hand, a special form of treatment and detention has been provided in Denmark, in the institution at Herstedvester (near Copenhagen), or in a second institution in Jutland. It is difficult in a few words to characterise the form of treatment that is applied here. The treatment takes account of the psychopathic type of the individual offender, and has largely been in the nature of experiment. Efforts are made to combine general psychiatric therapy and special forms of medical treatment with worktraining, instruction and social care. The end in view is a maturation and stabilisation of the psychopathic personality. An essential feature of this particular treatment is the application of release on parole, so as to maintain the contact between the offender and the officers of the institution.

(c) Against persistent criminals two forms of indeterminate detention may be applied: workhouse (sect. 62) and preventive detention (sect. 65). These measures are not penalties in the technical sense of the term, but are alternatives to punishment. They are chiefly intended for persons on whom previous sentences of imprisonment for a definite term have had no corrective effect and who are therefore supposed to be in need of penitentiary treatment through a long period of time. In addition to this consideration, the regard to public safety clearly stands out, especially in the case of preventive detention.

Workhouse is applied to, amongst others, a group of persons who are not particularly dangerous, but who have shown a constant inclination to lead an anti-social life marked by criminality (more particularly acquisitive offences) and in many cases also by habitual drunkenness. The period of detention is not less than one nor more than five years. Most inmates enjoy a fair measure of liberty and occupy their time in workshops or in farming.

Preventive detention is imposed in relatively few cases, on an average one or two a year. According to court practice it is required that the criminal tendencies of the accused should have been clearly ascertained through a number of previous sentences of imprisonment. A considerable number of those detained have pronounced psychopathic symptoms. The minimum period of detention is four years; no maximum is laid down. In practice, the average term of detention has been some seven years.

(d) One of the special groups of offenders who should preferably be submitted to treatment is that of the alcoholics. Under sect. 73 of the Criminal Code certain groups of drink addicts may be required to enter an inebriates' home for treatment. A more lenient measure is an order made under section 72 (1) requiring the offender not to drink or buy intoxicating liquor. If he disobeys this order he is liable to be dealt with in accordance with the provisions of section 138 (2) of the Code. A good many inebriates are detained in workhouse. None of these measures has proved fully satisfactory against offenders addicted to drink. During the last ten years, however, the treatment of the alcoholics seems to have been brought into more fruitful paths. It is now recognized that penal policy in this particular field has to some extent been based on a superficial view of the causes of alcoholism and of the prospects of curing it. Habitual drunkenness and the criminality attaching to it should be viewed as part of the social and personal situation of the individual, and the means of treatment should be adapted accordingly. It rarely serves any purpose to institute measures directed against intemperance as an isolated phenomenon. The treatment should consist of a medical, psychological and social therapy. Attempts of this nature have been made in recent years, and the so-called "antabuse" treatment has attracted particular attention. Antabuse is a medicine invented by Danish scientists; it is taken in the form of pills which cause sickness if the patient subsequently tastes an intoxicant. The essential thing, however, is not cure in the traditional sense through the taking of the daily pill. The medicine should rather be considered as an aid to a psychological and social cure. The new forms of treatment are applied in freedom or in connection with commitment to prison or other institutions. It has been possible to fit them into the existing system of sanctions, inter alia as a condition for suspended sentence, release on parole, and conditional pardon.

(e) Mention has been made above of a number of measures against special groups of offenders. No measure has, however, contributed so much to reduce imprisonment as the suspended sentence, which has not been applied in Denmark for fifty years. About a third of all cases of violations of the Criminal Code result in a suspended sentence. The conditional suspension of punishment is applied in the form that is usual in continental countries: as a suspension of the execution of penalty. In including the imposition of a penalty, this form differs from the suspension of sentence that came into existence in Great Britain and the United States in the course of the 19th century, the most highly developed form of which is now the British probation system. Danish law, however, is not unfamiliar with the ideas underlying probation. Under sect 56 of the Criminal Code the suspended sentence may be subject to various conditions, e.g. supervision. Besides, it will be seen from sect. 56 (2) that importance is attached to pre-sentence social investigations, in order to ensure a careful selection for the suspension of the sentence. Both supervision and pre-sentence investigation are usually carried out by the Danish Welfare Society, a private organization which receives State subsidies. The welfare work is in rapid progress, the staff of full-time social workers being extended and greater importance given to their professional training.

(f) So far, no mention has been made of the types of penalty. There are three ordinary penalties: the fine and the two penalties involving deprivation of liberty, viz. simple detention and imprisonment, the latter being the normal penalty in the case of acquisition offences, sexual offences, arson, forgery, and a great number of other offences under the Criminal Code.[1] Simple detention is considered a milder form of the penalty involving deprivation of liberty. It is applied to some less grave violations of the Criminal Code (inter alia, certain offences of violence) and also in infringements of special Acts (e.g., motoring in intoxicated condition). The fixed legal minimum duration of simple detention is seven days and, in practice, its duration rarely exceeds two months.

The minimum duration of the penalty of imprisonment is 30 days. Sentences for a term of under four months are generally served in the local prison (like sentences of simple detention), long-term sentences in the so-called State prisons. Since the Second World War, the Prison Administration has made great efforts to improve the State prisons and the whole treatment of prisoners. A number of open and semi-open institutions have been established with only little prisonlike atmosphere, with a rather high degree of freedom in the daily life of the prisoners, and an extensive community in instruction, employment and recreation. A large proportion of the sentences of imprisonment of more than four months are served in the open and semi-open institutions, and regard is given to an adequate classification of the offenders by age, previous convictions, etc. At the same time, it has been possible to restrict the use of the old cell prisons from the 19th century. This whole development implies a trend away from the mere deprivation liberty under a strict and schematic administrative system towards an individualising treatment of prisoners with the emphasis on instruction and vocational training, psychiatric and psychological treatment and, in particular, social care in connection with release on parole. Of course, the reforms are closely related to or directly inspired by the prison progress of other countries.

[1] The death penalty is provided only in respect of a few grave crimes (more particularly treason and murder) committed in time of war or occupation for the advancement of enemy interest and in other aggravating circumstances. These provisions are not included in the Criminal Code, but are found in a special Act of 1952.

III. The Criminal Code is now over 25 years old. This is no great age for a Criminal Code: but these years have been so rich in experience and ideas of penal policy that it is legitimate to ask whether the Code still affords an adequate basis for the practical work. In all essentials, this question can be answered in the affirmative. There is no need today for any entirely new Criminal Code, but the last decade has called for amendments to particular provisions.

The need of reforms has been least in the Special Part of the Code. Only in one field has any major revision been necessary, and this is a field lying outside that of ordinary crime, viz. Chapters XII and XIII of the Criminal Code on offences against the State and the Supreme Authorities of the State. These Chapters have been amended by an Act of June 7, 1952. No radical amendments are likely to be made in any near future to the legal provisions relating to the more ordinary types of offence.

It is primarily the system of penal reaction that has held the interest of Danish criminalists in postwar years. An essential feature of the reform efforts in this field is that they have largely been inspired by collaboration between the Scandinavian countries. Sweden had already before 1939 commenced a gradual revision of its penal legislation. Denmark and Norway followed a similar course when, after 1945, it became possible to think of reforms in these countries. Problems of common interest have been discussed by the meetings, and congresses of the associations of Scandinavian criminalists, and by conferences which since 1948 have been held at regular intervals at the instance of the Scandinavian Ministers of Justice.

In 1950, a permanent Criminal Law Commission was charged with considering and making recommendations on a partial reform of the Criminal Code. The President of the Commission is Professor Stephan Hurwitz. Among the tasks that have been entrusted to the Commission are two which should be singled out for special mention.

In 1950 the Commission submitted a Report on the forfeiture of civil rights in consequence of punishment. On the basis of this Report an Act was passed in 1951 amending, inter alia, the text of ss. 78 and 79 of the Criminal Code. Formerly, convicted persons were largely precluded from exercising the rights otherwise belonging to citizens. They might often result in a penalty of imprisonment being, in point of fact, followed by a long-term additional punishment consisting in loss of franchise, of the right to trading licenses, game licenses, etc. The essence of the new Act is that, normally, punishment shall not entail such social disqualification. As will be seen from ss. 78 and 79 of the Criminal Code, this principle has been somewhat modified: on the whole, however, convicted persons are given a more unfavourable position than non-convicted persons only where this may be justified from rational considerations of penal policy.

Furthermore, in 1953, the Criminal Law Commission submitted a Report on suspended sentences. The proposals made by the Commission have not yet resulted in any amendment to the legal provisions. If the general lines of the proposals are followed, the provisions of Chapter VII of the Criminal Code will be somewhat changed: the end in view will be a further development of the application of supervision and similar requirements, and the ultimate result may well be a system very much like the English system of probation.

The trend of penal legislation depends on a variety of factors. In most countries a contrast between two tendencies in penal policy is obvious. Many criminalists are strongly in favour of a more extensive use of social, educational and medical treatment of offenders. Others are more inclined to stress the deterrent effect of punishment, advising caution in the application of measures likely to reduce the severity of the penal reaction. The opinion of the general public is usually strongly in favour of the latter thesis and suspicious of reforms that seem to err in the direction of leniency. In Denmark, too, there may be different opinions as to the measures to be applied: on the whole, however, there has been no difficulty in following a line of policy which increases the possibilities of individual treatment and resocialization, while it avoids sudden departures from the traditional course.

Fortunately, the general trend of crime since 1945 has not placed major obstacles in the way of legislative and administrative progress. The crime rate rose sharply during the war, but since the end of the war the number of offences in proportion to the population has on the whole been declining. Whatever will be the future conditions of penal policy, its further development will follow the trend indicated by the Criminal Code of 1930. New experience will be gained and proposals of reform will be critically examined, inter alia with a view to finding out whether the necessary financial, personal and institutional resources can be provided. International co-operation may also greatly contribute to this development. Our present system includes elements which are clearly the result of national experience, but also elements which are quite as obviously taken from a foreign pattern. In the Danish Criminal Code hereby presented in English translation you will meet with no codification of epoch-making or sensational theories for the prevention of crime and treatment of offenders; this will probably be evident already from these introductory remarks. On the other hand, you may find that the Code contributes to the international literature in this field by showing a system based on the efforts to create a happy combination of tradition, national experiments, and foreign patterns.

CHAPTER I

INTRODUCTORY PROVISIONS

1. Only acts punishable under a statute or acts of entirely similar nature shall be punished. The same rule shall apply to the legal effects referred to in Chapters VIII and IX.

2. Unless otherwise provided, Chapters I to XI of this Act shall apply to all punishable offences.

CHAPTER II

CONDITIONS UNDER WHICH THE CRIMINAL LAW IS GENERALLY APPLIED

3. (1) Where the penal legislation in force at the time of the criminal proceedings in respect of any act differs from that in force at the time of commission of that act, any questions concerning the punishable nature of the act and the penalty to be inflicted shall be decided under the more recent Act: provided that the sentence may not be more severe than under the earlier Act. If the repeal of the Act is due to external conditions irrelevant to the guilt, the act shall be dealt with under the earlier Act.

(2) If in circumstances other than those provided for in the last sentence of subsection (1) an act ceases to be lawfully punishable, any penalty awarded, but not yet served for such act shall be remitted. The convicted person may demand that the question concerning the remission of the penalty be brought, at the instance of the Public Prosecutor, before the court which passed sentence in the first instance. The decision shall be made by court order.

4. (1) The question whether the punishable act shall have legal effects of the nature referred to in sections 30, 56 to 61, 70 to 77, or 79 of this Act shall be decided under the law in force at the time of the criminal proceedings.

(2) Unless otherwise provided, other legal consequences shall take effect only if provided for by the law in force at the time the act is committed.

(3) The provision of sect. 3, subsect. (2), of this Act shall likewise apply to legal effects other than punishment, provided such effects directly arise from the punishable nature of the act.

5. Where an aggravation of the penalty or other legal effects have been prescribed in the case of recidivism, decisions made under previous law shall be taken into account as if they had been made in conformity with the law under which the immediate act is to be dealt with.

6. (1) Under Danish criminal jurisdiction shall come acts committed (i) within the territory of the Danish State; or (ii) on board a Danish ship or plane being outside the territory recognised by international law as belonging to any State; or (iii) on board a Danish ship or plane being within the territory recognised by international law as belonging to a foreign State, if committed by persons employed on the ship or plane or by passengers travelling on the ship or plane.

(2) The Minister of Justice shall decide to what extent acts committed on board a foreign ship or plane within Danish territory by and against any person employed on it or travelling on it as a passenger shall be brought before the courts.

7. Under Danish criminal jurisdiction shall also come acts committed outside the territory of the Danish State by a Danish national or by a person residing in that territory (i) where the act was committed outside the territory recognized by international law as belonging to any State; provided acts of such nature are subject to a penalty more severe than simple detention; (ii) where the act was committed within the territory of a foreign State, provided it is punishable also under the law in force in that territory.

8. (1) Under Danish criminal jurisdiction shall also come acts committed outside the territory of the Danish State, irrespective of the nationality of the perpetrator (i) where the act violates the independence, safety, Constitution or public authorities of the Danish State, the duties of an official to the State or such interests the legal protection of which depends on a personal connection with the Danish State; or (ii) where the act violates an obligation which the perpetrator is required by law to observe abroad or prejudices the performance of an official duty incumbent on him regarding a Danish ship or plane; or (iii) where an act committed outside the territory recognised by international law as belonging to any State violates a Danish national or a person residing within the territory of the Danish State, provided acts of such nature are subject to a penalty more severe than simple detention.

(2) In the circumstances referred to under paragraph (iii) of subsect. (1) of this section, the Chief Public Prosecutor shall decide whether or not an action shall be brought.

9. Where the punishable nature of an act depends on or is influenced by an actual or intended consequence, the act shall also be deemed to have been committed where the consequence has taken effect or has been intended to take effect.

10. (1) Where prosecution takes place in this country under the foregoing provisions, the decision concerning the penalty or other legal effects of the act shall be made under Danish law.

(2) Provided that, in the circumstances referred to in sect. 7 of this Act, the penalty to be inflicted in respect of an act committed within the territory recognised by international law as belonging to a foreign State shall not be more severe than that provided for by the law in force in that territory.

(3) In the cases referred to in sect. 7 of this Act, no prosecution may be proceeded within this country if the perpetrator has been finally acquitted in the State where the act was committed or if he has served the penalty inflicted or if the penalty has been remitted under the law of that State.

(4) If, otherwise, any person who is to be sentenced for an act in this country has already served his sentence elsewhere, this shall be taken into account by the court in such manner as to reduce the penalty commensurately or to remit it, as the case may be.

11. If a Danish national or a person residing in the Danish State has been punished in a foreign State for an act which under Danish law may entail loss or forfeiture of an office or profession or of any other right, such effect may take place in the course of a public action brought by the order of the Chief Public Prosecutor.

12. The application of the provisions of sections 6 to 8 of this Act shall be subject to the exceptions recognized by international law.

Chapter III

Conditions regarding liability to punishment

13. (1) Acts committed in self-defence are not punishable if they were necessary to resist or avert an imminent or incipient unlawful attack, provided that such acts do not manifestly exceed what is reasonable, having regard to the danger inherent in the attack, the person of the aggressor, or the social importance of the interests endangered by the attack.

(2) Provided that any person who exceeds the limit of lawful self-defence shall not be liable to punishment if his act could in fairness be excused by the fear or excitement brought about by the attack.

(3) Similar rules shall apply to acts necessary to enforce lawful orders in a rightful manner, to carry out a lawful apprehension, or to prevent the escape of a prisoner or a person committed to an institution.

14. An act normally punishable shall not be punished if it was necessary in order to avert impending damage to a person or property and if the offence can only be regarded as of relatively minor importance.

15. Acts committed by children under 15 years of age are not punishable.

16. Acts committed by persons being irresponsible owing to insanity or similar conditions or pronounced mental deficiency are not punishable.

17. (1) If, at the time of committing the punishable act, the more permanent condition of the perpetrator involved defective development, or impairment or disturbance of his mental faculties, including sexual abnormality, of a nature other than that indicated in sect. 16 of this Act, the court shall decide, on the basis of a medical report and all other available evidence, whether he may decide that a penalty invloving the deprivation of liberty inflicted on him

(2) If the court is satisfied that the accused is susceptible to punishment, it may decide that a penalty involving the deprivation of liberty inflicted on him shall be served in an institution or division of an institution intended for such persons. If appropriate, the Prison Commission may alter the decision as to where the penalty of imprisonment shall be served. If, during the term of imprisonment, it becomes evident that a continuation of such imprisonment will be useless or will be likely seriously to aggravate the condition of the convicted, then, at the request of the Director of the Prison Service, the case shall again be brought before the court which passed sentence in the last instance. This court shall decide, on the basis of a medical report, whether the penalty shall continue to be served or not.

(3) If a person in respect of whom preventive measures are taken under sect. 70 of this Act (cf. subsect. (1) of this section) for an offence committed by him has committed another offence, and if he is considered susceptible to punishment for offences of that nature, then, where the latter offence is of minor importance in relation to the offence in respect of which preventive measures are applied, the court may decide that no penalty shall be imposed.

18. Intoxication shall not preclude punishment being awarded, except where the perpetrator has acted while in an unconscious condition.

19. As regards the offences dealt with by this Act, acts which have been committed through negligence on the part of the perpetrator, shall not be punished, except where expressly provided. As regards other offences, the appropriate penal sanction shall apply, even where the offence has been committed through negligence, unless otherwise provided.

20. Where the statutory penalty, or aggravation of a penalty, refers to an intentional offence resulting in an unintentional effect, then that penalty shall take effect only where such consequence may be attributed to the negligence of the perpetrator or if he has failed to avert it to the best of his ability, after becoming aware of the danger.

Chapter IV

Attempt and complicity

21. (1) Acts aiming at promoting or carrying out an offence shall be punished as attempts, when the offence is not accomplished.

(2) The penalty prescribed for the offence may be mitigated in the case of attempts, particularly where the attempt gives evidence of little strength or persistence in the criminal intention.

(3) Unless otherwise provided, attempts shall be punished only where the offence is subject to a penalty more severe than simple detention.

22. Attempts shall not be punished if, spontaneously and not because of extraneous or independent obstacles against either completing the wrongful action or achieving his intention, the perpetrator desists from carrying further his intended act, or prevents its accomplishment or acts in such manner that his intervention would have prevented its accomplishment, even if, without his knowledge, the act had not failed in its purpose or otherwise been averted.

23. (1) The penalty in respect of an offence shall apply to any person who has contributed to the execution of the wrongful action by instigation, advice or action. The penalty may be mitigated in respect of a person who has intended to give assistance of minor importance only or to strengthen an intention already existing and, again, if the offence has not been accomplished or if an intended assistance has failed.

(2) Similarly, the penalty may be mitigated in respect of a person who has contributed to the breach of a duty in a special relationship in which he himself has no part.

(3) Unless otherwise provided, the penalty for participation in offences that are not subject to a penalty more severe than simple detention shall not take effect if the accomplice had intended to give an assistance of minor importance only or to strengthen an intention already existing or, again, if his own complicity is due to negligence.

24. The accomplice shall not be punished if, under the conditions laid down in sect. 22 of this Act, he prevents the accomplishment of the punishable act or acts in such manner as would have prevented its accomplishment, even if, without his knowledge, the act had not failed in its purpose or otherwise been averted.

Chapter V

Prosecution

25. Unless otherwise provided, punishable acts shall be subject to public prosecution.

26. (1) Private prosecution or requests for public prosecution may be initiated by the injured party. If the latter is a minor, the provisions of sect. 257 of the Administration of Justice Act shall apply.

(2) If the injured party has died or if an act directed against a deceased is punishable, the right to initiate private prosecution or to request public prosecution shall lie with the spouse, the parents, the children or the brothers or sisters of the deceased.

27. A request for public prosecution that excludes any accomplice from prosecution shall be refused, unless the public prosecutor approves of such exclusion. If the request concerns only some of the accused or suspected persons without the exclusion of accomplices, if any, the public prosecutor may extend the prosecution to the latter, unless the interested party, on enquiry, opposes it.

28. If the person on whose request public prosecution has been taken withdraws his request, prior to the pronouncement of sentence or the jury's verdict, the prosecution shall be discontinued, unless the public prosecutor is satisfied that general considerations call for its continuation.

29. (1) The right to initiate private prosecution or to request public prosecution shall be forfeited if the prosecution has not been initiated or the request not submitted before the expiration of three months as from the date on which the interested party received information as to who is the suspected perpetrator. If there are more than one guilty person, the time limit shall be reckoned separately for each. If the time allowed for requesting public prosecution has been exceeded in respect of one of the accused or suspected persons, but not in respect of the others, it shall be for the public prosecutor to decide whether a request for prosecution against those persons shall be accepted. Further, the right to initiate private prosecution or to request public prosecution shall be forfeited at the expiration of three months after the death of the injured party.

(2) If a private prosecution does not result in a final judgment, the time limit shall continue to run, account not being taken of the time during which the proceedings have been carried on.

30. (1) In respect of offences committed by persons between fifteen and eighteen years of age, the public prosecutor may decide that proceedings shall be stayed on condition that the accused person be placed under the care of the child welfare authorities or, in exceptional cases, be entrusted, for a specified period that may continue until such person attains the 21st anniversary of his birthday, to the care of a trustworthy person or institution. Before the public prosecutor decides on the conditions under which the prosecution shall be stayed, a report shall normally be obtained from the child welfare authorities concerned.

(2) The prosecution may be resumed if, while under the supervision referred to above, the person concerned commits another offence or a serious contravention of the regulations to be observed by him.

Chapter VI

Penalties

31. The ordinary penalties shall be imprisonment, simple detention, or fine.

32. Where a penalty involving the deprivation of liberty is of shorter duration than three months, it shall be fixed in days; otherwise in months or years.

33. The penalty of imprisonment shall be inflicted for life or for a specified period covering not less than 30 days, nor more than 16 years.

34. (1) The extent to which the penalty of imprisonment shall be served in solitary confinement or in association shall be laid down by Royal Order: provided that short terms of imprisonment shall normally be served in solitary confinement and long terms of imprisonment in association.

(2) Even where the penalty shall be served in association, the prisoner may be kept in solitary confinement during the first and the last period of his term of imprisonment.

(3) If the penalty shall be served in solitary confinement, the prisoner shall be kept in isolation day and night: provided that, where divine service, classes, lectures, physical exercise and walking exercise in the courtyard are concerned, such exceptions may be made to the isolation as may be warranted by the prisoner's age or condition of health or by other circumstances. Further exceptions may be granted for certain prisoners if special circumstances make this necessary.

(4) Even where the penalty shall be served in association, the prisoner shall be isolated during the night, apart from periods spent outside the grounds of the penal institution, provided his condition of health permits it, and he may be kept isolated during divine service, classes, preparation for lessons and walking exercise in the courtyard as well as during leisure-time and meals.

35. (1) Prisoners shall be required to carry out work imposed on them under the Royal Order issued for this purpose, which Order shall also contain detailed rules governing the earnings of prisoners. Such earnings may be diverted to compensate for any damage or expenses for which the prisoner becomes responsible during his term of imprisonment.

(2) Open-air work outside the grounds of the penal institution may take place under the direction and supervision of the institution.

36. The diet of prisoners shall be in accordance with regulations drawn up by the Minister of Justice. Prisoners shall not be allowed to procure or receive for their diet or for other purposes anything other than that which is permitted by Orders or Regulations.

37. (1) Prisoners whose state of health is impaired by drunkenness may, if owing to their condition the penalty cannot be considered to have the intended effect on them, be transferred by the Prison Commission, on the recommendation of the governing body of the penal institution, to a workhouse, either temporarily or for the remaining term of their penalty (cf. sect. 64 of this Act).

(2) Prisoners whose term of imprisonment amounts to eight years or more may, after the expiration of a period equal to one-half of their term, and provided that this period may not be less than five years, be transferred by the Prison Commission, on the recommendation of the governing body of the institution, to a preventive detention centre (cf. sect. 67 of this Act) for the remaining term of their penalty. As far as life prisoners are concerned, such transfer may take place after the expiration of 16 years.

38. (1) After the expiration of two-thirds of the term of imprisonment, provided that this period may not be less than nine months, the Minister of Justice shall decide, on the recommendation of the governing body of the institution, whether the prisoner shall be released on parole.

(2) Release on parole shall be on condition that this measure is warrantable, having regard to the personal conditions of the prisoner; that appropriate work has been provided for him or that his placement and maintenance have otherwise been adequately secured; and that he declares himself willing to comply with the conditions of such release.

(3) Release on parole may, on the decision of the Minister of Justice, take place earlier than stated in subsect. (1) of this section, where according to the available evidence, including the report on the prisoner submitted by the institution, such release is considered warrantable in the individual case. Release on parole may not take place until the prisoner has served one-half of his term of imprisonment, subject to a minimum of four months.

(4) At his release on parole the person concerned shall normally be placed under supervision by an institution established for that purpose or by a person who is qualified for that task and has accepted it. In any event, such release shall be allowed on condition that the person concerned leads a regular and law-abiding life and that he follows such directions as may be given to him by his supervisor and complies with any other conditions imposed on him.

39. (1) When released on parole, the prisoner shall receive a passport reciting the conditions under which his release is valid and declaring that, if these conditions are not observed, he will be recommitted to serve the unexpired term of his sentence.

(2) The Minister of Justice shall decide whether the released person shall be recommitted to prison. If recommittal takes place, the remaining part of the penalty shall be served as a new penalty which, if after his release he has been sentenced to another penalty of the same kind, shall be added to the latter. If the latter penalty is simple detention, the authority responsible for the execution of sentence shall convert this penalty to imprisonment under the provisions of sect. 90 of this Act.

40. (1) The period of parole ends with the expiration of the remaining term of imprisonment: but in no case before the end of two years.

(2) If, at the expiration of the period of parole, no decision has been made concerning recommitment, the penalty shall be considered to have been served.

41. (1) Where a person between 15 and 21 years of age makes himself liable to imprisonment for an offence which can only be regarded as the result of criminal tendencies, idle inclinations, or association with bad companions, he shall be sentenced to commitment to youth prison, if the court is satisfied that measures of education and instruction for some length of time will meet the purpose.

(2) Such penalty shall be served in an institution or, in respect of women, in a division of an institution, established for the purpose, which either belongs to or is under the supervision of the State.

42. (1) Persons sentenced to commitment to youth prison may be detained in such prison for not more than three years, subject to the provisions of subsect. (4) of this section.

(2) At the expiration of one year after commitment, the Prison Commission shall decide, on the recommendation of the governing body of the prison, whether or not the prisoner shall be released. If the Prison Commission decides that the person concerned shall not be released the question shall be reconsidered at the expiration of the following year.

(3) When the prisoner is released, he shall continue, for a period to be fixed by the Prison Commission, to be under a supervision ordered by the Prison Commission in conformity with sect. 38, subsect. (4), of this Act, and during that period he shall be bound to observe the directions prescribed for him under the said provision.

(4) If he should fail to observe the conditions so prescribed, the Prison Commission shall decide whether or not he shall be recommitted. A person who has been recommitted may, on the decision of the Prison Commission, be detained in youth prison for a period exceeding the term of penalty provided for in subsect. (1) of this section by not more than one year.

(5) If a charge is brought against the parolee for a punishable offence, the Prison Commission shall be consulted as to whether conviction for the offence will result in recommittal. If so, the court may, with the consent of the Public Prosecutor, confine itself to decide the question of guilt.

(6) The period of supervision referred to in subsect. (3) of this section shall not exceed four years as from the date of the first commitment to youth prison: provided that, when after recommitment the prisoner is released again, the supervision may continue for one year as from the date of the later release.

(7) The provision of sect. 40, subsect. (2), of this Act shall apply in like manner to this section.

43. (1) Royal Order shall lay down the extent to which periods spent in youth prison shall be served in solitary confinement or in association.

(2) Particular importance shall be attached to the mental and physical development of the prisoner while serving his penalty, through instruction, physical exercise and the execution of open-air work, as well as to his training in an occupation which will enable him to earn his living after release.

(3) If it appears that a prisoner has a bad influence on the other prisoners or is, in general, unamenable to treatment in association with the latter, he may be transferred to a special division separated from the juvenile prison proper.

44. (1) Unless otherwise provided, the penalty of simple detention shall be imposed for not less than seven days, nor more than two years. The penalty shall be served in solitary confinement, subject to the exceptions and modifications appropriate to the prisoner's age or state of health: provided that, where under sect. 90 of this Act a penalty of simple detention is inflicted for a period exceeding two years, the Minister of Justice may decide that the penalty shall be served, in whole or in part, in association.

(2) Prisoners undergoing detention may not be accommodated with other persons except those also serving sentences of simple detention. Their diet shall not be limited to the ordinary fare in prisons. Within the limits set by the maintenance of proper order in the prison, prisoners shall be entitled to procure what they want for their personal use and for the furnishing of their cell.

(3) Prisoners shall be entitled to find work compatible with the safety and good order of the prison, the earnings from which work shall be paid to the prisoner. In case a prisoner does not find work himself, he shall be required, against remuneration, to carry out such work appropriate to his standard of education and occupation as is considered necessary to keep him reasonably employed.

45. Prisoners may not be employed at work injurious to health, and they shall be insured against the consequences of accidents. Detailed rules for the application of the latter provision, including the payment and administration of benefits may be provided by Royal Order.

46. (1) The period during which a prisoner is in hospital shall be included in the term of his penalty, except when the hospital treatment is attributable to his own conduct during the period of his penalty.

(2) The period during which a prisoner is committed to a special cell as a disciplinary measure or the period until an escaped prisoner has been recommitted shall not be included as part of the penalty itself.

47. (1) The following disciplinary punishments may, under specified rules provided by Royal Order, be applied to prisoners serving a penalty:

(i) Deprivation of privileges granted by Orders or Regulations to prisoners whose conduct is satisfactory, such as the degrading to a lower stage; or

(ii) Restriction of diet for not more than 15 days: provided that, where the prisoner is restricted to bread and water, this punishment may be applied only to persons over 18 years of age and, in respect of prisoners serving a penalty of simple detention, for not more than five days; or

(iii) Exclusion from work for not more than 14 days; or

(iv) Commitment to a special cell for not more than 60 days or, for prisoners serving a penalty of imprisonment, not more than three months.

Further, in respect of prisoners serving a penalty of simple detention:

(v) Deprivation of the privilege of providing for their own food for not more than 30 days, or, in respect of prisoners serving a penalty of imprisonment:

(vi) Deprivation of earnings.

(2) Several disciplinary punishments may be applied at the same time.

(3) The punishment indicated in paragraph (ii) of subsect. (1), of this section may be applied only where, on the basis of a medical report, it is considered to be without detriment to the physical or mental condition of the prisoner.

(4) The prolongation of the term of a penalty involved by commitment to a special cell may not, except with the consent of the Minister of Justice, exceed one-third of the term of the penalty and in no cases one-half of the term.

48. Straight-jacket, handcuffs, commitment to maximum security cell or other safety measures may, to the extent required by the circumstances, be utilised with a view to averting assault, repressing violent resistance or preventing escape. Commitment to maximum security cell for a period exceeding six months shall be ordered only with the consent of the Minister of Justice.

49. Detailed provisions relating to the execution of the sentences of imprisonment, detention in youth prison or simple detention shall be laid down by provided by Royal Order, be applied to prisoners serving a penalty:

50. (1) Fines imposed under this Act shall accrue to the Exchequer.

(2) Fines as a penalty supplementary to other forms of penalty may be imposed in the case of offences committed for the purposes of gain.

51. (1) Where under this Act a fine is imposed or accepted in court, the penalty shall be fixed in the form of day-fines. Their number shall be fixed at not less than one, nor more than 60, having regard to the nature of the offence and the circumstances referred to in sect. 80 of this Act. The amount of the single daily fine or contribution shall be fixed at a sum corresponding to the average daily earnings of the person concerned: provided that, in fixing the amount, account should be taken of the living conditions of the convicted person, including his capital resources, family responsibilities or other circumstances affecting his capacity to pay. The daily fine or contribution shall in no case be fixed at an amount lower than two kroner.

(2) Where a fine shall be imposed in respect of an offence by which the person concerned obtained or intended to obtain a considerable economic profit for himself or others, and where the application of day-fines will result in the penalty being fixed at a substantially lower amount than is deemed reasonable, having regard to the amount of the profit that is or might have been obtained by the offence, the court may award the penalty of a fine other than day-fines.

(3) In fixing other fines, special consideration shall be given, within the limits relative to the nature of the offence and to the circumstances referred to in sect. 80 of this Act, to the offender's capacity to pay. Such fines shall in no case be fixed at an amount lower than four kroner.

(4) The extent to which the provisions concerning day-fines laid down in this Act shall apply to the fixing of fines for infringements of other Acts shall be provided by law. In the case of Acts where the application of day-fines is of minor importance, such provision may be made by Royal Order, after previous consultation between the Minister of Justice and any other Minister concerned.

52. (1) The court may fix a time limit of not more than three months for the payment of a fine.

(2) Payment by instalments may be allowed by the Police.

(3) If a fine is not paid in due time, it shall be recovered by distraint, unless the Police are satisfied that recovery is not possible or that it would seriously prejudice the living conditions of the convicted.

(4) In the absence of special legal provision, a fine shall not be recoverable from the estate of the convicted after his death or from any person other than the convicted.

53. If a fine cannot be recovered, it shall be replaced by a penalty of simple detention or imprisonment.

54. (1) A fine imposed by or accepted before a court is replaceable by a penalty to be served under the provisions relating to simple detention: provided that, if the person concerned in the course of the preceding five years has served a penalty involving the deprivation of liberty more severe than simple detention or if he has served, more than once, an alternative penalty in default of payment of a fine, a penalty of imprisonment may be applied. Simultaneously with fixing the fine, the court shall make a decision concerning the nature of the alternative penalty and its duration. Where the fine has been fixed in the form of a day-fine, it shall, in the calculation of the alternative penalty, be taken into account that one day's simple detention or imprisonment shall be equal to one day-fine: provided that the alternative penalty may in no case be less than two days. If the fine has been fixed otherwise, the alternative penalty shall in no case be less than two days nor more than sixty days: provided that, in special cases, the alternative penalty may be increased to a maximum of nine months.

(2) Where a fine has been added to a penalty involving the deprivation of liberty, the alternative penalty in default of payment of a fine shall be of the same nature as the principal penalty and shall be served, the time of its commencement permitting, in continuation of the latter.

(3) If part of the fine has been paid, the alternative penalty shall be proportionately reduced: provided that part of a day shall be counted as a whole day and that the alternative penalty shall in no case be reduced below the minimum duration referred to above. If part of the alternative penalty has been served and if the convicted offers to pay the remaining part of the fine, account shall be taken, in calculating the latter, only of the whole days during which the alternative penalty has been served.

55. In default of payment of a fine fixed otherwise than provided for in sect. 54 of this Act, a punishment shall be served under the provisions governing the penalty of simple detention:

In respect of a sum amounting to not more than 60 kroner: one day for each 6 kroner;

In respect of the additional amount, not exceeding 400 kroner: one day for each 10 kroner;

In respect of the additional amount, not exceeding 4,000 kroner: one day for each 50 kroner;

In respect of the remaining amount: one day for each 100 kroner;

Provided that the maximum and minimum limits laid down in sect. 54 shall be observed. When calculating the alternative penalty account shall be taken only of that portion of the fine which is equivalent to full days of simple detention.

Chapter VII

SUSPENDED SENTENCES

56. (1) Where the penalty imposed does not exceed a fine, simple detention for two years or imprisonment for one year, the terms of the sentence may provide that its execution shall be suspended in such manner that it shall be remitted at the expiration of a probation period to be fixed by the court, provided that the convicted satisfies the conditions laid down by law and any other conditions prescribed by or in the sentence. The probation period shall be not less than two years nor more than five years, as from the final promulgation of the sentence. During this period or part of it, the convicted shall be subject to supervision, as specified in the sentence, except where this is considered inappropriate in the circumstances.

(2) In cases likely to result in a suspended sentence, a special enquiry should be made for the purpose of providing information on the former career and present circumstances of the accused in home, school and employment, on his physical and mental condition and on any other circumstances likely to be of importance in deciding the case. If possible and desirable, this enquiry shall be made by an institution responsible for the supervision of probationers. If so, this institution shall be informed as soon as possible of the case by the public prosecutor and shall be made cognizant of any relevant information already available as a result of police enquiries. It shall be kept informed of the time of the court sittings during which the case is to be tried and shall be entitled to be represented even in camera.

57. Where the convicted is guilty of a punishable offence in respect of which court proceedings have been instituted against him before the expiration of the probation period, the suspended sentence shall be carried out in such manner that one penalty shall be inflicted in respect of both offences: provided that, if the new offence was committed through negligence or the penalty to be inflicted in respect of that offence does not exceed that of a fine or simple detention, the court may maintain the suspension of the execution of the former penalty or, if warranted by special circumstances, may decide that the execution of a combined penalty in respect of both offences shall be suspended.

58. The penalty shall be served where a condition prescribed in the sentence has not been observed, except in cases where such non-observance is due to circumstances beyond the control of the convicted: provided that, if the convicted so requests, the Public Prosecutor shall bring the case before the court which passed sentence in the first instance or, subject to the consent of the convicted, before the court of first instance in the jurisdiction where he is domiciled or resident. The court shall then decide whether the penalty shall be served or whether the suspension shall be maintained on the original or on modified conditions. There shall be no right of appeal against such decision, except with the permission of the Minister of Justice.

59. If, before the expiration of the probation period, proceedings are instituted against a probationer in respect of an offence committed prior to the pronouncement of the first sentence and resulting in the imposition of an additional penalty under sect. 89 of this Act, the court shall impose on him a combined penalty covering both offences and shall decide, subject to the provisions of sect. 56 of this Act, whether the sentence shall be executed or whether the execution shall be suspended once more. In the latter case, a new probation period shall be fixed.

60. If, after the expiration of the probation period, proceedings are instituted in respect of an offence committed after the suspended sentence as such has been promulgated, but before the probation period has expired, the non-observance of any condition governing the remission of the penalty shall be considered as an aggravating circumstance in fixing the penalty in respect of that offence.

61. (1) If, under the above provisions, the penalty inflicted is not served, it shall be deemed to be remitted and, apart from the case referred to in sect. 60 of this Act, the sentence shall not be counted as a conviction in respect of any future recidivism.

(2) Unless otherwise provided, any legal consequences following the infliction of a penalty shall have effect only where a suspended sentence is later put into execution.

Chapter VIII

Workhouse and Preventive Detention

62. A person may be committed to a workhouse in lieu of imprisonment—

(i) If, after serving two sentences of imprisonment for offences against property or for vagrancy or having been committed to a workhouse, he is found guilty, within three years of his last final release, of one of the offences referred to, provided that such offences committed can only be regarded as being due to idle or irregular habits, except where considerations of public safety require the application of preventive detention under sect. 65 of this Act;

(ii) If, after serving three sentences for begging or having been committed to a workhouse, he is found guilty of begging within two years of his last final release, provided the available evidence marks him out as a professional or habitual offender, except where considerations of public safety require the application of preventive detention under sect. 65 of this Act;

(iii) If, after serving a term of imprisonment in respect of one of the offences referred to in Chapter XXIV or having been committed to a workhouse, he is found guilty of any such offence within three years of his final release, provided his past record shows that he has a tendency to commit offences of that nature, except where considerations of public safety require the application of preventive detention under sect. 65 of this Act;

(iv) If he has committed an offence under the influence of intoxicants, provided he is deemed to be addicted to drinking;

(v) If, having been punished under sect. 256 of this Act, he is found guilty once more of contravening that provision.

63. (1) No person who has been sentenced to workhouse may be released until the expiration of one year as from the date of commitment or be retained in workhouse for a period exceeding five years. If the governing body of the institution considers that he should be released at the expiration of one year, the decision shall be made by the Prison Commission. At the expiration of two years or, in the case of repeated commitment, three years, the Prison Commission shall decide, on the recommendation of the governing body of the institution, whether the convicted shall remain in the workhouse. If so, the question shall be reconsidered and a new decision made at the expiration of each period of one year as from the commitment and until the time limit of five years has expired. Except as provided above, the question of release is not remissible to the Prison Commission.

(2) The Prison Commission shall decide whether release shall take place without conditions or on parole, and shall fix the period of parole at not less than one, nor more than three years. The provisions of sections 38, subsect. (2) and (4), 39, subsect. (1), 40, subsect. (2), and 42, subsect. (5), of this Act shall apply. Decisions concerning recommittal shall be made by the Prison Commission.

(3) The foregoing provisions shall not apply to prisoners transferred to a workhouse under sect. 37, subsect. (1), of this Act.

(4) The provisions of sect. 46 of this Act shall apply in like manner to persons committed to a workhouse.

64. The sentence of commitment to a workhouse shall be served in an institution or division of an institution established for the purpose and belonging to or being under supervision of the State. Persons committed to a workhouse shall be liable to work under rules specified by Royal Order. Open-air work shall be applied to the maximum extent. The provisions of sect. 35, subsect. (1), of this Act shall apply also to this section. The treatment shall not be more severe than required by the exigencies of discipline and the obligation to work. The governing body of the workhouse may grant leave of absence, to a limited extent, to inmates who have deserved it by good behaviour.

65. (1) Where a person who has served a term of imprisonment for not less than two years in respect of one of the offences referred to in Chapter XXIV or under two sentences, or who has been retained in workhouse for the same period, becomes liable to imprisonment again, and where the available evidence marks him out as a professional or habitual offender, the court may, if it deems it necessary having regard to public safety, sentence him to preventive detention, as an alternative to punishment. (2) Penalties involving the deprivation of liberty and of a nature similar to imprisonment which have been served abroad may, in the circumstances, be recognized as equivalent to imprisonment.

66. (1) Persons sentenced to preventive detention may not be released until after the expiration of four years after committal. At the expiration of four years the Prison Commission shall decide whether release shall take place. Release shall take place on parole under the provisions of sections 38, subsect. (2) and (4), 39, subsect. (1), and 40, subsect. (2), of this Act. The period of parole, which shall be not less than two years, shall be determined by the Prison Commission, which is also responsible for deciding any question of recommitment. The provision of sect. 42, subsect. (5), of this Act shall apply in like manner. In case of non-release, the question may be reconsidered only after the expiration of two years.

(2) Where a person has been detained in preventive detention for twenty years, he shall be released, unless this is considered dangerous by the Prison Commission. In the latter case, the question of his remaining in the preventive detention centre shall be brought before the High Court within the jurisdiction of which that centre is situated. The decision shall be made by court order. If the court decides that he shall remain in the preventive detention centre, the question shall be brought before the court again every five years. Where release is granted after the expiration of twenty years or more, release shall be without conditions.

(3) The above provisions shall not apply to prisoners transferred to preventive detention under sect. 37, subsect. (2), of this Act.

(4) The provisions of sect. 46 of this Act shall apply in like manner to persons subject to preventive detention.

67. The sentence of preventive detention shall be served in a State institution established for the purpose or in a division of such an institution, as far as men are concerned, and, by women, in a workhouse, subject to the provisions of sect. 66 of this Act. As regards the obligation to work, earnings and treatment, the provisions of sect. 64 of this Act shall apply in like manner, with due regard to the greater risk of danger from persons subject to preventive detention. Leaves of absence shall not be permissible.

68. Detailed provisions governing the treatment of persons sentenced to workhouse or preventive detention shall be laid down by Royal Order, which shall also provide for disciplinary measures corresponding to those of sect. 47 of this Act. Sect. 48 of this Act shall apply in like manner to such persons.

69. If a person committed to workhouse or to a preventive detention centre incurs a penalty involving the deprivation of liberty, his stay in the workhouse or the centre shall be temporarily in abeyance for the period while serving his penalty.

Chapter IX

Other Legal Effects of a Punishable Act

70. (1) Where an accused is acquitted under sect. 16 of this Act or where punishment is considered inapplicable under sect. 17 of this Act, while having regard to public safety it is deemed necessary that other measures be applied to him, the court shall decide on the nature of such measures. If public safety is unlikely to be guaranteed by imposing less rigorous measures, such as sureties, directions as to or prohibition against residence in a particular place, orders of the nature dealt with in sect. 72 of this Act, appointment of a supervisor or relegation to a state of minority, the person concerned shall be placed in a mental hospital, an institution for feeble-minded or other curative institution, an asylum for inebriates or in a special detention centre. Within the limits set by the court, the competent administrative authority shall decide upon any further arrangements that may be required by such measures.

(2) Where the accused is likely to be sentenced to placement in a hospital or an institution, the court may appoint a supervising guardian for him, if possible one of his near relatives, who is qualified for that task and has accepted it. The supervising guardian shall, on the one hand, assist the accused during the proceedings together with the counsel for the defence and, on the other hand, keep himself informed of his condition and see to it that his stay in the hospital or the institution be not extended beyond what is necessary.

(3) At the instance of the Public Prosecutor, of the director of the institution concerned or of the supervising guardian, the court which passed sentence in the first instance may at any time alter the earlier decision made concerning the nature of the measure or may, on the basis of a medical report, cancel it temporarily or absolutely. If a request on the part of the supervising guardian for cancelling or modifying the measures of security is not allowed by the court, the supervising guardian may submit a second request only after the expiration of one year: provided that, if warranted by special circumstances, such a request may be submitted at the expiration of not less than six months.

71. When the perpetrator of a punishable act, after carrying it out but before having sentence passed on him, becomes more seriously affected by the conditions referred to in sect. 16 or sect. 17 of this Act, the court shall decide whether a penalty shall be inflicted or whether the penalty incurred shall be remitted. If deemed necessary, having regard to public safety, the court shall provide in the sentence that measures in conformity with the provisions of sect. 70 of this Act shall be applied in lieu of punishment or until the punishment can be carried out.

72. (1) Where a person is sentenced to a penalty involving the deprivation of liberty in respect of an offence covered by this Act, and if the court is satisfied that the offence has been committed under the influence of intoxicants, the convicted may be ordered by the court not to taste or buy intoxicants, on pain of being dealt with under the provision of sect. 138, subsect. (2), of this Act, for a specified period not exceeding five years as from his final release; a similar order may be made if the person concerned is acquitted under sect. 18 of this Act, where a penalty involving the deprivation of liberty would otherwise have been incurred. If, moreover, the person concerned is regarded as being addicted to intoxicants, such an order shall be made in all cases by the court.

(2) The Police shall as far as possible instruct restaurant keepers, tradesmen and retailers, on pain of liability to sect. 138, subsect. (3), of this Act, not to serve, sell or distribute intoxicants to person convicted under subsect. (1) of this section.

73. Where it appears from a medical report and other available evidence that any person covered by sect. 72, subsect. (1), of this Act or any person liable to punishment under sect. 138, subsect. (1) or (2), of this Act is addicted to intoxicants, it may be provided in the sentence that he shall be placed, after the penalty has been served or in the case of suspended sentence, immediately, in a curative institution for inebriates, if necessary in a public institution or division of an institution established for that particular purpose, until he can be regarded as having been cured. The maximum period of such detention shall be fixed in the sentence at 18 months, or in the case of recidivism at three years. If, prior to the expiration of the specified period, the person concerned is deemed to be cured or if the commitment appears to be ineffective, the Minister of Justice shall, on the recommendation of the governing body of the institution and on the basis of a medical report, decide whether the detention shall be discontinued.

74. Provisions may be made by Royal Order concerning the treatment of the persons detained in an institution under sect. 70 or sect. 73 of this Act concerning, inter alia, their employment at appropriate work.

75. If a person threatens death, fire or other misdeed, and if punishment is precluded or is not considered to afford adequate safety, the court may by a sentence passed after trial initiated by public prosecution, at the request of the person threatened or, if general considerations so require, without such request, order him to comply with the measures which the court finds necessary for obviating the apprehended menace and, if necessary, decide that he shall be taken into custody; if so, the court shall also decide whether the detention shall take place under the provisions governing arrest or in one of the institutions referred to in ss. 64, 67, 70 or 73 of this Act. The orders made or the measures taken may be rescinded by the Public Prosecutor if he deems it unnecessary to maintain them and if the person threatened agrees, or otherwise by a decision of the court which passed sentence in the first instance. At the request of the convicted, the case shall be brought before the court again, unless the Public Prosecutor is satisfied that the situation is exactly the same and if less than one year has passed after the promulgation of sentence or of a subsequent judicial decision.

76. (1) Where a foreigner, who during the last five years has not been permanently resident within the territory of the Danish State, is sentenced to imprisonment for two years or more, the court shall, except where special circumstances militate against it, order him to be expelled from the Kingdom after he has served his penalty. In other cases, where a foreigner is sentenced to imprisonment, the court may make such order, if appropriate in the circumstances.

(2) Prior to his expulsion, the convicted shall be notified of the criminal liability involved in any unlawful return, and this notification shall be entered in the records of the Police.

77. (1) Unless otherwise expressly provided, the court may decide that the following objects shall be confiscated for the benefit of the Exchequer:

(i) Objects produced in pursuance of a punishable act or which have been used or intended to be used for an intentional offense, provided they belong to any of the persons responsible for the act; or

(ii) Objects supposed to be intended to serve a criminal purpose, where their confiscation is deemed necessary, having regard to public safety; or

(iii) The profit gained by a punishable act, provided no person has a legal claim on it, or an amount deemed to be equivalent to such profit.

(2) The Police shall decide on the use to be made of the objects confiscated under paragraph (ii) of subsect. (1) of this section. In other cases, the objects or money confiscated shall, if any person has suffered damage through the punishable act, and if compensation cannot otherwise be recovered from the guilty person, be applied to meet any claim for compensation, and this claim takes precedence over the claims of the State.

(3) If an association is dissolved by judgment, the capital of the association shall be confiscated for the benefit of the Exchequer, and the State shall take charge of the documents, protocols, etc., of the association.

78. (1) A punishable offense shall not involve the suspension of civil rights, including also the right to carry on a business under an ordinary license or a maritime license.

(2) Provided that the person who has been convicted of a punishable offense may be debarred from carrying on a business requiring a special public authorization or permission, if the offense committed carries with it an obvious risk of abuse of the position or the occupation concerned.

(3) The question whether the offense committed implies an objection to carrying on a business of the nature referred to in subsect. (2) of this section shall, at the request of the person whose application for such authorization or approval has been refused or of any competent authority, be brought by the Public Prosecutor before the municipal court which made the decision or by which the case would have been tried if it had been decided by a municipal court. The question shall be decided by court order. If, according to the decision, the person concerned shall not be allowed to carry on his business, the question may be brought before the court again at the expiration of not less than two years. Authorization or permission may be given by the competent authority, also before the expiration of this time limit.

79. (1) A person carrying on one of the undertakings referred to in sect. 78, subsect. (2), of this Act may, on conviction of a punishable offense, be deprived of the right to continue to carry on the business concerned or to carry it on under certain forms if the offense committed carries with it an obvious risk of abuse of the position. If warranted by special circumstances, the same shall apply to the carrying on of other forms of business. The deprivation of such a right shall be made for a period of not less than one nor more than five years, as from the date of the final sentence, or for the time being; in the latter case, the question as to whether the person concerned shall continue to be excluded from carrying on the business may, at the expiration of five years, be brought before the court which made the last decision concerning the deprivation of the right, subject to the provisions of sect. 78, subsect. (3), of this Act.

(2) Pending the decision of the case referred to in subsect. (1), first sentence, of this section the court may debar the person concerned from carrying on the business. The court may decide that appeal shall have no suspensive effect.

(3) If warranted by special circumstances, the Minister of Justice may permit the case to be brought before the court before the expiration of the time limit of five years referred to in subsect. (1) of this section.

Chapter X

Determination of the Penalty

80. (1) In determining the penalty, account shall be taken, not only of the gravity and dangerousness of the offense, but also of the previous record of the offender, of his age and of his general conduct before and after the deed, of the persistence of his criminal tendencies and of the motives underlying the act.

(2) The fact that the offense has been committed by several persons in association shall, as a rule, be considered as an aggravating circumstance.

81. (1) The application of provisions concerning an aggravation of the penalty or other legal effects in the case of recidivism shall be dependent on the condition that, before he committed his second offense, the offender has been found guilty, within the territory of the Danish State, or a punishable act committed after he has attained the 18th anniversary of his birthday and is liable, under the Act, to incur the penalty of recidivism for the second offense, or of attempt or complicity in respect of such offense: provided that the age of the offender at the time of committing the punishable act shall not be relevant to the provisions of sect. 65 of this Act.

(2) The court may take into account, for the assumption of recidivism, foreign sentences as sentences pronounced within the territory of the Danish State.

(3) No recividism is to be assumed if, before the commission of the second punishable act, a period of five years has passed after the former sentence has been served, finally remitted or ceased to have effect, or after the convicted has been finally discharged from a workhouse or preventive detention. Where the former penalty is a fine, the said time limit shall be reckoned as from the date of the final sentence or of the acceptance of the fine.

82. If a person is found to have committed one or several offenses by way of profession or habit, then, unless otherwise provided, the punishment may be increased by up to one-half and, in the case of recidivism, be doubled.

83. (1) If any of the offenses referred to in ss. 119, 121, 141, 142, 180, 181, 237, 244 to 247, 252, 260, 261, 266 or 291, subsect. (2), of this Act is committed by a prisoner while serving a sentence or while kept in custody for some other reason, the penalty prescribed in the said provisions may be doubled: provided that the punishment shall in no case be fixed at a penalty lower than simple detention. If the prisoner is serving a term of imprisonment or if he has been committed to a workhouse or a preventive detention centre (cf. sect. 67 of this Act), the penalty to be applied shall not be lower than that of imprisonment, so that, where the penalty provided is only simple detention, that penalty may be replaced by imprisonment for the same period; if so, this penalty may be inflicted for a period shorter than that provided for in sect. 33 of this Act.

(2) The provision of subsect. (1), first sentence, of this section shall apply in like manner if the offenses concerned are committed by a former prisoner against a person employed in the institution concerned or against the institution or its proerty and, again, where a former prisoner is found guilty of any of the offenses referred to in sect. 124 of this Act against a prisoner committed to the institution concerned.

(3) The fact that the deed has been committed by several persons in association shall in all cases be considered as an aggravating circumstance.

(4) If several prisoners have agreed to commit any of the offenses referred to in subsect. (1) of this section, the principals shall, even where the offense is not accomplished, be punished as if it had been accomplished: provided that the punishment may be reduced under the circumstances referred to in sect. 22 of this Act.

(5) If a person who has been sentenced to imprisonment for life and who has not been pardoned commits another crime in or outside the prison, the nature of the penalty involving the deprivation of liberty that he would have incurred if the penalty previously inflicted on him had not been for life shall be laid down in the sentence. Besides, under specific provisions laid down by Royal Order, he may be sentenced to a penalty corresponding to one or several of the disciplinary punishments provided for in sect. 47 of this Act. The Order may provide that the penalty prescribed in sect. 47, subsect. (1) paragraph (i), of this Act shall be inflicted for an indeterminate period, and that the maximum periods of paragraphs (2) to (4) may be doubled.

84. (1) The punishment prescribed for a punishable act may be reduced in the following circumstances, viz.—

(i) If a person has exceeded the limits of lawful self-defense or of the right to avert damage established by sect. 14 of this Act;

(ii) If, at the time of committing the punishable act, the perpetrator had not attained the age of 18 years and the full penalty, if applied, would be considered unnecessary or harmful because of his youth. The penalty in respect of such persons may not exceed imprisonment for eight years;

(iii) If the perpetrator had acted in excusable ignorance or excusable misinterpretation of legal provisions prohibiting or prescribing a certain act;

(iv) If the act has been committed in a state of excitement brought about by an unlawful attack or by a gross insult on the part of the injured party;

(v) If a person has been induced to commit the deed by virtue of his position of dependence on some other person or in the face of a menace of a substantial injury;

(vi) If, after the accomplishment of the punishable act, the perpetrator has spontaneously averted the danger resulting from the act;

(vii) If, after the accomplishment of the punishable act, the perpetrator has fully restored the damage caused by his act;

(viii) If, otherwise, he has spontaneously made efforts to prevent the accomplishment of the act or to restore the damage caused by it;

(ix) If, by his own will, he has given himself up and made a full confession.

(2) In the circumstances referred to under paragraphs (i) to (vi) of subsect. (1) of this section, the punishment may be remitted in further extenuating circumstances.

85. (1) If an offense has been committed under the influence of excitement, of other temporary lack of mental balance or of other special circumstances which reduce the degree of criminality normally inherent in such acts, to such an extent that the application of the penalty prescribed would be excessively severe, the punishment shall be reduced and may, if the relevant penal sanction provides for a penalty of simple detention only, be remitted. If the lack of mental balance arises from self-inflicted drunkenness, the above provision shall apply only if the accused has not previously been found guilty of a similar punishable act or of a contravention of sect. 138, subsect. (1) or (2), of this Act, and only in further extenuating circumstances.

(2) A suspended sentence may be pronounced in these cases, even where the penalty is higher than that provided for in sect. 56 of this Act.

86. If the offender has been remanded in custody for a reason not attributable to his own conduct during the proceedings, it shall be provided in the sentence that a specified part of the penalty inflicted, or the whole of it, shall be considered as having been served. If the person concerned is sentenced to commitment to a youth prison, a workhouse or a preventive detention centre, the period thus fixed in the sentence shall be deducted from the terms of detention in youth prison or in workhouse or preventive detention provided for in ss. 42, 63 and 66 of this Act.

87. If, under sect. 79 of this Act, a person has been deprived of the rights referred to in that section, the penalty may be reduced or, if it would not have exceeded that of simple detention, be remitted.

88. (1) If, by one or several acts, a person has committed several offences, one penalty shall be fixed for these offences within the statutory range of the punishment prescribed or, if punishments with a different statutory range apply, within the highest maximum. In particularly aggravating circumstances, the penalty may exceed the most severe penalty prescribed for any of the offences by not more than one-half.

(2) If the offences to be considered in fixing the penalty entail penalties involving the deprivation of liberty of different kinds, a penalty involving the deprivation of liberty of the most severe nature shall be fixed in respect of all of the offences.

(3) If one of the offences is punishable by the deprivation of liberty and another punishable by a fine, the court may, in lieu of a penalty involving the deprivation of liberty to cover both offences, impose a fine in addition to a penalty involving the deprivation of liberty.

(4) If one of the offences is punishable by a day-fine and another by a fine of a different nature, the court shall inflict the penalty of a day-fine in respect of both offences, except where, in the circumstances, it is deemed appropriate to inflict a separate penalty in respect of each offence.

(5) A person who is sentenced to commitment to a workhouse or preventive detention cannot, at the same time, be sentenced to a penalty involving the deprivation of liberty. In case the accused has committed one or several offences in addition to the offence or offences for which he is liable under sect. 62 of this Act to be sentenced to commitment to a workhouse, he may be sentenced to commitment to a workhouse in respect of all the offences committed by him.

89. (1) If a person already sentenced is found guilty of another punishable act committed prior to the promulgation of a sentence, a supplementary penalty shall be inflicted, provided that a sentence, including both offences, awarded at the time of the earlier offence would have rendered him liable to an aggravation of the penalty. If the term of penalty previously inflicted has not expired, the provisions of sect. 88 of this Act shall be applied, if practicable, and the supplementary penalty may in that case be inflicted for a period shorter than those provided for in ss. 33 and 44 of this Act.

(2) If the offence to which the latter sentence relates involves imprisonment, while the former sentence was that of simple detention, the former sentence shall, if not fully served, be converted by the authority responsible for the execution of sentence under the provisions of sect. 90 of this Act.

(3) If the offence that is being tried by the court is punishable by the deprivation of liberty, and the former sentence was one of commitment to a workhouse or preventive detention, the court shall decide whether the former sentence shall be upheld or whether the accused shall be sentenced to imprisonment in respect of both offences. If, in the latter case, the convicted has been detained in a workhouse or in a preventive detention centre, it shall be provided in the sentence that a proportionate part of the term shall be considered to have been served.

(4) If the latter sentence inflicts the penalty of commitment to a workhouse or preventive detention centre, while the former sentence inflicted a penalty involving the deprivation of liberty, the former sentence shall cease to have effect. In case the sentence has been served, in whole or in part, the term served shall be deducted from the terms of commitment to a workhouse or preventive detention centre provided for in ss. 63 and 66 of this Act; if the penalty concerned is one of simple detention, such deduction shall be made under the provisions of sect. 90 of this Act.

90. (1) Where the penalty prescribed for an offence is replaceable by another, two days' imprisonment shall be recognised as equivalent to three days' simple detention.

(2) If the aggravation of a penalty provided by law is impracticable within the limits set for the category of penalties provided, the penalty shall be replaced by a more severe penalty of the next category; provided that, where an increase of the ordinary penalty prescribed for an offence is allowed, simple detention may be awarded for not more than three years and imprisonment for a determinate period up to 20 years.

91. If the penalty prescribed for a punishable act does not exceed simple detention, then, if the convicted has formerly served a term of imprisonment, a penalty of simple detention may be replaced by imprisonment for the same period.

Chapter XI

CESSATION OF THE LEGAL EFFECTS OF A PUNISHABLE ACT

92. Criminal liability shall cease to have effect—

(i) At the death of the offender, cf. sect. 52, subsect. (4), of this Act, or

(ii) If abandoned by the injured party, before the court has retired to consider the case, where the offence has been brought before the court by private prosecution; or before a request for prosecution has been made, where the offence is subject to public prosecution only at the request of the injured party; or

(iii) As regards contraventions of this Act, in the case of limitation, in accordance with the provisions of ss. 93 and 94 of this Act: provided that criminal liability in respect of the offences dealt with in Chapter XVI and in ss. 296, subsect. (1), paragraphs (ii) and (iii), and subsect. (2), and 297 of this Act shall not be subject to limitation. In the case of other offences to which no statutory limitations apply, the court shall decide whether, provided the conditions of limitation under the said provisions are satisfied, criminal liability shall cease to have effect. Criminal liability for violations of public taxation and duty statutes which aimed at withholding compulsory contributions from the Revenue Authorities shall not be subject to limitation in the absence of special provisions on the subject.

93. (1) The period of limitation shall be—

(i) Two years, where the penalty incurred for the offence would not exceed a fine or simple detention for two years; or

(ii) Five years, where the penalty incurred would be simple detention for more than two years or imprisonment for not more than one year; or

(iii) Ten years, where the penalty incurred would be more severe, but where the maximum penalty prescribed for the deed does not exceed imprisonment for six years.

(2) If any person has committed several offences for which criminal liability under subsect. (1) of this section would be barred by limitation if each offence was tried separately, the limitation shall take effect only if the penalty incurred in respect of all the offences together does not exceed the limits laid down in subsect. (1) of this section.

(3) If, under the provisions of subsect. (1) and (2) of this section, criminal liability for an offence is not barred by limitation, but if a period of ten years has expired after the commission of the offence, the Minister of Justice shall decide whether proceedings shall be instituted.

94. (1) The period of limitation shall run as from the date on which the punishable act has been terminated, or, in the case of an omission, where the obligation to act has ceased: provided that, if the punishable nature of the act depends on a later event, the period of limitation shall not commence to run until the occurrence of that event. The running of the period shall be interrupted during any criminal proceedings in which the person concerned may be a defendant. If the proceedings instituted are suspended for an indeterminate period, the limitation shall continue to run as if no proceedings had been instituted: provided that, if the suspension is due to the fact that the accused evaded prosecution, the duration of the proceedings shall not be included in the caculation of the period of limitation.

(2) If the punishable act has been committed on a Danish vessel outside the territory of the Danish State, the period shall not commence to run until the date when the vessel enters a Danish port or arrives at a place where a Danish consul resides: provided that the commencement of the period shall not be deferred for more than one year.

95. (1) Where criminal liability has ceased to have effect by limitation, the measures dealt with in ss. 30 and 62 to 75 of this Act shall not be applicable, nor may the convicted be deprived of the rights set out in sect. 79 of this Act.

(2) The preventive measures referred to in ss. 62 to 75 of this Act shall not be applicable after the expiration of ten years as from the commission of the act in question.

96. (1) The execution of a sentence of fine, or simple detention, or imprisonment for a period not exceeding one year shall cease to be permissible after five years have expired. After the expiration of ten years no sentence shall be capable of execution, except by the order of the Minister of Justice.

(2) The above time limits shall not include the period during which the execution of a sentence has been suspended under sect. 56 of this Act or has not been capable of commencement due to the serving of a penalty involving the deprivation of liberty or because of commitment to a workhouse, preventive detention centre or curative institution for inebriates.

97. (Repealed by Act, No. 88, dated 15 March 1939).

Special Part

Chapter XII

Offences against the independence and safety of the state

98. (1) Any person who commits an act aimed, by foreign assistance, by the use of force, or by menace of such, at bringing the Danish State or any part of it under foreign rule or at detaching any part of the State shall be liable to imprisonment for any term extending to life imprisonment.

(2) The same penalty shall apply to any person who, for the purpose mentioned in subsect. (1) of this section, organises extensive sabotage, suspension of production or traffic, as well as to any person who, conscious of the purpose of such act, takes part in carrying it out.

99. (1) Any person who commits an act aimed at involving the Danish State or any allied power in war, occupation or other hostilities, such as blockade or any other coercive measure, or who otherwise endeavours to bring about, by foreign assistance, a violation of the independence of the Danish State, shall be liable to imprisonment for any term extending to life imprisonment.

(2) For the purposes of this section and other sections of Chapter XII or XIII of this Act, occupation shall mean foreign occupation of any territory of the Danish State, if and as long as it is inflicted on the country by the use of force or menace of such.

100. (1) Any person who by public statements incites to enemy action against the Danish State or who brings about an evident danger of such action shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding six years.

(2) Any person who by public statements incites to intervention by any foreign power in the affairs of the Danish State or who brings about an evident danger of such intervention shall be liable to simple detention or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding one year or, in extenuating circumstances, to a fine.

101. Any person who, in the face of impending war, enemy occupation or any other hostilities, commits any act by which preparations are made for aiding the enemy shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding sixteen years.

102. (1) Any person who, in time of war or enemy occupation, assists the enemy by word or act or, for the promotion of enemy interests, impairs the military efficiency of the Danish State or of any allied power, shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding sixteen years.

(2) The following acts shall be deemed to be assistance to the enemy:

(i) Recruitment for or service in the armed forces of any military or occupation power of the enemy or in associated military or police forces or in any similar bodies or organisations; or

(ii) exercise of functions as a civil employee in the police or prison administration of any military or occupation power of the enemy, where such functions include participation in the examination or custody of prisoners; or

(iii) information or similar acts bringing about the arrest or risk of arrest or injury by any enemy authority or any associated organisation or person; or

(iv) any propaganda for the benefit of any military or occupation power of the enemy, including activities as publisher, editor or administrative officer of any daily paper, periodical, publishing business or press bureau working for the promotion of enemy interests; or

(v) payment of substantial financial assistance to others with a view to promoting propaganda of the nature indicated in paragraph (iv) of this section or to any party or organisation unduly co-operating with the military or occupation power of the enemy, or promoting the interests of such power.

(3) Where information (cf. subsect. (2), paragraph (iii), of this section) has taken place under such circumstances that the perpetrator has been aware that any person thereby has incurred the risk of imminent danger of losing his life, suffering grievous harm to person or health, of being deported or of being deprived of his liberty for a long time, or where ss. 245, 246 or 250 of this Act have been contravened with a view to enforcing evidence or a confession or otherwise as part of any maltreatment of prisoners, imprisonment for life may be inflicted.

103. (1) Any person who, in the case of war or occupation or imminent danger of such, fails to fulfill a contract relating to measures taken by the Danish State for that purpose, or who otherwise counteracts such measures, shall be liable to simple detention or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding three years.

(2) If the offence is due to gross negligence, the penalty shall be a fine or simple detention.

104. (1) Any person who, directly or through an intermediary, unduly cooperates for commercial purposes with any military or occupation power of the enemy shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding eight years.

(2) Criminal liability under subsect. (1) of this section may devolve on any person who has had a position of management in the undertaking concerned. Criminal liability may devolve also on other persons employed in the undertaking, if they have shown a particularly offensive behaviour.

(3) In determining whether and, if so, to what extent the cooperation is deemed to be undue in this sense, account shall be taken not only of the importance of the undertaking to the military or occupation power of the enemy, but also of the fact as to whether the person concerned—

(i) had himself taken steps to arrange for the establishment, continuation or extension of any business relations; or

(ii) at his own initiative had undertaken a re-organisation of the undertaking in the interests of the enemy or had made efforts to increase or accelerate its production substantially; or

(iii) had called on the assistance of the enemy in his relations with any Danish public authority with a view to promoting his own interests; or

(iv) had prevented or tried to prevent any Danish public authority from taking full knowledge of the conditions of the undertaking; or

(v) had obtained or tried to obtain any excessive profit or any other privileges not reasonably justified in the undertaking.

105. Any person who, in time of enemy occupation, commits an act aimed at inducing the occupation power or any organisation or person associated with that power to impair the independence of any Danish public authority, or who takes undue advantage of any connection with the occupation power or with any organisation or person associated with that power with a view to obtaining for himself or for others a special privilege, shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding eight years.

106. Any person who acts against the interests of the State in carrying out a mission entrusted to him to negotiate or settle, on behalf of the State, any matter with any foreign State shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding sixteen years.

107. (1) Any person who, being in the service of any foreign power or organisation or for the information of persons engaged in such service, inquires into or gives information on matters which, having regard to Danish State or public interests, should be kept secret, shall, whether or not the information is correct, be guilty of espionage and liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding sixteen years.

(2) If such information is of the nature indicated in sect. 109 of this Act, or if the act is committed in time of war or occupation, the penalty may rise to imprisonment for life.

108. (1) Any person who, by any other act than those covered by sect. 107, enables or assists the Intelligence Service of a foreign State to operate directly or indirectly within the territory of the Danish State shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding six years.

(2) If such act concerns information on military affairs, or if it is committed in time of war or occupation, the penalty may be increased to imprisonment for any term not exceeding twelve years.

109. (1) Any person who discloses or imparts any information on secret negotiations, deliberations or resolutions of the State in affairs involving the safety of the State or its rights in relation to foreign State, or which have reference to substantial economic interests of public character in relation to foreign countries, shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding twelve years.

(2) If any of these acts has been committed through negligence, the penalty shall be simple detention or imprisonment for any term not exceeding three years or, in the case of extenuating circumstances, a fine.

110. (1) Any person who forges, destroys or removes any document or any other instrument that is of importance to the safety of the State or to its rights in relation to foreign States shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding sixteen years.

(2) If any of these acts has been committed through negligence, the penalty shall be simple detention or imprisonment for any term not exceeding three years or, in extenuating circumstances, a fine.

110a. Any person who, intentionally or through negligence, without being duly authorised to do so,

(I) describes, photographs or otherwise reproduces Danish military works of defence, depots, units, arms, material, etc., which are not accessible to the public, or who copies or publishes such descriptions or reproductions; or

(II) takes photographs from airplanes over any territory of the Danish State or publishes such unlawfully taken photographs; or

(III) publishes provisions relating to the mobilisation of Danish forces or other war preparations, shall be liable to a fine or simple detention or, in aggravating circumstances, to imprisonment for any term not exceeding three years.

110b. Any person who gives his assistance to any violation of neutrality against the Danish State on the part of any foreign power shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding eight years.

110c. Any person who, intentionally or through negligence, contravenes any provisions or prohibitions that may have been provided by law for the protection of State defence or neutrality or for the fulfillment of its obligations as a member of the United Nations shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention or, in aggravating circumstances, to imprisonment for any term not exceeding three years.

110d. If any of the offences dealt with in Chapters XXV, XXVI or XXVII of this Act is committed against a foreign sovereign or the Head of any foreign diplomatic mission, the prescribed penalty may be increased by not more than one-half.

110e. Any person who openly insults any foreign nation, foreign State, its flag or any other recognised symbol of nationality or the flag of the United Nations shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention or, in aggravating circumstances, to imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years.

110f. The offences referred to in this Chapter shall in all cases be dealt with by public prosecution, to be instituted by the order of the Minister of Justice.

Chapter XIII

Offences against the constitution and the supreme authorities of the State

111. Any person who commits an act aimed, by foreign assistance, by the use of force or menace of such, at changing the Constitution or making it inoperative shall be liable to imprisonment for any term extending to life imprisonment.

112. Any person who commits an act directed against the life of the Sovereign or of the constitutional regent shall be liable to imprisonment for not less than six years.

113. (1) Any person who interferes with the safety or independence of the Diet or otherwise commits any act aimed, by the use of force or menace of such, at extorting any resolution from the Diet or preventing it from freely exercising its activities shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding sixteen years or, in the case of aggravating circumstances, for life.

(2) The same penalty shall apply to any person who, in like manner, interferes with or exercises coercion against the Sovereign or the constitutional regent or against the Ministers, the Constitutional Court or the Supreme Court.

114. (1) Any person who participates in or grants substantial pecuniary or other substantial support to any corps, group or association which intends, by the use of force, to influence public affairs to or disturb the public order shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding six years.

(2) Any person who takes part in any unlawful military organisation or group shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention or, in aggravating circumstances, to imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years.

115. (1) If any of the offences dealt with in Chapters XXV, XXVI or XVII of this Act, except where the circumstances are covered by sect. 112 or sect. 113 of this Act, is committed against the Sovereign or against the constitutional regent, the penalties prescribed in the above Chapters shall be increased up to twice the prescribed maximum.

(2) If any of the said offences is committed against the Queen, the Queen Dowager or the heir apparent, the penalty may be increased by not more than one-half.

116. (1) Any person who prevents or attempts to prevent any holding of elections to the Diet, to the Assembly of the Faroe Islands or to municipal or any other public councils or authorities, or who corrupts the outcome of any election or renders it impossible to count the votes, shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding six years.

(2) The same penalty shall apply where such acts are committed in connection with a plebiscite in public affairs, as provided by law.

117. Any person who, in the case of the elections or plebiscites referred to in sect. 116 of this Act,

(i) unlawfully obtains permission, for himself or for others, to take part in the voting; or

(ii) attempts, by unlawful coercion (cf. sect. 260 of this Act) by deprivation of liberty or by taking advantage of a position of superiority, to induce some other person to vote in a particular way or to abstain from voting; or

(iii) causes, by a trick, some other person, against his intention, to abstain from voting or brings it about that such person's vote in rendered invalid or that it has an effect different from that intended; or

(iv) grants, promises or offers any pecuniary advantage with a view to making any person vote in a particular way or abstain from voting; or

(v) accepts, or demands or accepts the promise of any pecuniary advantage against voting in a particular way or against abstaining from voting; shall be liable to simple detention or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years or, in extenuating circumstances, to a fine.

118. (1) Any person who, by the use of force or menace of such or by exploiting any fear of intervention on the part of any foreign power, prevents or attempts to prevent any public authority from freely exercising its activities shall, if the act is committed for the purpose of influencing public affairs or disturbing the public order, be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding twelve years.

(2) The same penalty shall apply to any person who, for the purpose indicated in subsect. (1) of this section and by utilising the means indicated in that subsection, gravely impairs freedom of speech or prevents any society or any other association from freely exercising its lawful activities.

(3) The same penalty shall, again, apply to any person who, for the purpose indicated in subsect. (1) of this section and by utilising the means indicated in that subsection, commits the offence dealt with in sect. 193 of this Act or any similar act detrimental to the common good.

118 a. The offences referred to in ss. 111 to 115 and 118 shall in all cases be dealt with by public prosecution, to be instituted by the order of the Minister of Justice.

118 b. (1) Where any person is sentenced to imprisonment for two years or more in respect of any of the offences dealt with in Chapters XII or XIII of this Act, the court may decide that his property and any benefit or income of which he is in receipt shall, in whole or in part, be confiscated for the interest of the Exchequer.

(2) If any person arranges to dispose of his property to another person who is aware of his intention of escaping confiscation, such disposition shall be void.

Chapter XIV

Offences against public authority

119. (1) Any person who, by the exertion of violence or menace of violence, assaults any person required to act by virtue of a public office or function, while executing the office or the function or on occasion of such office or function, or who in like manner attempts to prevent such person from discharging a lawful official function or to force him to discharge an official function, shall be liable to simple detention or imprisonment for any term not exceeding six years or, in extenuating circumstances, to a fine.

(2) The same penalty shall apply to any person who, in circumstances other than those covered by subsect. (1) of this section, threatens any person vested by public authority with jurisdiction or the power to make decisions on any matter involving legal consequences or in enforcing the authority of the Executive in criminal matters with violence, with deprivation of liberty or with allegation of a punishable act or dishonourable conduct, provided such threat is made either in respect of the execution of the office or function or for the purpose of preventing such person from discharging a lawful official function or of forcing him to discharge an official function.

(3) If, otherwise, any person puts obstacles in the way of the persons required to carry out their office or function, he shall be liable to simple detention or to a fine or, in aggravating circumstances, to imprisonment for any term not exceeding six months.

120. The penalties prescribed in sect. 119 of this Act shall, if the acts referred to in that section are carried out by means of any unlawful assembly, apply to those who instigate or direct the assembly and to the participants who fail to comply with any order to disperse, lawfully announced by the public authorities.

121. Any person who falls upon any of the persons referred to in sect. 119 of this Act with insults, abusive language or other offensive words or gestures, while they are executing their office or function or on occasion of such office or function, shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding six months.

122. Any person who grants, promises or offers some other person exercising a public office or function a gift or other privilege in order to cause him to do or fail to do anything by which he would be guilty of a breach of duty shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding three years or, in the case of extenuating circumstances, to simple detention or to a fine.

123. Where several prisoners serving a penalty involving the deprivation of liberty or being committed to a workhouse or preventive detention centre (cf. sect. 67 of this Act) agree to escape together, they shall be liable to imprisonment for not less than six months nor more than three years.

124. (1) Any person who sets free a person who is arrested, imprisoned or detained or any person who prompts or helps such person to escape or harbours the escaped shall be liable to simple detention or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years or, in extenuating circumstances, to a fine.

(2) Any person who unlawfully gets in touch with a person who is imprisoned or detained shall be liable to a fine or, in aggravating circumstances, to simple detention or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding three months.

125. (1) Any person who—

(I) with a view to shielding some other person from prosecution for an offence or punishment, harbours him, helps him to escape or passes him off as someone else; or who

(II) destroys, changes or removes objects of importance to a public enquiry or blots out the traces of a crime;

shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years.

(2) Any person who commits such acts with a view to shielding himself or any one of his near relatives from prosecution or punishment shall not be liable to punishment.

126. (1) Any person who removes or destroys any seal or mark affixed by a public authority shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding six months.

(2) Any person who removes or damages any poster put up by any public authority shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention for any term not exceeding three months.

127. (1) Any person who evades military service or who persuades or helps any conscript to evade his liability for military service, or who incites conscripts or persons belonging to the military forces to disobedience of official orders shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years.

(2) If any of the acts referred to in subsect. (1) of this section is committed in time of war or of imminent danger of war, the penalty shall be imprisonment for any term not exceeding six years.

128. Any person who within the territory of the Danish State undertakes to recruit for war service with a foreign power shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years.

129. Any person who, without being empowered to do so, disclosed public information concerning the proceedings of the elections or plebiscites dealt with in sect. 116 of this Act or concerning negotiations of a confidential nature pursued by or in public councils or authorities shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention for any term not exceeding three months or, in aggravating circumstances, to imprisonment for the same term. The same penalty shall apply to any person who, without being empowered to do so, gives public information concerning negotiations carried on by or in any commission or committee set up by the Government, provided that the Government or the Commission or Committee concerned has published its decision that the negotiations shall be confidential.

129a. (1) Any person who publishes versions which he knows to be untrue or false quotations of communications on facts given in court sittings or at meetings of the Diet or of any local or public council or authority shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years.

(2) The same penalty shall apply to any person who, conscious of the untruthfulness of the accusation, by publicly imputing to the Government or to any other public authority an act which it has not committed, prejudices the interests of the State in relation to foreign countries.

130. Any person who exercises a public power without being entitled to do so shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention or, in aggravating circumstances, to imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years.

131. Any person who, publicly or for an unlawful purpose, pretends to be invested with a public power or public authorisation to carry on an undertaking or who without public authorization carries on an undertaking for which such authorization is required or continues to carry on an undertaking subject to an authorization of which he has been deprived shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention for any term not exceeding three months or, in aggravating circumstances, to imprisonment for the same term.

132. Any person who, intentionally or through negligence, wears, publicly or for an unlawful purpose, any badge or uniform that is restricted to any Danish or foreign public authority or military persons or that is restricted to any personnel, institution or material designed to give assistance to wounded or sick persons in case of war, or any badge or uniform that bears such resemblance to those referred to above that a mistake is reasonably likely to arise, shall be liable to a fine.

132a. Any person who takes part in the continued activities of an association, after that association has been prohibited, for the time being, by the Government or has been dissolved by judgment shall be liable to simple detention or imprisonment for any term not exceeding one year. Any person who, subsequent to the prohibition or the dissolution, joins such association as a member shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention.

Chapter XV

Offences against public peace and order

133. (1) Any person who instigates an unlawful assembly with intent to exert or to threaten violence to persons or property shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding three years or to simple detention.

(2) The same penalty shall apply to those who, in the case of an unlawful assembly the purpose of which is evident, act as the ringleaders of the assembly, and any participant who fails to comply with the order to disperse, lawfully announced by the public authorities: provided that, in the case of the latter participants, the penalty may be reduced to a fine.

(3) If, during such unlawful assembly, any of the offences covered by its purpose is committed, the instigators or ringleaders of the unlawful assembly as well as the participants of the offence committed shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding six years, provided the offence, by its nature is not subject to a more severe penalty.

134. Any participant of an unlawful assembly who, knowing that an order to disperse has been lawfully announced, does not comply with such order shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention for any term not exceeding three months or, in aggravating circumstances, to imprisonment for the same term.

134a. Any participants in brawls or any other grave disturbance of public peace and order shall, if guilty of conspiracy, be liable to simple detention or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding six months.

135. Any person who by groundless alarms, by abuse of danger signals or by similar acts causes a turnout of the police, the fire-brigade or an ambulance shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention for any term not exceeding three months.

136. (1) Any person who, without thereby having incurred a higher penalty, publicly incites others to an offence shall be liable to simple detention or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding four years or, in the case of extenuating circumstances, to a fine.

(2) Any person who, in public, expressly approves of any of the offences dealt with in Chapters XII or XIII of this Act shall be liable to simple detention or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years or, in extenuating circumstances, to a fine.

137. (1) Any person who attempts to prevent the holding of any lawful public meeting shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention or, in aggravating circumstances, in particular where the act has been accompanied by violence or threat of violence, to imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years.

(2) The same penalty shall apply to any person who by noisy behaviour or disturbance interferes with the public sittings of Diet, of the Lagting of the Faroe Islands, of municipal or other public councils, divine service or other public church ceremonies or who, in an indecorous manner, disturbs funerals.

138. (1) Any person who, intentionally or through gross negligence, gets drunk shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention if, in that condition, he endangers the person of others or properties of high value. In aggravating circumstances, in particular where considerable damage has been done and in case of recidivism, the penalty may be increased to imprisonment for six months.

(2) Any person who contravenes any order made under sect. 72, subsect. (1), of this Act shall be liable to simple detention or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding four months.

(3) Any person who contravenes any order made under sect. 72, subsect. (2), of this Act shall be liable to a fine.

139. (1) Any person who violates the sanctity of cemeteries or is guilty of indecorous treatment of corpses shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding six months.

(2) The same penalty shall apply to any person who is guilty of indecorous treatment of objects belonging to any church and used for the services of the church.

140. Any person who exposes to ridicule or insults the dogmas or worship of any lawfully existing religious community in this country shall be liable to simple detention or, in extenuating circumstances, to a fine. Prosecution shall take place only by the order of the Chief Public Prosecutor.

141. (1) Any person who, knowing that the commission of any of the offenses against the State or against the supreme authorities of the State dealt with in ss. 98, 99, 102, 106, 109, 110, 111, 112 or 113 of this Act or of an offense endangering the life or welfare of human beings or substantial public property is intended, does not make efforts, to the best of his power, to prevent the offense or its consequences, if necessary by informing the public authorities, shall be liable, provided that the offense is committed or attempted, to simple detention or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding three years or, in extenuating circumstances, to a fine.

(2) Provided that, if the efforts to prevent the commission of any of the offenses referred to in the foregoing subsection would endanger the life, health or welfare of himself or of his near relatives, the person who fails to make such efforts shall not be punished.

142. Any person who fails, on request, to give assistance to any person wielding public powers with a view to averting an accident or an offense endangering the life, health or welfare of others, when such assistance might be given without danger or sacrifice of any great importance, shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention for any term not exceeding three months.

143. Any person who fails to give evidence likely to prove the innocence of a person charged with or convicted of an offense, when this could be done without endangering the life, health or welfare of himself or of his near relatives or without risking, for himself or for any of his near relatives, prosecution for such offense, shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention or, in aggravating circumstances, to imprisonment for any term not exceeding one year.

Chapter XVI

Offenses committed while exercising a public office or function

144. Any person who, while exercising a public office or function, unlawfully receives, demands or accepts the promise of a gift or other privilege shall be liable to simple detention or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding six years or, in extenuating circumstances, to a fine.

145. If any person exercising a public office or function demands or accepts, for the purposes of gain, remuneration in respect of an official function or a tax or charge not due shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding six years. If, for the purposes of gain, he keeps such remuneration which he received in good faith, after he has become aware of the mistake, he shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years.

146. (1) If any person invested with jurisdiction or other public power to make decisions in any matter affecting the legal rights of private persons commits an injustice in deciding or examining the case, he shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding six years.

(2) If such injustice has impaired the conditions of life of any person, or if such effect has been intended, the penalty shall be imprisonment for not less than three nor more than sixteen years.

147. If any person whose duty it is to enforce the punitive power of the State applies, for that purpose, unlawful means with a view to obtaining a confession or evidence, or if he undertakes any unlawful arrest, imprisonment, search or seizure, he shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention or, in aggravating circumstances, to imprisonment for any term not exceeding three years.

148. If any person in whom jurisdiction or other public power to decide legal is vested or whose duty it is to enforce the punitive power of the State fails, intentionally or through gross negligence, to observe the procedure provided by law, as regards the examination of the case or the execution of certain judicial acts or in respect of arrest, imprisonment, search, seizure or measures of a similar nature, he shall be liable to a fine or simple detention.

149. If any person responsible for the custody of a prisoner or for the execution of sentences allows an accused person to escape, prevents the execution of sentence or unlawfully occasions a mitigation of the penalty, he shall be liable to simple detention or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding three years or, in extenuating circumstances, to a fine.

150. If any person exercising a public office or function abuses his position to force any other person to do, suffer or omit to do anything, he shall be liable to simple detention or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding three years.

151. Any person who encourages or helps a subordinate in a public office or function to commit a punishable act in pursuance of that office or function shall be liable to the penalty prescribed for such act increased by not more than one-half. The punishment of the superior shall not be affected by the fact that, owing to a mistake or for any other reason, the subordinate is not himself liable to punishment.

152. (1) If any person exercising a public office or function reveals what he has learned in the official course of his duties as a secret or what the law or any other relevant regulation declares to be secret, he shall be liable to a fine or simple detention or, in aggravating circumstances, to imprisonment for any term not exceeding one year. If it is done in order to obtain an unlawful profit for himself or for others or if, in general, he utilises the knowledge thus acquired for the purpose indicated, the penalty may be increased to imprisonment for three years.

(2) The above provisions shall apply in like manner to any person who, after he has resigned from the office in question, commits a punishable act under any of the circumstances indicated in the foregoing subsection in respect of official secrets which have come to his knowledge by virtue of the office concerned.

(3) The provisions of subsections (1) and (2) of this section shall apply in like manner to persons employed in or by telegraph or telephone services recognised by the State.

153. (1) If any person employed by the Postal or Railway Service unlawfully opens, destroys or withholds letters or parcels or assists any other person in committing such acts, he shall be liable to simple detention or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding three years.

(2) The same penalty shall apply to any person employed in the services of the State Telegraph or any other telegraph service recognised by the State, where he destroys, corrupts or embezzles a telegram handed over to the Service for transmission or assists any other person to commit any of these acts.

154. If any person, while executing a public office or function, has been guilty of false accusation, an offence relating to evidence, physical assault, deprivation of liberty, embezzlement or breach of trust, the penalty prescribed for the particular offence may be increased by not more than one-half.

155. If, in general, any person exercising a public office or function abuses his position to violate the rights of any private person or of any public authority, he shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention. Where he commits such abuse in order to obtain an unlawful privilege for himself or for others, a penalty of imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years may be inflicted.

156. If any person exercising a public office or function refuses or fails to fulfil any duty involved by the office or the function or to comply with any lawful official order, he shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention. The foregoing provision shall not apply to functions the exercise of which is based on public elections.

157. The penalty provided for in sect. 156 of this Act shall apply if any person exercising a public office or function is guilty of a serious or often repeated breach of duty or carelessness in carrying out the office or the function or in the observance of the duties inherent in the office or the function. The provisions of sect. 156, second sentence, of this Act shall apply in like manner to this section.

CHAPTER XVII

FALSE EVIDENCE AND FALSE ACCUSATION

158. (1) Any person who gives false evidence before a court or before any other public authority which has the right to administer the oath shall be liable to imprisonment for not less than three months nor more than four years.

(2) If the false evidence is given on oath or under an oath taken on a previous occasion, the penalty may be increased to imprisonment for eight years. Such declaration as by law replaces an oath shall be recognized as equivalent to an oath.

(3) If the false evidence relates only to facts irrelevant to the matter to be elucidated, the penalty may be reduced to simple detention or to a fine.

159. (1) Any person who gives false evidence when a defendant in public criminal procedure or while being examined in cases where he would not be legally required to give evidence shall not be liable to punishment.

(2) If false evidence is given in the course of an examination before any of the public authorities mentioned in sect. 158 of this Act in cases where the person examined was entitled to refuse to give evidence, the penalty may be reduced or, in extenuating circumstances, where the evidence had not been given on oath, be remitted.

160. If any person is guilty of gross negligence by giving incorrect evidence in circumstances that would otherwise make him liable to punishment under sect. 158 or sect. 159, subsect. (2), of this Act, he shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention.

161. Any person who, in any circumstance other than that provided for in sect. 158 of this Act, gives false evidence before any public authority or for the information of such authority, while offering to take his oath, on his word of honour or in a similar solemn way, where such formality is prescribed or allowed, shall be liable to a fine or simple detention or, in aggravating circumstances, to imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years.

162. (1) Any person who otherwise makes an incorrect statement before any public authority or for the information of such authority concerning matters on which he is bound to give evidence shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention for any term not exceeding six months or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding four months.

(2) The provisions of sect. 159, subsect. (1), of this Act shall apply in like manner to this section.

163. The penalty prescribed in sect. 162 of this Act shall apply to any person who, otherwise, with regard to any matter affecting the public rights of individuals, makes an incorrect written declaration or gives evidence, in writing, of matters of which he has no knowledge.

164. (1) Any person who by false accusation, false denunciation to or false evidence before a court or a public authority or by any other means attempts to cause any innocent person to be charged with or convicted of a punishable act shall be liable, in case such act is not subject to a penalty higher than simple detention for three months, to simple detention or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding three years, in other cases to imprisonment for any term not exceeding six years.

(2) The provisions of subsect. (1) of this section shall apply in like manner to any person who, by corruption or suppression of evidence or by the establishment of false evidence attempts to cause some other person to be charged with or convicted of a punishable act.

(3) Where the offense has impaired the conditions of life of any person or where such effect has been intended, the penalty shall be imprisonment for not less than two nor more than sixteen years.

(4) At the request of the injured party the sentence may prescribe that, with the aid of a public authority, one or several public papers shall publish the sentence, together with as much of the reasoning on which it is based as is deemed necessary by the court.

165. Any person who informs a public authority of a punishable act that has not been committed, or any person who lodges false complaints with the Sovereign, the Diet, a court or a public authority shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention or, in aggravating circumstances, to imprisonment for any term not exceeding one year.

Chapter XVIII

Offenses in respect of money

166. (1) Any person who counterfeits or debases money with a view to putting it into circulation as legal tender or who, for the same purpose, procures, to himself or to others, money that is counterfeited or debased, shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding twelve years.

(2) In case the forgery consists in reducing the value of legal tender, the penalty shall be imprisonment for any term not exceeding four years.

167. The putting into circulation of counterfeit or debased money shall be punishable by the same penalties as apply to counterfeiting or forgery: provided that, if the person putting the money into circulation had received it in good faith, the penalty may be reduced to simple detention or to a fine.

168. Any person who puts into circulation money that he suspects of being counterfeit or debased shall be liable to simple detention or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding three years: provided that, if the person putting the money into circulation has received it in good faith, the penalty may be reduced to a fine or, in extenuating circumstances be remitted.

169. Any person who fabricates, imports or puts into circulation objects which, by their form and appearance, bear a striking outward likeness to money or to any security intended for general circulation shall be liable to a fine.

170. Any person who unlawfully fabricates, imports or puts into circulation bills payable to bearer purporting to be used as legal tender in a smaller or wider circulation, or which may be expected to be used in such manner, shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention for any term not exceeding three months. This provision shall not apply to foreign banknotes.

Chapter XIX

Offenses in respect of evidence

171. (1) Any person who, with intent to deceive in any matter involving legal consequences, makes use of a false document shall be guilty of forgery of documents.

(2) By document is understood a written statement bearing the name of the author and purporting to serve as evidence or which is used as evidence of any right, obligation or exemption from any obligation.

(3) A document is false if it does not emanate from the author indicated by it or if anything has been added to or altered in it by anyone other than the author.

172. (1) The penalty applicable to forgery of documents shall be imprisonment which, where the document professes to contain the decision of any public authority or where it is a public bond, a cheque, a bill of exchange or other document intended for general circulation or a testamentary provision, may be extended to eight years.

(2) If the document, by its nature, or if the forgery or the inherent intention is of minor importance, or if the offender has not intended to prejudice any other person, for example where the sole inherent intention has been to obtain satisfaction for any lawful claim or to avert an unlawful claim, the penalty shall be a fine or simple detention or imprisonment for any term not exceeding one year.

173. Any person who, with intent to deceive in any matter involving legal consequences, makes use of a document carrying an authentic signature, where, nevertheless, by deceit, the signature has been obtained on a different document or on a document having a wording other than that intended by the signatory, shall be liable to the pealty prescribed in sect. 172 of this Act.

174. Any person who in any matter involving legal consequences makes use of an authentic document as relating to a person other than the one to whom it actually relates, or in any other way contrary to the purpose intended by the document, shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding six months.

175. (1) Any person who, with intent to deceive in any matter involving legal consequences, in a public document or book or in a private document or book which, by law or in pursuance of a special obligation, he is required to issue or keep, or in a medical, dental, midwife's or veterinary surgeon's report makes an incorrect statement on any matter of which the statement shall serve as evidence, shall be liable to simple detention or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding three years or, in extenuating circumstances, to a fine.

(2) The same penalty shall apply to any person who in any matter involving legal consequences makes use of such document as representing the truth.

176. (1) Any person who, with intent to deceive in commerce, makes use of articles which unlawfully have been provided with an official trade-mark or any other mark intended to guarantee the authenticity, the nature, the quality or the quantity of the article shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding three years or, in extenuating circumstances, to simple detention.

(2) Any person who in like manner makes use of articles unlawfully provided with a private trade-mark or other mark or description intended to assert a fact relating to the article and being of importance to commerce shall be liable to imprisonmeent for any term not exceeding one year or to simple detention or, in extenuating circumstances, to a fine.

(3) Any person who in the same manner makes use of articles on which any lawfully affixed trade-mark or other mark or description has been corrupted or removed shall be liable to the penalty prescribed in the last foregoing subsection.

177. (1) Any person who makes use of counterfeit or forged stamped paper, stamps or other marks used for the payment of public taxes, rates or revenue duties as well as postage stamps shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding eight years. A proportionately less severe penalty shall apply to any person who makes use of paper or stamps already used and on which the mark indicating the previous use has been removed.

(2) The provision of sect. 169 of this Act shall apply in like manner to stamps, postage stamps and similar means of discharge.

178. Any person who, with intent to deprive any other person of his right, destroys, removes or makes ineffective, in whole or in part, any evidence capable of being used as such in any matter involving legal consequences shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years or, in extenuating circumstances, to simple detention.

179. Any person who, with intent to deceive, in respect of the boundaries of a piece of land or in respect of territorial rights or rights relating to water-courses or areas covered by water, puts up a false boundary-stone or other mark of delimination, or moves, removes, alters or destroys such indication, shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding three years. If this is done in order to maintain a lawful claim or to avert an unlawful claim, the penalty shall be a fine or simple detention.

Chapter XX

Offences causing danger to the public

180. Any person who sets fire to his own property or to the property of others under such circumstances as must make him realise that the lives of other persons are thereby exposed to imminent danger, or if it is done for the purpose of effecting extensive damage to the property of others or to incite sedition, looting or other similar disturbance of public order, shall be liable to imprisonment for not less than four years.

181. (1) If, otherwise, any person causes fire to be started on the property of others, he shall be liable to imprisonment for not less than six months nor more than twelve years.

(2) The same penalty shall apply to any person who, with intent to defraud any fire insurance company, to violate the rights of mortgagees or for a similar unlawful purpose, causes fire to be started on his own property or on the property of some other person, with the consent of the latter.

(3) If the object set on fire is of minor importance or if the perpetrator is assumed not to have considered the possibility that any major damage was capable of being caused by the fire, the penalty may be reduced to the minimum degree of imprisonment.

182. Any person who through negligence causes fire to be started on the property of others or to the prejudice of the pecuniary interests of others shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention or, in aggravating circumstances, to imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years.

183. (1) Any person who, to the prejudice of the person or property of others, causes explosion, spreading of noxious gases, floods, shipwreck, railway or other traffic accident shall be liable to imprisonment for not less than six months nor more than twelve years.

(2) If such act has been committed under the circumstances indicated in sect. 180 of this Act, the penalty shall be imprisonment for not less than four years.

(3) If the act has been committed through negligence, the penalty shall be a fine or simple detention or imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years.

184. (1) Any person who, without being liable to punishment under sect. 183 of this Act, impairs the safe operation of railways, ships or planes, motor vehicles or similar means of communication, or safe traffic on public highways, shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding six years or, in extenuating circumstances, to simple detention.

(2) If the act has been committed through negligence, the penalty shall be a fine or simple detention.

185. Any person who, though he could do so without particular danger or sacrifice to himself or to others, fails to the best of his power, by notification made in due time or in any other way appropriate in the circumstances, to avert a fire, explosion, spreading of noxious gases, floods, damage to ships, railway accidents or similar accidents involving danger to human lives, shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention for any term not exceeding six months.

186. (1) Any person who endangers the life or health of others by bringing about a general shortage of drinking water or by adding injurious substances to reservoirs, water-mains or water-courses shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding ten years.

(2) If such act has been committed through negligence, the penalty shall be a fine or simple detention or, in aggravating circumstances, imprisonment for any term not exceeding one year.

187. (1) Any person—

(I) who adds poison or other substances to products intended for sale or general use so as to endanger the health of others when the product is used for the purpose for which it is designed; or

(II) who, when such products have been tainted to such extent as to make their consumption or use as designed injurious to health, subjects them to a process likely to conceal their tainted condition; or

(III) who, while concealing his interference therewith, offers for sale or otherwise tries to spread products which have been treated as mentioned in paragraphs (I) or (II) of this subsection; shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding ten years.

(2) If such act has been committed through negligence, the penalty shall be a fine or simple detention or, in aggravating circumstances, imprisonment for any term not exceeding one year.

188. (1) Any person who, without being liable to punishment under sect. 187, subsect. (1), paragraph (III), of this Act, offers for sale or otherwise tries to circulate, while concealing the injurious nature of the substance,

(I) food stuffs or stimulants being injurious to health because of corruption, or of defective preparation, mode of conservation or for similar reasons; or shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding six years or, in extenuating circumstances, to simple detention or a fine.

(II) articles for use endangering the health of others when used in the customary way;

(2) If such act has been committed through negligence, the penalty shall be simple detention or a fine.

189. (1) Any person who offers for sale or otherwise tries to circulate as drugs or preventive remedies against diseases products which he knows to be unsuitable for the purpose indicated and, if used for that purpose, to be likely to endanger the life or health of others shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding six years.

(2) If such act has been committed through negligence, the penalty shall be simple detention or a fine.

190. If, under conditions corresponding to those indicated in ss. 186 to 189 of this Act, only the life or health of domestic animals is endangered, a proportionately milder punishment within the statutory range of punishment shall be inflicted.

191. Any person who unlawfully sells drugs or poison or who sells such articles on conditions other than those prescribed by law or in pursuance of a law shall be liable to a fine.

192. (1) Any person who, by contravention of the provisions laid down by law or in pursuance of a law for preventing or combating a contagious disease, brings about the danger that such a disease will reach or spread among the public shall be liable to simple detention or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding three years.

(2) If the disease is of such nature that, under the law, it shall be liable to or at the time of the commission of the act is in fact under public treatment or against the introduction of which in the Realm special measures have been taken, the penalty shall be imprisonment for any term not exceeding six years.

(3) Any person who in such manner brings about a danger that a contagious disease will reach or spread among domestic animals or cultivated or other profitable plants shall be liable to simple detention or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years or, in extenuating circumstances, to a fine.

(4) If such contravention has been committed through negligence, the penalty shall be a fine or simple detention or, in aggravating circumstances, imprisonment for any term not exceeding six months.

Chapter XXI

Various acts causing public damage

193. (1) Any person who, in an unlawful manner, causes major disturbances in the operation of public means of communication, of the public mail service, of publicly used telegraph or telephone services or of installations for the public supply of water, gas, electricity or heat shall be liable to simple detention or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding three years or, in extenuating circumstances, to a fine.

(2) If such act has been committed through negligence, the penalty shall be a fine or simple detention for any term not exceeding six months.

194. Any person who removes, ruins or damages public monuments or other objects of public utility or ornament or belonging to public collections or subject to public conservation shall be liable to simple detention or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding three years or, in the case of extenuating circumstances, to a fine.

195. Any person who offers for sale foodstuffs which he knows to be falsely constituted or adulterated without their special nature being indicated unambiguously on the article itself or its label or its packing (as well as on the invoice, in case such a document had been made out) shall be liable to a fine or simple detention for any term not exceeding three months. If the contravention is committed in the exercise of a trade, the offender may, in case of recidivism, be deprived of the right to carry on such trade, for a specified period or for ever. This consequence of the sentence may be annulled by Royal Order.

196. (Repealed by Act, No. 256, dated 27 May 1950).

Chapter XXII

Begging and commercialised vice

197. (1) Any person who, in spite of Police warnings, is guilty of begging, or who, having formerly been convicted of or having received a warning before a court for begging, vagrancy, a sexual offence, an act of violence or an offence against property or, having received a warning or an order by the Police under ss. 198 or 199 of this Act, is guilty of begging, or who employs other persons for begging or permits any person belonging to his household and being under eighteen years of age to engage in begging, shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding six months.

(2) If the act has been committed through distress and not from habit, the penalty shall be simple detention or may, in other extenuating circumstances, be remitted.

198. (1) Where, in consequence of habitual idleness due to his own fault, a person capable of working becomes a public charge, neglects his family responsibilities in respect of any person who, for that reason, falls into distress, or does not pay the contributions due to be paid by him to wife or child, he shall be given a warning by the Police and, if possible, work shall be found for him.

(2) If, within a period of twelve months as from such intervention by the Police, he is guilty once more of any of the defaults mentioned in subsect. (1) of this section, in consequence of idleness due to his own fault, he shall be guilty of vagrancy and liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding one year.

199. (1) If a person indulges in idleness under such circumstances that there is reason to suppose that he does not make an effort to earn his living in a lawful manner, the Police shall order him to find a lawful occupation within a reasonable time and shall, if possible, find such occupation for him. If he does not comply with the order, he shall be guilty of vagrancy and liable to the penalty prescribed in sect. 198 of this Act.

(2) Gambling, prostitution or living on the earnings of prostitution shall not be considered as lawful occupations.

200. (1) Where any person has been convicted under ss. 198 or 199 of this Act, the Police may, within a period of five years as from this final release, order him to appear on specified dates to give information as to his place of domicile or residence, and to account for the manner in which he earns his livelihood.

(2) Any contravention of such order shall be punished with imprisonment for any term not exceeding four months or, in particularly extenuating circumstances, with a fine.

201. Any person who, having been expelled from the country under sect. 76 of this Act, returns without permission shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding six months or, in the case of recidivism, for any term not exceeding one year.

202. Any person who, on a commercial basis, takes advantage of the ignorance, folly or inexperience of others with a view to inducing them to engage in speculation shall be liable to simple detention or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding one year.

203. (1) Any person who makes his living by gambling or betting of a similar nature not permitted under special regulations, or by promoting such gambling, shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding one year.

(2) The court shall decide whether the profit gained shall be confiscated or repaid.

204. (1) Any person who, in a public place, provides accommodation or makes arrangements for non-authorized gambling activities shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention for any term not exceeding three months. In case of recidivism, the penalty may be increased to a higher degree of simple detention or to imprisonment for six months.

(2) Equivalent to a public place shall be deemed the premises of an association, where any person whatsoever or any person belonging to a particular social class is, as a general rule, eligible for membership of that association, or if non-authorised gambling is one of the purposes of such association, or if a special subscription is paid for participation in the gambling.

(3) Any person who takes part in non-authorised gambling in a public place shall be liable to a fine.

205. (Repealed by Act, No. 123, dated 13 March 1943).

206. Any person who, for professional purposes, makes use of false pretences or of other fradulent methods to induce anyone to emigrate shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding one year.

207. If any person contravenes the provisions of ss. 202 to 206 of this Act in the exercise of his trade, he may, in case of recidivism, be deprived of the right to carry on such trade, for a specified period or for ever. This consequence of the sentence may be annulled by Royal Order.

Chapter XXIII

Offences against family relationships

208. (1) Any married person who purports to contract a marriage shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding three years, if the second spouse was then ignorant of the existing marriage, to imprisonment for any term not exceeding six years.

(2) If the act has been committed through gross negligence, the penalty shall be simple detention or imprisonment for any term not exceeding one year.

(3) Any unmarried person who purports to contract marriage with any married person shall be liable to simple detention or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding one year.

(4) Where the purported marriage is not voidable, the penalty in respect of the married person may always be reduced to simple detention, and the unmarried person may be acquitted.

209. (1) Any person who purports to contract a marriage which, owing to the consanguinity of the parties or owing to their relationship by marriage, is voidable shall be liable to simple detention or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years.

(2) In case the marriage is not voided, the penalty may, in the case of other extenuating circumstances, be remitted.

210. (1) Any person who has sexual intercourse with any relative in lineal descent shall be guilty of incest and liable to imprisonment for not less than six months nor more than six years, and any person who has sexual intercourse with any relative in lineal ascent or with brother or sister shall also be guilty of incest and liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years. If the sexual intercourse has taken place with a lineal descendent under eighteen years of age, the penalty shall be imprisonment for not less than one nor more than ten years.

(2) The lineal descendant under eighteen years of age shall not be punished. In the case of sexual intercourse between brothers and sisters, any person who has not attained sixteen years of age may be acquitted.

211. (1) Sexual intercourse between persons related by marriage shall, where their intermarriageability is unconditionally prohibited, be punished with simple detention. In cases were exception to the prohibition can be granted, the penalty is a fine.

(2) The provision of sect. 210, subsect. (2), of this Act shall apply in like manner to this section.

212. If, in the case of consanguinity or relation by marriage dealt with in ss. 210 and 211 of this Act, sexual relations other than sexual intercourse have taken place, the penalty to be inflicted shall be proportionately reduced.

213. (1) Any person who, by neglect or degrading treatment, insults his sponse, his child or any of his dependants under eighteen years of age or any person to whom he is related by blood or marriage in lineal ascent, or who, by evading his duties to maintain or contribute to the maintenance of any such persons, exposes them to distress shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years or, in extenuating circumstances, to simple detention.

(2) Prosecution may be waived at the request of the injured person.

214. (1) Any person who, by incorrect or incomplete notification to the public authority responsible for the registration of births, corrupts the evidence of the family status of any person shall be liable to simple detention or, in extenuating circumstances, to a fine.

(2) The penalty may be remitted where an illegitimate child of a married woman is notified, with the consent of the husband, as a legitimate child.

215. Any person who withdraws some other person under eighteen years of age from the authority or care of his parents or other authorized person, or assists him to evade such authority or care, shall be punishable under the provisions of sect. 261 of this Act.

Chapter XXIV

Sexual offences

216. Any person who enforces sexual intercourse with a woman by violence, by depriving her of her liberty or by inspiring her with fear concerning the life, health or welfare of herself or of her nearest relatives shall be guilty of rape and liable to imprisonment for not less than one nor more than sixteen years or, in particular aggravating circumstances, for life. If the woman has previously had sexual intercourse of a more lasting kind with the perpetrator, the penalty shall be imprisonment for any term not exceeding eight years.

217. (1) Any person who, out of marriage, has sexual intercourse with a woman who is insane or low-grade mental defective shall be liable to imprisonment for not less than three months nor more than eight years If the woman has previously, while in a normal condition, had sexual intercourse of a more lasting kind with the perpetrator, the penalty may be reduced to the minimum degree of imprisonment.

(2) The same penalty shall apply to any person who, out of marriage, has sexual intercourse with a woman whose condition is such as to make her incapable of offering resistance to the act or of understanding its significance. If, for that purpose, the perpetrator has himself reduced her to such condition, he shall be liable to the penalty prescribed in sect. 216 of this Act.

(3) Any person who, out of marriage, has sexual intercourse with a woman who, having been admitted to a general or mental hospital or an institution for the feebleminded, is subject to the care of any one of these institutions, shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding one year.

218. Any person who, in circumstances other than those dealt with in sect. 216 or sect. 217, subsect. (1) or (2), of this Act, has sexual intercourse with a woman under menace of violence, of deprivation of liberty or of accusing her of a punishable act or dishonourable conduct, shall be liable to imprisonment for any term of not exceeding six years.

219. Any person employed in or being a supervisor at any prison, poor-house, Children's Home, mental hospital, institution for the feebleminded or any similar institution who has sexual intercourse with an inmate of any such institution shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding four years.

220. Any person who, by grave abuse of the subordinate position of economic dependence of a woman, has sexual intercourse out of marriage with her shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding one year or, where she is under 21 years of age, to imprisonment for any term not exceeding three years.

221. Any person who by trickery has sexual intercourse with any woman who wrongly believes that she is united to him in marriage or mistakes the perpetrator for some other person shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding six years.

222. (1) Any person who has sexual intercourse with any child under fifteen years of age shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding six years.

(2) If the child is under twelve years af age, or if the perpetrator has enforced the sexual intercourse in a manner other than those mentioned in sect. 216 of this Act, or by intimidation, the penalty may be increased to imprisonment for any term not exceeding twelve years.

223. (1) Any person who has sexual intercourse with a person under eighteen years of age who is his adopted child or foster-child or who has been entrusted to him for instruction or education shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding four years.

(2) The same penalty shall apply to any person who, by gravely abusing superior age or experience, induces any person under eighteen years af age to sexual intercourse.

224. If, in the circumstances indicated in ss. 216 to 223 of this Act, sexual relations other than sexual intercourse have taken place, the penalty of imprisonment to be inflicted shall be proportionately reduced.

225. (1) Any person who commits acts of sexual immorality with any person of the same sex in circumstances corresponding to those indicated in ss. 216 to 220 or 222 of this Act shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding six years.

(2) Any person who commits an act of sexual immorality with a person of the same sex under eighteen years of age shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding four years; provided that, where the persons concerned are of approximately the same age and development, punishment may be dispensed with.

(3) Any person who, by abusing superior age or experience, induces a person of the same sex and under 21 years of age to commit sexual immorality with him shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding three years.

226. If, in the circumstances provided for in the foregoing, the punishable nature of the act depends on any abnormal mental or physical condition of the injured person or on the age of that person, the perpetrator has acted without knowledge of such condition or age of the person concerned, or if, in the circumstances dealt with in sect. 217, subsect. (3), of this Act, he has acted without knowing that the person concerned has been admitted to and was subject to the care of any of the institutions indicated in that section and if, for that reason, the act is not imputable to him as intentional, the penalty to be inflicted, if he has acted negligently, shall be proportionately reduced.

227. The punishment to be inflicted under ss. 216 to 224 or 226 of this Act may be remitted if the persons between whom the illicit sexual relations have taken place have since married each other.

228. (1) Any person who, for the purpose of gain, induces some other person to indulge in sexual immorality with others or prevents any person who carries on sexual immorality as a profession from giving it up, or who keeps a brothel, shall be guilty of procuring and liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding four years.

(2) The same penalty shall apply to any person who incites or helps a person under eighteen years of age to carry on sexual immorality as a profession, or to any person who helps some other person to leave the Kingdom in order that the latter shall carry on sexual immorality as a profession abroad or shall be used for such immorality, where that person is under 21 years of age or is at the time ignorant of the purpose.

229. (1) Any person who promotes sexual immorality as a profession by acting as an intermediary or who derives profit from the activities of any person carrying on sexual immorality as a profession, shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding three years.

(2) Any man who allows himself to be maintained, in whole or in part, by a woman who makes her living by prostitution shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding four years.

(3) Any man who, in spite of the warnings of the Police, lives with a woman who makes her living by prostitution shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding one year.

(4) The same penalties prescribed in subsect. (2) or (3) of this section shall not apply to male persons under eighteen years of age whom the women are under a legal obligation to support.

230. Any person who accepts payment for committing sexual immorality with a person of the same sex shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years.

231. If any person prosecuted under the provisions of ss. 228, 229 or 230 of this Act has previously been convicted of any of the offences dealt with in these provisions or of vagrancy, or if he has been sentenced to imprisonment in respect of an offence against property, the penalty may be increased by not more than one-half.

232. Any person who by obscene behaviour violates public decency or gives public offence shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding four years or, in extenuating circumstances, to simple detention or a fine.

233. Any person who incites or invites other persons to prostitution or exhibits immoral habits in such manner as to violate public decency or to give public offence or to inconvenience neighbours shall be liable to simple detention or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding one year or, in extenuating circumstances, to a fine.

234. (1) Any person who—

(I) offers or hands over to any person under eighteen years of age obscene publications, pictures or objects; or who

(II) publishes or circulates or, for such purpose, produces or imports obscene publications, pictures or objects; or who

(III) arranges for any public lecture, performance or exhibition of an obscene nature; shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention or, in aggravating circumstances, to imprisonment for any term not exceeding six months.

(2) If any of the acts mentioned in subsect. (1) of this section is committed for commercial purposes, a fine may be imposed only in particularly extenuating circumstances.

(3) Any person who, for the purposes of gain, publishes or circulates or, for such purpose, produces or imports publications or pictures which, without being actually obscene, must be assumed to be solely intended for a commercial exploration of sensuality shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention for any term not exceeding one year.

235. (1) Any person who, in an offensive manner, advertises or offers for sale contraceptive articles or substances shall be liable to a fine. The same penalty shall be imposed on any person who, without a positive request, sends out advertisements of such articles or substances to persons who are not specifically authorized to offer them for sale.

(2) (Repealed by Act. No. 177, dated 23 June 1956).

236. (1) Where any person is convicted under ss. 216, 217, subsect. (1) or (3), 218, 222 or 223, subsect. (2) 224 (cf. any of the provisions indicated), 225, subsect. (1) (cf. ss. 216, 217, subsect. (1) or (3), 218 or 222), 225, subsect. (2) or (3), 226 (cf. any of the provisions indicated) or 232 of this Act, he may be ordered by the court not to appear in public parks or gardens, on commons, in the neighbourhood of schools, recreation-grounds, Children's Homes, mental hospitals or institutions for the feeble-minded, or in particular woods or at particular bathing establishments or seaside resorts.

(2) Besides, any person who is convicted under the sections referred to in subsect. (1) of this section or under ss. 228 or 229 of this Act may be forbidden by the court to allow children under eighteen years of age to live in their house or, without the permission of the Police, to stay themselves with persons who live together with children under the said age: provided that such order shall not apply to children who are dependants of the convicted person.

(3) At the expiration of three years after his final release, the convicted may demand that the question of continuing the operation or otherwise of any of the orders made under subsect. (1) or (2) of this section shall be brought before the court which passed sentence in the first instance and the decision of the court shall be made by court order. If an application for rescinding the order is rejected, a new application may be submitted only after three years have expired.

(4) Any contravention of the orders made under subsect. (1) or (2) of this section shall be punished with simple detention or with imprisonment for any term not exceeding four months.

Chapter XXV

Offenses of violence against the person

237. Any person who kills some other person shall be guilty of homicide and liable to imprisonment for any term ranging from five years to life.

238. (1) If a mother kills her child in the course of or immediately after childbirth, and if she is shown to have acted while in distress, from fear of disgrace or while suffering from consequent weakness, confusion or panic caused by the childbirth, she shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding four years.

(2) If the crime has only been attempted without injury to the child, the penalty may be remitted.

239. Any person who kills some other person at the explicit request of the latter shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding three years or to simple detention for not less than sixty days.

240. Any person who assists some other person in committing suicide shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention. If such an act of assistance is committed for reasons of personal interest, the penalty shall be imprisonment for any term not exceeding three years.

241. Any person who negligently causes the death of some other person shall be liable to simple detention or to a fine or, in aggravating circumstances, to imprisonment for any term not exceeding four years.

242. (Repealed by Act, No. 161, dated 18 May 1937.)

243. Any person who imports, produces or offers for sale, as a complete set or separately, articles purporting to be intended for sexual hygiene but the principal purpose of which is shown to be inducing abortion shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention for any term not exceeding three months or, in aggravating circumstances, to imprisonment for the same term. This provision shall not apply to the purchase, for therapeutic purposes, of instruments and other similar objects on behalf of medical practitioners or hospitals.

244. (1) Any person who commits violence against or otherwise attacks the person of others shall be guilty of committing an act of violence and liable to a fine or to simple detention.

(2) If the victim is a pregnant women or if, owing to the nature of the instruments or means used or the circumstances under which it has been committed, the assault was of a particularly dangerous character, the penalty may be aggravated to imprisonment for two years. The same shall apply if the violence exerted was in any other way exceptionally brutal.

(3) If the act of violence has resulted in damage to the person or health of the injured party, the penalty shall be simple detention or imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years or, in particularly extenuating circumstances, to a fine. In the case of cruelty, the penalty shall be simple detention or imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years. If the act has resulted in death or grievous bodily harm, the penalty may be increased to imprisonment for six years.

(4) Any person who, without provocation, commits violence against some other person or otherwise attacks him shall be guilty of assault and battery and shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years. If the act of violence is of a less serious nature, or in extenuating circumstances, the penalty may be reduced to simple detention; if the act of violence is of minor importance or where they are particularly extenuating circumstances, a fine may be imposed. Where the act of violence has entailed such consequences or has been of such character as to be covered by the provisions of subsect. (2) or (3) of this section, the penalty may be increased to imprisonment for six years.

(5) In the circumstances dealt with in subsect. (1) of this section public prosecution shall take place only where required by considerations of public policy.

245. (1) Any person who injures the person or health of others shall be guilty of inflicting bodily harm and liable to simple detention or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding three years or, in particularly extenuating circumstances, to a fine.

(2) In the circumstances indicated in sect. 244, subsect. (2) or (4), of this Act, or where the bodily harm has been associated with cruelty or has resulted in death or grievous bodily harm, the penalty shall be imprisonment for any term not exceeding eight years.

246. Any person who injures some other person in such manner that the latter loses or suffers a substantial impairment of his vision, hearing, speech or power of procreation, or becomes unfit, for ever or for a long, indefinite time, to discharge his professional duties or to attend the pursuits of daily life, or who inflicts on his person or health any other injury of similar consequence, shall be guilty of inflicting grievous bodily harm and liable to imprisonment for not less than one nor more than twelve years.

247. If any person convicted under sect. 244 or sect. 245 of this Act has previously been sentenced to a penalty involving the deprivation of liberty for intentional assault or for any offense associated with intentional violence, the penalty may be increased to not more than one-half.

248. (1) Where the injured party has given his consent to the assault, the penalty may be reduced and, if covered by sect. 244, subsect. (1), of this Act, the act is not punishable.

(2) Where blows have been inflicted in a brawl or where the person attacked has returned such blows, the penalty may be reduced or, in the circumstances dealt with in sect. 244, subsect. (1), of this Act, be remitted.

249. (1) Any person who negligently inflicts serious harm on the person or health of others of a nature not falling within the provisions of sect. 246 of this Act shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention. Prosecution shall take place ony at the request of the injured party, unless considerations of public policy call for prosecution.

(2) Any person who negligently inflicts harm on others of the nature described in sect. 246 of this Act shall be liable to simple detention or to a fine or, in aggravating circumstances, to imprisonment for any term not exceeding four years.

250. Any person who reduces some other person to a helpless condition or abandons, in such condition, any person entrusted to his care shall be liable to imprisonment for a term which, where the act results in death or grievous bodily harm and in other aggravating circumstances, be increased to eight years.

251. Any woman who, at the time of her childbirth, exposes her child to serious danger in an unwarrantable manner shall be liable to simple detention for not less than sixty days or to imprisonment for not more than one year. The penalty may be reduced or remitted if the child survives without having suffered any injury.

252. Any persons who, for the purposes of gain, by gross recklessness or in similar inconsiderate manner, exposes the life or health of others to impending danger shall be liable to simple detention or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding four years.

253. Any person who, though he could do so without particular danger or sacrifice to himself or others, fails

(I) to the best of his power to help any person who is in evident danger of his life, or

(II) to take such action as is required by the circumstances to rescue any person who seems to be lifeless, or as is ordered for the care of persons who have been victims of any shipwreck or any other similar accident; shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention for any term not exceeding three months.

254. Any person who, intentionally or through negligence, leaves dangerous weapons or explosives in the hands of a child under fifteen years of age or of an insane, feebleminded or intoxicated person shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention for any term not exceeding three months.

255. (1) A man who fails to give any woman whom he has got with child out of wedlock such assistance as may be necessary for her childbirth and if, for that reason, she is reduced to distress, shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding one year.

(2) If any person who is aware that the childbirth of any woman belonging to his household is approaching fails to give her the assistance necessary for that occasion, he shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention for any term not exceeding three months.

256. (1) Any person who by sexual intercourse or other sexual relations exposes any other person to infection by venereal disease if he has been or ought to have been aware of the danger of infection, shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding four years or to simple detention.

(2) If the person exposed to the infection is the spouse of the guilty person, prosecution shall take place only at the request of the former.

257. (1) Any person who places a child infected with syphilis at nurse with a woman other than its mother shall, if he has been or ought to have been aware of the danger of infection, be liable to simple detention or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding three years or, in extenuating circumstances, to a fine.

(2) The same penalty shall apply to any woman who, despite her knowledge or suspicion that she suffers or has suffered from syphilis, accepts or keeps the child of some other woman at nurse.

258. Any person who, despite his knowledge or suspicion that a child is infected with a contagious venereal disease, entrusts it to the care of any other person who has not been informed in advance of the disease or of its contagious nature, or under conditions exposing other children to infection, shall be liable to simple detention or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years or, in extenuating circumstances, to a fine.

259. Any person who, in circumstances other than those covered by the foregoing provisions, through gross negligence exposes any other person to the imminent danger of being infected with venereal disease shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention.

Chapter XXVI

Offences against personal liberty

260. Any person who—

(I) by violence or under the threat of violence, of substantial damage to property, of the deprivation of liberty or of a false accusation of having committed a punishable act or dishonourable conduct or of revealing matters appertaining to someone's private affairs, forces any other person to do, suffer or omit to do anything; or who

(II) under threat of denouncing or revealing a punishable act or of making true accusations of dishonourable conduct, forces any other person to do, suffer or omit to do anything, provided such coercion is not deemed to be duly justified by virtue of the circumstances to which the threat relates;

shall be guilty of unlawful coercion and liable to a fine or to simple detention or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years.

261. (1) Any person who deprives any other person of liberty shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding four years or, in extenuating circumstances, to simple detention.

(2) If the deprivation of liberty has been effected for the purposes of gain or if it has been of long duration or if it consisted in any person being unlawfully kept in custody as insane or feebleminded or being enlisted for foreign military service or being taken into captivity or any other state of dependence in any foreign country, the penalty shall be imprisonment for not less than one nor more than twelve years.

262. (1) Any person who, through gross negligence, brings about a deprivation of liberty of the nature referred to in sect. 261, subsect. (2), of this Act shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention or, in aggravating circumstances, to imprisonment for any term not exceeding one year.

(2) Prosecution may be waived at the request of the injured person.

Chapter XXVII

Offences against personal honour and certain individual rights

263. (1) Any person who violates the peace or privacy of others—

(I) by opening letters or otherwise appropriating any closed communication addressed to others or withholding such communication from others; or

(II) by obtaining access without a proper reason to the places where other persons keep their personal things; or

(III) by publicly communicating the strictly private affairs of others; or

(IV) by publicly communicating other matters appertaining to the private affairs of others which they can reasonably expect not to be disclosed publicly; shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention for any term not exceeding six months.

(2) The same penalty shall apply to any person who exercises or has exercised a public office or function or who, by virtue of an official authorisation or approval, carries on or has carried on any occupation, as well as any assistant of such persons, where he reveals secrets appertaining to the private affairs of others or which have come to his knowledge in the execution of his work, except where he has been under an obligation to speak or has acted in lawful protection of obvious public interest or of the personal interests of himself or others.

264. (1) Any person who violates the peace of the home by forcing his way into any house, room or ship belonging to others or into any other place that is not open to the general public shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention for any term not exceeding six months.

(2) The same penalty shall apply to any person who refuses, on request, to leave the land or premises of others.

(3) If the trespass has caused substantial disturbance of peaceful enjoyment by the occupiers or if it has been committed by an armed person or by several persons in association or has been accompanied by violence against any person or with threat of such, or if the offender has previously been sentenced to a penalty involving the deprivation of liberty in respect of any offence associated with intentional violence against any person or property, the penalty may be increased to a longer term of detention or to imprisonment for one year.

264 a. Any person who obtains access to any house or room, including public or private offices, shops, factories, etc., belonging to others with a view to appropriating documents, commercial books, etc., or to ascertaining their contents, shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding one year or, in extenuating circumstances, to simple detention. If the trespass was of the nature of housebreaking or if it was planned by an organisation or if it was accompanied by violence against any person, the penalty may be increased to imprisonment for any term not exceeding four years.

265. Any person who violates the peace of some other person improperly by intruding on him, pursuing him with letters or inconveniencing him in any other similar way, despite warnings by the Police, shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention for any term not exceeding six months.

266. Any person who, in a manner likely to inspire some other person with serious fears concerning the life, health or welfare of himself or of others, threatens to commit a punishable act shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years.

266 a. Any person who, in circumstances other than those covered by ss. 136 or 266 of this Act, makes public statements aimed at provoking acts of violence or destruction shall be liable to simple detention or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding one year or, in extenuating circumstances, to a fine.

266 b. Any person who, by circulating false rumours or accusations, persecutes or incites hatred against any group of the Danish population because of its creed, race or nationality shall be liable to simple detention or, in extenuating circumstances, to a fine. If such rumours or accusations have been made in a printed document or in any other way likely to give them a wider circulation, the punishment shall be simple detention or, in aggravating circumstances, imprisonment for any term not exceeding one year.

266 c. Any person who, subsequent to the decision of a case, continues to make such frequent and baseless allegations against the same person as to amount to a virtual persecution shall be liable, if the information is likely to prejudice the person concerned in public opinion, to a fine or to simple detention for any term not exceeding one year.

267. (1) Any person who violates the personal honour of another by offensive words or acts or by making or spreading accusations of an act likely to disparage him in the esteem of his fellow countrymen shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention for any term not exceeding one year.

(2) If the offense has been made against any of the persons mentioned in sect. 119, subsect. (2), of this Act, in connection with the execution of their office or function, in circumstances other than those covered by the provisions of sect. 121 of this Act, this shall be taken into account as an aggravating circumstance in fixing the penalty and, in such case, the punishment may be increased to imprisonment for any term not exceeding six months.

(3) In fixing the penalty it shall be considered as an aggravating circumstance if the insult was made in a printed document or in any other way likely to give it a wider circulation, or in such places or at such times as greatly to aggravate the offensive character of the act.

267a. If any person in the manner indicated in sect. 267, subsect. (3), of this Act has made a statement containing an untrue allegation against another person for acts which, if true, would make the latter unworthy to hold public office, he shall not be heard with the argument that, for the determination of his guilt or for the assessment of the penalty, standards, as they are generally accepted in society, should not apply.

268. If an allegation has been maliciously made or disseminated, or if the author has had no reasonable ground to regard it as true, he shall be guilty of slander and liable to simple detention or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years. If the allegation has not been made or disseminated publicly, the punishment may, in extenuating circumstances, be reduced to a fine.

269. (1) An allegation shall not be punishable if its truth has been established or if the author of the allegation in good faith has been under the obligation to speak or has acted in justified protection of obvious public interest or of the personal interests of himself or others.

(2) Punishment may be remitted where evidence is produced affording grounds for regarding the allegation as true.

270. (1) Where the form in which the allegation is made is unduly offensive, the penalty prescribed in sect. 267, subsect. (1), of this Act may be inflicted, even where the allegation is true; the same shall apply if the author had no reasonable grounds for making the insult.

(2) If the injured party demands punishment only under this section, the offender shall not be allowed to prove the truth of the accusation, unless this is clearly justified by considerations of public policy.

271. (1) In the case of an allegation of a punishable act, the person who made the allegation shall not be allowed to prove the commission of such act if the accused has already been finally acquitted of it at home or abroad.

(2) Proofs of a punishable act of which the person, against whom the allegation was made, has been convicted, shall not exempt the author of the allegation from punishment if, having regard to the nature of the offense, the time it was committed and other circumstances, the person convicted of it had a reasonable claim on not having the offense revealed.

272. The penalty prescribed in sect. 267 of this Act may be remitted if the act has been provoked by improper behaviour on the part of the injured person or if the latter is guilty of retaliation.

273. (1) If a defamatory allegation is unjustified, a statement to that effect shall, at the request of the injured party, be included in the sentence.

(2) Any person who is found guilty of any defamatory allegation may, at the request of the injured party, be ordered to pay a sum fixed by the court to meet the cost of publishing, in one or several public papers, of either the full report of the sentence itself or of this together with the court's reasoning.

274. (1) Any person who makes or spreads defamatory utterances against a deceased shall be liable to a fine or, in the case of slander, to simple detention.

(2) Defamatory utterances made against any person twenty years after his death shall be liable to prosecution only for the conditions laid down in sect. 268 of this Act.

275. The offenses mentioned in this Chapter shall, with the exception of those dealth with in ss. 264 a, 266 or 266 a or b, of this Act, be liable to private prosecution. In the circumstances referred to in ss. 263, subsect. (2), 264, subsect. (3), or 265 of this Act or where any person who exercises or, at the time in question, exercised a public office or function is charged with an act that may entail or might have entailed resignation of the office or function, the injured party may require public prosecution. The same shall apply where an accusation is made in an anonymous letter or in a letter signed by a false or fictitious name.

275a. Cases in which a charge is preferred in pursuance of the provisions of ss. 267 or 268 of this Act shall be tried without delay.

Chapter XXVIII

Acquisitive offenses

276. Any person who, without the consent of the owner, carries away any movable object belonging to some other person for the purpose of obtaining for himself or for others an unlawful gain by its appropriation shall be guilty of theft. For the purposes of this and the following sections, any quantity of energy that is produced, conserved or utilized for the production of light, heat, power or motion or for any other economic purpose shall be recognized as equivalent to a movable object.

277. Any person who, for the purpose of obtaining for himself or for others an unlawful gain, appropriates any movable object belonging to some other person which is not in the custody of any person or which has come into the hands of the perpetrator through a carelessness on the part of the owner or in any similar accidental way shall be guilty of misappropriation of objects found.

278. Any person who, for the purpose of obtaining for himself or for others an unlawful gain:

(i) Appropriates any movable object belonging to any other person and which is in his custody, in circumstances other than those covered by sect. 277 of this Act; or

(ii) Refuses to acknowledge receipt of a pecuniary or any other loan, or of a service for which a remuneration shall be paid; or

(iii) Unlawfully spends money that has been entrusted to him, even if he was not under the obligation to keep it separate from his own funds; shall be guilty of embezzlement.

279. Any person who, for the purpose of obtaining for himself or for others an unlawful gain, by bringing about, confirming or exploiting a mistake, induces any person to do or omit to do an act which involves the loss of property for the deceived person or for others affected by the act or the omission, shall be guilty of fraud.

280. Any person who, for the purpose of obtaining for himself or for others an unlawful gain, involves some other person in a loss of property:

(i) By abusing an authority conferred on him to act with power of attorney on behalf of the latter; or

(ii) By acting against the interests of the person concerned in respect of property held in trust by him on behalf of that person; shall, provided the case is not covered by ss. 276 to 279 of this Act, be guilty of breach of trust.

281. Any person who—

(i) for the purpose of obtaining for himself or for others an unlawful gain, threatens some other person with violence, substantial damage to goods or deprivation of liberty, with making a false accusation of a punishable act or dishonorable conduct or with revealing matters appertaining to his private life; or who

(ii) threatens some other person with denouncing or revealing a punishable action, or with making true accusations of dishonourable conduct for the purpose of obtaining for himself or for others a gain which was not justified by the action which was the occasion of the menace or threat:

shall, provided the case is not covered by sect. 228 of this Act, be guilty of extortion.

282. Any person who takes advantage of the distress, naïvetē, or inexperience of some other person or of the state of dependence of that person in relation to himself in order to obtain or stipultate in a contract any payment that is out of all proportion to the return, and any person who, having been aware of the nature of the contract at the time of acquiring an interest arising out of such contract, enforces his claim or assigns it to some other person, shall be guilty of usury.

283. (1) Any person who, for the purpose of obtaining for himself or for others an unlawful gain,

(i) sells, pawns, mortgages or in any other way disposes of property belonging to him, but on which a third party has acquired a right with which the act is incompatible; or

(ii) subsequent to the institution of bankruptcy proceedings against him or to the commencement of negotiations to agree on a composition, undertakes acts aimed at withdrawing from creditors the property and interests in the estate; or who

(iii) by false pretences, concealment, abuse of contractual forms, substantial gifts, excessive consumption, sales at cut prices, payments of or deposit of guarantee for debts not due or in any other similar manner withdraws his property or interests from his creditors or from anyone of them;

shall be guilty of misappropriation of funds.

(2) If acts of the nature indicated under paragraph (iii) of subsect. (1) of this section have been undertaken for the benefit of a creditor, the latter shall be liable to punishment only if, at the time when he foresaw the imminence of bankruptcy or the suspension of payments by the debtor, he induced the debtor to grant him such facilities.

284. Any person who accepts or obtains for himself or for others a share in profits acquired by stealing, unlawful detention of objects found, embezzlement, fraud, breach of trust, extortion, misappropriation of funds or robbery, and any person who, by hiding the articles thus acquired, by assisting in selling them or in any other similar manner helps to ensure for the benefit of another person the profits of any of these offences, shall be guilty of receiving.

285. (1) The offences referred to in ss. 276, 278 to 281 or 283 of this Act as well as receiving in connection with such offenses or with robbery shall be punished with imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years or, in the case of recidivism, three years. In the circumstances dealt with in sect. 283, subsect. (2), of this Act, the penalty in respect of the debtor as well as of the creditor who had benefited may be reduced to simple detention.

(2) Misappropriation of objects found and receiving in connection with such offenses shall be punished with a fine or simple detention or imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years.

(3) Usury shall be punished with simple detention or with imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years.

286. (1) If a theft is of an especially aggravated nature, for example, because of the manner in which it was committed, or because it was committed by several persons in association, or because the perpetrator was armed with any weapon or any other dangerous implement, or because of the high value of the object stolen, or the conditions under which they were kept, or where a large number of thefts was committed, the penalty may be increased to imprisonment for six years.

(2) The penalty for embezzlement, fraud, breach of trust, or misappropriation of funds may, where the offence is of an especially aggravated nature or where a large number of such offences was committed be increased to imprisonment up to eight years.

(3) The penalty for extortion, usury or receiving may, under similar circumstances, be increased to imprisonment for six years.

287. (1) If any of the offences dealt with in sect. 276 or ss. 278 to 284 of this Act is of very small importance because of the circumstances under which the punishable act was committed, of the small value of the objects appropriated or of the loss of property sustained or for any other reason, the penalty may be reduced to simple detention or to a fine or, in further extenuating circumstances, be remitted.

(2) In the case of unlawful detention of objects found or in the case of receiving in respect of such objects, the penalty may be remitted under extenuating circumstances.

288. (1) Any person who, for the purpose of obtaining for himself or for others an unlawful gain, by violence or threat of immediate application of such,

(I) takes or extorts from any other person a movable object belonging to the latter; or

(II) hides in a safe place any stolen object; or who

(III) forces some other person to commit any act or make any omission involving that person or any other person for whom he is acting in a loss of property;

shall be guilty of robbery and liable to imprisonment for not less than six months nor more than ten years.

(2) If the robbery has been carried out in particularly dangerous circumstances, the penalty may be increased to imprisonment up to sixteen years.

289. (Repealed by Act. No. 120, of 17 May 1956).

290. (1) Any misappropriation of funds that has not violated any right especially protected shall be prosecuted only at the request of the injured party, or if a subsequent distraint has failed to satisfy a creditor, if bankruptcy proceedings have been instituted, if negotiations to agree on a composition have been commenced, or if a petition in bankruptcy has been refused owing to the insufficiency of the assets of the estate.

(2) In the case of stealing, unlawful detention of objects found, embezzlement, fraud or receiving committed against any near relative of the offender, and in the circumstances dealt with in sect. 287 of this Act, prosecution may be waived at the request of the injured party.

Chapter XXIX

Other offenses against property

291. (1) Any person who destroys, damages or removes objects belonging to others shall be liable to a fine, or to simple detention or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding one year.

(2) In the case of very serious damage or where the perpetrator has previously been convicted under this section or in pursuance of ss. 180, 181, 183, subsect. (1) or (2), 184, subsect. (1), 193 or 194 of this Act, the penalty may be increased to imprisonment up to four years.

(3) Where the damage has been done through gross negligence in the circumstances referred to in subsect. (2) of this section, the penalty shall be a fine or simple detention or imprisonment for any term not exceeding six months.

292. (1) Any person who destroys, damages or removes his property, thereby rendering it no longer available to satisfy his creditors or anyone of them shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding one year.

(2) The provisions of sect. 290, subsect. (1), of this Act shall apply in like manner to this section.

293. (1) Any person who unlawfully uses an object belonging to some other person so as to involve the latter in any loss or considerable inconvenience shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention. In aggravating circumstances, in particular where the object is of considerable value, the penalty may be increased to imprisonment up to two years.

(2) Any person who puts obstacles in the way of any other person exercising his right of disposing of or retaining an object shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention or, in aggravating circumstances, to imprisonment for any term not exceeding six months.

294. Any person who unlawfully takes the law into his own hands shall be liable to a fine.

295. Any person who, contrary to the rights of individuals or of public authorities, executes works of embankment or erects or builds permanent installations in fresh waters or in territorial waters shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention for any term not exceeding three months.

296. (1) Any person who, in circumstances other than those covered by sect. 279 of this Act,

(I) spreads false intelligence likely to affect the prices of commodities, valuable securities or any other similar interests; or

(II) makes incorrect or misleading statements concerning the economic conditions of joint-stock companies, co-operative societies or similar undertakings through channels of public communications, in reports, in statements of accounts or in declarations to the general meeting or any proper official of a company, in notifications to the Registrar of commercial undertakings or to the Registrar of joint-stock companies or in any invitation to the establishment of such companies or to the subscription of shares; or who

(III) contravenes the provisions governing joint-stock companies or any other limited liability companies in regard to the issue of share certificates, certificates of co-operative guarantee or scrip certificates, the application of profit, the payment of dividend, or the repayment of deposits; shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years.

(2) Where any of the acts referred to in paragraphs (II) or (III) of subsect. (1) of this section has been committed through gross negligence, the punishment shall be a fine or, in aggravating circumstances, simple detention.

297. Any person who, in circumstances other than those referred to in sect. 296 of this act, knowingly makes incorrect statements in documents, business letters, circular letters or notifications concerning the economic position of the company managed or represented by him shall be liable to a fine.

298. Any person who, in circumstances other than those covered by sect. 297 of this Act,

(I) by false pretences relating to his capacity to pay obtains, for himself or for others, loans or credit resulting in a loss of property to others; who

(II) by spending a prepaid remuneration renders himself incapable of fulfilling his obligation; who

(III) departs without paying for accommodation, food, transport or any other service the receipt of which has clearly been subject to the condition that payment should be made before the departure; or who

(IV) obtains admission by trickery, without paying the fixed price, to any performance, exhibition or meeting, or to conveyance by any public means of communication or to the use of any other public establishment; shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding six months.

299. Any person who, in circumstances other than those covered by the provisions of sect. 280 of this Act,

(I) in his capacity as trustee of any property of another person involves, by neglect of duty, the latter in a substantial loss of property that is not made good prior to the promulgation of sentence in the first instance; or who

(II) in his capacity as trustee of any property of another person accepts, claims or accepts the promise of a third party, for the benefit of himself or of others, a pecuniary advantage the receipt of which is concealed from the person whose interests he is protecting, as well as any person who grants, promises or offers such advantage;

shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding six months.

300. Any person who,

(I) at a time when he is aware or ought to be aware of his inability to satisfy his creditors seriously aggravates his economic circumstances by incurring new debt, or pays or deposits guarantees for substantial debts that have fallen due; who

(II) involves his creditors in a substantial loss by extravagant habits, by gambling, by hazardous enterprises that are out of proportion to his economic circumstances, by grave mismanagement of his affairs or by any other careless conduct; or who shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding one year or, in extenuating circumstances, to a fine.

(III) in his capacity as debtor or authorised agent makes incorrect statements or is guilty of grave carelessness in submitting the declarations necessary for the commencement of negotiations to agree on a composition;

(2) Prosecution shall take place only on the conditions laid down in sect. 290, subsect. (1), of this Act.

301. Any person wo, intentionally or negligently, fails to fulfil the duty of filing a petition in bankruptcy in respect of himself or of any company of which he is the responsible manager, shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention for any term not exceeding three months.

302. Any person who fails to keep such commercial books as he is under an obligation to keep by law, or is guilty of grave irregularities in the keeping of such books or in such filing of the books or of their vouchers as is prescribed by law, shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention.

303. Any person who is guilty of gross negligence in acquiring by purchase or in receiving in any other similar manner objects acquired through an offence against property shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention. In the case of recidivism or if the offender has been previously convicted of an offence against property, the penalty may be increased to imprisonment up to six months.

304. (1) Any person who, where rights of property are amenable to decision by voting, obtains for himself or for others an improper permission or authority to paticipate in such procedure or to give more votes than he is entitled to, or acts in a manner which unduly influences the vote, shall be liable to a fine or to simple detention for any term not exceeding one year.

(2) The same penalty shall apply to any person who, in the case of any voting in a bankruptcy estate or an unencumbered estate or in the course of any negotiations to agree on a composition, influences by false pretences the casting of votes, or who grants, promises or offers, accepts, claims or accepts the promise of a pecuniary advantage for voting in a particular way or for abstaining from voting.

305. The offences dealt with in ss. 291, subsect. (1) or (3), 293, subsect. (1), 298 or 299 of this Act shall be prosecuted only at the request of the injured party; provided that the offence dealt with in sect. 293, subsect. (1), of this Act shall also be amenable to prosecution in the absence of such request, if required by considerations of public policy. The offences dealt with in ss. 293, subsect. (2), and 294 of this Act shall be liable to private prosecution.

FOREWORD

There is unanimous agreement among comparative criminal lawyers that the modern era of criminal law began with the promulgation of the Norwegian Penal Code of May 22, 1902.[1] No doubt existed, therefore, that the Norwegian Penal Code was to be among the first in the American Series of Foreign Penal Codes. Since an unselfish willingness to help is a rather predominant Norwegian characteristic, it was no difficult task to secure the very best and most competent Norwegian cooperation. Mr. Harald Schjoldager, a graduate of the Faculty of Law of the University of Oslo, as well as an American LL.M. (Yale) devoted himself to the task of translating with the thrust of a Viking ship under full sail. Mr. Finn Backer, likewise a graduate of the University of Oslo and an alumnus of New York University, Chief of Division in the Royal Ministry of Justice, stood at the helm and safely guided the translation around difficult cliffs. But it was the distinguished Norwegian criminalist Prof. Dr. jur. Johs. Andenaes, former teacher of Messrs. Schjoldager and Backer, and our Norwegian Advisory Committee member, who provided the sails for the journey. Without his kind advice and his remarkable Introduction this volume would not have become a reality. His various previous publications in English have already introduced Prof. Andenaes' erudite scholarship to American criminalists. I am, therefore, particularly proud that Prof. Andenaes has made his services available to our Project.

To all three Norwegian friends and colleagues I want to offer my sincere gratitude for a splendid scholarly performance. My gratitude is also due to the Royal Norwegian Ministry of Justice for placing Mr. Backer's services at our disposal. And I am no less grateful to our secretaries and volunteer assistants who have labored beyond and without material compensation.

The editor-in-chief of the series has used his editorial discretion only in a few instances for the preservation of unity of style within the whole series, both as to terminology and as to technical matter, e.g., the mode of indicating the latest amendment anywhere within a given section by placing the date of such amendment in square brackets at the end of the whole section.

PREFACE

In the process of translating a penal code, one is constantly confronted with the difficult task of choosing between exactitude and linguistic beauty. This translation seeks a compromise between the two demands.

Some parts of the code, especially the chapters on maritime offenses, had already been available in English, as translated by the Ministry for Foreign Affairs. This has facilitated the work. The translation into English of the Danish Penal Code has also been of considerable help.

Professor Johs. Andenaes of the University of Oslo has given me valuable assistance and advice, for which I am most grateful to him. Chief of Division Finn Backer, of the Legal Department of the Ministry of Justice, has kindly checked every section and rewritten a great number of them. He has verified the legal terminology as well as the English style, and his extensive work has greatly improved the translation, for which I am deeply indebted to him and to the Ministry of Justice.

INTRODUCTION

More than most other comprehensive legislative works, the Norwegian Penal Code of 1902, in force since January 1905, is the result of one man's efforts. The draft of 1896 which, with only few alterations, became the basis for the code, was produced by a large committee. But the dominant force in the committee's work was its chairman, Bernhard Getz (1850-1901), one of the most renowned names in Norwegian jurisprudence. Originally he was a professor at the University of Kristiania (now Oslo), but in 1890, when the new Code of Criminal Procedure of 1887 came into force, he became the first Attorney-General. A comparison of Getz's preliminary draft, the proposal of the committee, and the final code, shows only few and minor revisions.

Getz, as well as his somewhat younger friend and colleague, Professor Francis Hagerup (later Prime Minister and diplomat), was an active member of the International Association for Criminology (Internationale Kriminalistische Vereinigung), the most brilliant member of which was Franz v. Liszt. It may be said that the Penal Code of 1902 was the first important practical result of the reform ideas represented by the I.K.V. Getz's preliminary draft of 1887 was translated with comments into German and reviewed in detail by v. Liszt himself in the Norwegian legal periodical Tidsskrift for Retsvidenskab, in 1889. The code earned international reputation and was, at the time of the enactment, regarded as the most modern penal code in Europe.

The code did not, however, represent any radical reform program. It did not, as Ferri's Italian draft of 1921, or the new Swedish draft of 1957, attack the traditional concepts of punishment, guilt and criminal responsibility. One of the most characteristic features of the code is said to be the way it has combined new ideas and traditional concepts. The code is also widely based on comparative legal studies.

AMENDMENTS TO THE PENAL CODE

Since the penal code's enactment in 1902, substantial parts of it have been amended. The most important amendments will be mentioned in the following.[1]

The work of revision was initiated in 1922 by the appointment of the Commission on Revision of the Penal Code. The first result of the Commission's work was the amendment of 1927, concerning the provisions on felonies against public morals (Chapter 19). At that time, the common feeling was that the number of sexual offenses was steadily increasing and that this was due partly to the mild penalties imposed by the courts. The amendment established high minimum punishments for serious sexual offenses. Experience has proved this to be a mistake. The high minimum punishments have sometimes caused unreasonable sentences which necessarily called for the exercise of the pardoning power. In other instances unjustified acquittals by the jury have resulted, or nolle prosequis have been entered. The provisions about sexual offenses are once again being revised and, probably, the court's discretionary power to determine the measure of punishment will be restored.

In 1929 the Commission's work resulted in amendments of the provisions concerning criminal responsibility, measures pertaining to recidivists and mentally abnormal offenders, the application of suspended sentence and some other provisions.

A new Commission on Revision of the Penal Code was established in 1934 and continued the work. On the basis of its proposals, the provisions concerning offenses against personal honor (Chapter 23) were amended in 1939, and the provisions concerning offenses against property (Chapters 24–29, 31 and 40 and some other single provisions) in 1951. Due to the threatening international situation, the provisions about treason and felonies against the state (Chapters 8 and 9) were temporarily amended in 1950, as a part of the national defense effort.

[1] A German translation of the code in its original form is given in the Sammlung ausserdeutscher Strafgesetzbücher, No. 20. The code is also available in a French translation, III Ancel, Les Codes Penaux Europeens 1281 (1958).

The Commission of 1934 was reorganized in 1947 and later given the status of a permanent advisory board to the Ministry of Justice (The Penal Code Council) with the task of continuing the work of partial revision. The provisions about loss of civil rights were amended in 1953, the provisions about suspended sentence in 1955, and the provisions about felonies and misdemeanors by press in 1958. At the same time new rules about wire-tapping and illicit eavesdropping on conversations and meetings were enacted (section 145a), and some of the provisions in Chapter 2, concerning the forms of punishment, were amended or repealed. A proposal of 1953 about new provisions concerning homosexuality and certain other sexual offenses did not, however, result in new legislation. The Council's proposal of 1956 about new provisions concerning legitimate abortion resulted in a special Act of November 1960, amending section 245 of the code. Among other problems on the Council's agenda may be mentioned the provisions regarding sexual crimes and measures against recidivists and mentally abnormal offenders (sections 39–39b).

A foreign reader may perhaps get the impression that these extensive revisions are an expression of general discontent with the code. This is not at all the case. The work of revision originates from the belief that with the passage of time even a good code must be reconsidered in light of new experiences, public sentiment and developments in legal thinking.

OTHER STATUTES CONCERNING PENAL MATTERS

When the Norwegian Penal Code of 1902 was enacted, it was one of a series of laws aimed at fighting criminality in its various forms. Therefore, by studying only the penal code without reference to the other provisions regulating penal matters, the reader may gain an incorrect impression of the state of the law.

In this connection the Act of 1896 about neglected children, now replaced by the Child Welfare Act of 1953, is of paramount importance. The Act of 1896 enunciated for the first time the Scandinavian alternative to juvenile courts: a system of local administrative agencies entrusted with the care of neglected or delinquent children whose sole consideration should be the best interests of the child. The Child Welfare Boards have authority to act until the child is eighteen years of age. The penal code declares that an offender is liable to punishment when he has reached his fourteenth year of age (section 46), and the prosecution is fully entitled to initiate proceedings before the ordinary courts. But when the offender is under eighteen years of age, the prosecution will generally waive its right to prosecute, and leave it to the Child Welfare Board to decide what measures should be taken.

The Act of June 1, 1928, concerning corrective treatment of juvenile offenders, inspired to some extent by the English Borstal institution, is based on the idea of treatment rather than punishment. This Act is aimed at offenders under twenty-three years of age and permits the court to place such an offender in a reform school instead of sentencing him to imprisonment. The court must find that the offender needs "educational influence in a reform school in order to abstain from further felonies, and that such treatment will be appropriate." The duration of the treatment is decided by the central prison administration, but except under special circumstances, may not be extended over more than two years. The law does not regard commitment to a reform school as a punishment. Rather, it is considered an educational measure similar to those employed with delinquents under eighteen years of age.

The Code of Criminal Procedure of 1887 should also be mentioned. This code established an efficient prosecution headed by the Attorney-General and permanently appointed state attorneys within each district. The Attorney-General is a non-political official in a very strong position. He is subject to instructions of the King, but not subordinate to any Ministry. The prosecution has a general and discretionary power to waive prosecution if it finds special reasons therefor. When the offense in question is a felony, the state attorney needs the approval of the Attorney-General.

The power to waive prosecution (nolle-pros) is extensively used, especially with respect to young offenders and when otherwise specially extenuating circumstances are present. Occasionally it has been used also in connection with types of felonies which generally are of a very serious nature: for example, in a case where an old man had killed his insane daughter out of mercy. On the whole, a waiver of prosecution is made conditional upon good behavior during a specified probation period. A conditional waiver of prosecution, therefore, largely resembles a suspended sentence.

It should also be mentioned that the Code of Criminal Procedure contains provisions which ensure a defendant's right to assistance of counsel at the expense of the state. In all cases where the defendant is charged with a felony he is entitled to have a counsel, unless he has made a complete confession and the case is therefore subject to summary proceedings. In misdemeanor cases the court may appoint counsel for the defendant, at the expense of the state if special circumstances make it necessary. The Prison Act of 1958 has replaced the previous Prison Act of 1903. This law invests the central prison and administration with a far-reaching power to release convicts on probation. Independent of these rules, the King in Council may pardon any convict, completely or partly.

THE SYSTEM OF THE CODE

The code is divided into three parts. The first part is the General Part, containing provisions about the scope of Norwegian penal law, about penal and correctional measures, self-defense and defense of others and of property, mens rea and responsibility. Unless otherwise stated, these provisions are applicable also to the penal provisions of other laws (see section 1). The second part of the code deals with felonies, the third part with misdemeanors. The division felonies-misdemeanors is followed also in other laws (see section 2). This is mainly of procedural significance, but it also has some substantive importance. According to section 49, for example, an attempted misdemeanor is not punishable.

All the major penal provisions about felonies are to be found in the second part of the code, for instance, homicide, larceny, forgery and sexual offenses. The third part, concerning misdemeanors is not so comprehensive. The misdemeanors included in this part of the penal code are of far lesser practical importance than those of other laws, for instance, the law of 1900 about vagrancy, begging and drunkenness, or the local police regulations.

RESPONSIBILITY AND MENS REA

Following the amendment of the provisions about responsibility in 1929, the code is based on a clearly biological system. A person who has acted while insane or unconscious may not be punished. Insanity under the law also includes severe imbecility. The medical diagnosis alone is decisive. If the accused person was insane at the time of the offense, he must be acquitted without any investigation of the relationship between the illness and the criminal act. From the viewpoint of the code, there is always a possibility that such a relationship is present. If the offender is dangerous because of his illness, the community must be protected by means other than punishment. The courts also adhere to the principle that the defendant shall receive the benefit of the doubt about his state of mind, according to the general principle in dubio pro reo. The statements of psychiatric expert witnesses are in principle only advisory, but, in fact, the biological system makes their statements conclusive on the question of responsibility. In this connection it should be mentioned that Norwegian law does not regard expert witnesses as ordinary party witnesses but as court appointed witnesses. (This does not prevent a defense counsel from calling private experts as witnesses, but actually this rarely happens.) The statements of the expert witnesses are subject to control by a national public Commission for Legal Medicine. This system secures a fairly high degree of conformity in terminology and in the practice of forensic psychiatry. A somewhat controversial exception to the general rules is found in section 45 which provides that unconsciousness due to voluntary intoxication does not exclude punishment. The provision is based on considerations of deterrence but is also undoubtedly related to the general antipathy to the consumption of alcohol so frequently reflected in Norwegian law, for example, in the complicated restrictions on the sale of alcohol and in the provisions (probably the strictest in the world) about driving under the influence of alcohol.

Only acts committed intentionally or by negligence are punishable. The principal rule is that intent is necessary (section 40). Frequently a special purpose is also required, particularly the purpose of obtaining an unlawful gain for oneself or another. The so-called strict or absolute criminal liability is practically unknown in Norwegian law, and the same applies to liability of corporations and other legal entities, though a few scattered provisions of this kind can be found in penal legislation outside the code, but they are rarely resorted to. The code contains no definition of the terms intent and negligence. It is clear, however, that an act is committed intentionally if the offender had the purpose of bringing about the harm or if he thought of it as the most probable result of the act. It is disputed whether intent may be present also outside these limits (dolus eventualis). The intent must include all aspects of the factual description contained in the provision which is to be applied. If the defendant intentionally has injured another person, who dies as a result, he may not be punished for intentional homicide (section 233). But the code contains special provisions about bodily assault causing death (sections 228, 229 and 231). Here it is sufficient that the offender has been in a position to foresee the possibility of death as a result of his act (see section 43).

According to section 57, the court may reduce the punishment or even acquit the defendant because of his error of law. According to precedent, it is generally understood that the court not only may, but is obliged to acquit the offender if he cannot be blamed for the error as a result of negligence. It should be added that the courts apply very strict standards in such cases, especially when the provisions in question relate to the trade of the offender.

COMPLICITY

The rules of the code concerning complicity deserve a short explanation. The General Part contains only a single provision on complicity, section 58. This section specifies only the stipulation of punishment in cases where several persons have committed an offense in concert. Whether complicity is punishable is expressly stated in the particular section describing the offense. In most sections concerning felonies and numerous sections concerning misdemeanors, complicity is mentioned explicitly. In these cases principals and accessories are equally liable to punishment, but according to section 58 the punishment can be mitigated, and in some cases even omitted for those whose cooperation "is due essentially to dependence on other guilty persons or has been of little significance in comparison to others." When complicity is not mentioned in a section, only those directly covered by the description of the punishable act are liable to punishment.

The advantage of the code's system is that every section considers how the liability should be distributed among the persons involved. But one must admit that as a result the wording of many sections has become rather complicated.

The court must decide separately for every participant whether the conditions for liability are present. The accessory may thus be liable to punishment even if the principal is acquitted by reason of insanity, because he is outside Norwegian jurisdiction, or the like.

PUNISHMENT AND SECURITY MEASURES

The penal code does not provide for capital punishment. The last Norwegian death sentence for a crime other than treason was executed in 1876. The Military Penal Code of 1902, however, has retained capital punishment for acts of treason committed during time of war, or national emergency. These provisions, which become somewhat extended in connection with the 1950 revision of the provisions regarding treason, are to some degree applicable also to civilians.

Indefinite punishments are unknown to the code. The judge must always stipulate a fixed punishment. Imprisonment may be imposed for a specific period of time from twenty-one days up to fifteen years, or in certain cases up to twenty years (section 17). Some of the most serious felonies are punishable by imprisonment for life. According to the new Prison Act of 1958, the convict may be released on probation after having served twelve years of a life term.

The reader should keep these general rules in mind when going through the various provisions. If, for example, the code provides for "imprisonment up to three years" for a certain felony, this means imprisonment from twenty-one days up to three years. If the punishment is imprisonment for at least one year, this means imprisonment from one to fifteen years (or sometimes twenty years). When evaluating a specific penal provision, the rules of Chapter 5, concerning suspended sentence and circumstances permitting higher or lower maximum and minimum punishments, should be kept in mind.

Misdemeanors are in fact mostly punished by fines, even if the alternative of imprisonment is generally permissible. An interesting feature of the code is that the provisions for fines never contain maxima or minima. The provisions originally contained in the code (section 27) concerning such limitations were repealed in 1946, because such minima and maxima for fines are regarded as contrary to the idea expressed in section 27: that the fine shall be proportional to the economic situation of the convict. The sentence shall also stipulate a term of imprisonment which will be enforced in case the fine is not paid (section 28).

Some penal provisions permit fines and imprisonments to be applied concurrently. Where there is no special provision, the judge must choose. But an unsuspended fine may always be imposed in addition to a suspended sentence of imprisonment (section 52, no. 4).

Norway was one of the first countries in Europe to establish the use of the suspended sentence. This was done by a special statute in 1894. The rules are now found in the penal code (sections 52–54, which have been amended several times, most recently in 1955). By this amendment, the previous restrictions on the courts' discretionary power to decide on suspension were repealed. Thus, it is now permissible to pronounce a suspended sentence for all kinds of felonies and without regard to the past of the offender. The extensive use of suspended sentence is today one of the most characteristic features of Norwegian penal practice. In 1956 more than half (52 per cent) of all sentences of imprisonment were suspended. Of previously unpunished offenders 78 per cent got suspended sentences. In addition, it may be noted that extensive use is made of the right to waive prosecution. It is only natural that people have become somewhat concerned about the possibility that we may have gone too far in leniency, especially since the crime rate has been rising substantially during the last years.

When suspended sentences were introduced they were in the continental form, according to which the fulfilment of a certain punishment is suspended, conditioned on good behavior. In 1955, patterned after the Anglo-American system, the alternative of suspending the imposition of punishment was established. For the time being, this form is rarely used. The alternatives may be combined with supervision of the offender, and during the last years great efforts have been made to improve the probation service. But there is still a long way to go before the English level, which in this case serves as the nearest ideal, may be reached.

Besides the punishments, the code (in sections 39–39b) provides for special offenders, nor the preventive detention which section 39a prescribes for recidivists. Neither the security measures which section 39 prescribes for abnormal offenders, nor the preventive detentien which section 39a prescribes for recidivvists, are to be regarded as punishments. Such measures are as a rule applied in addition to punishment. This is the double-track system. Security measures, however, may be imposed alone, and if the offender was not criminally responsible when he committed the offense, only such measures may be imposed. The double-track system represents a deliberate concession to the concepts of retribution present in the community; it was assumed that public opinion would demand punishment for an offender who had committed a serious felony unless he was not criminally responsible. Since deprivation of liberty is always felt as a punishment, even where punishment is not the purpose, it is highly questionable whether this reasoning is valid. The rules about security measures and preventive detention are presently under revision and it is probable that the question concerning the double-track or the single-track system will be reconsidered.

Security measures are of greater significance than preventive detention. Most recidivists, although subject to the rules regarding preventive detention, are also covered by the rules regarding security measures, and the latter provide far more flexible methods of treatment. Of those subjected to security measures, persons with "under-developed or permanently impaired mental capacity" form the most important category. This concept includes not only intellectual defects but also serious emotional deficiencies and volitional deficiencies (psychopathies). Security measures do not necessarily entail confinement: the convict may also be placed under supervision, maintaining his freedom or semi-freedom. The prison authorities may change the measures to be applied according to experiences during the period of treatment. The court will stipulate a maximum period, in most cases five years, but this may be prolonged if necessary. Security measures are terminated when no longer necessary.

The provisions of the code about punishment and security measures establish a wide range from which the court may choose the sanction appropriate in the individual case.

Norwegian Penal Code of May 22, 1902, as of March 1, 1961

Part I—General Provisions

introductory provisions

Section 1

The first part of this code applies to all offenses, unless otherwise provided.

Section 2

The offenses treated in the second part of this code are felonies, as are offenses treated in other laws, to the extent that they are punishable by imprisonment exceeding three months, jailing exceeding six months or dismissal from public office as the principal penalty, unless otherwise provided.

The offenses treated in the third part of this code are misdemeanors, as are those treated in other laws, to the extent that they are not defined as felonies according to the above provision.

Section 3

If the penal law has been amended in the interval between the commission of an act and the trial, the penal provisions in force at the time of commission are applicable, unless otherwise provided.

The penal provisions in force at the time of decision in a particular case apply when they are more favorable to the accused than the penal provisions in force at the time of the commission of the act. Provisions which come into force after the adjudication, however, shall not apply in case the decision is appealed or rehearing requested.

Duly initiated legal proceedings or execution of punishment shall not be affected by subsequent laws restricting the time limit for prosecution or execution or making prosecution dependent upon the request of the victim or restricting it to private action.

The time limiting the victim's initiation of legal action, or request for prosecution shall in no case be computed until the law determining it has come into force.

Section 4

Wherever this code mentions the word act, it also includes the omission to act, unless otherwise expressly provided or evident from the context.

Section 5

Wherever this code uses the expression a person's next of kin, it includes his spouse, ascendants and descendants, siblings and equally related in-laws, foster-parents and foster-children, and an affianced person. Should a marriage be dissolved, the above rules apply to events prior to the dissolution.

The spouses of the in-laws are to be regarded as in-laws.

Section 6

The term movable objects as used in this code includes any power made or stored for the production of light, heat or motion.

Section 7

1. The term public place as used in this code means any place designated for general use or so used by the public.
2. An act is considered committed in public when it is committed by printed publication or in the presence of a substantial number of persons or in such a way that it could have been easily observed from a public place and was observed by anybody present at such a place or close to it.

Section 8

Whatever this law prescribes for time of war shall also apply when the armed forces or any part thereof have been alerted for war service.

Section 9

By serious injury to body or health this code means injury whereby somebody loses, or suffers substantial impairment of sight, hearing, speech or reproduction, becomes disabled, seriously disfigured, or unable to continue his work, or suffers critical or protracted illness or mental disease.
It is also considered a serious injury when, in the case of an offense committed against a pregnant woman, the fetus is damaged or destroyed as a consequence of the act.

Section 10

Printed matter means writing, representation, etc., which is reproduced by printing or other chemical or mechanical means.
Publication means also posting, placing, etc., in a public place.

Section 11

One month means one calendar month; one day means twenty-four hours.

Chapter 1

Applicability of the Norwegian Penal Law

Section 12

The Norwegian penal law is applicable, unless otherwise provided or agreed upon by a treaty with a foreign state, to acts committed:
1. in the realm, including on a Norwegian vessel on the high seas and on a Norwegian aircraft in areas outside the jurisdiction of any state.
2. on a Norwegian vessel or aircraft wherever it is, by a member of its crew or others travelling on the craft.
3. abroad by a Norwegian national or any other person domiciled in Norway when the act
(a) is covered in chapters 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 14, 17, 18, 20, 23, 24, 25, 26 or 33 or sections 135, 141, 142, 144, 169, 191–195, 199, 204, (cf. 202), 205–209, 223–225, 228–235, 242–245, 291, 292, 294 no. 2, 318, 326–328, 330 last para., 338, 367–370, 380, 381 or 423 of this law, or
(b) is a felony or misdemeanor against the Norwegian state or a Norwegian authority, or
(c) is subject to punishment also according to the laws of the country in which it has been committed.
4. abroad by a foreigner, when the act
(a) is one treated in sections 83, 88, 89, 90, 91a, 93, 94, 98–104, 110–132, 148, 149, 152, paras. 1 and 2, 153, paras. 1 to 4, 154, 159, 160, 161, 169, 174–178, 182–185, 187, 189, 190, 191–195, 202, 217, 220, 221, 223–225, 229, 231–235, 243, 244, 256, 258, 267–269, 276, 292, 324, 325, 328, 415 or 423 of this law or the Defense Secrets Law, sections 1, 2, 3, or 5 or

(b) is a felony punishable also according to the laws of the country in which it has been committed, and the guilty person is domiciled in the realm or is staying here.

In cases where the punishability of the act depends on or is influenced by an actual or intended effect,the act is considered to have been committed also where the effect has occurred or is intended to occur. [5–11–1951]

Section 13

In the instances mentioned in section 12, No. 4, legal proceedings can be initiated only by the decision of the King.

In the instances mentioned in section 12, No. 4 (b) legal proceedings cannot be initiated, unless the perpetrator actually can be punished according to the laws of the country in which the act has been committed. Nor can more severe punishment be inflicted than provided for by the laws of that country.

In every case where somebody has been punished, abroad, and in this country is convicted of the same offense, the punishment already served shall, if possible, be deducted from his sentence.

Section 14

The application of the above described rules is circumscribed by generally acknowledged exceptions of international law.

CHAPTER 2

PENAL AND CORRECTIONAL MEASURES [2–22–1929]

Section 15

Ordinary punishments are: imprisonment, jailing and fines.

Under special circumstances a person may be deprived of certain rights as mentioned in section 29.

A person may be sentenced to loss of rights in addition to, or instead of, other punishment. Deprivation of rights may not be substituted for other punishment where the law specifies confinement for at least one year as punishment for an act. [5–22–1953]

Section 16

The following supplementary punishments may be combined with the punishments mentioned in section 15:

1. Deprivation of rights as stated in sections 30 and 31.
2. Banishment from specified places (section 33).
3. Repealed. [3–10–1939]
4. Confiscation of specific objects (section 34). [5–22–1953]

Section 17

Imprisonment may be imposed

1. for a period of twenty-one days to fifteen years or, in the cases mentioned in section 62, up to twenty years;
2. for life.

The term imprisonment as used in this code means imprisonment for a limited period of time, unless the contrary is expressly stated.

Anybody sentenced to imprisonment may be released on probation in accordance with the provisions of a special law (section 26).

Section 18

Repealed. [12–12–1958]

Section 19

Repealed. [12–12–1958]

Section 20

Should a person sentenced to, or serving, a term of imprisonment for life commit an offense, he may be disciplined according to one or more of the provisions of the Prison Act.

If the offense is a felony, the perpetrator may also be sentenced to solitary confinement up to six years. The punishments mentioned in the first para. of this section may be imposed in addition to solitary confinement.

The provisions in section 16 apply also in the cases mentioned in this section.

Section 21

If a person serving a jail sentence should be sentenced to imprisonment, he would generally serve the latter sentence first and the former afterwards.

Section 22

A jail sentence may be imposed for a period of from twenty-one days to twenty years. Two days of jailing correspond to one day of imprisonment.

Section 23

At a convict's request, or with his consent, a jail sentence may be converted to imprisonment.

Section 24

Where imprisonment is specified as the only form of confinement, a corresponding jail sentence may be pronounced, provided special circumstances seem to indicate that the offense did not originate from a depraved mind.

Section 25

Confinement up to four months is stipulated in days. Confinement over four months is stipulated in months and years.

Section 26

The more specific rules, necessary for the enforcement of the above provisions, as well as for the arrangement and administration of prisons and for the treatment of prisoners, are provided in a separate law.

Section 27

When the convict is sentenced to a fine, consideration shall be given not only to the offense he has committed, but also specifically to his economic position and the amount he can afford to pay.

The fine shall be paid to the State Treasury. [7–19–1946]

Section 28

In accordance with detailed provisions prescribed by the King, an imposed fine may be paid in instalments or accumulated in state or community service. The prosecution may order the employer of a convict to withhold from his wages and pay to the police an amount sufficient to cover the fine. If a deduction from the wages for taxes or alimony has already been decreed, such commitments have priority over deductions for fines. Absent the convict's consent, not more than one-third of the wages may be deducted to cover fines. If the employer fails to withhold wages as ordered by the prosecution, he is liable for the deductible amount. In this case, as well as when the employer fails to pay to the police the retained amount, payment may be enforced through levy of execution.

If the fine is not paid or accumulated, it shall be levied by execution, unless the convict's earnings or economic position are found to be severely diminished thereby.

In case the fine is not paid in any of the above mentioned ways, the sentence shall provide a prison term from one day to three months, or in the cases mentioned insection 63, up to four and one-half months.

If the convict has paid part of the fine and the rest is to be converted to imprisonment, the latter is reduced proportionately. Part of a day counts as a full day. If the fine is converted to imprisonment which is served in part and the convict offers to pay the balance of the fine, only the full days served shall count. [6–6–1930]

Section 29

When regarded necessary for the public good, anybody found guilty of an offense may be sentenced to:

1. Loss of public office for which the convict, because of the offense, has proved himself unfit or unworthy.

2. Loss for a definite period of up to five years, or forever, of the right to hold office or to pursue a certain occupation for which the convict, because of his offense, has proved to be unfit, or which he might misuse, or for which a high degree of public confidence is required. A person forbidden to practice a certain occupation may not engage in it on behalf of someone else. The convict may be required to surrender documents or other objects which have served as certificate or proof of such right. [5–22–1953]

Section 30

The sentence may deprive the convict, for a definite period or for all time, of the right to serve in the armed forces when his offense indicates that his service would be contrary to the interests of national defense.

A person deprived of the right to serve in the armed forces may, by a decision of the Magistrate's Court, regain such right before the expiration of the stipulated period, provided there is no longer any reason to exclude him from service. The convict or the prosecution may request such decision. The convict must make his request to the prosecution which prepares the case for the court. If the request is denied, it may not be repeated for two years. [5–22–1953]

Section 31

Anybody convicted of any of the offenses mentioned in chapters 8, 9 or 10, may, when general considerations demand it, be deprived of the right to vote in public plebiscites and elections for a period of up to ten years. [5–22–1953]

Section 32

A deprivation of right becomes effective on the day the sentence becomes final.

The time during which a convict serves, or avoids serving, a prison term included in the sentence, does not count as part of the period for which he is deprived of a right. [5–22–1953]

Section 33

If the nature of an offense or its motivation indicates that the presence of the convict at a designated place is connected with special danger to persons or property, the sentence may forbid him to live or appear at that place or within a specified distance therefrom.

When the prohibition no longer seems necessary, it may be terminated by the King or someone authorized by him, with or without conditions, for a limited or unlimited time.

Section 34

Objects created through an offense, or employed in an intentional felony, may be confiscated by the sentence when they belong to the convict.

Section 35

Objects which are by their nature destined for use as implements in committing an offense, may be confiscated by court order in the public interest, regardless of who owns them and whether or not anyone is, or can be, prosecuted. The same applies to burglars' tools and explosives owned or kept by anyone who has repeatedly been sentenced to imprisonment for theft, receipt of stolen goods, or robbery, either in Norway or abroad, unless it is proven that the tools or explosives are to be used for a legal purpose. [5–11–1951]

Section 36

The profit resulting from an offense, or an amount equal to the profit may, by court order, be seized from the guilty person or the person in whose behalf he was acting, whether or not anybody is, or can be, prosecuted.

If a punishable activity is carried on habitually, the amount subject to confiscation may be determined according to the probable profit of the entire activity.

Section 37

Confiscated funds accrue to the State Treasury, unless otherwise stated.

If the victim of an offense is unable to obtain damages from the offender, the confiscated objects shall, as far as possible, be used to cover the damage claim.

Section 38

A printed matter of felonious character may be confiscated by court order regardless of whether anybody is punished for the publication, or even if the author cannot be punished because of circumstances mentioned in section 249 No. 3 or other conditions which bar punishment.

The decision shall indicate the parts of the publication which occasion the confiscation. Upon enforcement of the decision, the remaining part of the publication shall, if possible, be taken out and returned to the person concerned, at his request and his own cost.

Confiscation may also include plates and molds prepared for printing; at the request of the party concerned and at his own cost, arrangement shall be made for dismantling the printing type instead of confiscating it.

The above provisions do not apply to copies which are inaccessible to the public or which are not intended for further distribution from their present location. [12-12-1958]

Section 39

1. If an otherwise punishable act is committed in a state of insanity or unconsciousness, or if an offense is committed during unconsciousness due to voluntary intoxication (section 45) or during temporarily reduced consciousness or by someone with underdeveloped or permanently impaired mental capacity, and there is danger that the perpetrator because of his condition will repeat such an act, the court may decide that, for purposes of safety, the prosecution shall

(a) assign or forbid him a certain place of residence,

(b) place him under the supervision of the police or a specially appointed probation officer and order him to report to the police or the probation officer at designated intervals,

(c) forbid him to consume alcoholic beverages,

(d) place him in reliable, private care,

(e) place him in a mental hospital, sanatorium, nursing home, or workhouse, where possible, in accordance with general provisions promulgated by the King.

(f) keep him in custody. [2-22-1929]

2. If such condition involves danger of acts of the kind covered by sections 148, 149, 152 para. 2, 153 paras. 1 to 3, 154, 155, 159, 160, 161, 191, 192, 193, 195, 196, 197, 198, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 206, 212, 217, 224, 225, 227, 230, 231, 233, 245 para. 1, 258, 266, 267, 268 or 298, the court must decide to apply such security measures as are mentioned above. [5-11-1951]

3. These measures are terminated when they are no longer regarded as necessary, but may be resumed if there should be reason to do so. The security measures listed under (a)-(d) may be employed concurrently.

The court shall determine the maximum period for which security measures may be imposed without its further consent.

4. If the court has not decided otherwise, the prosecution may choose between the above-mentioned security measures.

The decision to terminate, resume or alter a security measure is made by the ministry. Before a decision about security measures or their termination is made, the opinion of a medical specialist must ordinarily be obtained. The same procedure should be followed at regular intervals during the period in which security measures are in force.

5. If security measures, as mentioned in No. 1 above, are imposed, the ministry may decide to forgo all or part of the punishment to which a transgressor might be sentenced.

6. If the perpetrator is placed in a mental hospital and the court has not in advance decided that security measures are to be employed, the prosecution shall be notified before discharge. Discharge shall not take place until there has been opportunity to obtain the decision of the court on the imposition of further measures in accordance with this section. The offender may not be kept in the hospital waiting for such decision for more than three months after the director of the hospital has notified the prosecution that he will be certified as recovered.

7. If the perpetrator is not a Norwegian citizen, the ministry may decide to deport him instead of subjecting him to security measures according to this section, unless otherwise agreed by treaty with a foreign state.

Section 39a

1. If the defendant is guilty of several attempted or completed felonies punishable according to sections 148, 149, 152, para. 2, 153, paras. 1–3, 154, 159, 160, 161, 174, 178, cf. 174, 191, 192, 193, 195, 196, 197, 198, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 206, 207, 212, 217, 224, 225, 227, 230, 231, 233, 245, para. 1, 258, 266, 267, 268 or 292, and the court has reason to assume that he will again commit a felony of the kind named above, the court shall decide that he is to be kept in preventive detention after he has served all or part of his sentence, so long as this is necessary.

The court shall determine the maximum period for which preventive detention may be imposed without its further consent. [5–11–1951]

2. If the defendant is a person with underdeveloped or impaired mental capacity, the court may decide to employ security measures in accordance with section 39 instead of punishment and preventive detention in accordance with this section. Such decision may also be made by the ministry.

3. The ministry may decide to transfer the convict from prison to preventive detention when he has served at least one-third of the term to which he was sentenced.

4. The ministry may release the convict on probation when the punishment to which he is sentenced has been fully served, or when the punishment served and preventive detention together equal at least the prison term to which he was sentenced. As a condition for the release the ministry may assign or forbid him a certain place of residence, order him to report at regular intervals to the police or an appointed probation officer, forbid him to consume alcoholic beverages, and order him, within his financial capacity, to pay the victim compensation for economic loss and suffering.

If during the five years following his release on probation the convict has not committed any intentional felony and has acted in accordance with the conditions set, the release becomes final.

5. If the stipulated punishment has been served in part, it is regarded as completed as of the time the convict is released from preventive detention, unless he is again confined.

6. If the convict is not a Norwegian citizen the ministry may decide to deport him when the punishment to which he is sentenced is served, unless otherwise agreed upon by treaty with a foreign state. [2–22–1929]

Section 39b

1. The prosecution may proceed according to section 39 without demanding punishment, provided the right to prosecute has not expired. In such a case proceedings may be brought regardless of whether the conditions mentioned in section 87 of the Code of Criminal Procedure are present. Request for prosecution by the victim is not required. Such proceedings must always be brought in the City or County Court, and must be treated according to the rules in the Code of Criminal Procedure.

2. In a criminal case, if no decision is made about security measures according to sections 39 or 39a, the prosecution may, where there are special reasons, bring the question before the court within one year after sentence has been served. The provisions in the last sentence of No. 1, above, apply in such cases.

3. When the court provides that security measures shall be imposed, or when a court denies a request for such measures, the decision shall be in the form of a judgment.

In cases before the Court of Appeals, security measures may not be imposed unless the jury, by more than six votes, has affirmed that the conditions listed in section 39, Nos. 1 and 2, or section 39a No. 1, are present.

4. When a person is released on probation from a jail, sanatorium or nursing home, and the question of recommitment arises, the prosecution may have him arrested and, on specific instructions from the Magistrate's Court, keep him in custody until the matter is decided.

5. Detailed rules about the security measures mentioned in sections 39 and 39a, and about the questions to be presented to the jury as provided in No. 3, above, may be issued by the King. [2–22–1929]

Chapter 3

Conditions determining punishability

Section 40

The penal provisions of this code do not apply to an act committed unintentionally unless it is explicitly provided or unmistakably implied that a negligent act is also punishable.

A misdemeanor consisting of omission to act is also punishable when committed by negligence, unless the contrary is explicitly provided or unmistakably implied.

Section 41

In cases where a superior cannot be punished for a misdemeanor committed by somebody in his service, the subordinate can always be held responsible, even if the penal provision, according to its wording alone, is directed against the superior.

Section 42

To a person who has committed an act in ignorance of circumstances determining the punishability of the act or increasing his liability for punishment, these circumstances are not attributable.

Where the ignorance can be ascribed to negligence, the punishment provided for a negligent act is applied, if negligence is punishable.

Error regarding the value of an object or the estimated amount of damages caused will be taken into account only when punishability depends thereon.

Section 43

Where the law provides that an unintentional consequence of a punishable act entails increased punishment, the more severe punishment applies only where the offender could have foreseen the possibility of such a consequence, or where, in spite of his ability to do so, he has failed to prevent such a consequence after having been made aware of the danger.

Section 44

An act is not punishable if committed while the perpetrator was insane or unconscious. [2–22–1929]

Section 45

Unconsciousness due to voluntary intoxication (produced by alcohol or other means) does not exclude punishment. [2–22–1929]

Section 46

Nobody may be punished for an act committed before he has completed his fourteenth year.

Section 47

Nobody may be punished for an act committed to save the person or property of another from an otherwise inevitable danger, where the circumstances justified him in regarding this danger as extremely significant in relation to the damage his act might cause.

Section 48

Nobody may be punished for an act committed in self-defense.

Self-defense exists when an otherwise punishable act is committed for the prevention of, or in defense against, an unlawful attack, as long as the act does not exceed what is necessary; moreover, in relation to the attack, the guilt of the assailant, and the legal values attacked, it must not be considered absolutely improper to inflict so great an evil as intended by the act of self-defense.

The above rule concerning the prevention of unlawful attack applies also to acts performed for the purpose of lawful arrest or for the prevention of a prisoner's escape from prison or custody.

Anybody who has exceeded the limits of self-defense is nevertheless not to be punished if the excess is due solely to emotional upset or derangement produced by the attack.

ATTEMPT

Section 49

An attempt to commit a felony is punishable. An attempt is an act purposively directed at, but failing short of, completion of the felony.

An attempt to commit a misdemeanor is not punishable.

Section 50

An attempted felony is not considered punishable if the offender, before he knows that the felonious attempt has been discovered, by his own free will desists from the continuation of the felonious act before the attempt has been completed, or prevents the result which would constitute the completed felony.

Section 51

The attempt is subject to milder punishment than the completed felony; the punishment may be reduced to less than the minimum provided for such an offense or to a milder type of punishment.

The maximum punishment provided for a completed felony may be applied if the attempt has led to such a result as would justify that punishment if it had been purposely achieved.

Chapter 5

GROUNDS FOR MITIGATING OR AGGRAVATING PUNISHMENT

Section 52

1. Upon conviction of an offense, the court may provide in its judgment that the execution of the punishment shall be suspended, unless the concern for general law-abidance or for restraining the convict from further offenses requires execution of the punishment.

The court may also defer pronouncing sentence, if this is deemed to serve the purpose best.

If a substantial part of the sentence is considered served by time spent in custody, the court may decide to suspend enforcement of the remaining punishment.

2. If the convict has been kept in confinement in the course of five years preceding the offense, the court may decide upon suspension only under special circumstances.

The same applies when the convict is sentenced to be kept in confinement for more than one year, or the law provides a minimum punishment of more than one year's imprisonment for the felonies of which the convict is found guilty.

3. When the court decides upon suspension, it shall, in the judgment, stipulate a probation period of two years from the pronouncement of the final judgment. In special cases, a probation period up to five years may be stipulated.

4. When the execution of a prison or jail term is suspended, the court may in addition to the confinement impose fines, the payment of which is not suspended. This applies even where fines are not otherwise specified as punishment for violation of the law.

5. The court shall, as a condition for suspension, order the convict to pay compensation for economic loss and suffering to which the victim is entitled and which he has claimed, and which the court finds to be within the convict's ability to pay.

6. The court may also set the following conditions for suspension:

(a) that the convict seek employment or training for a trade,

(b) that he completely abstain from alcoholic beverages or other intoxicating or narcotic preparations,

(c) that he stay at a sanatorium or undergo other cure prescribed by a doctor or temperance commission, to counteract abuse of alcohol or other intoxicating or narcotic preparations,

(d) that he pay support which is or will become due during the probation period,

(e) that during the probation period he stay away from or remain at a designated place.

When there is reason for it, the court may also impose other conditions.

7. If the court considers it best for the support and welfare of the convict, it shall be specified in the judgment that he shall be under the supervision of an approved welfare organization during all or part of the probation period. The court may also decide that supervision shall be carried on by a person appointed by the (trial) court or the Magistrate's Court. In such a case the convict shall, if possible, be under the general supervision of the welfare organization.

The person exercising such supervision shall see to it that the legal regulations and the specific conditions are maintained, and shall furthermore counsel the convict and try to help him toward work or education and toward an ordered way of life.

The King issues specific rules concerning supervision.

8. A sentence specifying deprivation of a right becomes effective even where the execution of other punishments is suspended, cf. section 32.

The suspension does not extend to other supplementary punishments or to non-punitive confiscation. [6–3–1955]

Section 53

1. Should the convict, during the probation period, be found guilty of an offense committed before the sentence was pronounced, the court decides for both acts whether he shall be sentenced to punishment and whether the sentence shall be executed, or if the sentence shall be suspended (cf. section 52). The provisions of section 64 (cf. sections 62 and 63) apply similarly.

If a suspended sentence is imposed, the court specifies a new probation period which runs from the pronouncement of the final judgment in the new case.

2. If the convict commits an offense during the probation period and action is started or adjudication of the case is requested in the Magistrate's Court within six months after the expiration of the probation period, the court may

(a) specify a combined unconditional punishment for both offenses,

(b) pronounce a separate sentence for the new act, or

(c) pronounce a new suspended sentence for both acts in accordance with the rules of section 52, where there are special reasons for it.

3. During the probation period the Magistrate's Court may decide by a ruling that a convict shall be under supervision, and may provide new conditions on the basis of the convict's behavior. The court may also extend the probation period, but for not more than a total of five years.

The supervision may be terminated by the Magistrate's Court when it is no longer found necessary. The same applies to conditions which may have been imposed.

Decisions mentioned here may also be made by another court which has jurisdiction of the case according to No. 1 or 2.

4. If the convict fails to fulfil the conditions provided for suspension, avoids supervision, disregards orders given by the supervisor, or indulges in drinking, idleness or other improper habits, the Magistrate's Court may during the probation period decide that the punishment shall be executed.

If punishment is not previously specified, it may be provided now, in which case it is to be executed. Decisions mentioned here are made as judgments by the Magistrate's Court upon request of the prosecution.

5. If a case is settled out of court by the offender's acceptance of a fine suggested by the prosecution, the settlement may provide for suspension of payment in accordance with the rules of sections 52 and 53. [6–3–1955]

Section 54

When a suspended sentence is read to or served on the convict, he shall be acquainted with the meaning of a suspended sentence and with the consequences of not complying with the conditions. The judge should also give the convict such warning and admonition as his age and general circumstances might require. For this purpose the convict may be summoned to a special session of the court.

If the convict is placed under supervision, the judge shall explain to him the significance of the supervision and his duty to comply with the instructions provided under the supervision. [6–3–1955]

Section 55

For offenses committed by a person under eighteen years of age, confinement for life may not be used and punishment of the kind specified may be reduced below the minimum provided for the act.

If the convict is under eighteen years of age at the time of sentencing, the court may refrain from imposing punishment and, instead, provide in the sentence for the Child Welfare Board to take action in accordance with the Child Welfare Law. [6–3–1955]

Section 56

1. The court may reduce the punishment below the minimum provided for the offense and commute it to a milder form of punishment:

(a) when the act is committed in order to save the life or property of a person, but the limits for the right, as stated in sections 47 and 48, are exceeded;

(b) when the act is committed in justifiable anger, under compulsion or imminent danger or during temporary strong reduction of consciousness not due to voluntary intoxication.

2. When the act is committed in a state of unconsciousness due to voluntary intoxication (section 45), the punishment may, under extremely extenuating circumstances, be reduced to less than the minimum provided, unless the convict had become intoxicated for the purpose of committing the act. [2–22–1929]

Section 57

If a person was ignorant of the illegal nature of an act at the time of its commission, the court may reduce the punishment to less than the minimum provided for such an act, and to a milder form of punishment, provided the court does not decide to acquit him for this reason.

Section 58

Where several persons have cooperated in committing an offense, the punishment may be reduced to less than the minimum provided for the act and to a milder form of punishment if the cooperation was due essentially to dependence on other guilty persons or has been of little significance in comparison to others. Where the penalty otherwise could have been restricted to fines, and in the case of misdemeanors, punishment may be entirely remitted.

Section 59

The provisions of the foregoing section apply also to a person who, before he knew he was suspected, has as far as possible and substantially prevented the harmful consequences of the act, or has restored the damage done by it, or has reported himself and made a full confession.

Section 60

If the convict has been kept in custody pending trial, not imposed by reason of his conduct during the pendency of trial, the sentence should provide for the deduction of such period from the punishment ultimately imposed, so that the latter may even be considered as completely served.

Section 61

Provisions concerning increased punishment in case of recidivism are applicable only to persons who have completed their eighteenth year at the time of the commission of the earlier offense and who have committed the new offense after the punishment for the previously committed offense has been served partially or completely. Unless otherwise provided, there is no increase of punishment where the new offense, if a felony, is committed more than six years, and if a misdemeanor, more than two years, after the punishment for the previous offense has been served completely.

The court may allow previous punishments imposed in other countries to serve as a basis for increased punishment in the same manner as punishments imposed in this country.

Section 62

If anybody has, by one or several acts, committed more than one felony or misdemeanor which should have resulted in prison or jail sentences, a common sentence of confinement is provided which must be more severe than the highest minimum penalty provided for any of the single felonies or misdemeanors and must in no case exceed by more than one-half the maximum set for any one of them. Where any of the single offenses would have resulted in imprisonment, the common punishment generally provides for a prison sentence.

If any of the felonies or misdemeanors should have resulted in imprisonment, the same supplementary punishments as would apply in case of a prison sentence are imposed also in case of a jail sentence.

Under special circumstances, the court may provide a separate prison sentence, which is to be served for one or more of the offenses, and impose a suspended sentence for the others in accordance with sections 52 to 53. [6-30-1955]

Section 63

If anybody has, by one or more acts, committed several felonies or misdemeanors punishable by fine, a common fine is provided which must be more severe than that imposable for any of the single felonies or misdemeanors.

Where some of the felonies or misdemeanors are punishable by any kind of confinement and others by fine, the court may consider those felonies or misdemeanors for which fines are provided as aggravating circumstances instead of pronouncing sentence on the separate acts.

Section 64

If anybody already sentenced to punishment is found guilty of a felony or misdemeanor committed before sentence, the rules in sections 62 and 63 are applied as far as possible, for determining the punishment.

In this case the convict may be sentenced to confinement for less than twenty-one days.

If a prison term is to be served in lieu of fines for several convictions, that part of the prison sentence which exceeds what could have been imposed in one sentence is dismissed if the punishable acts are committed before sentence has been pronounced for any of them.

Section 65

Repealed. [2-22-1929]

Chapter 6

Cessation of punishability

Section 66

The right to initiate criminal proceedings or to pronounce a penal sentence ceases:

1. with the death of the offender;
2. after certain time limits, according to the following rules.

Section 67

The period of limitation required for offenses with maximum legal punishment of life imprisonment is twenty-five years; imprisonment for a limited time exceeding ten years, twenty years;

imprisonment up to ten years, fifteen years;
imprisonment up to five years, ten years;
imprisonment up to two years, five years;
imprisonment up to six months, two years.

For offenses for which the severest punishment is jailing, the period of limitation is half that provided for imprisonment.

The limitation period for other offenses is one year.

Section 68

Expiration of the time limit does not prevent initiation of proceedings for confiscation in accordance with sections 35 and 36, or for removal from public office, or for declaring an accusation null and void in accordance with section 251, para. 1, and section 253. [3-10-1939]

Section 69

The period of limitation begins to run on the day the punishable activity stops or the punishable condition ceases.

When the punishability of an act is dependent on or influenced by the harm in which it results, the period of limitation may in no case begin prior to the creation of the harm.

If, as a result of the offense, a person is unjustly deprived of freedom either by judgment or otherwise, the period of limitation runs from the day the victim has regained his freedom or died.

If an offense of the kind treated in Chapters 30 and 42 is committed abroad, or if an offense is committed on board a Norwegian ship, the period of limitation does not begin before the day the ship has come to a Norwegian port or to a place with a Norwegian consul, but its commencement may in no case be postponed for more than one year.

Section 70

The running of the period of limitation is interrupted by any legal proceeding in which the perpetrator is described as the accused.

If the proceedings are terminated or suspended for an indefinite period, the running of the period of limitation is resumed from that time.

If proceedings cannot be initiated or continued before a claim advanced in another case is settled, the period of limitation does not run so long as this case continues without interruption.

Section 71

After the death of the convict, punishment may not be executed; his death has no influence, however, on confiscation of objects or profits of the offense (sections 34–36) provided for in the sentence, or on a decision to publish the sentence.

Section 72

The power to execute the following punishments ceases after these time limits:

for life imprisonment—after thirty years;

for imprisonment for a specified time exceeding ten years—after twenty years;

for imprisonment up to five years—after fifteen years;

for imprisonment up to one year—after ten years;

for imprisonment up to three months—after five years;

for jailing—after one-half of the period specified for imprisonment, but not before a period equal to the sentence, and in no case before five years;

for fines over twenty kroner—after five years;

for fines up to twenty kroner—after two years.

If execution cannot begin because another term is being served in this country or abroad or has been suspended according to section 52, the period of limitation does not run during this time.

Section 73

The period of limitation begins to run from the day the sentence becomes final, but in no case before the beginning of the period in which criminal proceedings must be initiated according to section 69.

The period of limitation ceases to run when execution of punishment begins or when the convict is arrested to insure execution.

If the convict is released or has escaped before the execution of the punishment has commenced, or if the punishment is discontinued, a new period of limitation begins, the duration of which is computed according to the punishment which remains to be served.

If a release on probation is revoked, the period of limitation begins from the time of revocation.

Section 74

The running of the period of limitation is similarly interrupted when anybody who is sentenced to imprisonment for more than six months is found guilty of a felony committed after the sentence and for which he is sentenced to imprisonment for more than two years in this country or abroad.

However, a new period of limitation begins to run from the commission of the last felony (section 69).

Section 75

Repealed. [5–22–1955]

Section 76

Repealed. [5–22–1955]

CHAPTER 7

THE PROSECUTION

Section 77

Unless otherwise provided, offenses shall be subject to public prosecution.

Section 78

In those cases where only the victim may institute legal action, or where public prosecution cannot be instituted without his request, the guardian or one of the parents, or, if the parents are deceased, one of the grandparents of the victim acts in his behalf if he is under eighteen years of age. However, a prosecution may not be instituted against the expressly stated desire of the victim who is over sixteen years of age for assault or an insult to his honor. If the victim has completed his sixteenth year, he may also request public prosecution personally.

If the victim is mentally ill, his guardian, his spouse, his parents, or his children of age, or, in case there are neither parents nor children of age, his grandparents, may act in his behalf.

If the victim is deceased, his spouse, his ascendants or descendants, his siblings as well as his heirs may institute or request prosecution.

In case of harm to property or economic rights, a person is considered a victim if, according to a previous agreement, he has paid or is obliged to pay compensation for damages. [5–11–1951]

Section 79

If there is nobody who under section 78 is entitled to request public prosecution, or if the offense is committed by anybody who under section 78 would have been entitled to request public prosecution, such a request may be made by the provincial governor.

Section 80

Complaints in cases not subject to public prosecution and requests for public action in cases where this is a condition for public prosecution, must be brought within six months after the person entitled to do so receives information about the offense and its perpetrator.

For those whose rights are based on sections 78 and 79, the time limit does not begin until their right is established.

Section 81

Request for public prosecution may be restricted to the instigator or the instigators of the decision to commit the felony.

Otherwise, in order to be effective, the request must not exclude any accomplice from prosecution; without special procedures, prosecution may be extended to accomplices not expressly exempted in the request.

Section 82

The request may not be withdrawn after charges are brought.

If the perpetrator has committed the offense against any of his next-of-kin, as well as in the cases mentioned in sections 209, 210 and 409–412, the request may be effectively withdrawn at a later stage.

If a request for public action is withdrawn, it may not be advanced again.

PART II—FELONIES

CHAPTER 9

FELONIES AGAINST NORWAY'S CONSTITUTION AND HEAD OF STATE

Section 98

Anybody who attempts to bring about the alteration of Norway's Constitution by illegal means, or is accessory thereto, shall be punished by jailing or imprisonment for not less than five years. If the act is committed by use of arms or by exploitation of the fear of intervention by a foreign power, imprisonment for life may be imposed.

Fines may be imposed in addition to confinement. [12–15–1950]

Section 99

Anybody who by force, threats or other illegal means prevents the free exercise of authority by the King, the Regent, the King's Council, the Parliament or any of its divisions, the Supreme Court or the Court of Impeachment, or is accessory thereto, shall be punished by jailing or imprisonment for not less than five years.

Section 98, second and third sentence, is similarly applicable. [12–15–1950]

Section 99a

Anybody who by use of arms or by exploitation of the fear of intervention by a foreign power, hampers the public authorities in their activities, or seriously hinders civil servants, the press, associations or institutions, or otherwise endangers important public interests, or is accessory thereto, shall be punished by jailing or imprisonment from five years to life.

Fines may be imposed in addition to confinement. [12–15–1950]

Section 100

Anybody who brings about the death of the King or the Regent, or is accessory thereto, shall be punished by imprisonment for life.

An attempt is punished in the same way.

Section 101

Anybody who commits violence or other bodily injury against the King or the Regent, or is accessory thereto, shall be punished by imprisonment for not less than two years. If serious injury to body or health is caused, or attempted, imprisonment for life may be imposed.

Anybody who commits an offense against the honor of the King or the Regent, shall be punished by jailing or imprisonment up to five years.

Section 102

If any felony mentioned in chapters 19, 20, 21, 22 or 23, is committed against any member of the royal family, the punishment may be increased to double the penalty provided therefor, and life-imprisonment is imposed if the general punishment is as high as eight years imprisonment.

Section 103

Prosecution of offenses against honor, as provided in sections 101 and 102, shall take place only by order of the King, or with his consent.

Section 104

Anybody committing acts mentioned in section 94 shall be punished by jailing or imprisonment up to ten years, if they intended the commission of a felony covered in sections 98, 99 or 99a, but by imprisonment from one to twelve years, if they intended the commission of a felony covered in section 100 or in the Military Penal Code, section 81a (cf. this code, sections 98 and 99). [12–15–1950]

Section 104a

Anybody who establishes or participates in a private organization of military character or supports such organization, shall be punished by imprisonment up to two years. If the organization or its members maintains supplies of arms or explosives, or if there are other aggravating circumstances, the punishment shall be imprisonment up to six years.

Chapter 13

Felonies against the general order and peace

Section 135

Anybody who endangers the general peace by publicly insulting or provoking hatred of the Constitution or any public authority, or publicly inflaming one group of the population against another, or is accessory thereto, shall be punished by fines or jailing or imprisonment up to one year.

Section 136

Anybody who brings about the occurrence of a riot with the intent to use violence against person or property, or to threaten therewith, or is accessory to bringing about such a riot, or who, during a riot where such intent has been revealed, acts as a leader, shall be punished by imprisonment up to three years.

If, during a riot, such felony against person or property as intended thereby, or as revealed by the participants as intended, is committed, or if any felony against public authority is committed, the above-mentioned persons as well as those participating in the commission of the felony shall be punished by imprisonment from two months to five years, but by up to one and one-half the punishment provided for such felony if a more severe punishment results therefrom.

Section 137

Anybody who is present, or is accessory to another's presence, in such riot as mentioned in section 136, after the authorities have ordered the rioters to leave peacefully, shall be punished by imprisonment up to three months, but up to two years if a felony against the public authorities or if such a felony against person or property as intended by the riot, or as revealed by the participants therein to be intended, is committed while he is present.

Section 138

Anybody who causes, or is accessory to causing, the unlawful prevention or interruption of a public function, a public religious meeting, an ecclesiastical act, public instruction or teaching in the schools, an auction, or a public meeting called for a common purpose, shall be punished by fines or by imprisonment up to six months.

Section 139

Anybody who omits, by timely report to the proper authorities or otherwise, to try to prevent a mutiny, war-time treason, espionage or a plot with the purpose of desertion punishable according to military law, or a felony defined in the Law on Defense Secrets, sections 1, 2, 3 or 4, or a felony mentioned in this code, sections 83, 84, 86, 87 No. 2, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 98, 99, 99a, 100, 104a, 148, 149, 150, 152, 153, 154, 159, 169, 192, 195, 217, 223 second para., 225, 231, 233, 234, 243, 267, 268 or 269, or the results of any such felony although he had received reliable information that the felony was impending or was being committed at such time as the felony or its consequences could have been prevented, shall be punished by fines, jailing or imprisonment up to one year.

He shall, however, not be punished, if the felony is not completed nor a punishable attempt made, or if it could not be prevented without exposing himself, his next-of-kin or an innocent person to prosecution or danger to life, health or welfare.

A superior who has omitted to prevent a felony committed in his service, although he was able to do so, shall be punished similarly, but the punishment shall not exceed the maximum penalty provided for such felony. [12-15-1950]

Section 140

Anybody who publicly urges or prompts the commission of an offense, or glorifies an offense, or offers to commit or to assist in the commission of an offense, or who is accessory to such urging, prompting, glorification or offer, shall be punished by fines, jailing or imprisonment up to eight years, but in no case with confinement exceeding two-thirds of the maximum provided for the offense.

Punishable acts here include acts which it is punishable to urge or prompt,

Section 141

Anybody who by false inducements or other underhanded conduct deceives another into emigrating from this country, or is accessory thereto, shall be punished by fines or imprisonment up to one year.

Section 142

Anybody who, by word or deed, publicly insults or in an offensive or injurious way shows disdain for a religious creed permitted in this country, or for the dogma or worship of any religious community lawfully existing here, or is accessory thereto, shall be punished by fines, jailing or imprisonment up to six months. [3–24–1934]

Section 143

Anybody who mistreats a corpse or unlawfully takes possession of a corpse in another's custody, or exhumes or removes a corpse without authorization, or is accessory thereto, shall be punished by imprisonment up to two years. Under extremely extenuating circumstances, fines may be imposed.

Anybody who removes a corpse or takes an object from a corpse, a grave or a memorial, with the intent of obtaining by such appropriation unlawful gain for himself or another, or is accessory thereto, shall be punished according to the provisions of Chapter 24, regardless of whether the corpse or the object belongs to someone.

Clergymen, lawyers, defense counsel in criminal cases, physicians, pharmacists and midwives, as well as their employees and helpers, who illegally reveal secrets confided to them or their employers in the course of duty, shall be punished by fines or imprisonment up to six months.

Public prosecution is initiated only upon request of the victim or when required in the public interest.

Section 145

Anybody who unlawfully opens a letter or any other closed document, or breaks into another's locked depository, or is accessory thereto, shall be punished by fines or imprisonment up to six months.

If injury is caused through unauthorized knowledge acquired thereby, or the felony is committed for the purpose of unlawful gain, imprisonment up to two years may be imposed. Public prosecution may not be initiated without the request of the victim.

Section 145a

Fines or imprisonment up to six months may be imposed on anybody who

1. With the aid of a concealed monitoring apparatus, listens to a telephone conversation or other conversation between other people or to negotiations in a closed meeting in which he himself does not participate, or

2. with the aid of a recording apparatus or other technical means, secretly records conversations as mentioned above, or of negotiations in closed meetings in which he does not himself participate or to which he has gained admission by false pretenses or by sneaking in, or

3. introduces a monitoring or recording apparatus for the purposes named.

Complicity is punished in the same way.

Public prosecution is initiated when it is required in the public interest. [12–12–1958]

Section 146

Anybody who unlawfully causes, or is accessory to causing, the failure of a written message to be delivered or to come on time to the person addressed, by destruction, concealment or retention, shall be punished by fines or imprisonment up to one year.

If injury is caused by the felony, or the offender has acted with the intent of unlawful gain for himself or another, imprisonment up to three years may be imposed.

Public prosecution may not be initiated without the request of the victim.

Section 147

Anybody who unlawfully breaks into or assists another in breaking into a house, vessel, railroad car, automobile or aircraft or into any room in same or into a closed courtyard or similar storeroom or place of residence, by damaging an object designed for protection against intruders, or by means of a picklock, false key or key unlawfully taken from the possessor, is considered guilty of punishable burglary.

Anybody who is guilty of burglary or is accessory thereto, shall be punished by imprisonment up to one year. If the felony is committed by an armed person, or by several in cooperation, imprisonment up to two years may be imposed; if the felony is committed with the intent to prepare the way for another felony, imprisonment up to four years may be imposed.

Anybody who by violent or threatening conduct seeks to force his own or another's unlawful admission to, or presence in, such place, or who unlawfully sneaks into an inhabited house or room which usually is kept closed at night, with the intention of being locked in, or who by means of disguise or a pretended or misused public capacity or order, or by use of a document which is falsified or pertains to somebody else, obtains for himself or another, unlawful admission to or presence in an inhabited house or room, or is accessory thereto, shall be punished similarly. [5–11–1951]

Chapter 14

FELONIES AGAINST PUBLIC SAFETY

Section 148

Anybody who causes, or is accessory to causing, fire, collapse, explosion, flood, marine casualty, railroad or aircraft accident, which may easily result in loss of human lives or extensive destruction of another's property, shall be punished by imprisonment from two years to life, but not less than five years if as a result of the felony somebody is killed or seriously injured in body or health.

An attempt may be punished in the same way as a completed felony. [5–11–1951]

Section 149

Imprisonment for at least one year shall be imposed as punishment upon anyone who tries to hinder the prevention or combating of such an accident as treated in section 148, when it occurs or when he knows it is threatening, by destruction, damage or removal of equipment or in another way, or who is accessory thereto.

Section 150

Anybody who brings about, or is accessory to bringing about, such danger as mentioned in section 148, by omitting to perform a special duty incumbent on him, by unlawfully destroying, removing or damaging an object or guiding signal, by giving or setting a false signal, by placing an obstruction in a seaway, by impairing the safe operation of a railroad driven by a locomotive or other mechanical power, shall be punished by imprisonment up to six years. If an accident such as mentioned in section 148 is caused thereby, imprisonment up to twelve years may be imposed.

Anybody who has committed one of the above-mentioned acts by negligence, or in ignorance of the danger, shall be punished by fines or by imprisonment up to one year.

Anybody who causes a person to escape, or to be removed unlawfully, from an institution or another place where the public authorities have put him, shall be punished by fines or imprisonment up to three months.

Chapter 35

MISDEMEANORS AGAINST GENERAL PEACE AND ORDER

Section 347

Any superior who intentionally omits to prevent the commission of any misdemeanor in his service, to the extent he was able to do so, shall be punished by fines.

Section 348

Anybody who violates the provisions concerning peace and order on holidays, shall be punished by fines.

Section 349

Anybody who causes, or is accessory to causing, fear among a substantial number of persons, their gathering, or turnout of the police, the fire service or the armed forces, by groundless cries for help, misuse of distress signals or similar conduct, shall be punished by fines or imprisonment up to three months.

The same punishment shall apply to anybody who, against his better conscience or without reasonable grounds for believing a rumor to be true, publicly spreads or is accessory to spreading a false rumor which is likely to cause general bitterness or fear or endanger public peace and order.

Section 350

Anybody who, by fighting, shouting, offensive behavior or other improper conduct, disturbs public peace and order, or lawful traffic, or is accessory thereto, shall be punished by fines or imprisonment up to two months.

Anybody who, by shouting, noise or in some other way, disturbs the night-rest of the neighborhood without just cause, or who causes the neighborhood fear or disturbance by such conduct in a place where he remains without authority and in spite of a request to leave, or who is accessory thereto, shall be punished in the same way.

The acts mentioned in the second para. shall be subject to public prosecution only upon request of the victim.

Section 351

Fines or imprisonment up to three months may be imposed as punishment upon anybody who

1. by careless driving, riding, sledding or sailing, or
2. by careless depositing of objects, or
3. by throwing stones or placing obstacles or traps, or
4. by omitting to properly fence in or to cover a well or an excavation, or
5. by omitting to maintain a building, road, bridge or handrail, or
6. by omitting to carry out compulsory safety measures, or
7. by omitting to mend or report damage which he himself has caused, or by other similar conduct, causes danger for the traffic in a public place, or is accessory thereto.

Anybody who, in such manner as mentioned above, causes danger to the traffic in a place which is the lawful entrance to a farm, house or apartment, or to the traffic in a courtyard, garden or similar place to which several people have common access, shall be punished by fines.

Section 352

Anybody who, in the manufacture, use, storage or handling of explosives, firearms, machines, steam boilers, electric wires, or similar objects, is guilty of careless conduct which is likely to endanger the life or health of others, or who is accessory thereto, shall be punished by fines or imprisonment up to three months.

Anybody who by careless handling of fire or inflammable materials causes danger of fire, or is accessory thereto, or who violates the provisions contained in the law or issued in accordance with the law for the prevention of fires or explosions or similar accidents, shall be punished in the same way.

Section 353

Anybody who appears in a place to which access is forbidden by the public authorities, or who is accessory thereto, shall be punished by fines.

Section 354

Fines or imprisonment up to four months may be imposed as punishment upon anybody who causes danger

1. by neglecting his duty to watch an insane person, or by omitting to report to the police the disappearance of an insane person in his custody or care,
2. by unlawfully exciting, teasing or frightening animals, or by complicity thereto,

3. by unlawfully keeping dangerous animals or omitting to render dangerous animals in his possession harmless in a proper manner, or

4. by omitting to report to the police and otherwise to do all in his power to prevent an accident in case a dangerous animal has escaped from him.

If a dog attacks a person or causes considerable nuisance by noise or in some other manner, the owner of the dog shall be punished by fines, unless it must be assumed that he cannot be blamed therefor. If the dog, after having attacked somebody, still goes loose, despite complaints to the owner, or if considerable nuisance continues despite such complaints, the dog may be killed or requested to be killed by arrangement with the police.

Public prosecution of cases treated in the previous para. shall be initiated only on request of the victim.

Section 355

Anybody who unlawfully sneaks into or, despite prohibition, forces his way into a house, vessel, railroad car, motor vehicle or aircraft or a room in any of these, or any other closed place, or who unlawfully remains therein despite requests to withdraw, or who is accessory thereto, shall be punished by fines or imprisonment up to three months.

Anybody who unjustifiably stays in a place which is in the possession of another and remains there despite a request to withdraw, shall be punished by fines.

Public prosecution shall be initiated only on request of the victim, or when required in the public interest. [5-11-1951]

Section 356

Anybody who without request from the proper person, manufactures or disposes of a key to a lock belonging to somebody else, or who manufactures or gives a picklock to another person who has no lawful use for it, or who is accessory thereto, shall be punished by fines.

If he has acted on the supposition that an offense was intended, imprisonment up to six months may be imposed.

CHAPTER 36

MISDEMEANORS AGAINST PUBLIC HEALTH

Section 357

Anybody who violates the regulations given by law or in accordance with law in Norway, for the prevention or combating of contagious diseases, or for the protection of public health, shall be punished by fines or imprisonment up to three months.

Section 358

Punishment by fines or imprisonment up to six months may be imposed upon anybody who, without calling attention to the danger of contagion,

1. places in care a child whom he knows or presumes to be suffering from a contagious syphilitic disease, or who hires somebody to nurse such a child, or

2. enters service in another's house with the knowledge or presumption that he suffers from a contagious syphilitic disease, or continues in such employment, or receives a strange child to nurse, or is accessory thereto.

Anybody who hires or continues to employ a person whom he knows or presumes to be suffering from a contagious syphilitic disease, to nurse a child, or who is accessory thereto, shall be punished in the same way.

Section 359

Punishment by fines or imprisonment up to four months may be imposed upon anybody who with intent or through negligence offers for sale,

1. as foodstuffs for people or animals or as luxuries, objects injurious to health because of adulteration, immaturity, spoilage, defective preparation, mode of conservation or other reasons, or

2. garments, fabrics, wall-paper, toys, utensils or other tools designed for preparing or preserving foodstuffs, or similar objects containing substances which make them injurious to health.

Preface

A thorough reform of the Swedish penal law has been in preparation for more than half a century. Its purpose has been to replace the penal code of 1864 and other acts related thereto. In the meanwhile the old code has been progressively modernized by partial reforms, and now the results of all such labors have cumulated in the enactment of a new penal code. Adopted in 1962, this code took effect on January 1, 1965, exactly one hundred years after the previous code came into force.

Even though the new code does not contain a complete revision of Swedish penal law, the modifications introduced constitute altogether a substantial reform. As to specific crimes, it is mainly the provisions concerning crimes against persons that now appear in a completely revised form. Modifications in the system of sanctions have been made more extensively. The new code reflects the social outlook of our times and prevalent views of problems of penal law. It expresses in a comprehensive manner the trends and evaluations which have appeared in the legislation of more recent years.

Considering international developments in the field of penal law, the Swedish Government has thought that jurists and interested persons in other lands might find it useful to have an English translation of the code and a substantial introductory analysis of its content. The introduction has been written by Professor Ivar Strahl of the University of Uppsala, who has taken an active part in the drafting of the legislation. The translation is the work of Professor Thorsten Sellin of the University of Pennsylvania, who wishes to acknowledge the assistance of Mr. Gillis Erenius, Judge Referee of the Svea Court of Appeals, Stockholm, in the translation of the first twenty-one chapters of the Code and a final review of the complete typescript. For the cooperation these gentlemen have given in the production of this publication, the Government hereby expresses its gratitude.

Stockholm, January 1965

Herman Kling,
Minister of Justice.

Introduction

(By Ivar Strahl, Professor of Criminal Law, University of Uppsala)

The penal code, presented here in an English translation, was proclaimed in 1962 and went into effect January 1, 1965. It has replaced the code of 1864 which took effect January 1, 1865, and has been in force for exactly a century. The Swedish title of the new code (brottsbalk) literally means "Part on Crime", because in Sweden's general code of laws, which contains the most important of the provisions affecting citizens, the new penal code is only one "part". This general code dates from 1734 but has been revised from time to time. Besides changing some of its provisions, entire "parts" have been replaced by new parts with new content; the marriage law, the inheritance law, and the law of procedure, for instance, which have been adopted during the present century. The part dealing with the law of crimes now joins the others. The idea is to give the old general code of laws new content step by step and, when all parts have been reformulated, to declare that a new general code has replaced that of 1734.

This manner of proceeding is characteristic of Swedish legislation. It has been followed in the preparation of the new penal code. Work to produce such a code began early in the present century, but it was found difficult to draft it in one piece and therefore it was decided to revise the 1864 law gradually. Consequently the text of the new penal code is not entirely new. Large sections of the law of 1864 were revised in 1942 and 1948; the revisions, slightly amended, are found in the new penal code.

The labor of preparing the draft of the new code was entrusted to two committees. One, chaired by the former president judge of the Svea District Court of Appeals and later Lord High Chamberlain, Birger Ekeberg, was given the task of drafting the definitions of crimes and general provisions relevant to crime. The other, chaired by Karl Schlyter, president judge of the District Court of Appeals of Skåne and Blekinge, was to draft the provisions concerning sanctions.[1]

[1] An English translation of this committee's proposal, together with an orienting presentation of its main features, is found in Thorsten Sellin's pamphlet, The Protective Code. A Swedish Proposal, 56 pp., Stockholm: Department of Justice, 1957.

Each committee presented a draft and these were then combined by the Department of Justice into a coordinated text.

Besides the efforts designed to bring a new penal code into being, a lively reform activity during the present century has brought about changes in the law of 1864 and in collateral legislation containing penal provisions. Reforms affecting sanctions have been particularly prominent. When the new penal code was proclaimed, Swedish criminal law had already become widely different from the law in force a century earlier. The new code is in a large degree the consolidation, in a systematically formulated legal text, of reforms previously realized.

EARLIER REFORMS

A few of these earlier reforms should be mentioned and in this connection references will be made to the Sections of the penal code which contain provisions corresponding to the novelties introduced by those reforms.[1]

As originally adopted, the code of 1864 was typical of the European penal codes of the middle of the last century. It was based on concepts then generally accepted. Each crime was to be carefully defined in the law and the punishment of that crime stated. The offender should, practically without exception, suffer the penalty attached to the crime by law. The law determined the punishment by fixing a minimum and a maximum, i.e., a penal latitude, within which the court, in each case, had to set a definite quantity of punishment after evaluating the seriousness of the crime. Lesser crimes were punishable by fine and more serious crimes by deprivation of liberty, imposed by courts for specific periods of time or, for very serious crimes, for life. Death sentences occurred but were seldom executed. No one who committed a crime before he was 15 years of age could be sentenced to punishment, because he was not considered responsible. Nor could the insane or the feebleminded be so sentenced; they, too, were held irresponsible. If they needed treatment, public mental health authorities were to provide it.

Changes in this system began to be made at the beginning of this century. In connection with the creation of a special public system of child care, separately administered, there was introduced a sanction involving commitment to an institution for training and treatment: it could be imposed by the court on persons between 15 and 18 years of age and its length was not fixed in the sentence but was decided, within certain limits, as the treatment progressed; the need for treatment would determine the length of time that liberty was denied. The new penal code contains nothing corresponding to this sanction.

In 1906, conditional sentences and parole were introduced. To begin with, the execution of a sentence was conditionally suspended. Later reforms permitted different ways of administering the sentence which in many cases became, in fact, probation. Chapters 27 and 28, respectively, deal with conditional sentence and probation.

In 1921, capital punishment was abolished after a long period during which no death sentence had been executed.

In 1927, courts were granted the prerogative, given certain prerequisites, of sentencing criminals who were considered dangerous to imprisonment for an indeterminate maximum term: the minimum term was stated in the sentence. Chapter 30 contains a corresponding provision.

In 1931, the so-called day-fine system was introduced; its meaning will be described later. Chapter 25 deals with such fines and other fines. The requirement that those unable to pay an imposed fine should serve a prison term was practically abandoned in 1937.

In 1935, a form of imprisonment was adopted for youths between 18 and 21 years of age, who needed treatment and training. The length of the term was not to be decided by the court but during the process of treatment, within certain limits. The English Borstal system served as a model for this sanction, the counterpart of which is dealt with in Chapter 29.

Provisions were adopted—the most important of them in 1944—which made it possible for a prosecutor to remit prosecution in certain cases even though he had adequate evidence.

[1] A description of these reform activities appears in Thorsten Sellin's Recent Penal Legislation in Sweden, 70 pp., Stockholm: Penal Code Commission, 1947. This pamphlet also contains an English translation of the Act of 1945 concerning the execution of imprisonment, now superseded by an act of 1964 in the main of the same content.

A reform was made in 1945 in the system of administering imprisonment and other sanctions deprivative of liberty. The cellular system was abolished and treatment in open institutions introduced as a normal form of imprisonment. By open institutions is meant institutions lacking surrounding walls, grill work or other security measures. About a third of the prison inmates are at present in open institutions. There has been no intention of abolishing closed institutions, but the Correctional Administration is making efforts to enlarge the use of open institutions. The serving of longer prison terms is begun in closed institutions, the prisoner being transferred later, if possible, to an open institution. One who misbehaves in an open institution is returned to a closed one. Regardless of the type of institution, the law has specified that the execution of the sanction shall aim at the inmate's re-adaptation to society. Aside from disciplinary measures, no measures may be taken which inflict suffering on prisoners in addition to the mere loss of liberty, which is considered to be afflictive enough. Considering the usually terse and severely factual Swedish style of legal draftsmanship an unusual statement is found in the text of the code, namely that prisoners shall be treated with consideration for their human dignity.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF THE NEW PENAL CODE

There is no statement in the new code of the philosophy on which it is based, but it is clear from its provisions and from views expressed during its drafting that it is founded on the idea that prevention and not retaliation is its aim. In Chapter 1, Section 7, this is apparent from the stipulation that in the choice of sanction in the individual case the court shall, without ignoring the need for general deterrence, keep in mind that the sanction should serve to foster the offender's adaptation to society, i.e., aim at individual prevention. However, the code is less marked by theories and principles than are certain other European codes. Its initiators have not sought guidance from the different schools of thought which have arisen within European penal jurisprudence but have been guided by common sense, practical experience and regard for the need of humaneness. The orientation closest to that of the new code is the movement usually called that of social defense.

The code is based on a firm principle in one respect, namely that punishment may not be imposed without legal authorization: nullum crimen sine lege. It is not explicitly stated in the code, however, but for certain reasons in its promulgation statute. The provision in Chapter 1, Section 1, is not meant to give expression to the principle; it only defines what the law considers a crime. The principle will most likely be inserted in the new Swedish Constitution now in preparation. However, the principle is not so strictly construed in Sweden that, regardless of circumstances, courts could be absolutely required to apply it in marginal cases quite like those definitely covered by a penal provision.

THE ORGANIZATION OF THE CODE

The organization of the penal code differs somewhat from the customary one. The drafters have assumed that the law should give information on what is punishable, not only to jurists but also to the general public. The public is most interested in the definition of the individual crimes and therefore it was thought that these definitions should be placed at the beginning of the code. Consequently, after two introductory chapters there follow, as in a catalogue, chapter after chapter containing definitions of crimes. First come the offenses of greatest interest to the public; the catalogue begins with crimes against life and health. There follow chapters on, among others, libel and slander, crimes against morals, theft, fraud, embezzlement, and malicious mischief. Not until the last part of the catalogue do we find crimes such as rebellion and treason. Crimes by public servants and members of the armed forces have also been placed at the end of the catalogue.

General provisions concerning crimes are found in Chapters 23 and 24, following the catalogue of crimes. In Chapter 23 provisions are found which extend the area of punishability beyond that given by the definitions of the crimes, namely provisions defining punishable attempts or punishable preparation of crime and participation in crime. In the next chapter, on the contrary, there are provisions that actually restrict the punishable area in comparison with what the crime catalogue covers. Impunity, for instance, is granted for acts committed in self defense and in certain other situations of such nature that the act should be considered noncriminal even though it fits into the definition of crime.

Beginning with Chapter 25, there are provisions governing punishments and other sanctions. Later, in Chapter 33, we find provisions that exempt from punishment or other sanction a person who committed the act before he was 15 years of age, and provisions placing restrictions on sanctions when the offender is mentally ill or suffers from some other mental abnormality. In Chapter 34 there are provisions governing certain cases when someone has committed multiple crimes. Then come chapters on the statute of limitation on prosecution for crime and administration of sanction, and confiscation. Two chapters dealing with organizational matters close the code.

SUBJECTS NOT IN THE PENAL CODE

To try to give details here about the specific crimes and general provisions concerning crime would carry us too far afield. It is worth mentioning, however, that the penal code lacks definitions of certain concepts which are very significant for determining the criminal nature of an act, namely intent (dolus) and carelessness (culpa). According to Chapter 1, Section 2, the definitions of crimes in the code are to be understood to mean that unless it is definitely stated that carelessness suffices to make an act punishable, intent is always required. The reason for omitting a definition of carelessness or of carelessly causing an effect is that it was thought difficult or impossible to give a definition that could furnish real guidance in borderline cases. Carelessness does comprise, however, both recklessness and negligence. Intent has not been defined because when the penal code was drafted the committee was not quite sure how it could be done. Therefore it was preferred to let judicial decisions gradually shape the concept of intent.

Courts have, as a matter of fact, partly as a result of decisions subsequent to the drafting of the penal code, arrived at a definition of intent that is probably rather generally accepted by now. According to this definition three kinds of intent can be distinguished. It is enough to describe these three kinds, having in mind cases where intentionally causing an effect is a requirement for punishability.

First of all, intent may be said to be direct, if the effect is what the actor wants to produce by his act. For instance, he is so insensed by the person he kills that he desires his death and hence kills him. In that case he has caused the death by direct intent. Such intent exists also when the effect—the death—is looked upon by the actor as a transitional link to what he wants to gain. For instance, he kills his aunt in order to inherit from her. For certain crimes, namely those in which the penal code expressly so states, direct intent is required for punishability, usually indicated by the words "in order to," as for instance in Chapter 9, Section 9, first paragraph, or in Chapter 17, Section 1.

The second kind of intent is the so-called indirect intent. It is present when the actor is sure that the effect will occur although it is not the effect he wanted produced by his act nor is it a transitional link to the effect he wanted to gain. Example: In order to collect on an insurance policy on the life of an airplane passenger, a person causes the wreck of the plane. If he is certain that other passengers on board will be killed, he indirectly intends their death.

Finally, the third kind of intent, eventual intent so called, exists in cases where the actor has neither direct nor indirect intent but realizes that the effect is possible and circumstances are such that one can be sure that he would have acted as he did even if he had been certain that the effect would materialize. Example: A person fleeing in a car sees a policeman facing him in the middle of the road but instead of stopping increases his speed and runs over and kills the officer. If the fleeing person did not want to kill the policeman but realized that there was a risk that this might happen and if, furthermore, the circumstances were such that one would be sure that he would have acted the same way even though he had known that the policeman would be killed, he has killed him with eventual intent.

When the definition of crime does not indicate otherwise, the requirement of intent is established whichever kind is present. The statements just made about intent to produce an effect are also applicable to circumstances of the crime. These must also be included in the scope of intent, when intent is required to make an act punishable.

The legislator has refrained from introducing provisions in certain other respects also. Chapter 24, for instance, deals with such grounds as self defense, for instance, that rule out criminality. One might expect to find among such provisions one that would make clear that under certain circumstances the consent of the person against whom the crime is directed would lead to the conclusion that the act is no crime. Although consent undoubtedly has this effect to some extent according to Swedish law, the legislator has not felt capable of defining its scope well enough to venture to introduce any provision regarding it. He has likewise avoided provisions stating the extent to which the causing of an effect by omission is to be considered punishable, in accord with a description of a crime that literally would require that the effect be produced by an act. There is no doubt that omission in such cases is punishable to some extent.

GENERAL COMMENTS ON PUNISHMENTS AND OTHER SANCTIONS

In Chapter 1, Section 3, there is a list of the sanctions that can be imposed in accord with the penal code. They are divided into punishments and other sanctions. The punishments are fines, imprisonment, suspension or discharge of a public servant from office, and military arrest or disciplinary fine for servicemen (Ch. 32). A feature of the punishments is that they are attached to the specific offenses in the law; in each Section containing the definition of a crime, such and such a punishment shall be imposed for the crime. The court is always given the latitude of fixing the punishment within a minimum and a maximum. However, instead of the punishment so stated in the catalogue of crimes, i.e., in Chapters 3–22, the court may choose another sanction if the prerequisites for its use are met. This is the import of the provision in Chapter 1, Section 4, first paragraph. The idea is that in principle all sanctions are to be on an equal footing even though, for practical reasons, punishments are specified for each crime.

While the preparatory work on the penal code was progressing there was a lively discussion on whether it would be reasonable to avoid calling some of the sanctions in the penal code punishments. The committee which proposed the part of the draft code dealing with sanctions did not adopt the term punishment in its draft. This aroused strong opposition. Among those who submitted reports on the draft the vast majority felt that the traditional term of punishment should above all be retained to designate fines and imprisonment.

In this connection we should perhaps note that the word sanction is not quite an apposite translation of the word used in the text of the code. A literal translation of the Swedish term is "consequence." Thus Chapter 1, Section 3, speaks in part of punishments and in part of other consequences.

THE SPECIAL SANCTIONS

The provisions with reference to sanctions begin with Chapter 25. We should note that in accord with Chapter 33, Section 1, no sanction may be imposed for an act committed by someone under 15 years of age.

Chapter 25 contains the provisions concerning fines. Except for drunkenness and disorderly conduct (Ch. 16, Secs. 15–16) all fines are to be fixed in day-fines. This means that the court (Ch. 25, Sec. 2) sentences to a fixed number of units, called day-fines, at least one and at most 120, and at the same time sets the size of each day-fine in an amount of money not less than 2 and not more than 500 kronor. The total amount to be paid as fine is arrived at by multiplying the number of day-fines by the amount of each day-fine. If, for instance, the offender has been sentenced to pay 20 day-fines of 10 kronor, he must pay 200 kronor. The idea of this system is that the number of day-fines is to be determined in relation to the gravity of the crime in accord with the customary way of meting out punishment, while the size of the day-fine is to be commensurate with the offender's capacity to pay. In this manner one achieves both a sentence which expresses the court's evaluation of the gravity of the crime and also adapts the punishment to the offender's economic status. The term day-fine is due to an idea that the size of that fine would be the amount the offender, by exercising great frugality, can forego per day. An exact calculation of this amount is often difficult, of course. The calculation is generally made in a rather routine manner in practice, but the result is fairly well adapted to the offender's ability to pay.

Even other statutes than the penal code that provide for fines are as a rule to be so applied that the fines are assessed in day-fines, following the rules already mentioned. This appears from Chapter 25, Section 1, second paragraph. Two exceptions are made there, however. Fines shall be assessed directly in kronor if the statutory maximum fine is 500 kronor or less and also if the law defines a special basis for computing the fine. The second exception is found especially in a separate statute fixing punishment for incorrect declaration of taxes.

Section 7 of Chapter 25 refers to a special statute dealing with the recovery of fines. This Section also notes that unpaid fines may be converted into imprisonment, but this procedure is rarely used and occurs really only when the reason for non-payment is obstinacy or negligence on the part of the offender. The fines that are never paid represent a very small proportion of those assessed.

Provisions governing imprisonment are found in Chapter 26. Before the new penal code appeared there were two kinds of punishment by imprisonment in Sweden, one called imprisonment and the other penal servitude. Gradually, the differences in the manner of administering them had been practically eliminated, however. The Act of 1945 on the execution of imprisonment, already mentioned, stated that both should be so administered that the prisoner's adaptation to society was fostered. This principle did not permit essential differences in the treatment of those sentenced to simple imprisonment and those sentenced to penal servitude. The prisoners of both classes had to work and this work was to be of a kind that would promote their resocialization. The new act of 1964 differs very little from the previous act.

According to Chapter 26, Section 1, imprisonment is imposed for a specific period of time or for life. In the former case the minimum is fixed at one month and the maximum at ten years. However, if a specified crime in the catalogue is punishable by imprisonment, the minimum and maximum times for the sentence applicable to that crime are stated. When Chapter 8, Section 1, provides, for instance, that theft is to be punished by imprisonment for at most two years, this means that the court shall sentence to a term of a given length of at least one month and no longer than two years.

A person sentenced to a fixed term of imprisonment will, in most cases, not have to serve the entire term in prison. If his sentence is for six months or longer, he must be paroled (Ch. 26, Sec. 7) when he has served five-sixths of the term. This is a mandatory rule, and the release occurs no matter how the prisoner has behaved in the institution. The idea behind the rule is that by conditionally releasing these prisoners some time before the expiration of their terms they can be placed under supervision and subject to the threat that they can be returned to the institution to serve the balance of their sentence unless they behave themselves well during parole. After-care armed with this means of bringing pressure to bear on the parolee has been regarded as the more advisable the poorer the inmate's prognosis is. But, as Chapter 26, Section 6, indicates, a well adjusted prisoner may be paroled before he has served five-sixths of his term, namely after two-thirds but not before four months of the term has passed. This means, then, that a prisoner with a sentence of six months may be paroled after four and must be paroled after five months; if he has a sentence of one year, he may be paroled after eight months and must be paroled after ten, etc. Sections 9—24 of Chapter 26 give more detailed instructions regarding parole.

Life imprisonment is provided for only the most serious crimes. It is customary to parole a prisoner under life sentence by way of pardon, when he has served ten to fifteen years.

Chapter 27 provides for a conditional sentence. No punishment is ever stated in such a sentence, according to the new penal code. The probationary period is two years. There is no supervision, and this sanction is designed for only those whose prognosis is excellent.

Chapter 28 deals with probation. Before the adoption of the new penal code probation was a form of conditional sentence, but the new code clearly distinguishes between conditional sentence and probation. Probation is not conceived to be a conditional suspension of the imposition of a sentence. However, if during the probation term the probationer does not observe the rules of conduct imposed on him, the probation order may be revoked and another sanction imposed (Ch. 28, Secs. 8–10). The probation term is three years long (Ch. 28, Sec. 4). The probationer is placed under supervision, and the court can issue directives concerning this way of life during the probation period (Ch. 28, Secs. 5—6).

Local boards, called supervision boards, with a judge or other jurist as chairman, have been set up for the supervision of probationers and parolees (Ch. 37, Secs. 1–2; Ch. 28, Sec. 6; and Ch. 26, Sec. 12). There also exists an organization of State servants—protective supervisors—who are to assist in the supervision of both probationers and parolees. One of the tasks of the protective supervisor is to carry out or assist in investigations of the accused in order to provide the court with information needed for the proper choice of sanction. The court or the supervision board selects a probation or parole officer for each person to be supervised. He is either a suitable private citizen or a protective supervisor or assistant protective supervisor. The protective supervisor in the district assists and exercises control over such officer and his charge, if the officer is a private citizen.

In connection with both conditional sentence and probation, the court can prescribe at what times and in what manner the offender shall meet the obligation to pay damages incurred by his crime (Ch. 27, Sec. 5; Ch. 28, Sec. 6; cf. Ch. 26, Sec. 15). Customary rules are followed in determining whether or not the offender is obliged to pay damages and in what amount, but if the court, following such rules, does sentence the offender to pay damages, it can, according to the Sections mentioned, direct, for instance, that payments be made in weekly or monthly installments in given amounts during the probation(ary) term. For one conditionally sentenced, such a directive operates as a condition for enjoying a respite, and for the probationer as an obligation which like other conditions prescribed in the probation order he must meet, if he does not wish to risk a revocation of the order and a substituted sanction.

According to Chapter 27, Section 2, and Chapter 28, Section 2, a court can add day-fines for the crime, when a conditional sentence or a sentence to probation is passed, even if the offense is not expressly made punishable by fine. This possibility has been provided to enable the court to sharpen the reaction to the offense, when there is a good reason for it.

In a sentence to probation, but not in a conditional sentence, the court can also (Ch. 28, Sec. 3), if found advisable, order the probationer committed to an institution for a period of not less than one and not more than two months. The actual time is not fixed by the court but by the supervision board later during the confinement period. This device, like the authorization to impose fines, is a means which permits the court to react more severely to the offense. It is also meant to give the court a means, if necessary, to interrupt the criminal activity of the sentenced offender, preventing him from continuing to commit crimes after having been sentenced, as sometimes happens. It may also be necessary to remove a probationer from a sodden milieu or extricate him from alcoholism. The commitment is to a correctional institution but to one of a special kind set up for the purpose. The institutions are small and open. There the inmate will be under observation and treatment which may be of value for his later treatment, since this institutional phase is to be regarded as the initial one of probation. It is not intended that this form of deprivation of liberty will be common. The court is to use it only when it is considered essential for the rehabilitation of the offender or when it may be expected to have positive value in encouraging public law obedience.

The possibility of ordering such a commitment to an institution is a novelty in the penal code and the extent to which the courts will adopt it remains somewhat uncertain. It is regarded as being particularly applicable to rather young offenders being sentenced to probation, but the code does not permit its use in the case of defendants under eighteen years of age. As will be seen from later comments, the commitment of such juveniles to a correctional institution should be an exceptional event.

Youths who are 18 but not yet 21 years of age at time of sentence may be sentenced to youth imprisonment (Ch. 29, Sec. 1). In exceptional cases, such a sentence may also be imposed on a youth under 18 or on one who is 21 but not yet 23 years of age. The length of the term is left indeterminate in the sentence. The execution of the sanction begins in a correctional institution and is later transformed into treatment on parole. There are special institutions serving this class of inmates; some are closed and some open and some have both open and closed sections. Their program emphasizes education and vocational training. Inmates may not be held longer than three years within walls and the entire treatment period, including parole, may not exceed five years (Ch. 29, Secs. 2 and 4). Usually the youth has spent a year or a little less before his first release on parole; he may be returned to the institution if he does not behave himself.

A central board decides on the inmate's release on parole on conditions about like those imposed on parolees from sentences to imprisonment (Ch. 29, Sec. 5 and Ch. 37, Sec. 4). The local supervision boards, mentioned earlier, are primarily responsible for the supervision.

Youths may on occasion be sentenced to ordinary imprisonment, but the use of this sanction in such cases is greatly circumscribed (Ch. 26, Sec. 4). Very strong reasons must exist before some one under 18 at the time of sentence may be so dealt with, and if the defendant is 18 but under 21, ordinary imprisonment can be used only for the purpose of general prevention or when no other sanction is equally suitable.

Youths under 18 years of age and, under certain circumstances, those between 18 and 21 may be surrendered by the court to public child welfare organs for treatment in one of their institutions. The sense of this procedure and those referred to earlier is that youths deprived of liberty because of crime are generally in need of education and training. With that aim in mind, youths under 18 are as a rule better served by the child welfare agencies than by the Correctional Administration. Even when they are dealt with in correctional institutions, it is felt that the length of time should neither be fixed in the sentence nor determined in relation to the gravity of the offense, as is largely the case when ordinary imprisonment is imposed. It is thought wiser to leave the time indeterminate, within certain limits, in the sentence so that it can be adjusted to the need of treatment revealed as that treatment progresses. But, it has not been thought possible to forbid the use of ordinary imprisonment for youths under 21 or even under 18 years. There are instances when a young offender needs no education or training by a pulic agency but must be deprived of his liberty for purposes of general prevention. A fairly common case in practice is grossly reckless operation of a motor vehicle, perhaps under the influence of alcohol. There are cases, when for other reasons, such as the heinousness of the offense, the possibility of imposing a sentence to imprisonment should be left open.

In Chapter 30, there are provisions enabling the court to sentence dangerous offenders to indeterminate internment. The prerequisites are found in Section 1 of the Chapter. Section 3 provides that the court shall fix a minimum term for the confinement in the institution. The maximum term is not decided, except that, as Section 8 notes, the confinement for longer than a certain time in excess of the minimum requires a court decision but not necessarily by the sentencing court. Supervision follows a release from internment and the parolee can be re-incarcerated if his conduct is not satisfactory (Ch. 30, Secs. 12 and 13). A central board decides on release and re-incarceration (Ch. 30, Sec. 6 and Ch. 37, Sec. 4). The local supervision boards already mentioned are primarily responsible for supervision, as in the case of other parolees (Ch. 30, Sec. 10).

According to Chapter 31 the court may, under certain circumstances, surrender the offender for care as provided in social welfare statutes, i.e., to the public agencies for child welfare, care of alcoholics or the mentally ill. Such surrender is collectively referred to as surrender for special care.

Child Care.—This care, according to the Child Welfare Act, is so organized that it is primarily in the hands of local boards, whose members are elected by the communal administrations, who in return are elected by the voters of the communes. Each child welfare board is, by and large, charged with the task of seeing that children and youth within its jurisdiction may grow up under favorable conditions and receive suitable nurture. The work of such boards is not limited to asocial young people; it includes needed assistance to those having shown no asocial tendencies. The boards are not courts, for there are no juvenile courts in Sweden or the other Scandinavian countries. There is no requirement that a jurist be a member of a board, but the Act recommends it if a suitable candidate is available. Furthermore, a board may engage a jurist as secretary or expert. The boards are much less than courts bound in their work by legal formalities. There is no prosecutor who presents a case against any one before a board. When a board makes a decision that infringes upon some one the decision may be appealed to State authorities of a courtlike character, and decisions that more seriously infringe upon some one's liberty cannot be executed until they have been approved by a State authority. These authorities also exercise control in other ways over the work of the boards and lend them assistance.

One of the functions of the boards is to take measures against children and youths who act in an asocial manner and therefore are in need of corrective measures. The measures may consist of advice and warnings, probation, placement in a foster home and commitment to an institution for education and training. A criminal act by the younster is neither a prerequisite, nor a sufficient reason for taking a measure. The decisive element is instead the recognized need for remedial action. It is, of course, obvious that the need is often demonstrated by the youngster's criminal act. Remedial measures may be taken by the board if the person has not reached his 18th birthday, but under certain conditions they may be applied to older youths not yet 21 years of age.

It should be clear from what has just been said that public child care is entirely divorced from the system of prosecution and court action and from the authorities executing the sentences of courts. However, judicial authorities may allow child welfare boards to take action in criminal matters.

The pertinent provision is found in Chapter 31, Section 1. The case in point is one where some one of an age to which the Child Welfare Act applies is prosecuted in court and found guilty. The above Section offers the court the possibility in such case to surrender the defendant to the child welfare board of the district for appropriate disposition in accord with the Child Welfare Act. Such surrender is considered as a sanction by the penal code. The court must establish that the prerequisites for care under the Act exist, both with respect to age and other conditions, and that the child welfare board's opinion has been sought. In practice no surrender would occur unless the board had expressed its willingness to take the required measures. What further measures are taken depends on the board, for the court has no jurisdiction over its actions. If it should happen, however, that the measures which the board said that it would take cannot be taken, the case (Ch. 38, Sec. 2) can be re-opened by the court, and if that occurs it can impose another sanction for the crime.

Section 1 of Chapter 31 also covers the case in which the accused has already been taken in charge by the child welfare authorities and placed in one of its institutions. If so, the administration of the institution rather than the child welfare board shall be asked for its opinion.

Section 1 thus treats of what a court can do if the prosecution of a young offender has been started. According to another statute than the penal code, the prosecutor is allowed to forego prosecuting some one under 18 years of age. If the crime is not insignificant, the prosecutor must consult the child welfare board before deciding to prosecute or not prosecute. It happens very often that the prosecutor drops the prosecution and lets the child welfare board take over, before the judge has had any opportunity to surrender the case to a board. In many instances this is no doubt what the judge would have done ultimately.

In certain cases there is a special reason for starting prosecution even though all concerned are agreed that the young offender should be dealt with under the provisions of the Child Welfare Act. Chapter 31, Section 1, second paragraph, permits the court to impose a fine for the offense although the offender is being surrendered to a child welfare board (or the administration of an institution) for handling. A child welfare board cannot impose fines, since it is not a court.

Of course, there may be other reasons for starting prosecution even in cases where the prosecutor has grounds for assuming that the court will end by turning the juvenile over to a child welfare board. One reason may be that the offense is so serious that it should not escape prosecution; another that the juvenile belongs to a gang, whose other members are to be prosecuted. In some cases, the authorities may think it a good idea to show the juvenile that his offense is considered so serious that he must be brought before the court.

The above provisions signify altogether that there is no fixed border between the administration of criminal justice and care in accord with the Child Welfare Act, so far as age is concerned. The distinction depends on what the authorities regard as the most suitable disposition in the individual case.

Care of Alcoholics.—In Sweden there exists a public agency, organized in the main like public child welfare and based on a special statute, the Temperance Act. Local temperance boards are elected by the communal administrations, and among their tasks these boards are to take measures against those who abuse alcoholic beverages. These measures consist, among others, of advice and warnings, probation and commitment to an institution for alcoholics. Such commitment requires a decision by a State authority. If the alcoholic does not apply for such commitment voluntarily, a petition to that effect by the temperance board is generally required.

A court may, under Chapter 31, Section 2, hand over to the temperance board the task of acting under the Temperance Act, if the measures available are deemed applicable, but the opinion of the board must first be sought by the court.

Transfer of a case for care under the Temperance Act is also regarded as a sanction by the penal code.

Mental Health Care.—A third form of special care mentioned in Chapter 31, Section 3, is mental health care including the care of the feebleminded. Such care is not entrusted to local boards. According to the Mental Health Act commitment to a mental hospital can occur on the basis of a report by a registered physician that such care is needed. Control in various ways exists to prevent the retention of some one in a hospital without adequate reasons.

Somewhat like the provisions of Chapter 31, Sections 1 and 2, the third Section empowers the court to surrender a convicted defendant for care under the Mental Health Act, which means his being sent to a State mental hospital. First, however, a medical examination in accord with the Act must have demonstrated that there is need for such action.

If psychiatric care is found to be needed but without hospitalization, the court, under the authority of Section 4 of Chapter 31, may order that such care be provided. There are physicians at the mental hospitals who provide such care for out-patients.

An order made by authority of Sections 3 or 4 of Chapter 31 is counted as a sanction by the penal code. This means that in accord with this code even the mentally ill are sentenced to what the law calls a sanction for the crime.

The Applicability of Sanctions to the Mentally Abnormal and to the Young.—The provisions in Chapter 33, Section 2, show that even other sanctions than surrender for mental care, in or outside a hospital, may be applied to the mentally ill. The provisions do not state that the mentally ill or those equated with them are to be exempt from all punishments and other sanctions. They only place restrictions on the use of sanctions in such cases. Certain sanctions are forbidden, others permitted, and when no permissible sanction is applicable the mentally ill defendant is not sanctionable.

The Section just mentioned applies to one who has committed the crime under the influence of mental disease, feebleмindedness or other mental abnormality of so profound a character that it must be considered equivalent to mental disease. This last formulation has in mind the psychopaths, in particular, but only those who suffer from a strongly marked psychopathy. It should be noted that neither in this connection nor elsewhere does the penal code speak of irresponsibility. There is no statement that the offender may lack the ability to comprehend that he has committed a wrong or the ability to act in accord with the law. It is the view of Swedish legislators that such provisions do not point to any realities, the existence of which could be established, one way or another. The legislator has preferred to tie the relevant provisions of the penal code to criteria which really can be established. A diagnosis can establish the existence of a mental illness. Intelligence tests can demonstrate the presence of feebleмindedness. The difficulties are greater when the third category—those equated with the mentally ill—are involved and one has to be satisfied, alas, with evaluations which often are uncertain.

If a person belongs to any of the categories mentioned in Chapter 33, Section 2, he can be subjected only to certain sanctions. Imprisonment, youth imprisonment, internment, conditional sentence, suspension or discharge from public office and military arrest and disciplinary fines cannot be employed. The most commonly used sanction is surrender for commitment to a mental hospital, but surrender for open psychiatric care may also occur or care in accord with the Child Welfare Act or the Temperance Act. Probation might be ordered, because it may in certain cases be a means for providing suitable treatment. Even a sentence to fines may be used. Fines are often considered a suitable sanction for ordinance violations even when the offender is mentally ill, feebleминded or otherwise mentally abnormal. In more serious offenses a fine would be regarded as a proper sanction only in exceptional cases. During the period of the drafting of the code, the example was given of a person suffering from a pathological mania to hound a given individual with defamatory statements. In such a case, fines could be both an effective and humane way of causing him to desist.

The court shall declare the defendant free from sanction, however, if none of the permissible sanctions should be used (Ch. 33, Sec. 2, third par.).

The system of provisions applicable to the mentally ill, the feebleминded and similar persons is a novelty in the penal code. The change is in reality not very great, because in the future, as heretofore, the great majority of those belonging to these categories will undoubtedly be brought to court and committed for mental hospital care. From a theoretical point of view, however, the new system represents a radical modification of earlier law.

The legislator has abandoned the idea that there are two classes of people, the responsible and the irresponsible, and that the second class should be exempt from the administration of criminal justice. He has instead, with practical and humanitarian viewpoints in mind, given thought to whether each and every one of the sanctions available through the penal code ought to be applicable to those mentally ill, feebleminded or otherwise serious abnormal mentally. In so doing he has found good reason for eliminating certain sanctions and allowing others. Given this point of departure it would have been logical to let the prohibition against the use of some sanctions apply even to the offender who has become mentally ill after the crime. However, this has not been thought possible. It might conduce to a risk of simulation or aggravation. For the same reason, Section 3 of Chapter 31 prescribes a restricted use of the possibility of ordering a surrender for care in a mental hospital in cases where the crime was not committed under the influence of mental illness, feeblemindedness or mental abnormality of equal serious nature.

The reasoning which has determined the formulation of the system of rules concerning mental cases has been followed also in deciding what importance an offender's youth should have for imposing a sanction on him. The legislator has abandoned the idea of fixing an age limit below which a young person would be regarded as irresponsible and above which he would be responsible. He has instead, animated by practical and humanitarian considerations, examined each sanction with a view to its possible suitability for a given age group. A fixed minimum age for bringing an offender into a court is found in the rule (Ch. 33, Sec. 1) that no sanction may be imposed on any one for a crime committed before he was 15 years of age, but otherwise different age limits have been set for the use of different sanctions. Repeating to some degree what has already been said, these age limits will be described here altogether.

Fines and conditional sentence, as well as surrender for special care, may be used with no other limitation than the 15-year age rule, which also applies to internment, although in practice this sanction is hardly likely to come into question for those very young, since they cannot have met other prerequisites for internment.

Probation is to be used only in exceptional cases unless the offender is at least 18 years old at the time of sentence (Ch. 28, Sec. 1). For those who are younger, care under the Child Welfare Act is preferred, as a rule.

Imprisonment may be imposed on one under 18 years of age only in very rare cases, and the code favors a restrictive use of imprisonment even for the youth of 18 but not yet 21 years of age (Ch. 26, Sec. 4).

Youth imprisonment is primarily designed for those who are 18 but not yet 21 at the time of sentence, but in exceptional cases it may be used for some one under 18 and for one of 21 but not yet 23 years of age when sentenced (Ch. 29, Sec. 1).

The system is complemented by the age limits for the application of the Child Welfare Act, which is fully applicable to those under 18. To those older but not yet 21, it is applicable only under certain circumstances.

Multiple Crimes.—When, as sometimes happens, a person is to be sentenced for several crimes at the same time, whether these crimes were committed by one act or several acts, only one sanction shall, as a rule, be imposed for all the crimes together (Ch. 1, Sec. 6). This applies even if the crimes are not interrelated. For instance, a person prosecuted for two thefts and drunkenness is consequently to be sentenced, as a rule, to only one punishment for these crimes or to another sanction, too, such as probation. In that case, however, another latitude applies to the punishment than if only one crime were involved. In the example given, the only punishment possible is imprisonment, because theft carries no other sanction. The maximum sentence for theft would be two years (Ch. 8, Sec. 1). The punishment for drunkenness is a fine of at most 500 kronor (Ch. 16, Sec. 15). According to Chapter 26, Section 2, the maximum for a collective sanction is to be computed according to two rules. One states that the maximum for the individual crimes are to be summed. This rule would result in two years plus two years plus 40 days, i.e., the number of days into which the fine of 500 kronor could be converted if not paid. According to the second rule, a limiting one, the highest maximum for any one of the crimes may not be exceeded by more than two years. In the example given, the maximum collective sanction then becomes four years. The minimum for any sentence to imprisonment is one month. Within these limits the court must impose a fixed term for the two thefts and the drunkenness, collectively.

In cases where a collective fine may be imposed because each of the crimes is punishable by fine (which is not the case with theft), similar provisions in Chapter 25, Section 5, provide the possibility of sentencing to a larger fine than the maximum established for a single offense.

Chapter 34 governs cases in which someone has already been sentenced to a punishment or other sanction and later is to be sentenced for a crime he committed earlier or later but before he has completely undergone the sanction first imposed.

Remission of Prosecution or Sanction.—We have already mentioned that public prosecutors have the power to forego prosecution of a person who committed his crime before the age of 18. This is an exception from a general rule in Swedish law, namely that the prosecutor is duty bound to prosecute when adequate evidence against some one exists. One may deduce from what has been said earlier that the exception is primarily to be understood as a link in the system of rules which fix the minimum age limit for the administration of criminal justice. This limit has not been made unchangeable. After an examination of circumstances in an individual case falling within the 15–17 year group, inclusive, the authorities must decide if some form of child care is preferable. It is not necessary for the public child welfare authorities to intervene. Many a time, the solicitude of the parents is considered adequate.

There are certain other exceptions from the general rule that prosecution must follow if there is sufficient evidence. Thus, prosecutors may forego prosecution when it is obvious that it would only result in a fine. Furthermore, the State's highest prosecutor has the power to decide that no prosecution be started. This power is to be used in exceptional cases when a prosecution would be looked upon as shocking. As examples one might mention the case of someone accused of assault following strong provocation or some one who has committed a theft, soon regrets it, returns the property and tells the police about it, or someone who committed an offense in the excusable belief that his act was not criminal.

The provisions governing the power of the prosecutor to forego prosecution are not found in the penal code. Before the power can be exercised, it is generally held that investigation of the crime has established the fact that the one benefitting from such remission did, in fact, commit the offense.

There is a provision in the penal code (Chapter 33, Section 4) permitting a court in rare cases to impose a punishment below the minimum in the punishment scale or even to remit a sanction for the crime.

From this review it appears that the new Swedish Penal Code offers great possibilities for individualizing the law's reaction to an offender's crime by taking into account his personal nature and circumstances.

In certain cases, the public prosecution may forego prosecution or the court may decide not to impose a sanction. Given certain conditions, the court may use as mild a sanction as a conditional sentence, i.e., stop at something which in reality is hardly more than a warning.

It is also possible for the court, if certain prerequisites exist, to surrender the lawbreaker for care in accord with the Child Welfare Act, the Temperance Act, or the Mental Health Act. Such care may, indeed, mean such a great restriction of the culprit's liberty that it can be regarded as an appreciable reaction to his offense, but it should be noted that such care requires that the need for it exists and that if that need is established, the same kind of care could have been furnished without the cooperation of the court and in the absence of any criminal conduct.

If the court finds that a fine should be imposed for a crime that is not trivial, the monetary value of the fines is generally, by means of the day-fine system, adjusted to the culprit's capacity to pay.

If a court considers it purposeful to leave the offender in freedom but under supervision and measures connected therewith, it has, within certain limits, the possibility to arrange such treatment in freedom by a sentence to probation. The conditions that can be imposed on the probationer in the sentence may vary greatly depending on the requirements of the individual case and such conditions may be changed during the probation period if necessary.

A far-reaching individualization can also result if the court sentences to a sanction depriving the culprit of his liberty. These sanctons have been reduced in number in the new Code compared with the older one, and therefore the court often has no choice from among several prison sanctions. But, this has not reduced the possibility of individualization. One has preferred to let it occur at the institutional level, guided by the greater knowledge of the offender at that stage. For instance, it is then that the decision is made that the sentence be served in an open or a closed institution. Even the length of the institutional period depends in many cases on decisions taken during it. This applies also to fixed terms of imprisonment for if that term is not too short, the institutional period can be abbreviated by parole which is decided after taking into consideration what is then known about the prisoner. Furthermore, it is noteworthy that if parole is granted or if the sanction is a Borstal commitment or internment, the institutional period is followed by one during which the parolee is regularly to be subject to a treatment which in principle is like that organized under a sentence to probation, with a possibility of recommitting the parolee to the institution in case of violation. Thus, we note that one sentenced to have his freedom curtailed is under continuous observation while in an institution and often long afterwards, and that there exist wide possibilities for having recourse to measures prompted by that observation.

PART ONE—GENERAL PROVISIONS

Chapter 1

Of Crimes and Sanctions

Sec. 1. Crime is an act for which a punishment as stated below is provided by this Code or by other codes or laws.

Sec. 2. Unless otherwise stated, an act described in this Code shall be regarded as a crime only if it is committed intentionally.

If the act has been committed during self-induced intoxication or if the actor had otherwise himself brought about the temporary loss of the use of his senses, this shall not cause the act to be considered non-criminal.

Sec. 3. A sanction for crime in this code means: the common punishments of fine and imprisonment—the punishments of suspension or dismissal of a person exercising a function carrying official responsibility, and disciplinary punishments for members of the armed services; as well as conditional sentence, probation, youth imprisonment, internment, and surrender for special care.

Sec. 4. The use of punishments is regulated, in general, by the statutory provisions governing the individual crimes. Other sanctions may, according to what is provided for their use, nevertheless be applied albeit they are not mentioned in those provisions.

Imprisonment, suspension, and dismissal are to be regarded as heavier sanctions than a fine and disciplinary punishments.

Sec. 5. Unless otherwise provided several sanctions for the same crime may not be imposed.

Suspension or dismissal are imposed collaterally with the sanction to which it is found that the accused should be sentenced.

Sec. 6. Unless otherwise provided, a joint sanction for the crimes shall be imposed when some one is to be sentenced for several crimes.

If there are special reasons for it, a person may be sentenced for one or more crimes to pay a fine together with a sanction for additional criminality, or to imprisonment together with conditional sentence or probation for the rest of his criminality.

Sec. 7. In the choice of sanctions, the court, with an eye to what is required to maintain general law obedience, shall keep particularly in mind that the sanction shall serve to foster the sentenced offender's adaptation to society.

Sec. 8. Aside from a sanction and in accord with appropriate statutory provisions, a crime can incur forfeiture of property or some other special consequence defined by law and may also incur liability for the payment of damages.

Chapter 2

Of the Applicability of Swedish Law

Sec. 1. A person, who has committed a crime within this Realm, shall be tried according to Swedish law and in a Swedish court. The same applies when it is uncertain where the crime was committed but grounds exist for assuming that it was committed within the Realm.

Sec. 2. If a crime has been committed outside the Realm by a Swedish citizen or by an alien domiciled in Sweden, he shall be tried according to Swedish law and in a Swedish court.

If some other alien, while being outside the Realm, has committed a criminal act which was punishable under the law in force at the place of the crime, he shall be tried according to Swedish law and in a Swedish court, if, after having committed the crime, he has become a Swedish citizen or has acquired domicile in this Realm or if he is a Danish, Finnish, Icelandic, or Norwegian citizen and is found here, and similarly too if he is found in the Realm and the crime is punishable according to Swedish law by imprisonment for more than six months.

Sec. 3. Even in a case other than those mentioned in Section 2, an alien, who has committed a crime outside the Realm, shall be tried according to Swedish law and in a Swedish court.

1. if he committed the crime on board a Swedish vessel or airplane or if he was a commanding officer or belonged to the crew of such carrier and committed the crime while in that capacity;

2. if he committed the crime in an area where a detachment of military forces was found but, unless he was a serviceman, only if the detachment was there for other than training purposes;

3. if the crime was committed against Sweden, a Swedish citizen or a Swedish group, institution or organization or against an alien domiciled in Sweden; or

4. if the crime violated international law.

Sec. 4. A crime is deemed to have been committed where the criminal act occurred and also where the crime was completed or, in case of attempts, where the intended crime would have been completed.

Sec. 5. Prosecution for a crime committed within the Realm on a foreign vessel or airplane by an alien, who was a commanding officer or belonged to the crew of or otherwise accompanied the carrier, against such alien or a foreign interest shall not be instituted without an order from the King or from someone authorized by the King to give such order.

Prosecution for a crime committed outside the Realm may be instituted only pursuant to an order as stated in the first paragraph. Nevertheless, prosecution may be instituted without such order if the crime was committed on a Swedish vessel or airplane or, while on duty, by the commanding officer or some member of the crew of such carrier or by a serviceman in an area where a detachment of the armed services was found or by a Swedish, Danish, Finnish, Icelandic or Norwegian citizen against a Swedish interest.

Sec. 6. No one may, without an order from the King or from some one authorized by the King to give such order, be prosecuted for an act for which he has been subjected to punishment or other sanction outside the Realm. If prosecution is instituted in this Realm, the fixing of the sanction shall be done with due consideration for what he has suffered outside the Realm, and he may according to circumstances be sentenced to a lesser punishment than the one set by law for the act or be completely absolved of punishment.

Sec. 7. Aside from the provisions of this chapter regarding the applicability of Swedish law and the jurisdiction of Swedish courts, attention shall be paid to the limitations resulting from generally recognized principles of international law or, in accord with special statutory provisions, from agreements with foreign powers.

Sec. 8. Separate statutory provisions govern extradition for crime.

Conditions stipulated in connection with extradition from a foreign state to Sweden shall be complied with in this Realm.

Chapter 16

Of Crimes Against Public Order

Sec. 1. If a crowd of people disturbs public order by demonstrating an intention to use group violence in opposition to a public authority or otherwise to compel or obstruct a given measure and does not disperse when ordered to do so by the authority, instigators and leaders shall be sentenced to imprisonment for at most four years and other participants in the crowd's business to pay a fine or to imprisonment for at most two years for riot.

If the crowd disperses on order of the authority, instigators and leaders shall be sentenced for riot to pay a fine or to imprisonment for at most two years.

Sec. 2. If a crowd, with intent referred to in Sec. 1., has proceeded to use group violence on person or property, whether a public authority was present or not, sentences for violent riot shall be imposed; on instigators and leaders to imprisonment for at most ten years and on participants in the crowd's business to pay a fine or to imprisonment for at most four years.

Sec. 3. If a member of a crowd that disturbs public order neglects to obey a command aimed at maintaining order, or if he intrudes on an area that is protected or has been closed off against intrusion, he shall, if no riot is occurring, be sentenced for disobeying police order to pay a fine or to imprisonment for at most six months.

Sec. 4. If a person by act of violence, loud noise or other like means disturbs or tries to interfere with a public religious service, other public devotional exercise, wedding, funeral or like ceremony, a court session or other state or local official function, or a public gathering for deliberation, instruction or hearing a lecture, he shall be sentenced for disturbing a function or public meeting to pay a fine or to imprisonment for at most six months.

Sec. 5. A person, who orally, before a crowd or congregation of people, or in a publication distributed or issued for distribution, or in other message to the public, urges or otherwise attempts to entice people to commit a criminal act, evade a civic duty or disobey public authority, shall be sentenced for inciting rebellion to pay a fine or to imprisonment for at most six months.

If the crime is considered grave because the offender tried to induce the commission of a serious crime or for other reasons, imprisonment for at most four years shall be imposed.

Sec. 6. If a person publicly spreads a false rumor or other untrue assertion apt to arouse a danger to public subsistence or to public order or security, he shall be sentenced for spreading socially harmful rumor to pay a fine or to imprisonment for at most two years.

Sec. 7. If a person publicly insults the Swedish flag or coat of arms or other majestic symbol of the Realm, he shall be sentenced for insulting a symbol of the Realm to pay a fine or to imprisonment for at most six months.

Sec. 8. If a person publicly threatens, slanders or vilifies an ethnic group having a certain origin or religious creed, he shall be sentenced for agitation against ethnic group to imprisonment for at most two years or, if the crime is petty, to pay a fine.

Sec. 9. If a person publicly vilifies matters held sacred by the Church of Sweden or other religious denomination active in this Realm, he shall be sentenced for breach of religious peace to pay a fine or to imprisonment for at most six months.

Sec. 10. If a person, without authorization, moves, or if he injures or infamously treats the corpse or ashes of the dead, opens a grave or otherwise inflicts damage on or abuses a coffin, urn, grave or other resting place of the dead or a tombstone, he shall be sentenced for crime against the peace of the tomb to pay a fine or to imprisonment for at most six months.

Sec. 11. If a person offends morality and decency by written or pictorial representation or by offering for sale, exhibiting or otherwise spreading a writing or picture, he shall be sentenced for offending morality and decency to pay a fine or to imprisonment for at most six months.

The statement just made shall also apply, if a person in a public place or otherwise publicly, offends morality and decency by speech or action.

Sec. 12. A person, who distributes among children or youth a writing or picture which due to its content can coarsen or otherwise involve serious risk for the moral nurture of the young, shall be sentenced for leading youth astray to pay a fine or to imprisonment for at most six months.

Sec. 13. If a person, by physical maltreatment, overworking, neglect or in other ways exposes an animal to undue suffering, he shall be sentenced for cruelty to animal to pay a fine or to imprisonment for at most two years.

Sec. 14. If a person organizes for the public a game of chance about money or monetary values, or permits such play on premises he has opened to the public, he shall be sentenced for gambling to pay a fine or to imprisonment for at most six months. If a person participates in such play, which has been arranged for the public or else occurs on premises to which the public is admitted, he shall be sentenced for gambling to pay a fine.

Sec. 15. A person, who, in a public place, indoors, or outdoors, appears so intoxicated by alcoholic beverages that it is evident from his gestures and speech, shall be sentenced for drunkenness to pay a fine of at most five hundred kronor.

The fine just mentioned shall also be imposed if the intoxication has been caused by something other than alcoholic beverages.

Sec. 16. A person, who, in a case other than those previously mentioned in this Chapter, by loud noisiness in a public place or otherwise publicly behaves in a manner apt to arouse public indignation shall be sentenced for disorderly conduct to pay a fine of at most five hundred kronor.

Chapter 23

Of Attempt, Preparation, Conspiracy and Complicity

Sec. 1. If some one has begun to commit a given crime without its arriving at completion, he shall, in cases where specific provisions have been made governing this, be sentenced for attempt to commit the crime, if there had been a danger that the act would lead to the completion of the crime or such danger had been precluded only because of accidental circumstances.

Punishment for attempt shall be fixed at most at what applies to a completed crime and not at less than imprisonment, if the lowest punishment for the completed crime is imprisonment for two years or more.

Sec. 2. A person who, with the intention of committing or promoting a crime, presents or receives money or something else as prepayment or payment for the crime or who procures, constructs, gives, receives, keeps, conveys or engages in any other such activity with poison, explosive, weapon, picklock, falsification tool or other such auxiliary means, shall, in cases where specific provisions have been made governing this, be sentenced for preparation of the crime, unless he is punishable for completed crime or attempt.

In specially designated cases punishment for conspiracy shall also be imposed. By conspiracy is meant that some one decides on the act in concert with another, or also that some one seeks to incite another or agrees to or offers to commit it.

Punishment for preparation or conspiracy shall be fixed lower than the highest and may be fixed below the lowest limit applicable to a completed crime. No greater punishment than imprisonment for two years may be imposed, unless imprisonment for eight or more years may be imposed for the completed crime. If there was slight danger of the crime's being completed, no punishment shall be given.

Sec. 3. Punishment for attempt, preparation or conspiracy to commit a crime shall not be imposed on one who voluntarily, by discontinuing the execution of the crime or otherwise, has prevented the competion of the crime. Even though the crime was completed, a person who has unlawfully had to do with auxiliary means may not be punished for that reason if he has voluntarily prevented the criminal use of the means.

Sec. 4. Punishment provided in this Code for an act shall be inflicted not only on the one who committed the act but also on any one who furthered it by advice or deed. A person who is not regarded as the actor shall, if he induced another to commit the act, be punished for instigation of the crime or else for being an accessory to the crime.

Each accomplice shall be judged according to the intent or the carelessness attributable to him. Punishment fixed by law for the act of a manager, debtor, or other person in a special position shall also befall a person who together with him was an accomplice in the act.

The provisions of this paragraph do not apply if the law provides otherwise in special cases.

Sec. 5. If some one has been induced to be an accessory to a crime by coercion, deceit or misuse of his youth, lack of comprehension or dependent status or has been an accessory only to a small degree, his punishment may be fixed below that otherwise established for the crime; in trifling cases no punishment shall be imposed. The same applies when it is a question of imposing the punishment for a person in a special position on some other accomplice.

Sec. 6. If a person omits in time to report or otherwise reveal a crime that is occurring, when it can be done without danger to himself or any one of his next of kin, he shall in the cases where this has been covered by special provisions be sentenced for failure to reveal the crime as provided for a person who has been an accessory to the crime only to a smaller degree; however, in no case may a heavier punishment than imprisonment for two years be imposed. In the cases covered by special provisions punishment for failure to reveal a crime as just stated shall also be imposed on one who has not but should have realized that crime was being committed.

If, when it can be done without danger to themselves or their next of kin and without reporting to some authority, parents or other preceptors or guardians, in cases other than those mentioned in the first paragraph, fail to prevent one who is in their care or under their control from committing a crime, punishment for failure to prevent the crime shall be imposed as provided in the first paragraph.

Failure to reveal or prevent a crime is not punishable unless the act being committed has progressed so far that punishment can follow.

Sec. 7. Punishment provided in this Code in a case where some one by crime achieves for himself a gain or appropriates something shall also be imposed when some one intentionally provides a gain for or appropriates something for another.

Chapter 24

Of Self-Defense and Other Acts of Necessity

Sec. 1. An act committed by a person in self-defense is not punishable.

A person acts in self-defense, who seeks to avert an actual or imminent criminal attack on person or property;

to compel one, who by force or threat of force or in other ways obstructs the recapture of property when caught in the act; to prevent some one from unlawfully forcing his way into a room, house, yard or vessel; or to remove from a room, house, yard or vessel some one who has unlawfully forced, his way in, or, else, if it is dwelling, refuses to leave when ordered to do so.

and all this so long as the act is not obviously unjustifiable considering the nature of the aggression and the importance of its object.

Sec. 2. If a policeman, who is to execute an official duty is met with or is attacked by force or threat of force, he may for the accomplishment of his task use such force as can be regarded as justifiable in view of the circumstances. The same applies to a sentry or other serviceman or civilian defense personnel during civilian defense preparations, who performs a police task or serves on guard duty or for maintaining order.

If a prisoner or one who is jailed, taken into custody or otherwise deprived of liberty escapes or, by force or threat of force offers resistance or if he otherwise offers resistance to some one who has him in charge and responsible for making him behave, such force as is justifiable in view of the circumstances may be used to prevent the escape or maintain order. If some one who is to be jailed, taken into custody or otherwise deprived of his liberty tries to avoid or impede the one who has to perform the task, force may also be used as just mentioned. The same applies, if in cases referred to in this paragraph, resistance is offered by some one other than previously mentioned.

If some one has the right according to this section to use force, each person who comes to his assistance shall have the same right.

Sec. 3. In case of mutiny or during combat, as well as on occasions when a crime against military discipline imports a special danger, a serviceman may vis-a-vis a subordinate, who shows disobedience, use the force necessary for maintaining military discipline.

In a case referred to here, the provisions of Section 2, third paragraph, shall apply correspondingly.

Sec. 4. A person, who in a case other than one referred to previously in this Chapter acts out of necessity in order to avert danger to life or health, save valuable property or for other reasons, shall also be free from punishment if the act must be considered justifiable in view of the nature of the danger, the harm caused another and the circumstances in general.

Sec. 5. If, in a case referred to in Sections 1–4, some one has used greater force or caused more serious harm than is permissible in each case, he shall nevertheless not be punished, so long as the circumstances were such that he could hardly have stopped to think.

If the act is found to be criminal, a lesser punishment than that fixed for the crime may be imposed.

Sec. 6. An act committed by some one by order of the person to whom he owes obedience shall not lead to punishment for him, if he had to obey the order in view of the nature of the condition of obedience, the character of the act and the circumstances in general.

PART THREE—OF SANCTIONS

Chapter 25

Of Fines, etc.

Sec. 1. Fines are imposed in day fines.

However, if a certain maximum sum of not more than five hundred kronor is specified for a fine or if its amount is to be determined according to a special basis of computation (standardized fine), the fine is imposed directly in money.

Sec. 2. Day-fines are imposed to a number of at least one and at most one hundred and twenty.

A day-fine is fixed in money in an amount of at least two and at most five hundred kronor, depending on what is deemed reasonable in view of the defendant's income, wealth, obligations to dependents, and other economic circumstances. If the offense is petty, the amount of the day-fine may be adjusted accordingly.

Sec. 3. Unless the law states otherwise, the smallest sanction by fine is ten kronor.

Sec. 4. Fines may be used as a collective punishment for several crimes, if fines can follow on each of the crimes.

A collective punishment by fines does not apply to crimes for which the law has provided standardized fines or fines which may not be converted into imprisonment.

Sec. 5. Fines as collective punishment for several crimes are imposed in day-fines if the law provides such fines for any one of the crimes.

As a collective punishment day-fines may be imposed to a number of one hundred and eighty and a fine directly in money to an amount of one thousand kronor.

If a specified minimum fine is provided for any one of the crimes, a lesser fine may not be imposed.

Sec. 6. Unless otherwise prescribed, fines go to the Crown.

If fines are imposed as collective punishment for several crimes and the fine for any one of the crimes is to go elsewhere than to the Crown or be used for a special purpose, the apportionment of the fines shall be ordered depending on circumstances.

Sec. 7. Special provisions govern the recovery of fines.

Unless otherwise provided, unpaid fines shall be converted into imprisonment for at least ten and at most ninety days in conformity with special provisions applying thereto.

Sec. 8. The provisions of Sec. 6, first paragraph, and of Sec. 7 shall correspondingly apply with respect to a monetary penalty which, by decision of a court or other authority, has been imposed on some one in a particular case. With respect to other monetary penalties, the provisions of this Chapter pertaining to fines shall apply.

Chapter 26

Of Imprisonment

Sec. 1. According to what is provided for the crime, imprisonment is imposed for a fixed term of not more than ten years, or for life. A fixed term of imprisonment may not be shorter than one month.

Separate legal provisions govern the use of imprisonment as punishment into which fines have been converted.

Sec. 2. Imprisonment may be used as a collective punishment for several crimes if imprisonment can follow on any one of the crimes.

Imprisonment for a fixed term may be set longer than the longest of the maximum terms that can follow on the crimes, but it may not exceed this by more than two years nor surpass the maximum terms added together; in that connection, punishment by fine is considered as corresponding to the imprisonment which would result from the conversion of the fines.

Imprisonment shorter than the longest of the minimum terms may not be imposed.

Sec. 3. If some one has been sentenced to a sanction for a crime defined in this Code and punishable by imprisonment and he, after the sentence has acquired legal force, again commits a crime defined in the Code and punishable by imprisonment for at most six months, imprisonment for at most two years may be imposed for the new crime. If the new crime is punishable by imprisonment for more than six months but at most two years, imprisonment for at most four years may be imposed for the new crime.

Neither a crime which some one has committed before his eighteenth birthday, nor a sentence to a fine or a disciplinary punishment may be made the basis for the augmentation mentioned in the first paragraph.

A foreign sentence may be given the same effect as a Swedish one.

Sec. 4. A person under eighteen years of age may not be sentenced to imprisonment except for very strong reasons.

Imprisonment may be imposed on one over eighteen but not yet twenty-one years of age only when the deprivation of liberty is particularly called for in deference to public law-obedience or else when imprisonment is found more appropriate than another sanction.

Life imprisonment may not be imposed for a crime some one committed before reaching eighteen years of age.

Sec. 5. A person sentenced to imprisonment shall, for the execution of the punishment, be committed to a correctional institution. This is the subject of separate legislation.

Sec. 6. A person serving imprisonment for a fixed term may, if it can be assumed that it will further his adaptation in society, be paroled when two-thirds of his term, but at least four months, have been served (discretionary parole).

When a matter of discretionary parole is being investigated, special note shall be taken of the prisoner's conduct during his stay in the institution and his mental attitude at the time the question of his parole arises, his readiness to make compensation for the damage caused by his crime, and the circumstances in which he would find himself upon release.

Sec. 7. A person serving imprisonment for a fixed term of not less than six months shall be paroled when he has served five-sixths of his term (mandatory parole).

Sec. 8. If several sentences to imprisonment are being served concurrently, the combined prison terms shall be taken into consideration in applying Sections 6 and 7. In that connection, punishment into which fines have been converted shall also be regarded as imprisonment.

If, in accord with governing provisions, the period of imprisonment has been extended due to disciplinary punishment, such extension shall not be counted in computing the time for parole, nor may release on parole occur before the conclusion of such punishment.

The period during which the punishment shall be regarded as being administered as a result of a court order referred to in Chapter 33, Section 3, is also counted as time served.

Sec. 9. Questions of discretionary parole are investigated by the supervision board within whose district the correctional institution is located.

The decision concerning mandatory parole is made by the director of the correctional institution.

Sec. 10. A parole period corresponding to the balance of the term at the time of release, but at least one year in length, shall be set in the decision granting parole.

Sec. 11. The parolee shall be under supervision during the parole period.

If at the time of release or later it is found that supervision is not needed, it may be decided that no supervision shall take place. As long as the parole period lasts, the parolee may be placed under supervision, when reasons dictate it. Decisions here referred to are made by the supervision board.

Sec. 12. A supervision board is in charge of the supervision. The board appoints a parole officer.

If some one other than the protective supervisor attached to the supervision board has been appointed parole officer, the supervision shall be under the guidance of such supervisor.

Sec. 13. The parolee shall keep the parole officer informed of his residence and employment, appear before him when summoned, and otherwise maintain contact with him in conformity with his instructions.

Sec. 14. During his parole period, the parolee shall lead an orderly and law-abiding life, avoid harmful company, try to support himself according to his ability, and otherwise observe what is required of him by this Code or by directives or instructions issued by its authority. If he has been enjoined to make compensation for damage caused by his crime, he shall meet this obligation to the best of his ability.

Sec. 15. When it is deemed appropriate for promoting the parolee's adaptation in society, special directives, valid for a given period of time or until further notice, shall be issued with respect to what he has to observe during the parole period. Such directve may have reference to place of residence or lodging, use of leisure time, disposal of wages or other resources, all this for a specified period of at most one year at a time; training, employment, or ban on the use of alcoholic beverages. Other analogous directives may also be issued.

When deemed required, the parolee may be directed to submit to medical care, treatment for alcoholism or other care or treatment in or outside a hospital or other similar establishment.

If the parolee has been enjoined to make compensation for damage caused by his crime, directives may be issued governing the time and manner of meeting this obligation.

Sec. 16. Directives in accord with Section 15 shall be issued by the supervision board.

If so indicated by the parolee's progress and other personal circumstances, the supervision board may change a directive issued and also issue a new directive.

Sec. 17. Instructions concerning the carrying out of a directive referred to in Section 15 may be given by the parole officer, who may also allow temporary relief and make a promptly required adjustment.

Sec. 18. If the parolee does not comply with what is required of him by this Code or by directives or instructions issued by its authority, the supervision board, aside from ordering supervision or issuing a directive in accord with Secton 15, may, depending on the circumstances:

1. Decide that the parolee be given a warning;

2. Extend the parole period by at most one year beyond the time fixed at the time of release;

3. Order him, under threat of a monetary penalty, to comply with a directive issued.

Sec. 19. If it can be assumed that a parolee, who has ignored his obligations, will not let himself be corrected by a measure referred to in Section 18, the supervision board may declare the conditionally granted liberty forfeited.

Sec. 20. A decision concerning a measure referred to in Section 18 or 19 may be made even after the expiration of the parole period, if the question has been under consideration by the supervision board prior thereto. No other measure there mentioned may be decided upon after the expiration of the parole period, unless that period is prolonged in accord with Section 18.

Sec. 21. Concerning the forfeiture of conditionally granted liberty and concerning certain other measures, when the person sentenced to imprisonment is found to have committed another crime, provisions are found in Chapter 34.

Sec. 22. If a question arises of declaring a conditionally granted liberty forfeited or of taking a measure referred to in Section 18, the supervision board may, if circumstances indicate it, order that the parolee be appropriately detained while awaiting further order.

A person thus detained may not be held longer than a week. However, if strong reasons dictate it, a new order for his detention for at most an additional week may be issued. He may not be retained in detention after the expiration of the parole period.

Sec. 23. If a conditionally granted liberty is declared forfeited the balance of the prison term shall be regarded as a new term with respect to re-parole. If the parolee is not at the same time sentenced to imprisonment for a fixed term, discretionary parole may, however, be granted even though the time mentioned in Section 6 has not ended.

Sec. 24. If a conditionally granted liberty can no longer be declared forfeited, the punishment shall be considered fully served when the parole period expires.

Chapter 27

Of Conditional Sentence

Sec. 1. A conditional sentence may be given for a crime punishable by imprisonment, if, with particular consideration of the defendant's character and other personal circumstances, there are firm reasons for assuming that supervision or some other more far-reaching measure is not needed to restrain him from further criminality.

A conditional sentence may not be given if, because of the gravity of the crime or for other reason, an obstacle exists with respect to public law-obedience. A conditional sentence may not be used for a crime by a serviceman, unless it is deemed feasible without danger to military discipline and order within the military forces.

Sec. 2. Whether or not fines are provided by law for the crime, at most one hundred and twenty day fines may be imposed in addition to the conditional sentence, if this is deemed appropriate for the correction of the defendant or out of consideration for public law obedience.

Sec. 3. A person who receives a conditional sentence shall undergo a probationary period of two years.

The probationary period begins the day the decision of the court in respect to the sanction for the crime, either by declaration of satisfaction with the decision or otherwise, has acquired legal force against the offender.

Sec. 4. During the probationary period the offender shall lead an orderly and law abiding life, avoid harmful company, and seek to support himself according to his ability.

Sec. 5. If the offender has been enjoined to make compensation for damage caused by his crime, he shall do what he is able to do to meet this obligation. The court may direct that, during the probationary period, he shall seek to meet his obligation to pay damages or a part thereof at times and in a manner indicated in the sentence.

When reasons dictate it, a directive referred to in the first paragraph may be changed or revoked on application by the prosecutor or by the offender.

Sec. 6. If the offender does not comply with what is required of him by the conditional sentence, the court may, if the prosecutor proceeds in the matter before the expiration of the probationary period, depending on circumstances:

1. Decide that the offender be given a warning;

2. Issue a directive according to Section 5 or change a directive previously issued;

3. Extend the probationary period to three years;

4. Vacate the conditional sentence and fix another sanction for the crime.

Unless the probationary period is extended, a measure described in 1 and 2 of the first paragraph may not be taken after the expiration of the probationary period.

If the conditional sentence is vacated, fair consideration shall be given, in deciding on the sanction, to the fine which in accord with Section 2 was imposed in addition to the conditional sentence.

Sec. 7. Concerning the vacating of a conditional sentence and concerning certain other measures, when the offender is found to have committed another crime, provisions are found in Chapter 34.

Chapter 28

Of Probation

Sec. 1. If it is deemed necessary that the defendant be placed under supervision and no more far-reaching sanction than probation is needed, a sentence to probation may be imposed for a crime punishable by imprisonment.

A person under eighteen years of age may not be sentenced to probation unless this sanction is deemed more appropriate than care in accord with the Child Welfare Act.

If the mildest punishment provided for the crime is imprisonment for one year or longer, a sentence to probation may be imposed only if strong reasons dictate it.

Sec. 2. Whether or not fines are provided by law for the crime, at most one hundred and twenty day-fines may be imposed in addition to probation, if this is deemed appropriate for the correction of the defendant or out of consideration for public law-obedience.

Sec. 3. If the defendant is eighteen years of age or older, the court may, if it is deemed necessary for his correction or for some other reason, order that the probation shall include treatment in an institution. Such treatment shall continue for at least one and at most two months depending on decisions made as it progresses. In other respects, the treatment is governed by special legislation.

If the probationer has not reached his twenty-third year of age, the court may decide that the order mentioned in the first paragraph shall take effect even though the sentence to probation has not acquired legal force.

Sec. 4. Probation shall last three years.

The probation term begins the day the decision of the court in respect to the sanction for the crime either by declaration of satisfaction with the decision or otherwise, has acquired legal force against the probationer.

If the court has rendered a decision mentioned in Section 3, second paragraph, the probation term shall begin the day of the sentence.

Sec. 5. The probationer shall remain under supervision during his probation term.

When supervision is no longer deemed needed, it shall be ordered terminated. As long as the probation term lasts, the probationer may be placed under supervision anew, if reasons dictate it. A decision here referred to is rendered by the supervision board.

Sec. 6. Provisions of Chapter 26, Sections 12–17, shall correspondingly apply to a person sentenced to probation. A probation officer may also be assigned and directives based on Chapter 26, Section 15, issued by the court when sentencing to probation.

Sec. 7. If the probationer does not comply with what is required of him in consequence of the sentence to probation, the supervision board may, aside from ordering placement under supervision or the issuing of a directive in accord with Chapter 26, Section 15, depending on circumstances:

1. Decide that the probationer be given a warning;
2. Extend the probation term to at most five years;
3. Order him, under threat of a monetary penalty, to comply with a directive issued.

A measure referred to in this Section may not be taken by a supervision board after the expiration of the probation term.

Sec. 8. If the probationer has ignored his obligations and it can be assumed that he will not let himself be corrected by a measure which the supervision board may take, the board shall ask the prosecutor to raise with the court the question of revoking the probation or of treatment referred to in Section 3.

The proceeding just mentioned shall be instituted before the expiration of the probation term.

Sec. 9. If probation is revoked, the court shall import another sanction for the crime. In so doing, fair consideration shall be given to what the probationer has suffered in consequence of the sentence to probation as well as to fines imposed in addition to probation in accord with Section 2; and the court may impose imprisonment for a shorter time than that provided for the crime.

If adequate reasons for the revocation of probation are not present, the court may instead take a measure referred to in Section 7 or, if the probationer is eighteen years of age or older, order that he undergo treatment in accord with Section 3. If the question of such treatment is raised, a decision to revoke probation or to take a measure referred to in Section 7 may be made instead. No other measure than one there mentioned may be ordered when the probation term has expired, unless the term is extended in accord with Section 7.

Sec. 10. Concerning the revocation of probation and concerning certain other measures, when the probationer is found to have committed another crime, provisions are found in Chapter 34.

Sec. 11. If a question arises concerning the revocation of probation or concerning treatment in accord with Section 3 or a measure referred to in Section 7, the supervision board or the court before which a proceeding has been instituted in accord with Section 8 may, if circumstances dictate it, order the probationer appropriately detained while awaiting further order.

A probationer thus detained may not be held longer than a week. However, if strong reasons dictate it, a new order for his detention for at most an additional week may be issued. He may not be held in detention after the expiration of the probation term.

Chapter 29

Of Youth Imprisonment

Sec. 1. A sentence to youth imprisonment may, for a crime punishable by imprisonment, be imposed on a person who is eighteen but not yet twenty-one years of age, if the nurture and training which youth imprisonment is meant to give are deemed appropriate in view of the youth's personal development, conduct and other circumstances.

A person who is not yet eighteen or who is twenty-one but not yet twenty-three years of age may be sentenced to youth imprisonment, if such sanction is deemed obviously more appropriate than another sanction.

The court may order a sentence to youth imprisonment executed even though it has not acquired legal force.

Sec. 2. The treatment of one sentenced to youth imprisonment takes place within or outside an institution and may last for at most five years, of which at most three in an institution.

Sec. 3. The treatment shall begin in an institution.

The institutional care shall be given in a youth institution or, if special reasons dictate it, in some other correctional institution.

Special legislation governs institutional care.

Sec. 4. The treatment shall continue outside the institution when institutional care has lasted as long as needed in view of the aim of the treatment. Unless special reasons dictate it, the youth may not be transferred to care outside the institution before a year has passed since his commitment to the institution.

Sec. 5. The decision on transfer to care outside the institution is rendered by the youth imprisonment board, which may, however, charge the supervision board in the district in which the institution is located with fixing more precisely the date of the transfer.

If the supervision board finds that the youth should be transferred to care outside the institution or if he himself applies for such transfer, the board shall refer the matter, together with its own views thereon, to the youth imprisonment board for investigation.

Sec. 6. The youth shall be under supervision during treatment outside the institution.

Sec. 7. With respect to care outside the institution, the provisions of Chapter 26, Sections 12–17, shall have corresponding application. A parole officer may also be assigned and directives in accord with Chapter 26, Section 15, issued by the youth imprisonment board when it orders care outside the institution.

Sec. 8. If a youth under care outside the institution does not comply with what is required of him by this Code or in accord with directives or instructions issued by its authority, the supervision board, aside from issuing a directive in accord with Chapter 26, Section 15, may, depending on circumstances, decide that he be given a warning, as well as requiring him, under threat of a monetary penalty, to observe a directive issued.

Sec. 9. If a youth under care outside the institution obstinately refuses to meet his obligations or if it is found that because of his conduct or for other reasons institutional care is needed to prevent him from committing crime, the youth imprisonment board may order his re-commitment to the institution.

A re-committed youth shall be again transferred to care outside the institution, when the aim of his treatment is best achieved thereby.

Sec. 10. Concerning re-commitment to an institution and concerning certain other measures, when the youth is found to have committed another crime, provisions are found in Chapter 34.

Sec. 11. If a question arises of recommitting a youth to an institution or of taking a measure referred to in Section 8, the supervision board or the youth imprisonment board may, if circumstances dictate it, order him appropriately detained while awaiting further order.

A youth thus detained may not be held longer than a week. However, if strong reasons dictate it, a new order for his detention for at most an additional week may be issued. He may not be held in detention after the expiration of the imposed sanction.

Sec. 12. If the need to continue supervision over a youth under care outside the institution no longer exists, the youth imprisonment board shall order the imposed sanction terminated. Unless special reasons dictate it, however, such order may not be issued until the care outside the institution has lasted two uninterrupted years.

If no order mentioned in the first paragraph is issued, the sanction terminates at the expiration of the maximum length of time the treatment can be given.

Chapter 30

Of Internment

Sec. 1. A sentence to internment may be imposed if the crime or, when several crimes have been committed any one of them is punishable by imprisonment for two years or longer and, in view of the defendant's criminality, mental condition, conduct and other circumstances, a long-lasting deprivation of liberty, without duration fixed in advance, is deemed needed to prevent further serious criminality on his part.

Sec. 2. The treatment of a person sentenced to internment takes place within and outside an institution and shall begin in an institution.

Sec. 3. When internment is imposed, the court, in considering the nature of the crime and other circumstances, shall fix a given minimum time of at least one and at most twelve years for custodial institutional care.

Sec. 4. The institutional care shall take place in an internment institution or, if special reasons dictate it, in some other correctional institution.

Special legislation governs the institutional care.

Sec. 5. After the expiration of the minimum term, the treatment shall continue outside the institution, when institutional care is no longer deemed needed to restrain the internee from further criminality.

Sec. 6. The decision on transfer to care outside the institution is rendered by the internment board, which, however, may charge the supervision board in the district in which the institution is located with fixing more precisely the date of the transfer.

Before the expiration of the minimum term and at least every six months thereafter, the supervision board shall consider the question of transfer to care outside the institution.

If the supervision board finds that the internee should be transferred to care outside the institution or if he himself applies for such transfer, the board shall refer the matter, together with its own views thereon, to the internment board for investigation.

Sec. 7. If the internee is in permanent need of care in a mental hospital, the the internment board may, when the minimum term has expired, order the termination of the internment for the purpose of his admission to such hospital.

Sec. 8. Without the consent of the court, care in the institution may not exceed the minimum term by more than three years altogether, or five years altogether, if the minimum term is three years or longer.

The consent referred to in the first paragraph shall be given if it is deemed necessary to prevent further serious criminality on the part of the internee. The consent shall apply to an extension by three years; the term can be further extended, three years at a time, by a new consent.

The proceeding concerning extension is instituted by the attorney general when proposed by the internment board. If such proceeding is instituted the internee may be held in the institution until the court's decision has acquired legal force.

Sec. 9. The internee shall be under supervision during treatment outside the institution.

Sec. 10. With respect to the care outside the institution, the provisions of Chapter 26, Sections 12–17, shall have corresponding application. A parole officer may also be assigned and directives in accord with Chapter 26, Section 15, issued by the internment board when it orders care outside the institution.

Sec. 11. If an internee under care outside the institution does not comply with what is required of him by this Code or in accord with directives or instructions issued by its authority, the supervision board, aside from issuing a directive in accord with Chapter 26, Section 15, may, depending on circumstances, decide that he be given a warning, as well as requiring him, under threat of a monetary penalty, to observe a directive issued.

Sec. 12. If an internee under care outside the institution obstinately refuses to meet his obligations or if it is found that because of his conduct or for other reasons institutional care is needed to prevent him from committing crime, the internment board may order his re-commitment to the institution.

A re-committed internee shall again be transferred to care outside the institution when institutional care is no longer deemed necessary.

Sec. 13. Concerning re-commitment to an institution and concerning certain other measures, when the internee is found to have committed another crime, provisions are found in Chapter 34.

Sec. 14. If a question arises of recommitting an internee to an institution or of taking a measure referred to in Section 11, the supervision board or the internment board may, if circumstances dictate it, order him appropriately detained while awaiting further order.

An internee thus detained may not be held longer than a week. However, if strong reasons dictate it, a new order for his detention for at most an additional week may be issued. He may not be held in detention after the expiration of the imposed sanction.

Sec. 15. If there is no longer a need to continue supervision over an internee under care outside the institution, the internment board shall order the imposed sanction terminated. Unless special reasons dictate it, such an order may not be given before three years have passed since the internee was last transferred to care outside the institution.

If the internee has been under supervision during an uninterrupted period of three years, the board shall consider the possibility of terminating the sanction; if the supervision has lasted five years, the sanction shall be terminated.

Chapter 31

Of Surrender for Special Care

Sec. 1. If a person who has committed a criminal act can be subject to care in accord with the Child Welfare Act, the court may, after hearing the child welfare board, or, in case a pupil in a youth welfare school is involved, the school administration, leave to the board or the administration to arrange for requisite care.

If deemed needed for the correction of the offender or out of consideration for public law-obedience, at most one hundred and twenty day fines may be imposed in addition to the surrender for care in accord with the Child Welfare Act, whether the law provides fines for the crime or not.

Sec. 2. If a person who has committed a criminal act can be subject to care in accord with the Temperance Act by supervision or compulsory commitment to a treatment institution, the court may, after hearing the temperance board or, in case an inmate of such an institution is involved, the institutional administration, leave to the board or the administration to arrange for requisite care.

If a more severe punishment than imprisonment for six months is provided for the crime, surrender for care according to the Temperance Act may take place only if special reasons dictate it.

Sec. 3. If a person who has committed a criminal act has been declared, in a report of his mental examination, to be in need of care in a mental hospital, the court may, if it finds the need for such care established, order his surrender for care in accord with the Mental Health Act. If the act was not committed under the influence of mental disease, feeblemindedness or other mental abnormality of such profound nature that it must be considered equivalent to mental disease, such order may, however, be made only if special reasons dictate it.

Sec. 4. If some one who has committed a criminal act is in need of psychiatric care or supervision and no order based on Section 3 is made, the court may order him surrendered for open psychiatric care if, for special reasons, no more far-reaching measure is deemed required.

Chapter 32

Of Punishments of Public Servants and of Disciplinary Punishments of Servicemen

Sec. 1. Suspension involves the loss of a given office for a specific period and is accompanied, during the period the offender is by his sentence deprived of the exercise of his functions, by the loss of the rights and privileges pertaining to the office, unless otherwise provided with respect to some particular right or privilege.

Sec. 2. The period of suspension is fixed at not less than one month and no more than one year, whether the sanction applies to one or to several crimes.

Suspension may be used as collective sanction for several crimes, if each and all of them can incur suspension.

Sec. 3. Suspension may not be enforced while the offender is an inmate undergoing a sanction in a correctional institution or a military jail.

Sec. 4. Dismissal from a given office involves the loss of the office and of the rights and privileges pertaining thereto, unless otherwise provided with respect to some particular right or privilege.

Sec. 5. Dismissal may be used as collective punishment for several crimes for which public servants are punishable, if dismissal can follow upon any one of the crimes.

Sec. 6. Disciplinary punishments for servicemen are arrest and disciplinary fine.

Arrest shall be imposed for at least three and at most thirty days. The sentence is served in a military jail.

A disciplinary fine consists of a deduction from wages or a corresponding cash payment in accord with special legal provisions and is imposed for at least one and at most twenty days.

Sec. 7. Concerning disciplinary punishment as collective punishment for several crimes and, when a crime by a serviceman is involved, concerning sentence to disciplinary punishment instead of to fines and to fines instead of to disciplinary punishment, provisions are found in a special statute, which also contains provisions on the administration of disciplinary punishments.

If a person who is not a serviceman has become punishable for being an accessory to a crime subject to disciplinary punishment, the determination of the sanction shall be made as if day fines instead of disciplinary punishment were provided.

Chapter 33

Of Reduction and Exclusion of Sanctions

Sec. 1. No one may be sentenced to a sanction for a crime he committed before he reached fifteen years of age.

Sec. 2. For a crime which some one has committed under the influence of mental disease, feebleмindedness or other mental abnormality of such profound nature that it must be considered equivalent to mental disease, no other sanction may be applied than surrender for special care or, in cases specified in the second paragraph, fine or probation.

Fines may be imposed if they are found answering the purpose of deterring the defendant from further criminality. Probation may be imposed if in view of the circumstances such sanction is considered more appropriate than special care; in such case treatment provided for in Chapter 28, Section 3, may not be prescribed.

The defendant shall be free of sanctions if it is found that a sanction mentioned in this Section should not be imposed.

Sec. 3. If some one is sentenced to imprisonment for a fixed term, fines, suspension or disciplinary punishment in a case for which he has been detained in jail, it may be decided, if deemed reasonable in view of the circumstances, that the sentence shall be considered as having been wholly or partly served by such detention of the defendant.

If some one, who has begun to undergo youth imprisonment, internment or, subsequent to a sentence to probation, treatment provided by Chapter 28, Section 3, is instead sentenced to a punishment mentioned in the first paragraph, it may be decided, if deemed reasonable in view of the circumstances, that the sentence shall be considered as having been wholly or partly served by such institutional care or treatment.

A decision on a matter referred to in this Section may be changed by a higher court when considering an appeal of the sanction imposed, even though the decision was not appealed.

Sec. 4. If some one has committed a crime before reaching the age of eighteen, a milder punishment than that provided for the crime may be imposed, depending on circumstances. If special reasons dictate it, a milder punishment may also be imposed for crime which some one committed under the influence of mental abnormality.

If very strong reasons dictate it and no obvious obstacle exists with reference to public law-obedience, a milder punishment than that provided for the crime may be imposed in other cases as well.

A sanction may be completely dispensed with, if because of special circumstances it is found obvious that no sanction for the crime is necessary.

Chapter 34

Certain Provisions Concerning Concurrence of Crimes and Change of Sanction

Sec. 1. If a person who has been sentenced for crime to imprisonment, conditional sentence, probation, youth imprisonment or internment is found to have committed another crime prior to the sentence, or if he commits a new crime subsequent to the sentence but before the sanction has been fully served or otherwise terminated, the court may, depending on circumstances and taking note of what Sections 2–9 prescribe in certain cases:

1. Order that the sanction imposed earlier shall apply also to the second crime;

2. Impose a separate sanction for that crime, or,

3. If the earlier sentence has acquired legal force, vacate the sanction imposed and impose a different kind of sanction for the crimes.

Sec. 2. If the offender is serving life imprisonment, only an order in accord with Section 1(1) may be made.

Sec. 3. If the prior sentence is to imprisonment for a fixed term, an order in accord with Section 1(1) may be made only if it is obvious that, so far as the sanction is concerned, the new crime, compared with the earlier one, is of no importance worth mentioning, or else that strong reasons dictate it.

If in applying Section 1(2) punishment is imposed for crime committed before the execution of the earlier sentence has begun, possible care should be taken in determining the punishment that the combined punishments do not exceed what could have been imposed for the two crimes in accord with Chapter 26, Section 2, and in so doing a milder punishment than that provided for the crime may be imposed.

The vacating of imprisonment in conformity with Section 1(3) may occur only if sentence is pronounced before the prison term has been fully served.

Sec. 4. If Section 1 (1) or (2) is applied with respect to some one paroled from imprisonment, the conditionally granted liberty may be declared forfeited; if a fixed term of imprisonment is imposed in conformity with Section 1(2), such declaration shall be made, unless special reasons oppose it.

If forfeiture in accord with the first paragraph is not ordered, the court may decide on a measure referred to in Chapter 26, Section 18.

Forfeiture or a measure just mentioned may not be decided unless the question concerning it is raised in a case in which the parolee has been committed to jail or been informed of the prosecution before the expiration of the parole term.

Sec. 5. If the sanction previously imposed is a conditional sentence, an order based on Section 1(1) may have reference only to a crime committed before the beginning of the probationary period.

If Section 1 (1) or (2) is applied, the court may decide on a measure mentioned in Chapter 27, Section 6 (1–3), but only if the question concerning it is raised in a case in which the offender has been committed to jail or been informed of the prosecution before the expiration of the probationary period.

The vacating of a conditional sentence in conformity with Section 1(3) may not take place unless the question concerning it is raised in a case in which the offender has been committed to jail or been informed of the prosecution within a year from the expiration of the probationary period.

Sec. 6. If the sanction previously imposed is probation, the court may, in applying Section 1 (1) or (2), decide on a measure or treatment referred to in Chapter 28, Section 9.

If in applying Section 1(3) imprisonment is imposed, the provisions of Chapter 28, Section 9, shall govern the determination of the punishment.

A decision in accord with the first paragraph or a decision revoking probation may not be taken unless the question concerning it is raised in a case in which the offender has been committed to jail or been informed of the prosecution before the expiration of the probationary period.

Sec. 7. If the sanction previously imposed is youth imprisonment, an order according to Section 1(1) may be made in disregard of what Chapter 29, Section 1, states concerning the age of the defendant.

If the offender is under care in an institution, the provision of Section 1(2) may not be applied.

The vacating of youth imprisonment in conformity with Section 1 (3) may occur only if sentence is passed before the sanction is terminated. If, in applying Section 1 (3), a sentence to imprisonment is imposed, fair consideration shall be given, when determining the punishment, to what the offender has suffered on account of the earlier sentence, and in that connection imprisonment may be imposed for a shorter time than indicated in Chapter 26, Section 2.

Sec. 8. If Section 1 (1) or (2) is applied to one sentenced to youth imprisonment, the court may extend the maximum term of such imprisonment to six years, in which case treatment in an institution may take place for at most four years.

If in accord with Section 1 (1) the order is made that youth imprisonment shall apply to another crime as well, the court may decide that the youth shall be re-committed to an institution. If the crime was committed after the execution of the sentence to youth imprisonment had begun, the court may also direct that one who is under care in an institution or is being re-committeed may not be transferred to care outside the institution before six months have elapsed from the date of the court's decision or the re-commitment, so long as the maximum period for care in the institution does not expire earlier.

A decision referred to in this Section may not be made unless the question concerning it is raised in a case in which the offender has been committed to jail or been informed of the prosecution before the sanction has terminated.

Sec. 9. If the sanction previously imposed is internment and the internee is under care outside the institution, the court, when applying Section 1 (1), may decide that he shall be re-committed to the institution. If such decision is made or if Section 1 (1) is applied in the case of one under care in an institution, the court shall, unless special reasons oppose it, fix a minimum term for the institutional care in progress. In such case the minimum time fixed shall be at least six months.

If the offender is under care in an institution, the provision of Section 1 (2) may not be applied.

The vacating of internment in conformity with Section 1 (3) may occur only if sentence is passed before the sanction has terminated. If imprisonment is imposed, the provisions of Section 7, third paragraph, shall have corresponding application.

Sec. 10. If on the basis of Section 1 (1) a sentence which has acquired legal force has directed that imprisonment, conditional sentence, probation youth imprisonment or internment imposed in an earlier case shall cover further crime, and if the earlier sentence is changed by a higher court by a judgment which acquires legal force, the question of sanction for said crime shall, upon notification by the prosecutor, be reconsidered by the court. The same shall apply when a punishment has been decided on the basis of Section 3., second paragraph, and the punishment imposed earlier is changed.

If, when a sentence to imprisonment for a fixed term is to be executed, it is found that the offender committed the crime before the execution of such punishment, imposed on him for another crime, has begun, and if it does not appear from the sentences that the other punishment has been taken into consideration, the court, once the sentences have acquired legal force, shall, upon notification by the prosecutor and on the basis of Section 3, second paragraph, fix the punishment the offender shall suffer as a result of the sentence which is to be executed last.

Sec. 11. If the execution of a sentence to life imprisonment is to take place concurrently with a sentence to a fine, punishment to which a fine has been converted, imprisonment for a fixed term, conditional sentence, probation, youth imprisonment, internment or disciplinary punishment, the life sentence shall supplant the other sanction.

Sec. 12. If the execution of a sentence to youth imprisonment is to take place concurrently with a sentence to a fine, punishment to which a fine has been converted, imprisonment for at most one year, conditional sentence, probation or disciplinary punishment, the sentence to youth imprisonment shall supplant the other sanction, if the youth is to be under care in an institution while serving his sentence.

If the execution of a sentence to youth imprisonment is to occur concurrently with a sentence to imprisonment for a fixed term of more than one year, the prosecutor shall, when the sentences have acquired legal force, notify the court. Depending on circumstances, the court may declare that one of the sanctions shall supplant the other or may vacate the sentence to youth imprisonment and impose a sentence to imprisonment for the crime or crimes involved. If the court sentences to imprisonment, Section 7, third paragraph, shall apply.

Sec. 13. If the execution of a sentence to internment is to occur concurrently with a sentence to a fine, punishment in to which a fine has been converted, imprisonment for a fixed term, conditional sentence, probation, youth imprisonment or disciplinary punishment, the internment shall supplant the other sanction, if the offender is to be under care in an institution while serving his sentence.

If, in view of the nature of the additional crime, which the internment is thus to cover, a new minimum term for the institutional care is deemed needed, the court may fix such term upon application by the prosecutor.

Sec. 14. If some one has been sentenced to suspension from a given office and, before sentence or later before the execution of the sentence has begun, he is found to have committed another crime, for which he shall be suspended from the same office, the court may, depending on circumstances:

1. Declare that the sentence to suspension already imposed shall cover the other crime as well, or

2. Sentence to suspension for such crime separately, in which case the combined time of the punishment may not exceed one year.

Sec. 15. Provisions of Section 10 shall correspondingly apply in a matter of suspension; however, instead of Section 3, second paragraph, the provisions of Section 14 (2) shall govern.

Sec. 16. If some one has been sentenced to dismissal from a given office and it is found that before the sentence acquired legal force he had committed another crime for which he should have been sentenced to suspension or dismissal from the same office, the court shall declare that the sentence to dismissal shall cover the other crime as well.

Sec. 17. Fine or disciplinary punishment may not be imposed for a crime defined in Chapter 20, Sections 1–4, when a sentence of suspension or dismissal is imposed for another crime and such punishment is deemed sufficient.

Chapter 35

Of Limitations on Sanctions

Sec. 1. No sanction may be imposed unless the suspect has been committed to jail or informed of his prosecution for the crime within:

1. Two years, if the crime is punishable by no more severe punishment than imprisonment for one year;

2. Five years, if the most severe punishment is imprisonment for more than one but not longer than two years;

3. Ten years, if the most severe punishment is imprisonment for more than two but no longer than eight years;

4. Fifteen years, if the most severe punishment is imprisonment for a fixed term of more than eight years;

5. Twenty-five years, if the crime is punishable by life imprisonment.

If an act includes several crimes, a sanction may be imposed for all the crimes, regardless of what has just been stated, so long as a sanction can be imposed for any one of them.

Sec. 2. A sanction may not be imposed for a crime defined in Chapter 20, Sections 1–4, unless the suspect has been committed to jail or been informed of his prosecution for the crime within five years or, if the crime is punishable as mentioned in Section 1 (3) above, within the time there stated.

Sec. 3. If a person committed to jail is released without having been informed of his prosecution for the crime or if the case against him is dismissed or filed after he has been so informed, the commitment or information shall be considered as never having occurred, if a question of the possibility of imposing a sanction is raised.

Sec. 4. The times specified in Sections 1 and 2 shall be counted from the date the crime was committed. If the appearance of a given consequence of the act is a prerequisite for the imposition of a sanction, the time shall be counted from the date such consequence appeared.

In cases referred to in Chapter 7, Section 2, the time shall be counted from the date the sentence of annulment of the marriage acquired legal force, and in the case referred to in Chapter 11, Section 5, from the date the decision concerning the alienation of property was given or else the earliest date prosecution could be instituted.

Sec. 5. If some one has committed a crime referred to in Section 1 (3, 4, or 5) and has within the period there stated again committed a crime punishable by imprisonment for more than two years, the times mentioned in Section 1 for the imposition of sanction with respect to both crimes shall be counted from the latter. What has just been said shall have corresponding application if the criminal commits further crime punishable by more than two years' imprisonment.

Sec. 6. In no case may a sanction be imposed when thirty or, if the crime is not punishable by imprisonment for more than two years, when fifteen years have elapsed from the date mentioned in Section 4.

Sec. 7. Fines imposed are null and void when three years have elapsed from the date the sentence acquired legal force, if before such time no application for the conversion of the fines has been brought to the notice of the offender. Special provisions exist concerning the nullification of fines when such notification has been made and of imprisonment into which fines have been converted.

If the offender dies, imposed fines are nullified. If the sentence acquired legal force during the offender's lifetime and if in satisfaction of the fines chattel property has been distrained or placed in public custody, the fines shall, however, be payable out of such property.

What has been said now about fines, applies equally to a monetary penalty ordered paid.

Sec. 8. A sentence to imprisonment is null and void if its execution has not begun before the period stated below has elapsed since the sentence acquired legal force:

1. Five years, if less than six months' imprisonment had been imposed;
2. Ten years, if imprisonment had been imposed for six months or longer but not more than two years;
3. Fifteen years, if imprisonment for over two but not over eight years had been imposed;
4. Twenty years, if imprisonment for a fixed term longer than eight years had been imposed;
5. Thirty years, if life imprisonment had been imposed.

Sec. 9. If the serving of a sentence to imprisonment for a fixed term is interrupted, the provisions in Section 8 shall correspondingly apply with respect to the continuation of the serving of the sentence; in such case the time shall be computed with consideration of what remains of the punishment imposed. The time shall be counted from the date the interruption occurred or, when parole has been granted but declared revoked, from the date the declaration acquired legal force.

Sec. 10. Unless the execution of the sentence has already begun, a sentence to youth imprisonment is null and void when five years have elapsed, and a sentence to internment when fifteen years have elapsed since the sentence acquired legal force.

If the serving of a sentence to youth imprisonment or internment is interrupted while the offender is under care in an institution, or if a decision to re-commit him to the institution is taken while he is under care outside the institution, the provision of the first paragraph shall correspondingly apply with regard to the continuation of the serving of the sentence; in such case, the time shall be counted from the date of the interruption or the date the re-commitment order acquired legal force.

Sec. 11. Special legislation governs the nullification of disciplinary punishments.

Of Forfeiture of Property and of Other Special Legal Effects of Crime

Sec. 1. A bribe, as well as any tender or compensation similar thing meant to promote a crime, the giving or receiving of which is a crime according to this Code, shall be declared forfeited to the Crown unless this is obviously unreasonable; if the property consisted of other than money and is no longer available, its value may be declared forfeited instead. What has just been said shall not apply, however, against a person who in good faith has acquired such property or a special claim thereto.

If, through a crime defined in this Code, some one has otherwise received a gain in excess of the loss to an individual, he may, according to what is deemed reasonable, be required to pay the Crown an amount corresponding thereto.

Sec. 2. That which has been used as an instrument in the commission of a crime defined in this Code or has been the product of such crime may, if the owner or some one acting for him has intentionally committed the act or been an accessory thereto, be declared partly or wholly forfeited to the Crown, if this is called for in order to prevent crime or for other special reasons and is not obviously unreasonable; if the property is no longer available, its value may be declared forfeited instead. The same shall apply with regard to instruments, with which some one has had such dealings as constitute criminal preparation according to this Code.

What has been stated in the first paragraph shall not apply against a person who in good faith has acquired the property or a special claim thereto.

Sec. 3. Even though a case described in Section 2 is not in question, a picklock, counterfeit coin or other object, which, because of its special nature and other circumstances, raises an apprehension that it may come to be criminally employed, may be declared forfeited.

Sec. 4. If a vessel or airplane, subject to lien or mortgage is declared forfeited, the court may declare that the lien on the forfeited property shall cease. If in some other instance some one's claim on a property declared forfeited should stand despite the declaration, the court shall make a reservation to that effect.

Sec. 5. Instead of forfeiture, the court may prescribe a measure in order to prevent misusage.

Sec. 6. Provisions in law or statute with regard to a special legal effect of some one's being sentenced to punishment shall apply also when some other sanction mentioned in Chapter 1, Section 3, is imposed.

In applying the first paragraph, conditional sentence, probation, youth imprisonment and internment, and also, unless the sentence otherwise states, surrender for special care shall be considered equivalent to imprisonment. In that connection, internment and, if so ordered, probation, youth imprisonment and surrender for special care shall be considered as corresponding to imprisonment for at least six months.

Sec. 7. If sentencing some one to a sanction is prerequisite to the forfeiture of property or other special legal effect, which can follow upon crime, the court may, if the sanction for the crime is remitted, order, in so far as circumstances dictate it, that such legal effect shall ensue.

Sec. 8. If a crime has been committed by some one who has not reached fifteen years of age or who has acted under the influence of mental disease, feebleminded-ness or other mental abnormality of such profound nature that it must be considered as equivalent to mental disease, the court may order forfeiture of property or other special legal effect that can follow upon the crime only if and to the extent this can be regarded as reasonable in view of his mentality, the nature of the act, and other circumstances.

Sec. 9. If a sanction can no longer be imposed because of the death of the criminal or for other cause, the provisions of Section 1–5 can be applied only if, in a proceeding pertaining thereto, a summons has been served within ten years from the time the crime was committed. In such case the prosecutor may institute proceedings only if deemed required from a public point of view.

In a case just mentioned, the provisions of Chapter 35, Section 3, shall have corresponding application.

Sec. 10. A decision concerning forfeiture or other measure in accord with Sections 1–5 is null and void to the extent that its execution has not occurred within ten years from the date the decision acquired legal force.

Chapter 37

Of Boards

Sec. 1. The area of a supervision board's activity shall cover the district of one or more public courts of first instance. However, special supervision boards may be appointed to deal with matters concerning persons sentenced to imprisonment, youth imprisonment or internment. The area of a supervision board's activity is determined by the King.

A supervision board consists of five members, unless the King decrees that a given board shall have more members. Substitute members are appointed to a number determined by the King. The chairman and two members constitute a quorum. In urgent cases as well as in matters of less importance the chairman alone may act on behalf of the board. Such action shall be reported at the next meeting of the board.

The King may order that a supervision board shall work in sections. Applicable parts of the law governing the board shall apply to such section.

Sec. 2. The King appoints the chairman of the supervision board and a substitute who, in the absence of the chairman, serves in his stead. The chairman shall be learned in the law and have judicial experience; his substitute shall be learned in the law.

Other members and their substitutes are appointed by the county administration in the county within which the supervision board has its chief area of activity. They should have experience involving youth care or employment agencies or else in public functions.

The chairman, other members and substitutes are appointed for terms of five years. If a member or substitute leaves before the expiration of his term, a new member or substitute is appointed to serve for the balance of the term.

Sec. 3. In accord with provisions below there shall be a special board, the board of corrections, for dealing with matters concerning parole. This board shall consist of one member, who occupies or has occupied a judicial office and who shall be chairman of the board, and four additional members. Substitutes are appointed to a number determined by the King. The King appoints the chairman, other members and substitutes. In the absence of the chairman, his function shall be exercised by a member or substitute designated by the King and qualified for appointment as chairman.

The chairman, other members and substitutes are appointed for terms of five years. If a member or substitute leaves before the expiration of his term, a new member or substitute is appointed to serve for the balance of the term.

Sec. 4. The youth imprisonment board and the internment board shall each consist of a member, who occupies or has occupied a judicial office and who shall be chairman of the board, and one member who is a psychiatrist, both of them with special substitutes who have the qualifications required of the respective members, and three additional members together with substitutes to a number determined by the King. The King appoints the chairman, other members and substitutes. In the absence of the chairman, his function shall be exercised by a member or substitute designated by the King and qualified for appointment as chairman.

In urgent cases as well as in matters of less importance, the chairman alone may act on behalf of the board. Such action shall be reported at the next meeting of the board.

The chairman, other members and substitutes are appointed for terms of five years. If a member or substitute leaves before the expiration of his term, a new member or substitute is appointed to serve for the balance of the term.

Sec. 5. A member or substitute of a supervision board, the board of corrections, the youth imprisonment board and the internment board shall have taken a judge's oath. The same grounds for disqualification that apply to a judge shall apply to a member or substitute, but the provisions of Chapter 4, Section 13 (7) of the Code of Procedure shall not be applicable to a member or substitute of a supervision board.

With respect to decisions by a board referred to in the first paragraph, applicable parts of the provisions governing voting in criminal cases in a superior court shall be observed.

Sec. 6. In a matter dealt with by a supervision board and relating to some question other than the termination of supervision or a directive issued, the offender shall receive an opportunity to express himself if this can conveniently be done and hearing him would not be unprofitable. If the offender demands to be heard orally in a matter before the board, he shall be given the opportunity.

In a matter before the board of correction, the youth imprisonment board and the internment board an opportunity should be given the offender to express himself or be orally heard if this can be assumed to be useful and can be conveniently arranged.

Sec. 7. A person sentenced to imprisonment may request the board of correction to review a decision by a supervision board in a matter of parole.

If a parolee is not satisfied with the supervision board's decision relative to placement under supervision in accord with Chapter 26, Section 11, a directive in accord with Chapter 26, Section 15, or a measure in accord with Chapter 26, Section 18, 19, or 22, he may request the board of correction to review the decision.

Sec. 8. A person sentenced to probation may appeal to the circuit court of appeals against a supervision board's decision relative to placement under supervision in accord with Chapter 28, Section 5, a measure in accord with Chapter 28, Section 7 or 11, or a directive referred to in Chapter 26, Section 15. The time for appeal is counted from the date he was informed of the decision.

Sec. 9. If a person sentenced to youth imprisonment or internment is not satisfied with the decision of the supervision board in accord with Chapter 29, Section 8 or 11 or Chapter 30, Section 11 or 14, or relative to a directive referred to in Chapter 26, Section 15, he may request the youth imprisonment board or the internment board to review the decision.

Sec. 10. A supervision board's decision mentioned in Sections 7–9 shall be instantly obeyed unless otherwise provided.

Sec. 11. No appeal may be taken against a decision made by a supervision board in accord with this Code except in cases mentioned in Sections 7–9; by a circuit court of appeals in accord with Section 8 or by the board of correction, the youth imprisonment board or the internment board.

Chapter 38

Procedural Provisions, etc.

Sec. 1. A person sentenced to conditional sentence or to probation may, before the time for appeal has expired, make a declaration that he is satisfied with the judgment as to the sanction imposed. Such declaration shall also cover fines imposed on the basis of Chapter 27, Section 2, or Chapter 28, Section 2, and includes treatment mentioned in Chapter 28, Section 3. The declaration shall be made in the manner prescribed by the King.

A declaration once made in the prescribed manner is not retractable. If the offender has appealed the sentence, his appeal shall be considered withdrawn by the declaration so far as the sanction for the crime is concerned.

Special provisions exist relating to the declaration of satisfaction in conneciton with a sentence to imprisonment, youth imprisonment or internment.

Sec. 2. If a court has surrendered some one for care in accord with the Child Welfare Act or the Temperance Act but it is found, upon investigation prescribed, that the prerequisites indicated by law for such care, or for care of the kind the child welfare board or the temperance board declared themselves, in a report to the court, prepared to arrange, are absent, the court which first adjudicated the case may, upon application by the prosecutor, vacate the order for surrender for special care and impose another sanction for the crime.

Sec. 3. A question concerning a measure in accord with Chapter 27, Section 5, second paragraph, or Section 6, is dealt with by the court which first adjudicated the case in which conditional sentence was passed.

A proceeding based on Chapter 28, Section 8, shall be instituted in the public court of first instance, within whose district the supervision board which is in charge of the supervision of the offender is active.

A proceeding based on Chapter 30, Section 8, is instituted in the court which first adjudicated the case in which internment was imposed.

Cases referred to in this Section may also be brought before a court presently adjudicating a criminal charge against the offender, or before the court in the locality where the offender is mostly staying, if, in view of the investigation as well as costs and other circumstances, the court deems it appropriate.

Sec. 4. Notification based on Chapter 34, Section 10, 12 or 15 is addressed to the first court in any one of the cases.

Application based on Chapter 34, Section 13, is made to the court which first adjudicated the case in which internment was imposed.

Sec. 5. A proceeding to which reference is made in Chapter 27, Section 6, Chapter 28, Section 8, or Chapter 30, Section 8, shall be considered instituted, when the offender was informed of the opening of the case.

Sec. 6. With respect to the composition of the court when it has to decide a question referred to in Section 2 or in Chapter 27, Section 6, Chapter 28, Section 9, Chapter 30, Section 8, or Chapter 34, Section 10, second paragraph 12 or 13 or 15, insofar as the application of Section 10, second paragraph, is concerned, the general provisions of the Code of Procedure shall apply with reference to the competency of a court in criminal trials. The same shall apply with respect to the vacating of sanction in accord with Chapter 34, Section 1 (3), the forfeiture of conditionally granted liberty in accord with Chapter 34, Section 4, and recommitment to an institution or other measure in accord with Chapter 34, Section 8 or 9.

A question concerning any other measure in accord with Chapter 34, Section 4, a measure in accord with Chapter 34, Section 5, and a measure or treatment in accord with Chapter 34, Section 6, may not be decided by a district court without lay judges or a city court with but one judge learned in the law.

In deciding upon a question in accord with Chapter 27, Section 5, second paragraph or Chapter 28, Section 11, a district court may decide without lay judges and a city court with one judge learned in the law.

Sec. 7. If a question of sentencing to internment arises, the court shall, unless deemed unnecessary for some special reason, request an opinion from the internment board as to whether or not such a measure should be taken.

Before the court, in accord with Chapter 34, Section 1, decides on a measure concerning some one sentenced to youth imprisonment or internment, an opinion shall, if found needed, be secured from the youth imprisonment board or the internment board. What has now been said shall have corresponding application in cases referred to in Chapter 34, Section 12.

Sec. 8. In a proceeding concerning a measure in accord with Section 2 or Chapter 27, Section 5, second paragraph, or Section 6; Chapter 28, Section 9, Chapter 30, Section 8, or Chapter 34, Section 10, second paragraph, Section 12 or 13 or 15, in so far as the application of Section 10, second paragraph, is concerned, the court of first instance shall give the offender an opportunity to express himself. If he requests to be heard orally, he shall be given the opportunity. The court's adjudication of the matter is by decision.

A measure in accord with Chapter 28, Section 11, may be decided without giving the offender an opportunity to express himself.

Sec. 9. The court's decision on a measure in accord with Chapter 27, Section 5, second paragraph, Chapter 28, Section 11, or Chapter 34, Section 10, second paragraph, Section 12 or 13 or 15, in so far as the application of Section 10, second paragraph, is concerned, is to be instantly obeyed, unless otherwise decided. The same applies to decisions based on Chapter 27, Section 6, Chapter 28, Section 9, or Chapter 34, Section 4, 5, 6 or 8 with reference to directives, monetary penalties, probationary period or length of youth imprisonment.

If a decision in accord with Chapter 28, Section 9, second paragraph, or Chapter 34, Section 6, intends that someone not yet twenty-three years of age is to undergo treatment established by Chapter 28, Section 3, the court may order the decision to be executed even though it has not acquired legal force. Such order may also be given with respect to a decision in accord with Chapter 34, Section 8, concerning re-commitment to an institution of one undergoing youth imprisonment.

Sec. 10. A warning decided upon by a court or a supervision board shall be promptly delivered to the offender in person. If the warning cannot be delivered in connection with the decision, another court or supervision board may be requested to deliver it.

Sec. 11. A monetary penalty imposed by authority of Chapter 26, Section 18, Chapter 28, Section 7 or 9, Chapter, 29, Section 8, Chapter 30, Section 11, or Chapter 34, Section 4 or 6, may be enforced only if the prosecutor, upon application by the supervision board, institutes a proceeding in point before the sanction imposed has been fully executed or otherwise terminated. Such proceeding shall be considered instituted when the offender has been informed of the application for enforcement of the monetary penalty.

Sec. 12. It is the duty of police authorities to assist the court, the supervision board, the board of correction, the youth imprisonment board and the internment board in assuring the offender's appearance at a proceeding or in a matter dealt with in accord with this Code or in his detention in accord with Chapter 26, Section 22, Chapter 28, Section 11, Chapter 29, Section 11, or Chapter 30, Section 14.

Sec. 13. More detailed directives required for the application of the provisions of Chapters 25–38 are issued by the King.

PREFACE

The Danish Committee on Comparative Law has found it useful to have a general survey of Danish and Norwegian law published in the English language thereby making it accessible to the public at large. The Committee has been fortunate enough to secure the cooperation of a great number of distinguished experts in Norway and Denmark:

from Norway: professor, dr. Johannes Andenaes, professor, dr. Carl Jacob Arnholm, professor, dr. Sjur Braekhus, professor, dr. Torstein Eckhoff, assistant professor Carsten Smith, all in the University of Oslo, and Mrs. Elizabeth Schweigaard Selmer, chief of division, ministry of Justice; from Denmark: assistant professor K. Ehlers, professor, dr. W. E. v. Eyben, Folketingets ombudsmand, professor, dr. Stephan Hurwitz, professor, dr. Stig Iuul, former assistant professor N. Kjaergaard, professor, dr. Anders Vinding Kruse and professor, dr. Allan Philip, all in the University of Copenhagen.

Only a minor part of the contributions has been written in English; the rest of the work has been translated by Mr. Poul Boeg, Miss Else Giersing, both sworn interpreters and translators, and Miss Hedevig Ring, M.A.

The publication of this compilation has been generously supported by Rask-Ørsted Fondet, Copenhagen: the Committee expresses its heartiest thanks.

For further study of Danish and Norwegian Law attention is drawn to Scandinavian Legal Bibliography edited by professor, dr. Ake Malmstrøm. Uppsala, November 1961.

For the compilation and the editing of the present book the undersigned chairman of the Danish Committee is responsible.

CHAPTER IX

Criminal Law

1. The criminal laws of Denmark and Norway have both a national character of their own. The evolution from the earliest written sources of law in the 12th and 13th centuries has generally followed a steady course. In its nucleus this law has been of Germanic type. Roman law has had but a limited and indirect influence on the earlier stages of the development of law. A more important impact was exercised by cannon law and mosaic law during the Middle Ages and up to the 17th century.

In recent times, Scandinavian criminal law, like the other branches of law, has of course participated in the evolution of the general cultural currents. In the field of criminal law the influences deriving therefrom have particularly been related to German science in the 18th and 19th centuries. There has been no question, however, of any general acceptance of a particular foreign penal legislation or doctrine.

The considerable changes to which the Danish and Norwegian criminal law has been subject in our century, and the reform work that is still in progress, have to a very great extent been based on an international, primarily inter-Sandinavian, collaboration. In spite of the important common features which as a result of these criminalistic tendencies across the frontiers now characterise many recent criminal laws, as is the case with the Danish and the Norwegian penal legislation, the legislation of both countries presents, however, several important characteristics. As such willingness to accept the new ideas of a progressive penal policy may be mentioned.

2. Danish and Norwegian criminal law has escaped being dominated by any one-sided, stringent and consistent penal theory. The criminal law system, as laid down in the legislation and as practised by the courts and by the public prosecution, contains repressive or retributory elements as well as considerations of general and individual prevention. It may be said, however, that the latter considerations, which make the influence on and the treatment of the individual offender according to his peculiar nature the principal aim of penal policy, have gained ever increasing ground in recent legislation.

3. In both countries the most important penal provisions are codified in a general Criminal Code: the Norwegian Criminal Code of 22 May 1902 and the Danish Criminal Code of 15 April 1930. Great weight is attached to keeping the penal legislation up to date. At the present time, indeed, Criminal Law Commissions have been formed in both countries for the purpose of preparing such amendments as have been found desirable in the light of new experience and new views of penal policy. In Norway, where—with some interruptions—this revisonary work has been in progress ever since 1922, the result has been a gradual revision of large parts of the Criminal Code of 1902.

In addition to the general Criminal Codes, a number of Acts contain special provisions, particularly dealing with offences of a less grave nature. As a rule, the general provisions of the Criminal Code also apply to punishable violations of the special legislation.

4. As far as graduation of offences is concerned, the system differs as between the two countries. The Norwegian Criminal Code makes a distinction between "felonies" and "misdeameanors". The distinction has chiefly procedural but also some penal consequences; thus, attempts at misdeameanor are not punishable. The Danish Criminal Code has no such division. In point of fact, however, general usage confines the term of "felony" to offences of a certain gravity. And the Criminal Code also contains a number of special provisions for offences of a less serious type or of no great degree of criminality, so that, inter alia, liability for attempt and complicity is precluded or restricted; further that provision is made for a shorter period of limitation, and that the possibility of applying more radical measures involving deprivation of liberty outside the actual penal system is precluded. There is therefore no great difference.

5. Criminal liability is in principle confined to acts which at the time of the deed were criminalized by an explicit legal provision or in conformity with such provision, and the penalty cannot be more severe than prescribed by the law in force at the time the act was committed (nullum crimen sine lege, nulla poena sine lege). Application of penalty on the basis purely of common law is thus out of question. The application of this principle, however, differs somewhat as between the two countries. The Norwegian Constitution of 1814 provides: "No person may be convicted except in conformity with a law", a fact which, however, has not bound the courts to any strict construction of terms where evidently a more liberal construction better meets the intention of the legislator. The Danish Constitution contains no corresponding provision, and the Danish Criminal Code of 1930, like the earlier Danish penal legislation, has in sect. 1 maintained an opportunity for analogic application of penal provisions to acts which "must be treated as quite similar" to the act described in the Code. This provision, which does not authorize every analogy, but only the so-called strict or complete legal analogy is in practice applied as a rare exception only and then so narrowly that it goes no further than what might be justified as a reasonable construction of the particular legal provision. It is thus only on paper that the Danish Criminal Code may be cited in support of a conception relinquishing the legal guarantees implied by the explicit pre-fixation of the content of the criminal act as a condition for criminal liability. For reasons of principle, the provision of analogy should be abolished next time the Criminal Code is to be revised, which will involve no change in the actual legal position. Characteristic of the reluctance as to a wider application of analogy is the fact that, when after the cessation of the German occupation in 1945 it became necessary to instigate a judicial purge against traitors whose offences during the occupation did not all come clearly under the terms of the penal provisions, it was not found desirable to deal with the acts through an analogical application of the Criminal Code, it being preferred to provide an indisputable issue through a new Act. The fact that, on the other hand, it proved necessary to a certain extent to give the Act retrospective application was felt deeply regrettable, but was all the same deemed justified, considering that during the occupation Parliament had been precluded from freely exercising its legislative activities. In principle, the desirability of avoiding any retrospective penal legislation was maintained. And this view has been one of the chief arguments for enacting, in time of peace, a new up-to-date treason legislation dealing with the possibility of any future war and occupation, as was done by an Act dated 7 June 1952.

6. In accordance with the maxim nullum crimen sine lege, efforts have been made in Danish and Norwegian penal legislation to make the descriptions in the Code of the individual punishable offences as exact as possible. The casuistic legal formulation of earlier law is everywhere replaced by generally formulated type provisions. As regards certain penal provisions, more particularly within the special legislation, it has, however, not been possible to entirely avoid using rather vague descriptions of the acts to which the penal provision applies, e.g., when the Price Act prohibits "unfair" prices or business terms, or when the rules governing blackmail cover threats which are not "duly" motivated. The application of such "judicial standards" in criminal law has lately been subject to much discussion.

7. As to the subjective conditions of liability, it is a principle laid down practically without exception in the criminal laws of both countries that liability cannot be imposed without individual guilt on the part of the offender. The requirement of guilt (imputatio) implies an intentional or, at least, a negligent act on the part of the perpetrator, and that no effect of the act that is not covered by that subjective guilt may justify punishment or aggravated punishment. As regards the offences criminalized in the Criminal Code itself, only intentional acts are as a rule liable to punishment, in the event of negligence such liability is only assumed if it is expressly prescribed in the relevant special provision of the Criminal Code. In the case of violations of the special legislation, the situation is different. In Danish law, negligence is covered by the criminal liability, unless otherwise provided in the Act concerned. Under Norwegian law, the question is decided through a construction of the particular special Act.

8. The requirement of intention does not quite cover what in Anglo-Saxon law is denoted as mens rea. Decisive are certain psychological criteria specified in theory. It is a controversial question to what extent these criteria should be laid down as reflecting the perpetrator's will or his conception. In practice, a combination of the relevant theories developed particularly in German doctrine has been accepted. Accordingly, there is intention not only in regard to what the perpetrator intended, but also in regard to what he deemed a necessary or most likely result. Also the so-called dolus eventualis is recognized as a form of intention, but is very rarely used as basis of court decisions on the question of guilt.

9. As a result of the requirement of individual guilt, criminal liability of corporations is generally precluded. In more recent theory, however, the desirability and justification of making provisions for imposing a fine on joint-stock companies and other corporations on Anglo-Saxon lines have gained ground, and a few special Acts have now provisions for such liability.

10. The question of knowledge of the rules of law has in theory and legislation been kept separate from the question of subjective guilt. As a general rule criminal liability is to be imposed irrespective of the fact that the offender pleads ignorance or misapprehension of the penal provision (ignorantia juris semper nocet). This does not apply, however, if the misapprehension was "excusable", i.e., if the offender is not to blame. Under sect. 57 of the Norwegian Criminal Code, as it has been constructed in practice, the offender is exempt from punishment in such cases. Under sect. 84 of the Danish Criminal Code, impunity does not follow as a matter of course, but the courts have power to reduce the penalty or remit it altogether.

11. The subjective conditions of criminal liability are supplemented by provisions on exemption from liability in the event of lack of imputability. These provisions relate, on the other hand, to the age limit governing criminal liability and, on the other, to the significance of psychic abnormality in the offender.

12. As first regards the age limit, the minimum age of criminal liability is in Danish law 15, in Norwegian law 14. Any criminal prosecution of a child who at the time the act was committed was under that age is precluded. On the other hand, The National Assistance Act provides that children who commit criminal acts may be placed under the care of the child welfare authorities, e.g. even in such a manner that the child is removed the home and committed to the care of a child welfare institution.

Juvenile delinquents between 15 (14) and 18 years of age may be prosecuted, but this is very rarely done. In the vast majority of cases the charge is withdrawn subject to the condition that the young person even of that age be committed to care by the child welfare authorities. Apart from the very few cases of prosecution, the actual minimum age of criminal liability proper is thus 18.

The care replacing conviction and execution of sentence may, if necessary, be extended till the person concerned attains 21 years of age. The child welfare authorities have at their disposal a number of educational homes, some of which having a closed section for particularly maladjusted young persons. The conditions under which resocialisation and training take place in these homes hardly differ very much from the conditions obtaining in the youth prison referred to below, where the commitment formally has the character of "punishment". At present, efforts are being made to co-ordinate the treatment of the young offenders who are now distributed between the child care institutions and the institutions of the prison administration.

13. The rules governing the psychic abnormality of the offender are framed rather differently in the two countries. We shall first look at the rules of the Danish Code (see, in particular, ss. 16–18 and 70).

14. According to these rules, persons who were insane at the time the act was committed are generally exempt from criminal liability. The Danish Criminal Code, however, does not apply a purely medical criterion so that the psychiatric diagnosis of insanity automatically involves impunity. It is left to the discretion of the court whether the supposed mental disease viewed in relation to the offence committed should unconditionally preclude criminal liability. In borderline cases, special regard may be had to the question of whether, in spite of his insanity, the offender has been able to act rationally and whether he is susceptible of being influenced through ordinary punishment. No fixed doctrine, like the British MacNaghten Rules can be said to exist in these borderline cases. In practice the proceedings are as a rule stayed or the court holds the offender irresponsible in presence of medical proof of insanity. In that respect, as a rule, a report from the Forensic Medical Council on the basis of preceding observation in hospital is required. The physicians concerned are generally not called as witnesses in court.

15. The same significance as "insanity" in its proper sense is statutorily accorded to "conditions recognized as similar to insanity", i.e. conditions of psychic abnormality which, though not coming under the types of disease characterized by psychiatric science as insanity (psychosis), must nevertheless be supposed to have influenced the ability of motivation in the same pathological way as a psychotic condition. Certain neuroses and passing mental anomalies resulting in so-called abnormal isolated reactions may be mentioned. In practice, the said provision of irresponsibility is but little applied.

16. Offenders who are pronounced mentally deficient will always be declared irresponsible. On the other hand, intelligence defects of a less pronounced nature placing the offender at a subnormal intelligence level, without his being characterized as mentally deficient, do not normally exempt him from criminal liability. This is due to the fact that there exist no special welfare services for such a category of persons, the so-called mentally retarded, while there are highly developed welfare services for mental defectives, including residential care.

17. Of particular interest are the provisions of the Danish Criminal Code on the treatment of the psychically abnormal persons who without being mentally ill, nor mentally deficient, present serious charactereological anomalies, the so-called psychopathic personalities or persons suffering from character insufficiency. As far as this group is concerned, the Criminal Code provides for a differentiated treatment. Firstly it has to be decided whether or not they are found "susceptible of influence through punishment". If punishment is regarded as unsuitable, which, inter alia, may appear from the fact that punishment has been applied several times in vain, the offender shall be exempted from criminal liability; this can only be decided after a thourough medical examination of his whole personality. The offender may instead be sentenced to detention or other forms of non-punitive treatment under rules which will be discussed below. If, conversely, the offender is found to be susceptible of influence through punishment despite his psychopathic disposition, he may be sentenced to ordinary punishment, including ordinary imprisonment, or he may be sentenced to a term of imprisonment to be served under medical supervision in a special institution for psychopathic criminals, the so-called psychopathic prison, but otherwise being in the nature of an ordinary penalty involving deprivation of liberty. This latter form of deprivation of liberty is, however, but little applied. It must be recognized that the criterion of "susceptibility of influence through punishment" is rather vague and hardly, taken isolated, is made the basis of decisions. There is instead a clear tendency to make a general evaluation, taking into consideration the offences committed, the personality of the offender and the reaction and treatment possibilities that may be applied and in this way to choose the sanction which, having regard to all the circumstances at hand, is the most adequate in each particular case.

18. It should finally be noted that, as a rule, intoxication, even in its highest degrees, does not preclude application of punishment. Only in the event of complete unconsciousness, or where the intoxication has been of a pathological character, is it to a certain extent possible to exempt the offender from punishment.

19. In Norwegian law, the rules governing the psychic abnormality are more simple. Following a legislative amendment in 1929, a purely medical criterion is applied: if the act was committed in a condition of insanity (psychosis) or unconsciousness, the offender is unconditionally exempt from punishment, without the question of any connection between the abnormal condition and the act being examined; on the other hand, security measures may be applied, if necessary. Equivalent to insanity is pronounced mental deficiency, the level normally being an I.Q. of around 50. No other abnormal conditions may involve impunity, if they have not precluded the necessary intention, but they may be taken into account in meting out punishment and may give rise to application of security measures (see below par. 32). Self-inflicted intoxication does not preclude punishment, even if it has resulted in complete unconsciousness, except in cases where the statutory provisions require a special intention, e.g., in the case of theft, the intention to obtain, for oneself or for others, an unlawful gain.

20. As regards the objective conditions of criminal liability, it is of course first of all required that the committed act and its relevant effects may be subsumed under the acts covered by the particular legal provision. With positive acts are, as a general rule, classed omissions which according to a natural construction of the relevant penal clause may be regarded as covered by it. In addition, the omission qua omission is in some cases criminalized without being regarded as causal in relation to the consequence that should have been averted. Thus, a penalty (relatively mild) is prescribed for omission to come to the rescue of any person who is in evident danger of his life, where the help may be offered without any particular danger to himself or others.

21. In the case of liability for the effects of a certain act, it is in objective respect required, not only that the act is causal in relation to the effect, but also that the effect is an "adequate" consequence of the act; this implies that it must not have been caused as a result of developments being quite outside what normally may be anticipated, or on which it would be unreasonable to base any criminal liability.

22. In addition to the general conditions laid down as to the accordance of the act with the criminalized element of the deed and as to the causal and adequate relation of the consequences to the act, another objective condition governing the liability is laid down, that is, that the act is contrary to law. This implies the general reservation applying to the construction of any law, that acts which, properly speaking, accord with the description of the punishable offence may nevertheless be lawful or permissible; this may be the case because the law must be supposed to have taken account of the general conceptions prevailing in society or there may exist special, objective grounds for impunity, such as self-defence, jus necessitatis, consent or negtiorum gestio.

23. A few observations shall be made only concerning the rules governing self-defence (sect. 13 of the Danish, sect. 48 of the Norwegian Criminal Code) and jus necessitatis (sect. 14 of the Danish, sect. 47 of the Norwegian Code); these rules are characteristic of Danish and Norwegian law on account of their relativity. Thus, self-defence in the face of unlawful attacks must be kept within the limits resulting from the fact that the averting act must never go beyond the necessary; further it must not exceed what is reasonable, having regard to the danger inherent in the attack, the person of the aggressor, and the social importance of the interests endangered by the attack. Within these limits it is on the other hand not unconditionally required that the injury inflicted on the aggressor in order to avert the unlawful attack shall be less than the injury threatening the person attacked. Whereas, in the case of exercise of jus necessitatis, which in contradistinction to self-defence does not presuppose that the emergency was caused through any unlawful attack, it is always required that the interests that are sacrificed shall be "of relatively minor importance" (the Norwegian Code has a somewhat different wording). It is not assumed that the provision of jus necessitatis of the Criminal Code in any case admits of sacrifice of human lives. The possibility of an extra-legal jus necessitatis is, however, recognized in Danish law, and it is also possible, on subjective grounds, to acquit any person who has acted in the face of a quite exceptional emergency where normal motivation must be regarded as precluded and where the conditions of pronouncing punishable "guilt" therefore fail.

24. In connection with the objective basis of liability, mention should be made also of the rules governing punishment of attempts and complicity.

The Codes of both countries have general penal clauses for attempt (sect. 21 (Denmark), sect. 51 (Norway)). Under Danish law, the same maximum penalty may be inflicted for attempt as for an accomplished offence, whereas the Norwegian Code always prescribes a milder penalty for attempts. Under both Codes the penalty for attempt may be reduced to the minimum penalty prescribed in the Code itself and not only to the minimum penalty prescribed for the offence concerned, i.e., to a small fine. Attempts are in practice generally liable to a considerably milder penalty than an accomplished offence.

As regards the delimitation of the concept of attempt, the rules differ. The Norwegian Code requires that the offender has commenced to carry out the offence (sect. 49). The corresponding provision of the Danish Code (sect. 21), on the other hand, applies to any act "aiming at promoting or carrying out an offence". Thus even remote preparatory acts, e.g., procurement of arms or housebreaking tools in view of particular offences, may without any statutory limitation be liable to punishment as attempts. In this respect, Danish law goes further than most other national laws, which usually confine the criminality to cases where an act more directly connected with the carrying out of the offence has been committed. In practice, however, the difference between Danish and foreign law in this field is hardly very great. It is very rare that charge is made in respect of more remote preparatory acts, and a substantial limitation is implied by the demand of proof being made in regard to the offender's intention to commit the offence to which the act should have reference.

25. Sect. 23 of the Danish Code contains a general provision governing criminal liability for complicity. Accordingly, the penal provisions of the Code apply not only to the direct offender, but to any person who by instigation, advice or action has contributed to the offence, thus physical as well as mental accomplices. In point of fact, the Norwegian Code holds the same view; instead of having a general provision governing complicity, it is here covered by the individual penal clauses. In the event of minor offences, no mention is sometimes made of complicity and in that case the penal sanction applies only to the person who has carried out the very act described.

Unlike British-American law, no special rules have been laid down about conspiracy. The mere collusion about an offence will normally not give rise to criminal liability. The liability for complicity is not, as was the case in earlier theory, understood as a liability derived from or being accessory to the liability of the offender, but as an independent liability determined by the importance of the complicity and the subjective conditions of the accomplice. The penalty for complicity may rise to the maximum of the penalties concerned, but may be facultatively reduced, subject, however, to specified conditions.

26. The system of penal sanctions first covers penalties proper. They may consist in fines or penalties involving deprivation of liberty. The death penalty is not applied to civil offences in time of peace. The last execution for such offence took place in Norway in 1876, in Denmark in 1892, and the formal abolition of capital punishment was made in Norway by the Criminal Code of 1902, in Denmark by the Criminal Code of 1930. The abolition was not accompanied by any increase in the number of murders. In the Military Criminal Code, both countries have maintained the possibility to apply the death penalty in time of war. Through statutory amendments of recent years (Norway, 1950; Denmark, 1952) motivated by international political tension and the necessity of an effective fight against fifth-column activities, the authority to apply the death penalty in respect of grave treasonable offences committed in time of war or warlike conditions has been extended, applying also to civil persons. At the time of the judicial purge following the cessation of the German occupation in 1945, capital punishment was applied also to some of the most hardened killers and terrorists in German service.

27. Where not otherwise provided by law, fines may be imposed without any legally fixed maximum. In Denmark, but not in Norway, the so-called day-fine system is applied in the case of violations of the Criminal Code in contradistinction to infringements of the special legislation. Under this system the fine is fixed proportionate to the guilt as a multiple (from 1 to 60) of an amount corresponding more or less to the average daily earnings of the offender. The system has not obtained the same recognition in Denmark as in Sweden and Finland, where it was first practised. It is applied in a very small proportion of the total number of cases involving imposition of fines.

28. The principal form of the penalty involving deprivation of liberty is imprisonment. The minimum term of that type of penalty is 30, in Norway 21 days, the maximum 16, in Norway 20 years or for life. In the case of a number of less serious offences, provision has in Denmark been made for the application of a milder form of deprivation of liberty called "simple detention", which may be inflicted for terms ranging from seven days to two years. Offenders committed to simple detention may provide for their own diet, and the detention is in the nature of a custodia honesta rather than of any actual penalty of imprisonment. It is to a certain, not very large extent applied to offenders of a non-criminal type. A somewhat related institute in Norway is virtually never applied. It may be asked whether there is any ground for maintaining this special type of refined imprisonment, having regard to the reforms of recent years concerning the ordinary penalty of imprisonment.

As far as the penalty of imprisonment is concerned, the purpose of resocialization has gradualy assumed a more and more prominent place. A number of open and half-open institutions have been set up, still partly in the nature of an experiment, and great progress has been made in regard to classification and differentiation of the prisoners. Release on parole plays an important role as part of the prison system. It may take place on the expiration of two-thirds of the term, subject to a minimum of four months.

29. In meting out punishment in the individual case, the courts shall normally keep within the range of penalties provided for the particular offence in the special part of the Criminal Code. The ranges of penalty, however, are as a rule rather wide, and recent Danish legislation shows an increasing tendency to omit the determination of minimum levels, apart from what follows from the general statutory minimum of the type of penalty prescribed (for imprisonment, as already mentioned, 30, in Norway 21 days). Even where a particular higher minimum is prescribed, this may be departed from in a number of cases in pursuance of the general statutory grounds for reducing the penalty (Denmark, ss. 84–85; Norway, ss. 55–59). In this connection, special regard may, inter alia, be had to the young age of the offender; to a position of dependence that has affected the commission of the punishable act; to provocation, prevention or restoration of the damage caused by the offence; to great excitement or other temporary lack of mental balance at the time the act was committed. In the event of particularly extenuating circumstances, the punishment may be altogether remitted.

Maximum sanctions relating to the criminal liability, on the other hand, are maintained (apart from fines outside the day-fine system). In the event of several offences having been committed, the criminal liability is under Danish law generally kept within the normal maximum of the range of penalties or, where several ranges come into consideration, within the maximum of the most severe range. Norwegian law provides for a certain increase of the usual maximum. There is no question of any absolute accumulation of the penalties incurred in respect of each of the offences committed.

30. As special types of prison there exist in Denmark the psychopathic prison referred to above and the so-called youth prison, corresponding more or less to the British Borstal institutions. The latter prison admits young convicted male offenders, in particular between the ages of 18 and 21, with whom the child welfare authorities are unable to cope but who still give hope of social readjustment under the influence of long-standing educative and training measures. The sentence is indeterminate within a minimum of one and a maximum of three years.

The corresponding institution in Norway is termed work school; commitment to such institution shall under the Code not be regarded as a penalty.

31. There exist special forms of treatment for older persistent offenders who are not segregated for treatment by psychic deviations. Such offenders may in Denmark be committed either to workhouse or to preventive detention. In both cases the deprivation of liberty is for an indeterminate period, and both penal substitutes are in the Code, due in particular to their indeterminate nature, kept outside the actual concept of punishment, without admitting of any clear distinction from long-term imprisonment.

Sentence to workhouse (sect. 62 of the Criminal Code) is applied to habitual offenders of relatively little dangerousness to society. The term is from one to five years. The time of release is decided by a special board, the Prison Board. Quite a number of recidivists (50 to 100 a year) are sentenced to workhouse. Preventive detention (sect. 65 of the Code), which is designed for recidivists of a more dangerous type, is much more rarely applied. The minimum term of detention is here four years, and the term may be extended to 20 years or more. In recent years, very few persons have been sentenced to preventive detention, and it must be considered doubtful if there is sufficient ground for maintaining a special treatment of that nature. The particularly dangerous types will, as a rule, be physically abnormal and should be referred to psychiatric treatment and, as far as the remaining clientele is concerned, which consists of persons who do not differ substantially from ordinary prisoners, preventive detention is sometimes a disproportionately severe punishment, more particularly because of the mental strain due to the indeterminate nature of the penalty.

32. As regards the reaction to mentally abnormal offenders, the rules differ as between the two countries.

As already mentioned measures of detention are in Denmark applied by the courts under sect. 70 of the Criminal Code, when the offender on account of his psychic abnormality is acquitted of ordinary punishment or penal substitute. The insane will, as a rule, be sentenced to commitment to a mental hospital; the mental defectives will be placed under the special care provided for such persons; and the psychopaths who are considered unamenable to punishment will be committed to an institution for psychopathic criminals. In less severe cases there may, however, be questions of applying non-institutional treatment or supervision. These measures are applied with no indication of any definite minimum or maximum terms. The length of the term will, in principle, depend on the need of society for security, taking the mental condition of the offender into consideration. Cessation of the measures is decided by court order on the basis of a medical report.

In Norway, security measures (sect. 39 of the Criminal Code) may be applied even where the offender is responsible within the meaning of the Criminal Code if his "mental faculties are insufficiently developed or permanently impaired" and such condition is liable to result in recidivism. "Defective development or permanent impairment of the mental faculties" covers intelligence defects as well as emotional and character defects (psychopathies). The sentence will provide for a maximum term, as a rule five years, subject to extension, as needed, without any maximum limit. Characteristic of the statutory system is that the Code provides for a number of security measures to be applied by the administration, ranging from mild measures, such as supervision or prohibition against residence in a particular place, to deprivation of liberty in institution and, as an extreme measure imprisonment. If the court has set no limits, the prison administration has the choice between the different measures and may change over from one to the other, as the treatment is progressing. The intention has been to enable the administration to choose the measure protecting society against the danger represented by the convicted with as little suffering to the latter as possible. This extensive power of the administrative authorities may give rise to certain scruples of principle; the general opinion is, however, that the system has worked well.

33. The sexually abnormal offenders constitute a special group. In both countries, provision has been made for castration of such persons. A Danish Act of 11 May 1935 empowers the courts to order compulsory castration in the case of very grave sexual offences. This authority for compulsory castration has, however, never been applied, and members of the legal and medical profession are now generally agreed that it should on no account be applied and that the statutory provision should be repealed. In Norway, no provision has been made for compulsory castration. Voluntary castration, on the other hand, is subject to the consent of the convicted applied both in Denmark and Norway in a number of cases where such measure may without any risk permit of release of an offender who would otherwise be subject to detention as dangerous to the public security. The experience gained in that respect is favourable, and such application of castration (very limited in practice) presents therefore itself as a humane measure. In principle, however, the recognition of castration as part of the penal sanctions is still subject to discussion.

34. Finally, a number of special measures are applicable in the treatment of alcoholic offenders. There may be question of combining punishment with order of abstinence or placing in a curative institution for inebriates. In recent years, non-institutional treatment with special curative means ("antabuse" treatment) coupled with psychotherapy has been tried and orders of such treatment have been included as conditions in suspended sentences.

35. As will be seen from the foregoing, the system of penal sanctions is in both countries dualistic in the sense that the Code makes a distinction between punitive and non-punitive reactions. In Norway, the system is dualistic also in another sense, i.e. the special measures applied to psychically abnormal and habitual offenders (security measures and detention) are generally imposed in addition to punishment. Provision has been made, however, for the penalty thus inflicted to be largely remitted when the special measures are applied. In Denmark, on the other hand, the system is monistic in that respect, i.e., the special treatment (commitment to workhouse, preventive detention, psychopathic detention, etc.) replaces punishment, without it being provided in the sentence what type of penalty would have been inflicted in the case of ordinary punishment. This system works fully satisfactory in practice and there has hardly been any question of impairment of the object of the general prevention. On the contrary the special forms of detention, though not characterized as punishment, have, if anything, a more deterrent effect than ordinary punishment for a specified term.

36. Mention has been made of a number of the special measures of the penal system that are applied to special categories of offenders. Of a more general nature is the possibility to suspend the execution of a penalty through pronouncement of a conditional sentence suspending the execution of the penalty or a conditional sentence suspending the determination of the penalty.

The conditional sentence suspending the execution of the penalty was introduced in Norway in 1894, in Denmark in 1905. On Continental lines the courts were empowered to suspend the execution of sentence in case of minor offences, if so warranted by the circumstances of the individual case. The emphasis was originally only on the implied remission of the penalty incurred; already the Danish Code of 1905, however, made provision for combining the suspended sentence with constructive measures in the form of supervision or other specified moral care. The Code thus headed the development on the European Continent towards approaching the suspended sentences to the probation system of Anglo-Saxon law.

An Act passed in 1961, amending the provisions of Chapter VII in the Criminal Code on suspended sentences, introduced in Danish law, in addition to the previous form, a conditional sentence suspending the determination of penalty. Accordingly, the courts have to a certain extent the option between the two alternatives of suspended sentences, provided that, under the terms of the amendment, the punishment is meted out in a suspended sentence only where this is considered more expedient than suspending the determination of the penalty altogether.

In practice, the suspended sentence is mostly applied to juvenile delinquents and to first offenders whose criminality is of a more occasional nature. The suspended sentence provides for a probation period subject, as a rule, to a maximum of three years. In special circumstances, however, a period of probation of up to five years may be prescribed. As a condition for suspending the execution of the sentence the courts may decide that the convicted shall be placed under supervision during the whole probation period or part of it. Moreover, the courts may prescribe other conditions, as they think fit, including in particular those enumerated in the Code, such as order of abstinence, anti-alcoholic treatment, restrictions on disposal of income and property, payment of compensation, and orders relating to work and to place of residence. The conditions prescribed in the sentence are subject to subsequent modification or suspension by court order.

In the event of non-observance by the convicted of the conditions, the court may modify them and extend the probation period within the prescribed maximum or sentence the offender to punishment or other sanction in respect of the offence or, if the penalty has been prescribed in the suspended sentence, order the execution of that penalty or part of it in connection with a new suspended sentence. If the convicted commits another offence during the probation period and if, before the expiration of that period, he is prosecuted for the offence, the court inflicts an unconditional penalty or other sanction in respect of that offence and of the offence previously prosecuted. If warranted by the circumstances, the court may instead inflict an unconditional penalty only in respect of the new offence, possibly in connection with a change of the conditions previously prescribed, or the court may pass a new conditional sentence relating to both offences. It might be noted that a very great percentage of all cases concerning violation of the Criminal Code results in a suspended sentence and it is quite possible that the introduction in Denmark of the new form of sentence suspending the determination of the penalty will tend to increase the number of suspended sentences.

The Norwegian provisions governing suspended sentences have been subject to similar amendments.

37. In line with the efforts of resocialization underlying the application of suspended sentences and probation, both countries have recently enacted new provisions designed to facilitate the social resettlement of the convicted, including even those who have served a more or less severe penalty, by limiting the extensive and inappropriate provisions of previous law governing loss of civil rights as a result of punishment.

The view underlying the former provisions on loss of rights, more particularly so in Denmark, was that offences of a certain type or penalties of a certain severity entail public dishonour to the convicted. When he had served his sentence, he was thus excluded, automatically or in pursuance of special statement in the sentence, from a great many rights or facilities, belonging automatically to the non-convicted person, such as the franchise, the military service, the right to obtain appointment in public service and to carry out public functions, the right to carry on a trade or business requiring a special licence, the right to drive a motor vehicle, to draw public benefits (old age and disability pensions) that are not in the nature of poor relief, etc. This meant that the released offender, who made efforts to lead a blameless life, time and again came up against obstacles reflecting the fundamental distrust of him on the part of society. At the same time, the whole registration machinery that was of necessity involved in such a system of forfeiture of rights would inevitably spread knowledge of his offence and the serving of his sentence to wider circles wherever he came to live. If the resocialization shall be successful, however, society must give the convicted a fair chance after he has served his sentence, and this was excluded under the system thus described.

An Act passed in 1951, amending ss. 78 and 79 of the Danish Criminal Code, introduced, on the recommendation of the Criminal Law Commission, a new system which, as far as possible, combines the regard to resocialization with the justified demand of society for protection against particularly indicated risks on the part of convicted persons. As a general rule, punishment no longer entails any loss of civil rights, including in particular the right to carry on a trade or business. Where a trade or business is of such nature as to require public authorisation, it may in each individual case, however, be decided by court order that a convicted person shall be debarred from carrying on such trade or business if the offence committed carries with it an obvious risk of abuse of the position or occupation concerned. Subject to the same condition, it may be decided that a convicted person shall cease to carry on a trade or business requiring authorisation or any other business in which he has proved to present a particular risk of abuse. These rules, which to our knowledge are unknown in any foreign law, shift the central point, concerning the loss of rights, from the criterion of honour to the more rational one of dangerousness. In other words, an adequate connection is established btween the offence and its consequences to the future occupation of the person concerned. In practice, the new rules largely facilitate resocialization.

In Norway, similar rules were enacted in 1953; in that country, however, somewhat less drastic measures have been adopted in the abolition of loss of rights.

CHAPTER X

Criminal Proceedings

1. The Danish rules of procedure and court organisation are laid down in the Administration of Justice Act dated 1 April 1916 with subsequent amendments and additions. In Norway, the rules are distributed between the Criminal Proceedings Act, 1887, and the Courts of Law Act, 1915. Before going into the characteristics of the rules of procedure, an outline must be given of the organisation of the courts of law, which is broadly the same in both countries.

2. The ordinary courts are the lower courts, the High Courts, and the Supreme Court.

Preparatory judicial acts during inquiry and preliminary investigation take place before a lower court. As judicial court of first instance, the lower courts are further competent to deal with the vast majority of criminal cases. The judicial authority of first instance is assigned to the High Courts only in the graver cases and in a few other cases specified in the Act; even such cases may generally be tried by a lower court with the consent of the accused if he has made a full confession, the truth of which is corroborated by other available evidence.

While, thus, the High Courts only deal with criminal cases in first instance to a very limited extent, they act largely as a court of appeal since an appeal may normally be made to the competent high court from any decision by a lower court. Where the appeal relates to the hearing of the case, application of legal provisions or meeting out of punishment, it is, however, in Norway brought not before the High Court, but directly before the Supreme Court.

The Supreme Court never acts as a court of first instance but only as a court of appeal. The trial by the Supreme Court cannot include the assessment of evidence in regard to the guilt of the accused but is in all essentials confined to the legal problems of the case and the meeting out of punishment.

3. As regards the composition of the courts, it should be noted that, in the lower court, the criminal cases are heard by one legal judge and, apart from police prosecutions and cases where a full confession has been made, two lay judges. In the High Courts of Denmark three legal judges and three lay judges hear cases of appeal. In the graver cases, more particularly cases of homicide, in which the High Court acts as a court of first instance, the legal element consists of three High Court judges sitting with a jury being composed of twelve jurors, who decide the question of guilt between them and thereafter, together with the legal judges as one body determine the penalty. In the consideration of the sentence the total votes of the three legal judges have the same weight as those of the twelve jurors. In Norway, the relative influence of the legal judges and the lay judges is somewhat different.

4. Unlike the inquisitorial system of former rules of procedure, the existing rules are pronouncedly accusatory. The main characteristics of this modern prosecution system are:

(1) No proceedings may be taken without a charge being brought by a body outside the courts; (2) the accusation is made by a special prosecution; (3) the accused is recognized as a party to the proceedings with a number of positive capacities also at the preparatory stages of the proceedings; (4) the accused is under no obligation to submit to examination or to co-operate actively in any way to the elucidation of the case; (5) a counsel for the defense is to a large extent appointed at the public expense to safeguard the interests of the accused; (6) the criminal procedure is in principle subject to full publicity; (7) production of evidence takes in principle place directly before the competent court; (8) apart from cases where a full confession has been made, lay judges take part in the trial of all criminal cases proper.

In the sequel, some of these main characteristics will be illustrated in greater detail in regard to aspects where Danish and Norwegian law of legal procedure may present a particular interest. In such respect, particular attention is called to the rules governing charge and withdrawal of charge, the rules of publicity and the rules associated with the assessment of evidence.

5. As already mentioned, prosecution of offenses takes place through the public prosecution. In Norway, but not in Denmark, the injured person has a general subsidiary right to take proceedings. In certain petty cases it is the injured person himself who has to bring his claim before the court.—The structure of the public prosecution is hierarchic. At the head of it is the Public Prosecutor, who has under him a certain number of assistant public prosecutors; they generally decide whether a charge shall be made in criminal cases proper and carry out the office of public prosecution at the High Courts. The assistant public prosecutors are, in turn, superior to the chief constables and their assistants, who act as the representatives of the public prosecution at the preliminary stages of the case and often perform the office of public prosecution during trial before a lower court.

6. The determination as to whether criminal proceedings shall be brought before the courts is in Danish and Norwegian law subject to the so-called "principle of relative prosecution" (or "principle of opportunism"), which provides for a rather wide authority on the part of the public prosecution to withdraw the charge even where the evidence affords sufficient ground for taking proceedings.

In petty, i.e. police, cases the competent chief constable may normally withdraw the charge on his own accord, or he may omit prosecution against the accused's agreeing to pay a fine.

In the event of criminal cases proper which are prosecuted by the assistant public prosecutor, the general rule is of course to proceed with the case if, in the opinion of the public prosecution, the evidence of the guilt of the accused is sufficiently strong. From that rule, however, important exceptions are made. First, the assistant public prosecutors have a special statutory authority to withdraw the charge against offenders under 18 years of age, subject to the condition that they be placed under the care of the child welfare authorities; as mentioned above in the review of the criminal law virtually all criminal cases against young persons are dealt with in this way. Also in the case of adult offenders, it is, however, possible to stay proceedings, if this may be done without prejudice to any public interest. A case of euthanasia was e.g. decided in that way. The formal rules differ somewhat as between the two countries. In Norway, staying of proceedings shall in every case be submitted to the Public Prosecutor; whereas, in Denmark, the assistant public prosecutors may stay the proceedings on their own accord if the gravity of the offense is relatively small, e.g. petty acquisitive offenses, offenses of violence and against public decency of a minor gravity.

It may of course be questioned if so extensive rules governing staying of proceedings in Danish and Norwegian law are advisable. There is, however, consensus of opinion among experts that the system works satisfactorily, that there has been no abuse, and that indeed there is hardly any practical possibility of abuse in view of the control to which the decisions of the Public Prosecutor are subject by the consideration of the cases through the individual levels of public prosecution.

By and large, the staying of proceedings works as an adequate valve to the machinery of justice, permitting a number of petty and atypical cases to be kept outside prosecution. The general view is that the existing practice makes for promoting humane considerations without prejudice to the general prevention.

7. The court sittings in a criminal case are as a general rule public, not only during the trial of the case, but also at the preliminary stages from the moment when the investigation is focused on a particular person as accused. In a number of cases specified in the Act, the courts may, however, exclude the public. This may be done if warranted by special considerations of procedure, more particularly in view of the elucidation of the case; further where certain social considerations quite outside the case so require because public trial might prejudice the relations of the State with foreign powers or violate public decency, or where special individual considerations make themselves felt. The case may thus be heard in camera if the accused is under 18 years of age, but this is not the only case. Danish law provides for a case to be heard in camera where "special circumstances afford ground for assuming that public trial would unnecessarily insult any person". This rule is primarily designed to protect the injured persons and witnesses; it shall, however, "not be quite excluded" to decide to hear the case in camera in order to avoid the infliction of "disproportionately great suffering" to the accused or his nearest relatives. The fact that not only the regard to third parties, but also to the accused, may justify hearing the case in camera, is clearly expressed in Norwegian law, which as an alternative reason states that "regards to the sanctity of private life so require" and that "the accused himself so requests for reasons found adequate by the court".

8. As a rule, the proceedings of court sittings may be freely reported. Public report (press reportage) may, however, in certain cases be prohibited by the court. First, this may be done for the sake of clearing up the case and for protection of special public interests. Next, however, prohibition of press report may be ordered also to protect individual interests. Under Danish law, for example, the court may, as an exception, decide that public report shall be wholly or partly omitted where this would unnecessarily insult any person who is not charged in the case or would inflict disproportionately great suffering on the accused or his relatives. The Norwegian law contains similar provisions. In addition, Danish law provides for special restrictions in the right to pictorial reportage. It is thus forbidden without special permission to make drawings or take photographs in the court room, and the court has a general authority to entirely forbid public report in pictures of a court sitting at any stage of the case. The law also protects the correctness of the reportage by various provisions. The general rule is that "public report of court proceedings shall be objective and loyal." The provisions is not covered by any legal sanction, and its significance is therefore chiefly of a moral-pedagogic character. It is nevertheless not entirely without legal significance since in border cases it may justify considering a report contrary to law with resulting liability under civil law. Besides, criminal liability is separately provided for in regard to highly incorrect and wilfully untrue reports of court sittings.

9. As regards comments on pending criminal cases beyond the mere report of court proceedings, the Danish Administration of Justice Act contains a provisions reminiscent of the liability laid down in British law for contempt of court. Under that provision any person may be liable to punishment who "pending the final sentence in a criminal case makes statements calculated to improperly influence the judges, lay assessors or jurors in regard to the decision of the case." This prohibition of improper influence on the court is supplemented by a provision under which "no person who in an official capacity is concerned with a criminal case may out of court express any opinion to the public on the question of guilt pending the decision of the case".

These penal provisions governing improper court reports, communications and comments have been very little applied in practice, though the treatment by the press of lawsuits has often given rise to criticism. The efforts for reforms in that field have in recent years been concentrated on achieving satisfactory results through the voluntary co-operation of leading press organizations in remedying objectionable practices in press reportage; in that respect, certain agreements have been made, in Denmark as well as in Norway, between representatives of the press and of the bodies of criminal procedure about the lines to be followed in comments on criminal cases.

10. The assessment of evidence is free. Circumstantial evidence is fully recognized as a proof according to a free appreciation of the court. All factual elements relevant to the decision must be proved on the part of the public prosecution without support in legal rules of presumption. The principle of in dubio pro reo in regard to the decision of the question of guilt is fully accepted.

11. In principle, there exists no restriction on the nature of the acceptable pieces of evidence. As exceptions from that fundamental rule, however, it should be noted that the law admits certain grounds for exclusion of witnesses; thus clergymen cannot be examined as to what has been confided them in their capacity of spiritual advisers, nor counsels for the defense in criminal cases as to what has been confided them in such capacity; the law also admits certain grounds for exemption of witnesses; a witness may thus refuse to answer questions, if the reply would expose the witness to loss of general esteem or welfare.Under Norwegian law, the same applies to cases where the evidence would expose any of the nearest relatives of the witness to such consequences.

In addition, it is to a certain extent forbidden to read out documents in evidence of statements already made. More particularly extrajudicial evidence relating to the previous conduct of the accused is forbidden.

12. It is a controversial question whether evidence given by the accused or by witnesses to the police prior to court proceedings may or should be used during such proceedings as part of the production of evidence. In practice, the general rule is that the person concerned is confronted with such evidence if during the examination he gives different evidence; by and large there is a tendency to attach a certain, not quite insignificant weight of evidence to policemen's reports.

13. Information on the previous career of the accused, including his previous convictions, if any, is not to the same extent as in British administration of justice kept outside the material with which the court, including the jurors, become acquainted before the questions of guilt is decided. The Danish Minister of Justice has, however, instructed the representatives of the public prosecution to co-operate in avoiding superfluous documentation and documentation being unnecessarily injurious to the accused in regard to previous sentences. No request should therefore be made during court proceedings for documentation of the previous career unless it is of direct relevance to the particular case before the court. As to acquittals in previous cases and cases closed without any charge being made, documentation should not be requested unless the documents are deemed to be of crucial importance to the decision of the particular case before the court; this may be the case especially if they relate to similar offenses as the one now prosecuted, and if the accused now claims acquittal on subjective grounds.—The opportunity to produce evidence of previous convictions, etc., should be viewed in connection with the fact that Danish and Norwegian administration of justice does not provide for any separation of the decision of the question of guilt (conviction) from the determination of the penalty or other legal consequences (sentence), apart from the few cases tried by a jury. When it has reached the stage of judgment, the case is decided collectively in regard both to guilt and sanction.

14. The production of evidence in connection with the court proceedings is commenced by an examination of the accused, whose attention shall be called to the fact that he is under no obligation to answer. This should, however, be considered as a matter of pure form, since in practice the accused almost never wishes to be extempted from examination. In Denmark, the examination is undertaken in the first place by the public prosecutor. Then the counsel for the defense may put questions to the accused. The court is also entitled to do so. In Norway, the accused shall in principle be examined by the judge, but when the latter has finished, he normally leaves it to the counsels for the prosecution and for the defense to ask further questions. The examination is very informal and, more particularly, is not subject to the rules applying to the British cross-examination. The use of captious questions is expressly forbidden. The evidence of the accused is not given on oath and under penalty for false evidence.

The examination of the accused is followed by the further production of evidence. It is generally confined to production of the evidence included in the list of evidence of the parties. Also unannounced evidence may be produced; in that case, however, the court proceedings must be postponed, if necessary, in order that the opposite party may protect his interests.

The law provides for the production of evidence first on the part of the counsel for the prosecution and, next, of the counsel for the defense. In practice, however, this rule is frequently departed from so as to distribute the production of evidence as between the parties in the order considered expedient in each particular case.

15. As regards the examination of witnesses, this is generally carried out by the party producing the witness. Following the examination by the party, the so-called "general examination", the opposite party may put questions to the witness (cross-examination), after which the former party may put the questions to the witness to which the cross-examination has given rise (re-examination). The examination is hereby normally finished, but the court may permit further questions to be asked by the parties. In practice, the stages of the examination described above are not kept strictly separate, nor is the rule providing that the re-examination must not go outside the field of the cross-examination strictly observed.—The evidence is given under penalty of the law. The witnesses are generally not put on oath in Denmark, while in Norway it is the general rule, though often departed from.

It should be noted that the law expressly provides that production of evidence designed to weaken the trustworthiness of a witness may take place only in such manner and to such extent as is permitted by the court, and should always be refused where the evidence in view is not considered of substantial importance. It is hereby established that there has been no intention of admitting the application of the examination methods employed in British cross-examination.

As regards more general rules governing examination of witnesses, it should be noted that hearsay evidence is not precluded, but it must always be made clear whether the evidence of the witness is based on his own observation. Suggestive questions should as far as possible be avoided, while captious questions are quite inadmissable. The court shall also see to it that no irrelevant questions are asked, i.e. questions that do not contribute to clearing up the case. The general rule is that the examination must not be carried out in an improper manner or in a manner that is not calculated to elicit the truth.

The rules governing examination, both in themselves and by the manner in which they are practiced, are as a whole characterized by lack of formality, which is striking, more particularly as compared with British administration of justice. Where the latter has developed a comprehensive and complex system of legal rules, Danish and Norwegian laws leave practically everything to the free judgement of the court. This affords general satisfaction and in practice no need for any more formal regulation of the production of evidence on the British lines has made itself felt.

16. The law of criminal procedure is on the whole designed to provide the best possible conditions for trying the criminal cases on a sound basis. Many of the rules laid down with that general aim in view are primarily designed to guarantee the accused against errors of justice. Whereas in that respect no efforts have been made in Danish or Norwegian law to provide guarantees through the development of a fixed, formal system of evidence, the countries have otherwise gone far in the provision of security. Here, mention shall only be made of a system peculiar to the Danish law of legal procedure that admits of challenging sentences on the basis of a criticism of the assessment of evidence.

This special system was introduced in 1939 through the establishment of the "Special Court of Appeal". This is a court outside the ordinary court organization, being competent, on the one hand, to hear certain complaints against judges and, on the other, to decide on reconsideration of criminal cases in which the assessment of evidence is not capable of challenge through the ordinary channels by appeal to a court of higher instance within the general court system. In cases of reconsideration the special Court of Appeal is composed of three regular legal judges, one from each of the three levels of court: the Supreme Court, the High Courts and the inferior courts, and of two additional legal judges, one of whom being a university lecturer with expert knowledge of criminal cases, the other a practicing lawyer. All the judges of the special Court of Appeal are appointed for a term of ten years.

This composition of the Court of Appeal is supposed to provide the best guarantees for a competent and impartial examination of applications for reconsideration, as it eliminates the regards to prestige that might be an obstacle to a justified reconsideration if the judges who had pronounced the sentence or their colleagues alone should decide the question.

The reconsideration of a case may be decided by the Court of Appeal not only where new relevant evidence has come to hand, but also where this is not the case if, otherwise, "there are special circumstances indicating that the available evidence has not been properly assessed " (sect. 977 of the Administration of Justice Act.) This provision is based on the fact that, as mentioned before the assessment of evidence is not subject to examination by the Supreme Court. It has therefore been found desirable to provide an exceptional opportunity to set aside the assessment of evidence by the High Courts, which can otherwise not be challenged. The provision concerned is an ex tuto provision which preferably should not have to be applied and which, indeed, has been applied very rarely in practice during the years since 1939. The provision is, however, of preventive importance as against any tendencies on the part of the courts to weaken the requirements of evidence in criminal cases; it provides an additional legal protection to the individual citizen against erroneous decisions; and it is a significant manifestation of the care with which Nordic administration of criminal law tries to provide the best possible guarantees against erroneous convictions.

CHAPTER 51

REGULAR APPEALS IN CRIMINAL CASES

Section 1

A party desiring to take a regular appeal from a lower court judgment in a criminal action shall submit an appeal petition to the lower court within three weeks of the pronouncement of the judgement.

Section 2

If a party has appealed from a lower court judgment pursuant to section 1, the adverse party, although he did not observe the provisions of the said section, may also appeal from the judgment; to do so, however, he must submit an appeal petition to the lower court within one week of the expiration of the time to appeal pursuant to section 1.

If the first appeal is withdrawn or otherwise terminated prior to adjudication on the merits, the latter appeal also terminates.

Section 3

If it is found that an appeal is not brought in the prescribed form or in due time, the appeal shall be dismissed by the lower court.

Section 4

In the appeal petition the appellant shall specify:

1. the judgment appealed from;

2. the grounds for the appeal, stating the respect in which the appellant considers the fact findings and legal conclusions of the lower court to be erroneous; and

3. the particular part of the judgment attacked and the change in the judgment demanded by the appellant.

In the petition, the appellant shall specify the evidence upon which he desires to rely and indicate what he intends to prove by each specified item. The original or a certified copy of any document not previously presented shall be annexed to the petition. If the appellant desires that the court of appeals hear the testimony of a witness or an expert, or view the locus in quo, he shall so state in the petition, indicating the reasons therefor. The appellant shall also state in the petition whether he desires the injured person or the defendant to appear in person at the main hearing in the court of appeals. (SFS 1963:149)

When the defendant is under arrest or in detention, this information shall be stated in the appeal petition.

The petition shall be signed by the appellant or his attorney in his own hand.

Section 5

If the appeal is not dismissed, upon expiration of the time stated in section 2, the lower court shall transmit without delay to the court of appeals the appeal petition with the papers annexed thereto and the case file.

If the defendant is in detention, or if the petition contains a demand requiring immediate consideration, such as a request for the detention of the defendant, or for a measure referred to in chapters 25 to 28, or for the termination of such a measure, the transmission shall occur immediately upon receipt of the petition; however, until the time stated in section 2 has expired, a copy of the petition shall be held accessible at the lower court. (SFS 1947:616)

Section 6

If an impediment other than the kind referred to in section 3 precludes consideration of the appeal on the merits, the appeal may be dismissed forthwith by the court of appeals.

Section 7

If the peition fails to comply with the regulations in section 4, or is otherwise incomplete, the court of appeals shall direct the appellant to cure the defect.

If the appellant fails to comply with the directive, the appeal shall be dismissed if the petition is defective in failing to present a distinct demand for a change in the judgment or to state clearly the grounds of the appeal, or if the defect is otherwise so fundamental in character as to render the petition unserviceable as a basis for the proceedings in the court of appeals.

Section 8

In order to commence preparation of the case on appeal, the petition with the papers annexed thereto shall be served upon the appellee with a notice directing him to file a written answer.

If the lower court has denied a request for a measure stated in chapters 26 to 28, or ordered the termination of such a measure, the court of appeals may immediately grant the measure to remain effective until otherwise ordered. If the lower court has granted such a measure, the court of appeals may immediately direct that no further step be taken to execute the lower court order. As to detention and travel prohibition, the court of appeals may also change the lower court order without giving the adverse party an opportunity to be heard.

Section 9

The answer shall respond to the appellant's grounds for his appeal and specify the circumstances upon which the appellee desires to rely.

In the answer the appellee shall specify the evidence upon which he desires to rely and indicate what he intends to prove by each specified item. The original or a certified copy of any document not previously presented shall be annexed to the answer. If the appellee desires that the court of appeals hear the testimony of a witness or an expert, or view the locus in quo, he shall so state in his answer indicating his reasons therefor. The appellee shall also state in his answer whether he desires the injured person or the defendant to appear in person at the main hearing in the court of appeal. (SFS 1963:149)

The answer shall be signed personally by the appellee or his attorney or, when the defendant is the appellee, by his defense counsel.

Section 10

The answer with the papers annexed thereto shall be served upon the appellant.

If it is found necessary for the preparation of the case, the court of appeals may direct a further exchange of writings. The court may also issue detailed regulations as to the exchange of writings and even particularize the issues upon which the parties shall express themselves. However, a party may be directed to file more than one writing only for special cause.

Section 11

If the court of appeals finds it necessary to obtain expert opinions, documents, or objects for view or inspection, or to take proof outside the main hearing or any other preparatory measure, it shall issue an order thereon without delay.

A party who desires that one of the measures referred to above be taken shall apply therefor to the court of appeals as soon as possible.

In a public prosecution, if it is found that the preliminary investigation should be expanded or, if no investigation was made, that such an investigation should take place, the court of appeals may direct the prosecutor accordingly.

Section 12

If examination of a party or a third person is found necessary for the preparation of the case, the court of appeals shall direct such examination in the manner it finds appropriate. As to the appearance in court of a defendant who is under arrest or in detention, the court of appeals shall issue the appropriate directive to provide for his presence.

Section 13

As soon as the preparation of the case has been concluded, the court of appeals shall fix a date for the main hearing. A main hearing may be fixed for the disposition of a procedural issue, or of a portion of the controversy that may be decided separately, although in other respects the preparation of the case has not been completed.

If the defendant is in detention, the main hearing shall be held within four weeks of the expiration of the time stated in section 2, unless a longer postponement is necessary owing to a measure referred to in section 11 or to another circumstance. If the defendant was detained after the expiration of the time stated in section 2, the period shall be computed from the day of his detention.

Section 14

Notice to attend the main hearing shall be given to the parties.

A private appellant shall be directed to appear on pain that otherwise he forfeits his appeal. Moreover, if he is to appear in person, the court of appeals shall direct him to do so on penalty of fine. If a private appellee is obliged to appear in person, or if his presence is otherwise found to be of importance for the disposition or investigation of the case, he shall be directed to appear on penalty of fine; if the defendant is the appellee, and there is cause to believe that he would not comply with such direction, the court of appeals may direct that he be brought before it in custody. When a conditional fine is not directed and the appellee is not to be brought to the court in custody, the appellee shall be reminded that the case may be heard and decided notwithstanding his absence. As to the appearance of a defendant who is under arrest or in detention, the court of appeals shall issue the appropriate directive to provide for his presence.

In a public prosecution, if the injured person is to be examined as part of the prosecutor's case, he shall be directed to appear in person at the main hearing on penalty of fine.

The court of appeals shall also decide whether a witness or an expert shall be notified to appear at the main hearing. The parties shall be given notice of any direction issued for the attendance of a witness or an expert. As to notices to witnesses or experts to appear at the main hearing, the provisions in chapters 36 and 40 shall apply.

Section 15

As to main hearings in other respects, the provisions in chapter 1, section 15, paragraph 1 and in chapter 46, sections 1 to 5, 7, 9, 11, 13, and 16, shall correspondingly apply; however, with respect to notices to appear at postponed main hearings and directions for the parties, the provisions in section 14 of this chapter shall apply. (SFS 1956:587)

When a case is scheduled for a continued or new main hearing, the court of appeals may direct the measures found appropriate to facilitate conclusion of the case at that hearing. As to such measures, the provisions in sections 10 to 12 of this chapter shall apply.

At the main hearing the lower court judgment shall be read to the extent necessary, and the appellant shall state both the part of the judgment appealed from and his demand for a change in the judgment. The appellee shall be given an opportunity to respond to the demand.

Subsequently, the prosecutor, or the injured person, if he is the sole appellant on the prosecution's side, shall present the position of the prosecution to the extent required for the trial at the appellate level. If the defendant has appealed, however, and the court of appeals finds it more suitable, the defendant may present his position first, followed by the prosecutor or the injured person. Each party shall be given an opportunity to respond to the allegations of his adversary. When the hearing is held despite the absence of the appellee, to the extent necessary, his position shall be presented from the documents by the court.

During the examination of the injured person or of the defendant, the written record of his prior statements made before the lower court, a prosecutor, or a police authority may be read only if his oral testimony departs from his earlier statement, or if he fails to testify.

Section 17

After the opening statements of the parties, the evidence shall be presented. The evidence presented in the lower court, to the extent that it is of importance for the appeal, shall be presented by the court of appeals in the state in which it appears in the protocol and other documents; however, when the court of appeals finds it more suitable and the parties consent thereto, the evidence from the proceedings below may be presented by the parties.

Absent special cause for a different order of presentation, the evidence to be brought forward from protocol and other documents filed with the lower court should be presented before evidence concerning the same circumstance is taken directly by the court of appeals. When there are several evidentiary items concerning the same circumstance, they should be presented in sequence without interruption.

Section 18

After the evidence has been presented, the parties may state what they regard as necessary for the summation of their positions.

Section 19

If a private appellant fails to appear at a main hearing, his appeal shall be dismissed.

If a private appellee directed to appear on penalty of fine fails to appear, the court of appeals, in lieu of directing him to appear under the sanction of a new conditional fine, may direct that he be brought before it in custody either immediately or on the date to which the session has been adjourned.

If a private party directed to appear in person on penalty of fine appears by attorney only, the court of appeals, in lieu of directing him to appear under the sanction of a new conditional fine, may direct that he be brought before it in custody either immediately or on the date to which the session has been adjourned.

In a public prosecution, if an injured person who is to be examined in support of the prosecution fails to appear in person, the rule in the third paragraph shall apply.

However, if a party has been directed to appear on penalty of fine, or if a party is to be brought before the court in custody and it is found that the order for bringing him to court cannot be executed, the appeal may be heard and decided on the merits notwithstanding the fact that the party has appeared by attorney only or has failed to appear.

Section 20

When the court of appeals, pursuant to section 19, has dismissed the appeal, the appellant may make an application to the court for reinstatement of the case.

The application for reinstatement shall be made in writing within two weeks of the issurance of the dismissal order. If the appellant again fails to appear, his right to reinstatement of the case shall be forfeited.

Section 21

The court of appeals may dispose of an appeal on the merits without a main hearing if the prosecutor appeals only for the benefit of the defendant, or if an appeal brought by the defendant is supported by the adverse party.

If the lower court has acquitted the defendant or has dispensed with all sanctions for the offense, or has found the defendant free from criminal sanctions owing to his mental abnormality, or has sentenced him to ordinary or conditional fines,[1] and if there is no cause to sentence the defendant to a punishment more severe than those stated above or to impose a sanction of a different kind than those stated above, the case may be heard and decided on the merits without a main hearing; however, if the appeal also concerns a matter other than criminal liability, decision of the appeal without a main hearing is not permitted, unless the civil aspect of the appeal may be heard and decided on the merits without a main hearing pursuant to chapter 50, section 21. (SFS 1964:166)

For the determination of questions not related to the substance of the appeal, a main hearing is not required.

[1] As to the Swedish criminal sanctions, see note after ch. 29, sec. 2.

Section 22

If the court of appeals has ordered that a case shall be decided on the merits without a main hearing, and it is not obvious at the time of the order that the parties have already concluded their presentations, an opportunity to do so shall be given to them. (SFS 1954:432)

Notwithstanding any previous order, the court of appeals may direct that a main hearing shall be held.

Section 23

If testimony of a witness or an expert was heard at the main hearing in the lower court with respect to a particular circumstance, or if a view concerning a certain fact was held during the main hearing in the lower court, and the evaluation of such evidence is decisive of the outcome on appeal, the relevant part of the lower court judgment may not be changed by the court of appeals, except for the benefit of the defendant, unless the appellate court hears or views the evidence anew, or extraordinary reasons justify the conclusion that the value of the evidence is other than that attached to it by the lower court.

Section 24

An appeal may be withdrawn at any time prior to the pronouncement of the judgment or final order of the court of appeals. A prosecutor who appealed to the court of appeals against the defendant may amend his appeal to benefit the defendant.

An appellant may not amend his claim on appeal to include a criminal act other than the one specified in the appeal petition.

Section 25

In an appeal lodged by the defendant, or by the prosecutor for the benefit of the defendant, the court of appeals may not sentence the defendant to a criminal sanction more severe than the one imposed by the lower court. If the defendant was sentenced by the lower court to imprisonment, the court of appeals may order suspension of sentence, probation, youth imprisonment, internment, or surrender for special care; in addition to suspension of sentence, probation, or surrender for care under the Child Welfare Law, the court of appeals may impose a fine. When the lower court has ordered a sanction of the kind referred to above, the court of appeals may impose a different sanction.[1] (SFS 1964:166)

Section 26

If a grave procedural error of the kind referred to in chapter 59, section 1, 1. to 4. occurred in the lower court, the court of appeals shall vacate the lower court judgment even if not requested to do so.

If a grave procedural error of another kind occurred in the lower court, for cause, the court of appeals may vacate the judgment even if not requested to do so.

The judgment may be vacated in whole or only in part. If the procedural error also affects a part of the judgment from which no appeal has been taken, the court of appeals shall determine, based upon the particular circumstances, whether that part shall be vacated.

Section 27

If the issue of the disqualification of a judge in the lower court is raised in conjunction with an appeal from the judgment, and the complaint is well-founded, the court of appeals shall vacate the lower court judgment to the extent appealed from.

Section 28

If the court of appeals finds a procedural error other than those referred to in section 26 or 27 to have occurred, the appellate court may vacate the lower court judgment only if the error can be assumed to have affected the outcome of the case, and correction of the error cannot be accomplished in the appellate court without substantial inconvenience.

[1] As to the Swedish criminal sanctions, see note after ch. 29, sec. 2.

Section 29

If the court of appeals vacates a lower court judgment, and the decision on appeal is not based on lack of competence in the court below or another ground indicating that the lower court should not have entertained the case on the merits, the court of appeals shall remand the case to the lower court for the required further processing.

The authority of the court of appeals, when it finds that the court below lacked competence, to refer the case to another lower court is described in chapter 19, section 11.

Section 30

After a judgment or final order of a court of appeals has become conclusive, the file received from the lower court and a copy of the judgment or order on appeal shall be transmitted to the lower court.

Section 31

When the appeal from the lower court judgment concerns only matters other than criminal liability, the case shall be disposed of in the court of appeals as a civil case.

Chapter 52

Limited appeals

Section 1

A person desiring to take a limited appeal from a lower court order shall submit a limited appeal petition to the lower court within two weeks of the pronouncement of the challenged order; however, as to an order rendered in the course of the proceedings, but not at a hearing session, the period for appeal shall be computed from service of the order from the complainant. No time limit shall apply to an appeal from an order requiring a person to be placed or kept in detention or an order on an issue of the kind referred to in chapter 49, section 6.

The obligation to give a formal notice of exception to orders of the kind referred to in chapter 49, section 3 or section 4, paragraph 2, 3, or 7, is prescribed in the said chapter.

Section 2

If it is found that a limited appeal if not brought in the prescribed form and in due time, the appeal shall be dismissed by the lower court.

Section 3

In the limited appeal petition the complainant shall specify:

1. the order appealed from;
2. the grounds for the limited appeal and
3. the change in order demanded by the complainant.

In the petition, the complainant shall specify the evidence upon which he desires to rely and indicate what he intends to prove by each specified item. The original or a certified copy of any document not previously presented shall be annexed to the petition. (SFS 1963:149)

The petition shall be signed by the complainant or his attorney in his own hand.

Section 4

If the appeal is not dismissed, the lower court shall transmit without delay to the court of appeals the limited appeal petition with the papers annexed thereto, and an original or certified copy of the file to the extent related to the challenged matter.

Section 5

If an impediment other than the kind referred to in section 2 precludes consideration of the appeal on the merits, the appeal may be dismissed forthwith by the court of appeals.

Section 6

If the petition fails to comply with the regulations in section 3 or is otherwise incomplete, the court of appeals shall direct the complainant to cure the defect.

If the complainant fails to comply with the directive, the limited appeal shall be dismissed if the petition is defective in failing to present a distinct demand for a change in the order or to state clearly the grounds of appeal, or if the defect is otherwise so fundamental in character as to render the petition unserviceable as a basis for the proceedings in the court of appeals.

Section 7

If it is found that the adverse party should be given an opportunity to respond, the petition with the papers annexed thereto shall be served upon him with a notice directing him to file a written answer.

Unless an opportunity to respond has been given to the adverse party, the lower court order may not be changed to his detriment.

If the lower court, in a civil case, has denied a request for provisional attachment, injunction against dissipation or any other security measure, or for an interlocutory decree, or has ordered the termination of such a measure, or in a criminal case has denied a request for a measure stated in chapters 2 to 28, or has ordered the termination of such a measure, the court of appeals may immediately grant the measure to remain effective until otherwise ordered. If the lower court has granted such a measure, or has directed that execution of an order may occur forthwith, the court of appeals may immediately direct that no further step be taken to implement the measure or to execute the order. As to detention or travel prohibition, the appellate court may also change the lower court order without giving the adverse party an opportunity to answer.

Section 8

The answer shall respond to the complainant's grounds for his appeal and specify the circumstances upon which the respondent desires to rely.

The respondent shall specify the evidence upon which he desires to rely, and indicate what he intends to prove by each specified item. The original or a certified copy of any document not previously presented shall be annexed to the answer. (SFS 1963:149)

The answer shall be signed personally by the respondent or his attorney or, in a criminal case in which the defendant is the respondent, by his defense counsel.

Section 9

After an answer is filed, if the court of appeals finds that a further exchange of writings is necessary, it may so direct. The court may also issue detailed regulations as to the exchange of writings and even particularize the issues upon which the parties shall express themselves. However, a party may be directed to file more than one writing only for special cause.

Section 10

If examination of a party or a third person is found necessary for the investigation, the court of appeals shall direct such examination in the manner it finds appropriate. As to the appearance in court of a defendant who is under arrest or in detention, the court of appeals shall issue the appropriate directive to provide for his presence.

Section 11

After the required measures have been taken, the appeal shall be decided by the court of appeals as soon as possible.

Section 12

A limited appeal may be withdrawn at any time prior to the pronouncement of the final order by the court of appeals.

Section 13

After the final order of the court of appeals has become conclusive, the file received from the lower court and a copy of the order on appeal shall be transmitted to the lower court.

Chapter 53

Actions commenced in court of appeals

Section 1

In a civil action instituted in a court of appeals as a court of first instance, the provisions of chapters 42 to 44 concerning proceedings in the lower courts shall correspondingly apply.

Section 2

In a criminal case instituted in a court of appeals as a court of first instance, the provisions in chapters 45 to 47 concerning proceedings in the lower courts shall correspondingly apply; however, in such a case, the following diverging provisions shall govern:

1. The court of appeals may not authorize the prosecutor to issue a summons.

2. For the preparation of the action, the court of appeals may direct the defendant in the summons to file a written answer with the court. The answer with the papers annexed thereto shall be served upon the prosecutor. When a further exchange of writings is found necessary for the preparation of the action, the court of appeals may so direct. The court may also issue detailed regulations as to the exchange of writings and even particularize the issues upon which the parties shall express themselves.

3. In lieu of the one week period prescribed in chapter 45, section 14, chapter 46, section 11 and chapter 47, section 22, for holding the main hearing in cases in which the defendant is under arrest or in detention, a period of two weeks shall apply.

4. If there is no cause to sentence the defendant to punishment more severe than fine, the court of appeals may decide the case on the merits without a main hearing; as to such a decision, the provisions in chapter 51, section 22, shall govern. (SFS 1964:166)

Part 6

Proceedings in the Supreme Court

Chapter 54

Appeals from judgments and orders of the courts of appeals

Section 1

Appeal from a court of appeals judgment shall be sought by a review petition.

A party against whom a default judgment was entered may not appeal from the judgment; his right to a reopening of the case following the entry of such a judgment is prescribed in chapter 44, section 9, and chapter 53, section 1.

In an action amenable to out of court settlement, if a party has undertaken not to appeal from the judgment after the controversy arose, the undertaking shall be given effect; however, a commitment prior to the entry of judgment shall not be effective unless a reciprocal undertaking was made by the adverse party.

Section 2

Appeal from a court of appeals final order shall be sought by limited appeal. However, when an order dismissing a specified part of a case without reaching the merits is issued in conjunction with a judgment, review of the order shall be sought by a review petition.

A party entitled to apply for reinstatement of a case terminated by a final order may not appeal from the order.

Section 3

The provisions in chapter 49, sections 3 to 5, 7 and 11, concerning appeals from lower court orders shall correspondingly apply to appeals from orders, other than final orders, of the courts of appeals on issues referred to in the said sections and raised in, or appealed to, the appellate courts.

Section 4

As to orders of the courts of appeals other than those referred to in the preceding sections, the provisions in chapter 49, section 8, shall govern.

Section 5

As to an order of the court of appeals denying a request for detention or travel prohibition, or releasing a detained person, or terminating a travel prohibition, an appeal may be brought only in conjunction with an appeal from a judgment or final order of the appellate court.

Section 6

A court of appeals order remanding a case to the lower court is not reviewable; however, as an exception to this proscription, if the disposition by the court of appeals embraces decision of a question that bears directly upon the ultimate outcome of the action, an immediate appeal may be sought.

Section 7

A ruling of a court of appeals that the lower court is competent to entertain a case is not reviewable, unless the challenge to the competence of the lower court is based upon a ground that the higher courts on appeal are required to notice on their own motion.

Section 8

A court of appeals order concerning the disqualification of a judge in the lower court, or with respect to the lower court disposition of an issue of the kind referred to in chapter 49, section 4, paragraph 1, 7, or section 6, is not subject to review.

Section 9

An appeal from a court of appeals judgment or final order in a case or non-contentious proceeding initiated at a lower court may not be considered by the Supreme Court to a further extent than prescribed in section 10, unless that Court has granted the party review dispensation.

However, in a case invoving a public prosecution, this rule does not apply to an appeal brought by the Chief State Prosecutor, the Attorney General, or the Parliamentary Civil or Military Ombudsman. (SFS 1947:616)

Section 10

Review dispensation may be granted only if:

1. for uniform interpretation of statutes or uniform law application it is of extraordinary importance that the Supreme Court decide the case, or the petitioner shows that for other reasons the disposition of the case should have extraordinary importance beyond the particular situation involved in the litigation; or

2. cause exists for a change in the determination of the court of appeals or, on other grounds, in view of the circumstances in the case, cause exists for review by the Supreme Court.

If review dispensation is not granted, the appellate court judgment or final order shall remain conclusive; a reminder to this effect shall be included in Supreme Court order.

Section 11

In determining whether or not review dispensation shall be granted for an appeal from a judgment, the Supreme Court shall also examine any order in the case which dismissed a specified part thereof without considering the merits, and which is appealed from in conjunction with the appeal from the judgment.

When review dispensation is granted, the dispensation shall relate to the judgment or final order in its entirety, if the party appeals therefrom, as well as to any order appealed from in conjunction with the appeal from the judgment or final order.

Section 12

As to claims for, or payable in money, review dispensation pursuant to section 10, 2. may not be granted to a party if the sum he has lost in the court of appeals plainly does not amount to one thousand five hundred crowns. In computing the value of the party's loss, neither litigation costs, nor interest accruing after the commencement of the action may be taken into consideration.

As to criminal liability, review dispensation pursuant to section 10, 2. may not be granted to an injured party, unless his charge is based upon an offense punishable by imprisonment for more than one year or by dismissal from office. Such dispensation may be granted to a defendant or to any person related to him as specified in chapter 21, section 1, only when the prosecution is based upon an offense, punishable as stated above, or upon any other offense if the defendant was sentenced to a sanction other than a fine, or to not less than sixty day-fines, or to ordinary fines or finally imposed conditional fines of not less than one thousand five hundred crowns, or when a defendant already sentenced to internment was subjected to a new minimum term for institutional care, or when the provision in chapter 34, section 8, paragraph 2, 2. of the Penal Code was applied.[1] (SFS 1964:166)

Section 13

As to an appeal from an order of a court of appeals, other than a final order, in a case or non-contentious judicial proceeding initiated in a lower court, the provisions in sections 9 to 12 shall correspondingly apply, unless review dispensation has been granted for an appeal from the judgment or final order of the court of appeals, and the dispensation, in accordance with section 11, paragraph 2, also encompasses the ancillary order; however, as to an appeal from an order concerning litigation costs, no review dispensation pursuant to section 10, 2. may be granted.

Section 14

When the court of appeals issues an order which, pursuant to section 5, 6, 7 or 8, is not subject to review on appeal to the Supreme Court, the court of appeals shall so state in the order.

If an appeal from a court of appeals judgment or order cannot be entertained by the Supreme Court unless the Court grants review dispensation to a party, the court of appeals shall so state in its appeal instruction. The court of appeals shall also specify in the appeal instruction the grounds upon which review dispensation may be granted; it shall determine the applicable grounds with reference to the outcome of the case in the court of appeals. If different grounds apply to different parts of the judgment or order, the court of appeals shall instruct the party of the contents of section 11, paragraph 2.

Section 15

A party who considers an instruction issued by the court of appeals pursuant to section 14 to be erroneous may request review of the instruction in conjunction with an appeal from the judgment or order. if the challenge to the instruction raises the question whether, in light of the circumstances presented, the provisions in section 12 preclude review dispensation under section 10, 2., the question shall be decided in conjunction with the determination whether to grant review dispensation. New evidence may not be urged in the petition to the Supreme Court with respect to the monetary value of the party's loss in the court of appeals.

Questions referred to in the preceding paragraph may not be raised in the Supreme Court except as there stated. In all other respects, the directions of the court of appeals as to the form of appeal must be followed.

[1] As to the Swedish criminal sanctions, see note after ch. 29, sec. 2.

Section 16

Review of a court of appeals order dismissing a formal notice of exception to, an application for reopening or reinstatement of, or a regular or limited appeal from the judgment or order of the court of appeals may be sought by limited appeal. Under no other circumstances may the Supreme Court review the question whether such notice was given or application made, or appeal taken in the prescribed form and in due time.

Section 17

A person desiring to appeal from a court of appeals judgment or order shall deposit with the appellate court an appeal fee of one hundred fifty crowns, and an equally high sum as security for the costs that the Supreme Court may award to the adverse party. In a case in which several persons have a joint claim or defense, deposit of the said sums by one of them is effective for all of them. Although there are several parties adverse to the appelant, he is not obliged to deposit more than the two amounts stated above.

The Crown, and, in a criminal case, both the prosecutor and a defendant who is in detention are exempt from the obligation to make the deposits referred to above. Any other defendant who appeals from a conviction is exempt from depositing an appeal fee. A deposit as security for costs is not required when there is no private adverse party. (SFS 1947:616)

Section 18

A person desiring to appeal who deposits the sum prescribed as security for the adverse party's costs, but who is unable to post the appeal fee owing to poverty, may nonetheless pursue his appeal if he establishes by the affidavit of a competent authority that his assets are insufficient to cover the additional one hundred fifty crowns or that, after the payment of the appeal fee, he would lack adequate means to subsist. If he cannot pay even the sum that is to be deposited as security for costs, he may nonetheless pursue his appeal if he establishes by affidavit as stated above that his assets are insufficient to cover a deposit of one hundred fifty crowns or that after the payment of that sum he woud lack adequate means to subsist.

Further regulations concerning the authorities that may issue such affidavits and the contents of the affidavits are issued by the King.

Section 19

If a party's demand for change in the judgment or order of the court of appeals is granted in whole or in principal part, the Supreme Court shall further direct that the party may receive back the deposited appeal fee. If such a direction is not issued, the fee shall go to the Crown.

If a party has deposited an appeal fee when the circumstances were such that he was not obligate to make the deposit, the Supreme Court, in conjunction with its disposition of the appeal, shall direct that he may reclaim the fee.

In its judgment or final order the Supreme Court shall direct whether and to what extent the sum deposited by a party as security for costs may be withdrawn by him or by his adversary.

Chapter 55

Regular appeals to the supreme court

Section 1

A party desiring to take a regular appeal from a court of appeals judgment shall submit a review petition to the appellate court within four weeks of the pronouncement of the judgment.

Section 2

Within the period stated in section 1, the appellant shall deposit with the court of appeals the prescribed appeal fee, and the stipulated sum as security for costs is deposited, the appellant shall file an affidavit of poverty of the kind referred to in chapter 54, section 18, prior to the expiration of the period referred to above.

If the appellant has timely filed an affidavit of a competent authority concerning the appellant's poverty, but the content of the affidavit does not conform to that specified in the said section, the court of appeals shall direct the appellant to file an affidavit of the kind specified with the consequence that if a proper affidavit is not furnished to the appellate court when it re-examines the question whether the appeal has been properly pursued, the appeal will be dismissed. A deposit of the sum for which the waiver by affidavit had been sought is also effective to cure the defect.

Section 3

If it is found that an appeal is not brought in the prescribed form or in due time, the appeal shall be dismissed by the court of appeals.

Section 4

In the review petition the appellant shall specify:

1. the judgment appealed from;

2. the grounds for the appeal, stating the respect in which the appellant considers the fact findings and legal conclusions of the court of appeals to be erroneous; and

3. the particular part of the judgment attacked and the change in the judgment demanded by the appellant.

If the appellant requests review dispensation pursuant to chapter 54, section 10, 1., he should specify in the petition the circumstances he relies upon in support thereof.

In the petition, the appellant shall specify the evidence upon which he desires to rely and indicate what he intends to prove by each specified item. In a civil case, if evidence is specified which was not presented below, the appellant shall state why such evidence was not offered at an earlier stage. The original or a certified copy of any document not previously presented shall be annexed to the petition. The appellant shall also state in the petition whether he desires the adverse party or, in a criminal case, the injured person or the defendant to appear in person at the main hearing in the Supreme Court. (SFS 1963:149)

In criminal cases, if the defendant is under arrest or in detention, this information shall be stated in the petition.

The petition shall be signed by the party or his attorney in his own hand.

Section 5

If the appeal is not dismissed, upon expiration of the time stated in section 1, the court of appeals shall transmit without delay to the Supreme Court the review petition with the papers annexed thereto and the case files of the lower court and the appellate court.

The transmission shall occur immediately on receipt of the petition in criminal cases, if the defendant is in detention, or in any case in which the petition contains a demand requiring immediate consideration, such as a request in civil cases for provisional attachment or injunction against dissipation, or for the termination of such a measure, or for an order that execution may occur forthwith, or a request in criminal cases for the detention of the defendant, or for a measure stated in chapters 25 to 28, or for the termination of such a measure. (SFS 1947:616)

Section 6

If an impediment other than the kind referred to in section 3 precludes consideration of the appeal upon the merits, the appeal may be dismissed forthwith by the Supreme Court.

Section 7

If the review petition fails to comply with the regulations in section 4 or is otherwise incomplete, the Supreme Court shall direct the appellant to cure the defect.

If the appellant fails to comply with the directive, the appeal shall be dismissed if the petition is defective in failing to present a distinct demand for a change in the judgment or to state clearly the grounds of the appeal, or if the defect is otherwise so fundamental in character as to render the petition unserviceable as a basis for the proceedings in the Supreme Court.

Section 8

In order to commence preparation of the case, the petition with the papers annexed thereto shall be served upon the appellee with a notice directing him to file a written answer.

If the court of appeals in a civil case has denied a request for provisional attachment, injunction against dissipation or any other security measure, or for an interlocutory decree, or has ordered the termination of such a measure, or in a criminal case has denied a request for a measure stated in chapters 26 to 28, or has ordered the termination of such a measure, the Supreme Court may immediately grant the measure to remain effective until otherwise ordered. If the court of appeals has granted such a measure, or has directed that execution of a judgment may occur forthwith, or has confirmed a lower court order granting such a measure or authorizing immediate execution of a judgment, the Supreme Court may immediately direct that no further step be taken to implement the measure or to execute the order. As to detention or travel prohibition, the Supreme Court may also change the order of the court of appeals without giving the adverse party an opportunity to be heard.

Unless in a civil case the appellant's demand for a change in the judgment is consented to, the answer shall respond to the appellant's grounds for his appeal and specify the circumstances upon which the appellee desires to rely.

In the answer the appellee shall specify the evidence upon which he desires to rely and indicate what he intends to prove by each specified item. In a civil case, if evidence is specified which was not presented below, the appellee shall state why such evidence was not offered at an earlier stage. The original or a certified copy of any document not previously presented shall be annexed to the answer. The appellee shall also state in the answer whether he desires the adverse party, or, in criminal cases, the injured person or the defendant to appear in person at the main hearing in the Supreme Court. (SFS 1963: 149)

The answer shall be signed personally by the appellee or his attorney or, in criminal cases when the defendant is the appellee, by his defense counsel.

Section 10

The answer with the papers annexed thereto shall be served upon the appellant.

If it is found necessary for the preparation of the case, the Supreme Court may direct a further exchange of writings. The court may also issue detailed regulations as to the exchange of writings and even particularize the issues upon which the parties shall express themselves. However, a party may be directed to file more than one writing only for special cause.

Section 11

If review dispensation is required, after the conclusion of the exchange of writings, the Supreme Court shall determine whether such dispensation shall be granted. For cause, the matter of dispensation may be disposed of, although an exchange of writings has not occurred. Prior to the grant of review dispensation, the issues stated in section 8, paragraph 2, may not be considered.

Section 12

The Supreme Court may dispose of an appeal on the merits without a main hearing if the action was initiated in a court of appeals or, in civil cases, if the appeal petition is consented to or, in criminal cases, if an appeal by the prosecutor is brought only for the benefit of the defendant or an appeal by the defendant is supported by the adverse party.

For the determination of a question not related to the substance of the appeal, a main hearing is not required.

When an appeal, or a certain issue arising therein, is to be decided by the Supreme Court en banc, the en banc determination may take place without a main hearing.

Section 13

In civil cases a party may not assert in the Supreme Court in support of his position a circumstance or evidence not previously presented, unless he makes it appear probable that he was unable to claim the circumstance or evidence at a court below or that on other grounds he had a valid excuse for failing to do so. A set-off defense initially asserted in the Supreme Court may be dismissed unless it can be tried in the proceeding there without inconvenience.

Section 14

If testimony of a witness or an expert, or of a party under truth affirmation was heard at the main hearing in a court below with respect to a particular circumstance, or if a view concerning a certain fact was held during the main hearing in a court below, and the evaluation of such evidence is decisive of the outcome in the Supreme Court, the relevant part of the court of appeals judgment may not be changed by the Supreme Court, except for the benefit of the defendant in a criminal case, unless the court of appeals, even if the evidence was not taken at a main hearing in that court, has changed the relevant portion of the lower court judgment, or extraordinary reasons justify the conclusion that the value of the evidence is other than that attached to it by the appellate court.

Section 15

As to the proceedings in the Supreme Court in other respects, in civil cases, chapter 50, sections 11 to 20, 22, 24, and 25, paragraphs 1 and 2, and in criminal cases, chapter 51, sections 11 to 20, 22, 24, 25, and 31, shall correspondingly apply.

The provisions concerning the vacation and remand of lower court judgments by the courts of appeals, with respect to civil cases, chapter 50, sections 26 to 29, and with respect to criminal cases, chapter 51, sections 26 to 29, shall correspondingly apply to vacation and remand of the judgment below by the Supreme Court.

Section 16

After the Supreme Court has entered a judgment or final order, the files received from the court of appeals and copies of the judgment or order of the Supreme Court shall be returned, the court of appeals file to the appellate court and the lower court file to that court.

Chapter 56

Limited Appeal

Section 1

A person desiring to take a limited appeal from a court of appeals order shall submit a limited appeal petition to the appellate court within four weeks of the pronouncement of the challenged order; however, as to an order rendered in the course of the proceedings, but not at a hearing session, the period for appeal shall be computed from the date of the service of the order upon the complainant. No time limit shall apply to an appeal from an order requiring a person to be placed or kept in detention.

The obligation to give a formal notice of exception to orders of the kind referred to in chapter 49, section 3, or section 4, paragraph 1, 1., 2., 3., or 7., is prescribed in chapter 54, section 3.

Section 2

Within the period stated in section 1, the complainant shall deposit with the court of appeals the prescribed appeal fee, and the stipulated sum as security for the adverse party's costs; if neither sum or only the sum stipulated as security for costs is deposited, the appellant shall file an affidavit of poverty of the kind referred to in chapter 54, section 18, prior to the expiration of the period referred to above.

If the complainant has timely filed an affidavit of a competent authority concerning the complainant's poverty, but the content of the affidavit does not conform to that specified in the said section, the court of appeals shall direct the complainant to file an affidavit of the kind specified with the consequence that if a proper affidavit is not available to the appellate court when it re-examines the question whether the appeal has been properly pursued, the appeal been sought is also effective to cure the defect.

Section 3

If it is found that a limited appeal is not brought in the prescribed form or in due time, the appeal shall be dismissed by the court of appeals.

Section 4

In the limited appeal petition the complainant shall specify:

1. the order appealed from;
2. the grounds for the limited appeal;
3. the change in the order demanded by the complainant.

If the complainant requests review dispensation pursuant to chapter 54, section 10, 1., he should specify in the petition the circumstances he relied upon in support thereof.

In the petition, the complainant shall specify the evidence upon which he desires to rely and indicate what he intends to prove by each specified item. The original or a certified copy of any document not previously presented shall be annexed to the petition. (SFS 1963:149)

The petition shall be signed by the complainant or his attorney in his own hand.

Section 5

If the appeal is not dismissed, the court of appeals shall transmit without delay to the Supreme Court the limited appeal petition with the papers annexed thereto, and the files of the lower and appellate courts or certified copies thereof, to the extent related to the challanged matter.

Section 6

If an impediment other than the kind referred to in section 3 precludes consideration of the appeal upon the merits, the appeal may be dismissed forthwith by the Supreme Court.

Section 7

If the limited appeal petition fails to comply with the regulations in section 4 or is otherwise incomplete, the Supreme Court shall direct the complainant to cure the defect.

If the complainant fails to comply with the directive, the limited appeal shall be dismissed if the petition is defective in failing to present a distinct demand for a change in the order or to state clearly the grounds of appeal, or if the defect is otherwise so fundamental in character as to render the petition unserviceable as a basis for the proceedings in the Supreme Court.

Section 8

If it is found that the adverse party should be given an opportunity to respond, the petition with the papers annexed thereto shall be served upon him with a notice directing him to file a written answer.

Section 9

The answer shall respond to the complainant's grounds for his appeal and specify the circumstances upon which the respondent desires to rely.

The respondent shall specify the evidence upon which he desires to rely and indicate what he intends to prove by each specified item. The original or a certified copy of any document not previously presented shall be annexed to the answer. (SFS 1963:149)

The answer shall be signed personally by the respondent or his attorney or, in criminal cases, when the defendant is the respondent, by his defense counsel.

Section 10

After an answer is filed, if the Supreme Court finds that a further exchange of writings is necessary, it may so direct. The Court may also issue detailed regulations as to the exchange of writings and even particularize the issues upon which the parties shall express themselves. However, a party may be directed to file more than one writing only for special cause.

Section 11

If review dispensation is required, and the adverse party has been given an opportunity to respond, the Supreme Court shall determine, after the conclusion of the exchange of writings, whether such dispensation shall be granted. For cause, the matter of dispensation may be disposed of, although an exchange of writings has not occurred.

Section 12

As to the proceedings in the Supreme Court in other respects, the provisions in chapter 52, sections 10 to 12, shall correspondingly apply.

Section 13

After the Supreme Court has entered a final order, the files received from the court of appeals and copies of the order of the Supreme Court shall be returned, the court of appeals file to the appellate court and the lower court file to that court.

Section 14

The provisions in this chapter shall correspondingly apply to limited appeals from decisions in accordance with chapter 8, section 8; in such appeals, however, the following diverging provisions shall govern: (SFS 1963:149).

1. A person desiring to appeal shall file a limited appeal petition with the Supreme Court within four weeks of service of the decision upon him. The provisions in section 2 do not apply.

2. Unless special reasons indicate otherwise, the complainant and, when the appeal is brought by the Attorney General, the adverse party as well, shall be orally examined before the Supreme Court.

3. The organ of the Association of Advocates that rendered the decision appealed from shall be given an opportunity to file a written answer and, when a party is orally examined, to express its position on the matters raised in the examination. (SFS 1963:149)

Chapter 57

ACTIONS COMMENCED IN THE SUPREME COURT

Section 1

As to an action that is to be instituted in the Supreme Court as a court of first instance, the provisions in chapter 53 shall correspondingly apply.

Part 7

EXTRAORDINARY REMEDIES

Chapter 58

RELIEF FOR SUBSTANTIVE DEFECTS AND RESTORATION OF EXPIRED TIME

Section 1

After a judgment in a civil case has become conclusive, relief for a substantive defect in the judgment (resning) may be granted for the benefit of any of the parties:

1. if a member of the court, a civil servant employed at the court, an attorney, or a legal representative rendered himself liable for criminal conduct with respect to the litigation, and such conduct can be assumed to have affected the outcome;

2. if a document presented as proof was forged, or if a party examined under truth affirmation, or a witness, an expert, or an interpreter gave false testimony, and the document or testimony can be assumed to have affected the outcome;

3. if a circumstance or evidence that was not presented previously is asserted, and presentation of the matter asserted probably would have led to a different outcome; or

4. if the application of law forming the basis of the judgment is obviously inconsistent with the governing legislative provision.

Relief for a substantive defect may not be granted on the basis stated in 3., unless the party makes it appear probable that he was unable to claim the circumstance or evidence in the court that pronounced the judgment or on appeal therefrom, or that on other grounds he had a valid excuse for failing to do so.

Section 2

After a judgment in a criminal case has become conclusive, relief for a substantive defect may be granted for the benefit of the defendant:

1. if a member of the court, a civil servant employed at the court, the prosecutor, an attorney, a legal representative, or a defense counsel rendered himself liable for criminal conduct with respect to the case, and such conduct can be assumed to have affected the outcome;

2. if a document presented as proof was forged, or a witness, an expert, or an interpreter gave false testimony, and the document or testimony can be assumed to have affected the outcome;

3. if a circumstance or evidence that was not presented previously is asserted, and presentation of the matter asserted probably would have led to the defendant's acquittal or to application of a sentencing provision milder than that applied; relief may also be granted if, in view of the new matter and other circumstances, extraordinary cause warrants a new trial on the question whether the defendant committed the crime for which he was convicted;

4. if the application of law forming the basis of the judgment is obviously inconsistent with the governing legislative provision.

Section 3

After a judgment in a criminal case has become conclusive, relief for a substantive defect may be granted to the detriment of the defendant:

1. if a condition of the kind referred to in section 2, 1. or 2., existed, and the condition can be assumed to have contributed to the defendant's acquittal, or to application of a sentencing provision fundamentally milder than the one that should have been applied; or

2. if the offense is punishable by imprisonment for a term exceeding one year, and a circumstance or evidence that was not presented previously is asserted, and presentation of the matter asserted probably would have led to conviction of the defendant or to application of a sentencing provision fundamentally more severe than the one applied. (SFS 1964:166)

Relief for a substantive defect may not be granted on the basis stated in 2., unless the party makes it appear probable that he was unable to claim the circumstance or evidence in the court that pronounced the judgment or on appeal therefrom, or that on other grounds he had a valid excuse for failing to do so.

Section 4

A person desiring to apply for relief for a substantive defect shall file a written application therefor with the Supreme Court.

Applications in civil cases based upon a situation of the kind referred to in section 1, paragraph 1, 1., 2., or 3., and applications in criminal cases to the detriment of the defendant, shall be submitted within one year of the time when the situation justifying the application became known to the applicant; if the application is based upon the criminal activity of another person, the period may be computed from the time when the judgment in question became conclusive. In civil cases, relief based on a situation of the kind referred to in section 1, paragraph 1, 4., shall be sought within six months of the time when the judgment became conclusive.

Section 5

In the application for relief for a substantive defect the applicant shall specify:

1. the challenged judgment;
2. the legal basis of, and supporting reasons for, the application; and
3. the evidence upon which the applicant desires to rely, and what he intends to prove by each specified item.

If the application is based upon matters stated in section 1, paragraph 1, 3., or section 3, paragraph 1, 2., the applicant shall state why the circumstance or evidence was not presented in the proceedings.

The application shall be signed by the applicant or his attorney in his own hand.

The original or a certified copy of any document asserted by the applicant shall be annexed to the application.

Section 6

If an application for relief for a substantive defect is not dismissed, the application, with the papers annexed thereto, shall be served upon the adverse party with a notice directing him to file a written answer. If the application is found to be without merit, however, it may be dismissed forthwith.

The provisions in chapter 56, sections 9, 10, and 12, concerning limited appeals to the Supreme Court shall correspondingly apply to applications for relief for substantive defects.

For cause, the Supreme Court may direct that, until otherwise ordered, no further step may be taken to execute the judgment.

Section 7

If an application for relief for a substantive defect is granted, the Supreme Court shall direct that the case be taken up anew by the court in which it was last pending; however, when such relief is granted in a civil case, or in a criminal case for the benefit of the defendant and the matter is found to be plain, the Supreme Court may change the judgment immediately.

If the applicant fails to appear at the hearing for readjudication of the action, the proceedings shall be dismissed; if the adverse party fails to appear, the action may nonetheless be retried and determined. The notices to appear served on the parties shall contain a reminder of the consequences of failure to appear. However, the provisions of this paragraph are not applicable to prosecutors.

Section 8

If an application for relief for a substantive defect is dismissed or denied, the Supreme Court may order the applicant to compensate the adverse party or if the prosecutor is the adversary, the Crown for costs incurred in the extraordinary remedy proceeding; if the relief was sought by the prosecutor, the costs may be paid out of public funds. If the application is granted, the issue of costs shall be determined in conjunction with the disposition of case after its reinstatement.

Section 9

If a judgment in a criminal case also encompasses a matter other than criminal liability, relief for a substantive defect as to that part of the case shall be governed by the provisions for relief in civil cases; however, as an exception to this rule, if relief is granted on the question of criminal liability, relief may also be granted at the same time on any other aspect of the case.

Section 10

The provisions in sections 1 to 9 concerning judgments shall correspondingly apply to court orders.

Section 11

If the time has expired for an appeal from a judgment or an order, or for an application for reopening or reinstatement, and the person who failed to act within the period specified by statute was prevented from doing so by a circumstance that constitues legal excuse, upon an application made by him, the expired time may be restored, provided that the legal excuse was such that the person could not notify the court thereof prior to the expiration of the specified period.

Section 12

A person who desires to apply for the restoration of expired time shall file a written application therefor with the Supreme Court within three weeks of the termination of the legal excuse and, at the latest, within one year of the expiration of the time period.

As to such applications, the provisions in sections 5, 6, and 8 shall correspondingly apply.

CHAPTER 59

RELIEF FOR GRAVE PROCEDURAL ERRORS

Section 1

A judgment that has become conclusive shall be vacated for grave procedural errors on the limited appeal petition of the person whose legal right the judgment concerns:

1. if the action was adjudicated on the merits, although a procedural hindrance existed that a higher court is obliged to notice on appeal on its own motion;

2. if the court was improperly constituted;

3. if the judgment was directed against someone who was not properly summoned and did not appear in the proceedings, or if the substantive rights of a person who was not a party to the action are adversely affected by the judgment;

4. if the judgment is so vague or incomplete that the determination on the merits cannot be ascertained therefrom; or

5. if another grave procedural error occurred in the course of the proceeding that can be assumed to have affected the outcome of the action.

Section 2

A person desiring to take a limited appeal for relief from a grave procedural error shall file a limited appeal petition with the court to which an appeal from the judgment should have been brought or, if the judgment was not reviewable, with the Supreme Court.

If based on a circumstance of the kind referred to in section 1, 1., 2., or 5., the limited appeal shall be brought within six months after the judgement became conclusive and, if based on a circumstance of the kind referred to in section 1, 3., within six months of the time when the complainant learned of the judgment. If the complainant knew of the judgment before it became conclusive, the time shall be computed from the day when the judgment became conclusive.

Section 3

As to limited appeals for relief from grave procedural errors, and further appeals from court of appeals orders on such matters, the provisions in chapters 52, 54 and 56 shall correspondingly apply; however, conerning limited appeals for such relief that are to be brought directly to the Supreme Court, the provisions for deposit of an appeal fee and a sum as security for costs, and for review dispensation shall not govern.

For cause, the court may direct that, until otherwise ordered, no further step be taken to execute the judgment in question.

If the judgment is vacated, except when the decision is grounded upon the court's lack of competence or upon another basis for concluding that the court should not have entertained the case on the merits, the vacation order shall direct that new proceedings occur in the court that rendered the judgment from which relief was granted.

Section 4

As to compensation for expenses, the provisions on litigation costs shall apply.

The provisions in sections 1 to 3 concerning judgments shall correspondingly apply to court orders.

Section 5

An order of summary punishment by fine consented to by the suspect shall be set aside upon a limited appeal:

1. if the consent cannot be considered a valid voluntary declaration of intent by the suspect;

2. if an error occurred during the processing of the matter of such character that the order should be considered invalid; or

3. if the order is otherwise inconsistent with the governing legislative provision. (SFS 1959:257)

If an order for summary punishment by fine is set aside, a more severe punishment for the same criminal act may not thereafter be imposed. (SFS 1959:257)

Section 6

A person who desires to attack an order of summary punishment by fine shall file a petition with the lower court that had competence to entertain a prosecution for the offense. (SFS 1966:249)

The petition shall be filed within one year after a step was taken against the suspect to execute the order. As to such petitions, the provisions in chapter 52, sections 2, 3 and 5 to 12 shall correspondingly apply. Any provision relating to a court of appeals, however, shall apply to the lower court. (SFS 1966:249)

SCANDINAVIAN CRIMINAL CODES—QUESTIONS NOS. 1–20

Appendix G

FINES PROPORTIONAL TO THE INCOME OF THE OFFENDER IN THE NORDIC COUNTRIES

The Criminal Codes of all the Nordic Countries (Denmark,[1] Finland,[2] Norway,[3] and Sweden)[4] have provisions on fines which make it mandatory that the financial circumstances of the accused be considered before the final amount of a fine is decided. The alternative to paying a fine is to serve time in jail. In practice, the time to be served is always decided first and then the amount to be paid per day is decided after an evaluation of the total financial circumstances of the offender. The express purpose of these provisions is to make fines equally severe for everybody, just as the term of imprisonment is the same for everybody regardless of his financial situation.

Fine settled by the day apply only to fines for violations of the criminal (penal) codes, and are not applied widely for other infractions of the statutory laws, partly because they are both cumbersome and expensive to administer. For instance, violations of the traffic laws, such as parking violations and minor cases of speeding, are punished by small fines of the same amount for everybody.

SINGAPORE

1. The Penal Code of Singapore consists of 24 chapters, most of which deal with separate groups of offenses such as offenses against the State, offenses against the public tranquility, etc. Sentences are prescribed as each offense is described. The Code makes no distinction between felonies and misdemeanors. However, minor offenses are dealt with by the Minor Offenses Act first promulgated in 1906.

2. The Code does not leave blank numbers for future sections. However, sections inserted by amending legislation have been numbered 1A, 1B, 1C, and so on according to the number of the preceding section.

3. While the Singapore Penal Code nowhere lists the different kinds of culpability involved, an analysis of the various sections shows that ten different kinds are involved. These are:

(1) intentionally;
(2) knowingly;
(3) voluntarily;
(4) negligently;
(5) fraudulently;
(6) dishonestly;
(7) corruptly;
(8) wantonly;
(9) malignantly;
(10) maliciously.

Where the particular requirement for culpability is not specified in the offense, intent is required.

It should be noted that apart from liability for the actual commission of an offense, liability for abetment is also included.

4. Causation is defined only in connection with "voluntarily," as below:

Section 39.—A person is said to cause an effect "voluntarily" when he causes it by means whereby he intended to cause it, or by means which, at the time of employing those means, he knew or had reason to believe to be likely to cause it.

5. Singapore has an insanity defense to criminal charges:

Section 84.—Nothing is an offence which is done by a person who, at the time of doing it, by reason of unsoundness of mind, is incapable of knowing the nature of the act, or that he is doing what is either wrong or contrary to law.

It will be noted that "unsoundness of mind" is not defined or qualified, or is the term "incapable" explained.

According to the Singapore Criminal Procedure Code, a person raising insanity as a defense will have the fact of such unsoundness of mind investigated. The person may be remanded for a period not exceeding one month, to be detained for observation in a mental hospital. During that period, the medical superintendent (a medical officer in charge of mental hospital), will keep him under observation and before the expiry of the period will certify to the court his opinion as to the state of mind of the person; he may also ask for a further remand up to two months.

If the medical superintendent certifies that the person is of unsound mind and incapable of making his defense, the inquiry or trial is to be postponed. If the offense charged is a bailable one, the court may at its discretion release him on sufficient security being given that he will be properly taken care of and prevented from doing injury to himself or to any other person, and that he will appear before the court when required. If the offense is not a bailable one it is at the discretion of the Minister of Justice to order the accused to be confined in a mental hospital or other suitable place.

If the person is of unsound mind, therefore, the trial cannot be held, and must be postponed until such time as he is capable of making a defense. However, if the accused is found to be of sound mind at the time of the inquiry, but raises the defense of unsound mind at the time when the act was committed, he can be sent for trial.

If a person is acquitted upon the ground of mental disorder, the finding must state specifically whether he committed the act or not. When the finding states that the accused person committed the act, the Minister may order him to be confined in a mental hospital, prison or other suitable place of safe custody.

6. The cases in which intoxication may constitute a defense to a criminal charge are stated as below:

Section 85.—(1) Save as provided in this section and in section 86, intoxication shall not constitute a defense to any criminal charge. (2) Intoxication shall be a defense to any criminal charge if by reason thereof the person charged at the time of the act or omission complained of did not know that such act or omission was wrong or did not know what he was doing and—

(a) the state of intoxication was caused without his consent by the malicious or negligent act of another person; or

j)b) The person charged was, by reason of intoxication, insane, temporarily or otherwise, at the time of such act or omission.

Section 86.—(1) Where the defense under section 85 is established, then in a case falling under paragraph (a) of subsection (2) thereof the accused person shall be acquitted, and in a case falling under paragraph (b) the provisions of section 84 of this Code and of sections 304 and 305 of the Criminal Procedure Code shall apply.

(2) Intoxication shall be taken into account for the purpose of determining whether the person charged had formed any intention, specific or otherwise, in the absence of which he would not be guilty of the offence.

(3) For the purposes of this and the preceding section "intoxication" shall be deemed to include a state produced by narcotics or drugs.

Sections 304 and 305 of the Criminal Procedure Code, cited in the above paragraph, are those provisions described under item 5 of the questionnaire, regarding the finding when the person is acquitted on the ground of mental disorder. That is to say, in the case of intoxication also, such a finding must state whether he committed the act or not (Section 304), and whenever the finding states that he committed the alleged act, the Minister may order his confinement in a mental hospital, prison or other suitable place (Section 305).

7. Regarding the right of private defense, the Penal Code states, in its Section 96, that "nothing is an offence which is done in the exercise of the right of private defence." Section 97 deals with both self-defense and the defense of others.

Section 97.—Every person has a right, subject to the restrictions contained in section 99, to defend—

(a) his own body, and the body of any other person, against any offence affecting the human body;

(b) the property, whether movable or immovable, of himself or of any other person, against any act which is an offence falling under the definition of theft, robbery, mischief, or criminal trespass, or which is an attempt to commit theft, robbery, mischief, or criminal trespass.

Section 98 maintains the right of private defense against the act of a person of unsound mind, or an intoxicated person, or any other, for whom it would not be an offense. Section 99 restricts the right of private defense as not existing against an act which does not reasonably cause apprehension of death or grievous hurt, by a public servant acting in good faith under color of his office, or done under his direction, or in cases where there is time to have recourse to the protection of public authorities. It is also laid down that the right does not in any case extend to the inflicting of more harm than is necessary for the purpose of defense.

Section 100 gives descriptions of offenses which may occasion the right of private defense to extend to the voluntary causing of death or of any other harm to the assailant. Section 101 states when such a right may extend only to causing any harm other than death. Sections 102 through 106 contain provisions on the defense of the body and the defense of property.

The Code thus covers the same ground covered by the U.S. Draft Code in its sections on self-defense, defense of others, use of force in defense of premises and property, and limits on the use of force. The Singapore Code has no provisions on the use of force by persons with parental, custodial or similar responsibilities.

8. The Singapore Penal Code classifies offenses into various categories: offenses against the State; offenses relating to the armed forces; offenses against the public tranquility, and so on. This is not a classification for purposes of sentencing, but by nature or subject-matter only.

9. Offenders are liable to one of five punishments:

(1) death;

(2) imprisonment;

(3) forfeiture of property;

(4) fine;

(5) caning.

The Criminal Procedure Code has provisions for requiring security for keeping the peace. This is in cases where a person accused of certain crimes, e.g. rioting, assault, assembling armed men, has been convicted of the offense, and the court is of the opinion that it is necessary to require him to execute a bond for keeping the peace. This may be in lieu of a sentence, or in addition to the sentence. If the person is, at that time, sentenced to or is undergoing a sentence of imprisonment, the period for which the security is required is to begin on the expiration of that sentence. Also, when a person who has been convicted of an offense punishable with imprisonment for a term of two years or upwards is convicted of any other offense punishable likewise, he may be subject to the supervision of the police for a period of not more than two years, beginning immediately after the expiration of the sentence passed on him for the last offense. Police supervision involves notifying changes of residence and absences from residence of more than forty-eight hours, and reporting to the police at regular intervals.

Regarding the suspension of imposition of sentences, the Criminal Procedure Code provides as follows:

Section 203.—Sentence of death shall not be pronounced on or recorded against a person convicted of an offense if it appears to the court that at the time when the offence was committed he was under the age of eighteen years but instead of that the court shall sentence him to be detained during the President's pleasure, and, if so sentenced, he shall be liable to be detained in such place and under such conditions as the President directs, and while so detained shall be deemed to be in legal custody.

Section 204.—(1) Where a woman convicted of an offence punishable with death alleges that she is pregnant, or where the court before whom a woman is so convicted thinks fit, the question whether or not the woman is pregnant shall, before sentence is passed on her, be determined by the court.

(2) If the woman is found to be pregnant, a sentence of imprisonment for life shall be passed on her.

(3) If the woman is found not to be pregnant, she may appeal under the Supreme Court of Judicature Act to the Court of Criminal Appeal against such finding, and that Court, if satisfied that for any reason the finding should be set aside, shall squash the sentence passed on her, and instead of it pass on her a sentence of imprisonment for life.

As for suspension of execution of sentence, there is the following provision:

Section 227.—(1) When any person has been sentenced to punishment for an offence, the President, acting in accordance with the provisions of section 8 of the Republic of Singapore Independence Act, 1965, may at any time, without conditions or upon any conditions which the person sentenced accepts, suspend the execution of his sentence or remit the whole or any part of the punishment to which he has been sentenced.

(2) Whenever an application is made to the President for the suspension or remission of a sentence, the President may require the presiding Judge of the court before or by which the conviction was had to state his opinion as to whether the application should be granted or refused and the judge shall state his opinion accordingly.

(3) If any condition on which a sentence has been suspended or remitted is, in the opinion of the President, not fulfilled the President may cancel the suspension or remission, and thereupon the person in whose favour the sentence has been suspended or remitted may, if at large, be arrested by any police officer without warrant and remanded to undergo the unexpired portion of the sentence.

The whole question of probation is covered by the Probation of Offenders Act of Singapore. Section 5 of this Act reads thus:

Section 5.—(1) Where a court by or before which a person is convicted of an offence (not being an offence the sentence for which is fixed by law) is of the opinion that having regard to the circumstances, including the nature of the offence and the character of the offender, it is expedient to do so, the court may, instead of sentencing him, make a probation order, that is to say, an order requiring him to be under the supervision of a probation officer for a period to be specified in the order of not less than one year nor more than three years. . . .

Probation is thus a form of suspension of sentence.

A person released under probation is thus under the supervision of probation officers.

Determinate sentences of imprisonment are provided for.

Comparing sentences provided in the Singapore Penal Code for those offenses termed "Contempts of the Lawful Authority of Public Servants" with those in the U.S. Draft Code for offenses termed "Criminal Contempt and Related Offenses," it would seem that Singapore imposes heavier penalties for the same type of offense.

Criminal contempt under the U.S. Code is treated as a Class B misdemeanor, except that the defendant may be sentenced to a term of imprisonment of no more than six months, and may be sentenced to pay a fine in any amount deemed just, if the criminal contempt is disobedience of or resistance to a court's lawful temporary restraining order, or preliminary or final injunction, or other final order other than for the payment of money. Under the Singapore Code, disobedience in the form of non-attendance according to an order from a public servant carries a penalty of up to six months' imprisonment, fine of up to one thousand dollars, or both. Omission to produce a document when legally bound to do so is punishable with the same penalties, as is omission to furnish notice or information to a public servant when legally bound to do so. The furnishing of false information is punishable with imprisonment for a term which may extend to two years, or fine, or both. Other offenses of the same nature, e.g. refusing oath when required to take it, refusing to answer a public servant authorized to question, refusing to sign a statement when required to do so by a legally competent public servant, etc., carry penalties ranging from imprisonment of up to three years, fine of up to one thousand dollars, or both.

There are no mandatory minimum prison sentences under the Singapore Penal Code.

There is no provision in the Singapore Code requiring judges to give reasons in writing for sentences imposed.

Sentences are subject to review on appeal by a higher court. The appellate court may raise as well as lower the sentence.

The government may appeal a sentence as can the defendant.

Section 251 of the Criminal Procedure Code states that no judgment, sentence or order is to be reversed or set aside unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the High Court that the judgment, acquittal, sentence or order was either wrong in law or against the weight of the evidence, or in the case of a sentence, manifestly excessive or inadequate in the circumstances of the case.

On the question of multiple offenses, it is provided as follows, by Section 17 of the Criminal Procedure Code:

When a person is convicted at one trial of any two or more distinct offences the court may sentence him for such offences to the several punishments prescribed therefor which such court is competent to inflict, such punishments when consisting of imprisonment to commence the one after the expiration of the other in such order as the court directs or to run concurrently if the court so directs, but it shall not be necessary for the court, by reason only of the aggregate punishment for the several offences being in excess of the punishment which it is competent to inflict on conviction of one single offence, to send the offender before a higher court:

Provided that if the case is tried by a District Court or Magistrate's Court the aggregate punishment shall not exceed twice the amount of punishment which such Court in the exercise of its ordinary jurisdiction is competent to inflict.

Regarding the collection of fines, the Criminal Procedure Code states:

Section 214.—Where any fine is imposed under the authority of any law for the time being in force then, in the absence of any express provision relating to such fine in such law contained, the provisions following shall apply:—

(a) where no sum is expressed to which the fine may extend, the amount to which the offender is liable is unlimited but shall not be excessive;

(b) in every case of an offence in which the offender is sentenced to pay a fine the court passing the sentence may at any time before the fine has been paid in full at its discretion, do all or any of the following things:—

(i) allow time for the payment of the fine and grant extensions of the time so allowed;

(ii) direct payment of the fine to be made by installments;

Provided that before allowing time for payment of a fine or directing payment of a fine to be made by instalments the court may require the offender to execute a bond with or without sureties conditioned upon payment of the fine or of the instalments as the case may be on the day or days directed and in the event of the fine or any instalment not being paid as ordered the whole of the fine remaining unpaid shall become due and payable and the court may issue a warrant for the arrest of the offender;

(iii) issue a warrant for the levy of the amount by distress and sale of any property belonging to the offender;

(iv) direct that in default of payment of the fine the offender shall suffer imprisonment for a certain term, which imprisonment shall be in excess of any other imprisonment to which he may be sentenced or to which he may be liable under commutation of a sentence;

(v) direct that such person be searched, and that any money found on him when so searched or which, in the event of his being committed to prison, may be found on him when taken to prison, shall be applied towards the payment of such fine, the surplus, if any, being returned to him:

Provided that such money shall not be so applied if the court is satisfied that the money does not belong to the person on whom it was found.

Provision is also made for the term the offender may be imprisoned in default of payment of a fine, according to the gravity of the offense.

10. Mistake of fact is a defense under the Penal Code of Singapore, under the following circumstances:

Section 76.—Nothing is an offence which is done by a person who is, or who, by reason of a mistake of fact and not by reason of a mistake of law, in good faith believes himself to be bound by law to do it.

Section 79.—Nothing is an offence which is done by any person who is justified by law, or who by reason of a mistake of fact and not by reason of a mistake of law in good faith believes himself to be justified by law in doing it.

Mistake of law can be a defense only in the following circumstances:

Section 78.—Nothing which is done in pursuance of, or which is warranted by the judgment or order of a court of justice, if done while the judgment or order remains in force, is an offence, notwithstanding the court may have had no jurisdiction to pass the judgment or order, provided the person doing the act in good faith believes that the court had such jurisdiction.

The U.S. Draft Code in its Section 303 lays down the general principle that mistake of facts which would constitute an affirmative defense is not a defense, except as expressly provided otherwise. Singapore law, on the other hand, specifically states the two cases in which such a defense would be admissible. The Singapore Code's Section 79 is similar to the Draft Code's Section 304 in that they both admit of mistakes which would negate the culpability. The Singapore Code only admits mistake of fact, however, while the U.S. Code states "mistaken about a matter of fact or law." Mistake of law under the Singapore Code is possible only in acts done pursuant to a judgment or order of a court of justice. The U.S. Code admits mistake of law if it negates the kind of culpability required for commission of the offense. It also allows the defense of mistake of law under a larger area of circumstances than the Singapore Code does.

12. On the question of extraterritorial jurisdiction, the Singapore Penal Code states merely as below:

Section 3.—Any person liable by law to be tried for an offence committed beyond the limits of Singapore, shall be dealt with according to the provisions of this Code for any act committed beyond Singapore, in the same manner as if such act had been committed within Singapore.

13. Criminal conspiracy is handled first by defining the offense of criminal conspiracy, and then prescribing the punishment therefor.

Section 120A.—When two or more persons agree to do, or cause to be done—

(a) an illegal act; or

(b) an act, which is not illegal, by illegal means, such an agreement is designated a criminal conspiracy: Provided that no agreement except an agreement to commit an offence shall amount to a criminal conspiracy unless some act besides the agreement is done by one or more parties to such agreement in pursuance thereof.

Explanation: It is immaterial whether the illegal act is the ultimate object of such agreement, or is merely incidental to that object.

Section 120B.—(1) Whoever is a party to a criminal conspiracy to commit an offence punishable with death or imprisonment for a term of two years or upwards shall, where no express provision is made in this Code for the punishment of such a conspiracy, be punished in the same manner as if he had abetted such offence.

(2) Whoever is a party to a criminal conspiracy other than a criminal conspiracy to commit an offence punishable as aforesaid shall be punished with imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months, or with fine, or with both.

16. The following two sections are the only ones in the Singapore Penal Code on the collection of men, arms, or ammunition, with the intention of waging war against the Government, i.e. para-military activities:

Section 122.—Whoever collects men, arms, or ammunition or otherwise prepares to wage war, with the intention of either waging or being prepared to wage war against the Government, shall be punished with imprisonment for life or imprisonment for a term not exceeding ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

Section 123.—Whoever by any act, or by any illegal omission, conceals the existence of a design to wage war against the Government, intending by such concealment to facilitate, or knowing it to be likely that such concealment will facilitate, the waging of such war, shall be punished with imprisonment for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

17. The only offense pertaining to the taking of drugs is described in the following:

Section 328.—Whoever administers to, or causes to be taken by, any person, any poison or any stupefying, intoxicating or unwholesome drug or other thing, with intent to cause hurt to such person, or with intent to commit or to facilitate the commission of a offence, or knowing it to be likely that he will thereby cause hurt, shall be punished with imprisonment for a term which may extend to ten years, and shall also be liable to fine.

It will be noted that this pertains only to the administration of drugs, and does not deal with possession or trafficking. It also does not attempt to identify the poisons or drugs.

Illegal abortion is an offense under the Singapore Penal Code, i.e. abortion other than according to the provisions of the Abortion Act of 1969. Sections 312 through 318 provide for offenses relating to illegal abortions.

Gambling is dealt with outside the Penal Code, by means of the Betting Act of 1960 and the Common Gaming Houses Act of 1961. These acts make illegal betting-houses, betting in public places, bookmaking, common gaming houses, public gaming, and public lotteries.

Obscenity is dealt with in the following three sections:

Section 292.—Whoever—

(a) sells, lets to hire, distributes, publicly exhibits or in any manner puts into circulation, or for purposes of sale, hire, distribution, public exhibition or circulation, makes, produces, or has in his possession any obscene book, pamphlet, paper, drawing, painting, representation or figure, or any other obscene object whatsoever; or

(b) imports, exports, or conveys, any obscene object for any of the purposes aforesaid, or knowing or having reason to believe that such object will be sold, let to hire, distributed, or publicly exhibited, or in any manner put into circulation; or

(c) takes part in or receives profits from, any business in the course of which he knows or has reason to believe that any such obscene objects are, for any of the purposes aforesaid, made, produced, purchased, kept, imported, exported, conveyed, publicly exhibited, or in any manner put into circulation; or

(d) advertises, or makes known by any means whatsoever, that any person is engaged or is ready to engage in any act which is an offence under this section, or that any such obscene object can be procured from or through any person:

(e) offers or attempts to do any act which is an offence under this section, shall be punished with imprisonment for a term which may extend to three months, or with fine, or with both.

Exception: This section does not extend to any book, pamphlet, writing, drawing or painting kept or used bona fide for religious purposes, or any representation sculptured, engraved, painted or otherwise represented on or in any temple, or on any car used for the conveyance of idols, or kept or used for any religious purpose.

Section 293.—Whoever sells, lets to hire, distributes, exhibits or circulates to any person under the age of twenty years any such obscene object as is referred to in the last preceding section, or offers or attempts so to do, shall be punished with imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine, or with both.

Section 294.—Whoever, to the annoyance of others—

(a) does any obscene act in any public place: or

(b) sings, recites or utters any obscene song, ballad or words in or near any public place, shall be punished with imprisonment for a term which may extend to three months, or with fine, or with both.

In Singapore, offenses involving explosive substances are dealt with under the Explosive Substances Act and the Corrosive and Explosive Substances and Offensive Weapons Act. The first act penalizes the unlawful and malicious causing of an explosion likely to endanger life or cause serious injury to property, by means of an explosive substance, with fine, imprisonment up to ten years, caning, or any two of these punishments. Attempts and conspiracy to do so, and the possession of any explosive substance with such intent, is punishable with the same penalties. Making or possessing explosives under suspicious circumstances carries a penalty of fine, up to seven years imprisonment, caning, or any two of these penalties.

The second act penalizes unlawful possession of a corrosive or explosive substance for the purpose of causing hurt, using such a substance to cause hurt, and carrying offensive weapons without lawful authority or lawful purpose, with penalties for the first type of offense of imprisonment up to ten years and caning, for the second type imprisonment for life and caning, for the third type imprisonment up to three years and caning.

Firearms and ammunition are governed by the Arms and Explosives Ordinance and the Firearms and Ammunition (Unlawful Possession) Act. Unlawful possession, i.e. contrary to the provisions of the Arms and Explosives Ordinance, is punishable with up to ten years' imprisonment, fine up to ten thousand dollars, or both.

The emphasis in Singapore law is thus on unlawful possession, next on unlawful use of explosive substances. The wording of the law is rather broad in scope, unlike the specific nature of the offenses in the U.S. Draft Code, e.g. supplying firearms, etc. to a prohibited person, possessing explosives and destructive devices in federal government buildings, etc. Penalties are within an approximate range, with the exception that under Singapore law, the unlawful and malicious use of explosives to cause an explosion likely to cause hurt is punishable with imprisonment or fine or caning, regardless of whether any hurt has actually been caused or not.

19. Singapore provides for capital punishment. Death is the punishment for offenses against the State such as waging war against the government (with life imprisonment being the alternative), and offenses against the President's person (plus fine). Capital punishment is also prescribed for murder, and for attempts at murder made by a person under sentence of life imprisonment, if hurt is caused. Separate proceedings are not held to determine sentence in a capital case.

20. On the matter of multiple prosecutions and trials, the Singapore Criminal Procedure Code provides as below regarding previous acquittals and convictions:

Section 229.—(1) A person who has once been tried by a court of competent jurisdiction for an offence and convicted or acquitted of such offence shall, while such conviction or acquittal remains in force, not be liable to be tried again for the same offence nor on the same facts for any other offence for which a different charge from the one made against him might have been made under section 165 or for which he might have been convicted under section 166 or 167.

(2) A person acquitted or convicted of any offence may be afterwards tried for any distinct offence for which a separate charge might have been made against him on the former trial under subsection (1) of section 163.

(3) A person convicted of any offence constituted by any act causing consequences which together with that act constituted a different offence from that of which he was convicted may be afterwards tried for that different offence if the consequences had not happened or were not known to the court to have happened at the time when he was convicted.

(4) A person acquitted or convicted of any offence constituted by any acts may notwithstanding the acquittal or conviction, be subsequently charged with and tried for any other offence constituted by the same acts which he may have committed if the court by which he was first tried was not competent to try the offence with which he is subsequently charged.

A separate section provides for prosecution of multiple related offenses:

Section 163.—(1) If in one series of acts so connected together as to form the same transaction more offences than one are committed by the same person, he may be charged with and tried at one trial for every such offence.

(2) If the acts alleged constitute an offence falling within two or more separate definitions of any law in force for the time being by which offences are defined or punished, the person accused of them may be charged with and tried at one trial for each of those offences.

(3) If several acts of which one or more than one would by itself or themselves constitute an offence constitute when combined a different offence, the person accused of them may be charged with and tried at one trial for the offence constituted by such acts when combined or for any offence constituted by any one or more of such acts.

In general, these three sections of the Singapore Code cover the same ground as do Sections 703, 704 and 705 of the U.S. Draft Code. Section 3 of the Singapore Code provides that all offences under any other law are to be tried according to the same provisions as apply to offenses under the Penal Code.

Section 2 states that every person shall be liable to punishment under this Code and not otherwise for every act of omission contrary to the provisions thereof. Sheridan's comment is that this is in practice interpreted to mean criminal liability under the Code, and not otherwise, in respect of acts against the Code.[1] The Code has no provision for cases when former prosecution is invalid or fraudulently procured, other than that implied by the words "by a court of competent jurisdiction" in Section 229 above.

Somalia

The Somali Criminal Code was approved by Legislative Decree No. 5 of December 16, 1962, and entered into force on April 3, 1964. Although based on the Italian Penal Code, the Somali Code was, in the process of its preparation, subject to the influence of Islamic and Somali customary law in order to fit the needs of the Somali nation, which was under Italian and British administration prior to achieving independence in 1960.

Two unofficial scholarly sources on the text of the Somali Penal Code were used in the preparation of this report. They were published with comments and annotations in 1967[2] and 1971,[3] respectively. References to articles always refer to the 1967 edition.

QUESTION 1

The Somali Criminal Code is divided into three books: Book I, Offenses in general; Book II, Crimes in particular; and Book III, Contraventions in particular. The books are divided into parts, which in turn are subdivided into chapters, sections and articles.

The classification of offenses defined as crimes and contraventions is based on the nature of the right or interest which has been injured or threatened by the criminal act.

QUESTION 2

The Code contains 3 books, 25 parts, 46 chapters, 14 sections, and 565 articles. The numbering system runs consecutively from article 1 to article 565. The Code does not leave any blank numbers for future statutes.

QUESTION 3

In regard to culpability, the Somali Criminal Code requires objective and subjective elements for the existence of an offense. The subjective, also known as mental, or psychological, elements, consist of (a) knowingly, (b) intentionally, (c) preterintentionally, and (d) negligently committing or omitting an act (Articles 23 and 24).

A crime is committed (a) with criminal intent when the result is foreseen and desired, (b) preterintentionally, or beyond intent, when the result is more serious than that desired by the offender, and (c) with negligence, or against the intent of the offender, when the event is not desired and is due to imprudence, lack of skill, or non-observance of laws and regulations (Articles 24, 434, 441 and 513).

In regard to contraventions, that is, simple offenses, the offender has only to act (a) knowingly, and (b) wilfully, whether the act is done with criminal intent or by negligence (Article 23).

The distinction between crimes and contraventions is based on the different nature of the punishment prescribed by the code (Article 15). The state of mind of the offender is used to determine the guilt of innocence, the degree of guilt and the sentence (Articles 23 and 24).

Persons under the age of fourteen are not criminally liable based on the assumption that they are not capable of understanding or of having volition. Persons under the age of eighteen years are liable if the prosecutor proves that they had the capacity of understanding and volition. Should this be the case, then punishment must be reduced (Articles 59 and 60).

Acts committed through accident or force majeure, that is, acts of God, are not punishable (Article 26). The same rule applies when irresistible physical compulsion has been applied on the offender (Article 27).

In regard to causal connection, the Code requires that the harmful and dangerous event must be a consequence of the offender's act or omission. Failure to prevent the occurrence of an event is considered equivalent to causing it if there is a legal duty to prevent that event from occurring (Article 20).

The Code distinguishes between (a) preexisting causes, those that exist before the event occurs; (b) simultaneous causes, those which occur at the same time as the event; and (c) supervening causes, those that occur after the event. The concurrence of preexisting, simultaneous and supervening causes does not exclude the causal relationship. The chain of causality will, however, be broken in the case of supervening causes if such causes would have caused the event by themselves (Articles 13–21).

QUESTION 5

In cases of total mental deficiency, the Somali Criminal Code states that persons who, at the time of committing a criminal act, were infirm, so as to preclude the capacity of understanding and volition, shall not be liable. According to judicial practice the courts require proof by medical expert opinion, in which case the accused is sent to a mental hospital for observation and examination before any sentence is passed (Article 50).

Deaf and dumb persons who lack the capacity of understanding and volition due to their infirmity are not criminally liable (Article 58).

QUESTION 6

Chronic intoxication from alcohol or narcotic drugs is considered a stage of total mental deficiency and is treated like insanity, which precludes criminal liability (Article 57).

Partial mental deficiency involving diminished capacity of understanding and volition does not preclude liability, but punishment is reduced (Article 51).

This rule is also applicable to cases involving chronic intoxication from alcohol and narcotic drugs and to deaf and dumb persons (Articles 57 and 58).

In cases involving total mental deficiency, total chronic intoxication from alcohol or narcotic drugs as well as total incapacity of deaf and dumb persons, the accused persons are acquitted, but they are automatically presumed to be dangerous to society. Consequently, security measures are imposed upon them by the court and they are committed to a lunatic asylum for treatment.

The period of mandatory commitment to a lunatic asylum is limited to (1) c not less than two years provided that the maximum penalty prescribed by law is greater than two but less than ten years; (2) not less than five years where the term of imprisonment prescribed by law is not less than ten years; and (3) not less than ten years where the law provides punishment with death or imprisonment for life.

In cases involving contraventions, or crimes committed with negligence, or those which carry a fine or imprisonment for less than two years, the accused cannot be committed to a lunatic asylum and must be released. The police authority will be notified of the judgment of acquittal (Article 176).

Voluntary or culpable drunkenness does not lessen liability, because it is held that the offender was of proper mind when he commenced drinking (Article 54). If drunkenness is not total, punishment is reduced (Article 53). Punishment must be increased when an offense is committed in a state of drunkenness by a habitual drunkard, that is, a person who is addicted to alcohol (Article 55). The rules which govern the cases provided for by articles 53 and 54 also apply when the offender is under the influence of narcotic drugs (Article 56).

In cases involving habitual drunkards or drug addicts sentenced to imprisonment for committing a crime, if no other security measures of detention are required the judge also has to commit the offender to a nursing home for a period of not less than six months. If the imposed sentence carries a term of less than three years of imprisonment the judge may place the offender only under police surveillance (Article 175).

Commitment to a hospital or a nursing home is generally ordered in addition to imprisonment, and is executed after the sentence has been served or was extinguished (Article 170). In cases of habitual drunkards and drug addicts, the judge may order the execution of such commitment before the beginning or the end of the sentence restrictive of liberty (Article 174).

Persons convicted for a crime committed with intent and sentenced to a reduced punishment by reason of mental infirmity, of chronic intoxication from alcohol or narcotic drugs, or by reason of being deaf and dumb, are committed to a nursing home or a hospital for not less than one year, if the minimum punishment prescribed by law is imprisonment for not less than five years. This security measure must be ordered by the judge for a period of not less than three years if the punishment prescribed by law for a crime carries death, imprisonment for life, or imprisonment for a period of not less than ten years (Article 173).

Self-defense is known in the Somali Penal Code as private defense. It is based on the necessity to defend one's own or another person's rights against the actual danger of unlawful injury. If the defense is proportionate to the injury, the act committed is not punishable (Article 34).

Acts committed in the exercise of a right or in the performance of a duty imposed by law or by a lawful order of a public officer are not considered offenses. The existence of a lawful order will be determined by the judge. The officer giving an unlawful order is liable for the offense. The person who carries out such an order is also liable, unless he makes a justifiable mistake in believing that he was acting under a lawful order. If he was not allowed to question the correctness of the order, he is not liable (Article 33).

A public officer is not punishable if, in the performance of his duties, he employs or orders the use of arms or physical force. The use of arms or force must, however, be justifiable by an absolute necessity of repelling violence, overcoming resistance to the authorities, or avoiding the escape of a person lawfully arrested or detained. These rules also apply to private persons who are lawfully requested by a public officer to render assistance in such cases (Article 35).

In cases of a state of necessity, it is required that the offender (1) was compelled to save himself or another person from an actual danger of serious bodily injury, (2) did not cause the danger himself and could not avoid it, (3) committed an act that was proportionate to the danger involved, and (4) was not legally bound to expose himself to such danger. These rules also apply if the state of necessity is caused by the threat of others (Article 36).

If, within the terms of the exercise of a right or the performance of a duty (Article 33), of private defense (Article 34), of lawful use of arms or physical force (Article 35), or of a state of necessity (Article 36), the limits of the action permitted have been exceeded by negligence, and the acts constitute a crime committed with negligence, the excess (committed with negligence) is punishable as an offense committed with negligence (Article 37).

Abuses of correctional or disciplinary measures, committed by persons with parental, custodial, or similar responsibilities, are considered offenses and are punished with imprisonment up to six months, when the acts result in the danger of mental or physical illness. When the acts result in injury, the penalty is reduced to one third. Should the act result in death, imprisonment will range from three to eight years (Articles 431 and 440).

In cases other than those referred to in the preceding article, ill-treatment of children under the age of fourteen, of members of the family, and of other persons, committed by parents and persons with custodial or similar responsibilities, is punished with imprisonment from one to five years. If the result is a serious or very serious injury, the penalty is imprisonment from two to eight years. Resulting death carries a penalty of imprisonment from ten to fifteen years (Articles 432, 440, 441).

In cases of homicide or injury caused by a parent in the exercise of his paternal authority, the punishment of death is reduced to imprisonment from ten to fifteen years, and the punishment of imprisonment is reduced from one third to one half (Articles 442 and 96).

The parent who strikes a child in the exercise of his paternal authority, without causing physical or mental illness, commits an assault, but he is not punishable. This rule does, however, not apply when the act, by law, forms the constitutive element or an aggravating circumstance of another offense (Articles 442 and 439).

QUESTION 8

The Somali Criminal Code deviates from the traditional tripartite classification of offenses and distinguishes only two categories: (a) crimes, and (b) contraventions, or simple offenses. This classification is based on the juridical objectiveness of the offense, that is, on the nature of the good, possession, right or interest which has been injured by the criminal act.

The juridical objectiveness in regard to crimes is concerned with (1) social interests protected by the State, such as the personality of the State, the activity of administrative and judicial agencies, the society as a whole, moral values of the society, and (2) individual interests, such as those relating to persons and to property.

The classification of contraventional offenses is concerned mainly with social interests such as public order, public safety, prevention of certain classes of offenses, public morality, and public health.

The distinction between crimes and contraventions is based on the different nature of the punishments prescribed by the Code (Article 15).

QUESTION 9

Principal punishments are imposed by the judge upon conviction at the end of the trial. As a result of the conviction, accessory penalties, imposed by the judge, follow automatically (Article 93).

In the process of application and modification of punishments, the judge has general discretionary powers within the limits of the law. He is, however, required to state the grounds for using such discretion. When increasing or decreasing the terms of a sentence, the judge is bound to observe the limits established for each kind of punishment. Whenever a sentence of imprisonment is not greater than one year and the offender has not been previously convicted for committing a crime with intent, the judge can convert the penalty of imprisonment into an equivalent fine (Article 109).

The execution of a sentence can be ordered suspended by the judge when (a) the offender is not a recidivist, (b) there is reason to believe that the convicted person will show good conduct in the future, (c) the term of imprisonment imposed by the judge is not more than six months and/or a fine, and (d) the fine is convertible into imprisonment for the same period. This suspension of the punishment of a convicted person is, however, conditioned by the fact that (a) within five years from the date of the sentence, the offender does not commit a crime or contravention of the same nature and (b) the offender fulfills all civil obligations imposed by the court. Under all of these conditions the punishment will be extinguished after five years (Article 150). Otherwise the suspended sentences will be revoked automatically (Article 127 of the Criminal Procedure Code).[1]

In the exercise of his discretionary powers, for the purpose of the punishment, the judge is bound to take into account the following, as stated in Article 110.

Article 110: Gravity of the Offense: Evaluation for the Purpose of Punishment

(1) the gravity of the offense, as inferred from:

(a) the nature, character, means, object, time, place, and any other circumstances of the act;

(b) the gravity of the injury or of the danger caused to the party injured by the offense;

(c) the intensity of the criminal intent, or the degree of culpa; and

(2) the offender's criminal capacity, as inferred from:

(a) the motives to commit delinquency and the character of the offender;

(b) the criminal record of the offender and, in general, the conduct and life of the offender prior to the offense;

(c) the conduct at the time of, or subsequent to, the offense;

(d) the individual, domestic, and social conditions of life of the offender.

The Somali Criminal Code provides for determinate sentences and the judge cannot exceed the limits of punishment set by law (Article 109).

Based on the personality of the offender, recidivists (Articles 61, 62, 63), habitual offenders (Articles 64, 65, 66) and professional offenders (Article 67) are singled out by the Code for the purpose of extended term prison sentences. In cases involving recidivists, the punishment can be increased to one sixth, one third, or two thirds, depending on the specific conditions of the offenses (Article 124). Recidivists and persons declared as habitual or professional offenders can also be subject to administrative security measures (Article 70).

A group of crimes representing authorized sentences is reflected by the following text of the Somali Penal Code concerning crimes against morals, alcohol in particular.

Article 411: Supply or Sale of Alcoholic Beverages

(1) Whoever sells or otherwise supplies to a Somali citizen [4 P.C.] or to a muslim [1 Const.] of a foreign nationality any alcoholic beverage [417 P.C.] shall be punished with imprisonment [96 P.C.] up to three months or with fine [97 P.C.] up to Sh. So. 1,000.

(2) Where any alcoholic beverage [417 P.C.] is sold or supplied to a person under the age of 14 years or to a person who is afflicted with mental disease or is in a condition of mental deficiency owing to any other infirmity, the punishment shall be increased [118 P.C.].

Article 412: Consumption of Alcoholic Beverages

(1) In cases other than those referred to in the preceding article, a Somali citizen [4 P.C.] or a muslim [1 Const.] of a foreign nationality, who acquires for his consumption or the consumption of another Somali citizen or a muslim of a foreign nationality or consumes in any form whatsoever any alcoholic beverages [417 P.C.] shall be punished with imprisonment [96 P.C.], up to four months or with fine [97 P.C.] up to Sh. So. 1,000.

(2) Where the act is committed in a public place or a place open to the public, the punishment shall be increased [118 P.C.].

Article 413: Drunkenness

(1) Whoever, in a public place or a place open to the public, is in a state of manifest drunkenness [53, 54 P.C.], shall be punished with imprisonment [46 P.C.] up to six months or with fine [97 P.C.] up to Sh. So. 2,000.

(2) The punishment shall be imprisonment [96 P.C.] from three to six months where the act is committed by a person who has previously been convicted of a crime against human life or safety committed not with "culpa" [434–444, 447–450 P.C.].

(3) The punishment shall be increased [118 P.C.], where the drunkenness is habitual [55 P.C.].

Article 414: Causing a State of Drunkenness in Other Persons

Whoever, other than in the cases referred to in article 411, in a public place or a place open to the public, causes the drunkenness [413 P.C.] of other persons by supplying alcoholic beverages [417 P.C.], shall be punished with imprisonment [96 P.C.] up to six months or with fine [97 P.C.] up to Sh. So. 2,000.

Article 415: Supply of Alcoholic Beverages to a Person in a State of Manifest Drunkenness

(1) Whoever, other than in the cases referred to in articles 411 and 414, supplies alcoholic beverages [417 P.C.] to a person in a state of manifest drunkenness [413 P.C.] shall be punished with imprisonment [96 P.C.] up to one year.

(2) Where the offender is the keeper of a public establishment for the sale of food or beverage, conviction shall entail suspension of the license [107 P.C.] or permit for running the establishment.

Article 416: Unlawful Manufacture of or Trade in Liquors or Substances Intended for the Preparation of Same

(1) Whoever, without observing the provisions of the law or the orders of the authorities, manufactures, introduces into of the territory of the State [4 Const., 4 P.C.], holds for the purpose of sale, or sells, liquors or other alcoholic beverages [46 P.C.], shall be punished with imprisonment [97 P.C.] up to one year or with fine [97 P.C.] from Sh. So. 500 to 5,000.

(2) The same punishment shall be imposed on any person who, without observing the provisions of the law or the order of the authorities, manufactures or introduces into the territory of the State [4 Const., 4 P.C.] substances intended for the preparation of liquors [417 P.C.].

Article 417: Definition

For purposes of penal law [411–416 P.C.] "alcoholic beverage" means any alcoholic beverage of a strength exceeding 3 per centum of proof spirit.

The Somali Criminal Code provides for mandatory minimum prison sentences (Articles 96, 97, 98, 109).

Release on parole, called conditional release, will be granted by the court if (a) a person sentenced for life has served twenty-five years, or (b) a person sentenced to imprisonment has served one-half of the term, and (c) a recidivist sentenced to imprisonment has served three-fourths of the punishment, provided that he has shown good behavior (Article 151).

No publicity to a conviction is provided for by the Somali Penal Code.

The category of misdemeanants appears to correspond to the categories of habitual contraveners, habitual offenders, and professional offenders or contraveners. The judge can declare an offender a habitual contravener if (a) he has been sentenced to imprisonment for three contraventions and (b) he receives a sentence for another contravention (Article 66). Likewise, the judge may declare a person a habitual offender if (a) he has committed two crimes with intent and (b) he is again convicted for a crime with intent (Article 65). If a habitual offender is convicted for another offense he shall be declared to be a professional offender or contravener (Article 67). An offender must be declared a habitual offender by law if (a) he has been sentenced, for three intentional crimes of the same kind, to an aggregate term of imprisonment not exceeding five years, provided that the crimes were committed within a period of ten years and (b) he is convicted for another intentional crime of the same kind within ten years after the last crime (Article 64).

Reasons in writing must be given for sentences imposed by the judge. A judgment is null and void if no grounds are given or if they are contradictory (Article 121 of the Criminal Procedure Code[1]).

Criminal sentences are subject to review and appeal by a higher court. The Court of Appeal may decide on the merits of the appeal and can either affirm or modify the decision appealed against, which indicates that it can raise as well as lower the sentence (Articles 228 & 229 of the Criminal Procedure Code[2]).

The government and the accused may appeal (a) against conviction or acquittal, (b) against an order that proceedings be terminated, and (c) against measures concerning personal liberty. The accused and the injured party can appeal a judgment in respect to civil damages (Article 227 of the Criminal Procedure Code[3]).

The standards for sentencing in review are contained in Articles 230–244 of the Criminal Procedure Code (see attachment to this report).[4]

Concurrent and consecutive terms of imprisonment, and the computation of terms, are controlled by the following provisions of the Somali Penal Code (Articles 44–46, 126–135).

Article 44: More than One Breach of One or Various Provisions of Law by One or More Acts

Whoever, by a single act or omission, violates various provisions of law, or commits more than one breach of the same provision of law, shall be punished, for the various offences provided for by law. In such a case, the punishments imposed in the same judgment shall be added together, subject to the maximum limits fixed by law [126–139 P.C.].

Article 45: Continuing Offence

Whoever, by more than one act or omission done with the same criminal intent, commits, at the same time or at different times, more than one breach of the same provision of law, of the same or of different gravity, shall be guilty of continuing offence. In such a case the punishment shall be that imposed in respect of the most serious of the breaches committed, increased up to threefold.

Article 46: Complex Offence

(1) The provisions of the two preceding articles [44, 45, P.C.] shall not apply when the law considers as constituent elements, or as aggravating circumstances of a single offence, acts which by themselves would constitute an offence.

(2) Whenever the law, in fixing the punishment for a complex offence, refers to the punishments prescribed in respect of the separate offences which constitute it, the maximum limits fixed by articles 133 and 134 shall not be exceeded.

Article 126: Conviction for More Than One Offence by a Single Judgment

Where, by a single judgment, an offender is convicted of more than one offence, the provisions of the following articles shall apply.

Article 127: Concurrence of Offences Punishable with Imprisonment for Life and Offences Punishable with Imprisonment

(1) Imprisonment for life [95 P.C.] shall be imposed with separate confinement during daytime for a term of not less than one year and not more than five years, where the offender is guilty of more than one crime, each of which is punishable with imprisonment for life.

(2) Where an offender is convicted of a crime punishable with imprisonment for life [95 P.C.] and one or more crimes punishable with imprisonment [96 P.C.], the punishment of imprisonment for life shall be imposed, with separate confinement during daytime for a term of not less than six months and not more than four years.

Article 128: Concurrence of Offences Punishable With Imprisonment or Pecuniary Punishments of the Same Kind

[2] Ibid., pp. 125–126.
[3] Ibid., p. 124.
[4] Ibid., pp. 126–133.

(1) Where more than one offence is punishable with imprisonment [96, 98 P.C.], a single punishment shall be imposed for a term equivalent to the total duration of the punishment which would have been imposed for the separate offences.

(2) Where there is a concurrence of more than one crime, each of which is punishable with imprisonment [96 P.C.] for not less than twenty four years, imprisonment for life [95 P.C.] shall be imposed.

(3) Pecuniary punishments [91(2) P.C.] of the same kind shall all be imposed in full.

Article 129: Concurrence of Offences Punishable With Imprisonment of Different Kinds

(1) Where more than one offence is punishable with imprisonment of a different kind [96, 98 P.C.], each punishment shall be imposed separately and in full.

(2) Imprisonment for contravention [98 P.C.] shall be executed last.

Article 130: Concurrence of Offences Punishable With Pecuniary Punishment of Different Kinds

(1) Where more than one offence is punishable with pecuniary punishments [91(2) P.C.] of different kinds, each punishment shall be imposed separately and in full.

(2) Where the pecuniary punishment [91(2) P.C.] imposed is not paid in full, the sum paid shall, for the purposes of conversion [115 P.C.], be deducted from the amount of the fine.

Article 131: Punishments Considered as a Single Punishment or as Separate Punishments

(1) Except as otherwise provided by law, the punishments of the same kind which are imposed, in accordance with article 128 shall be considered a single punishment for all legal purposes.

(2) Punishments of different kinds which are imposed in accordance with articles 129 and 130 shall likewise be considered, for all legal purposes, a single punishment of the most serious kind. They shall, however, be regarded as different punishments for the purposes of their execution, the application of security measures [161 P.C.] and for any other purpose prescribed by law.

(3) Where a pecuniary punishment [91(2) P.C.] is imposed together with another punishment of a different kind, the punishments shall be considered as separate for all legal purposes.

Article 132: Determination of Accessory Penalties

In order to determine the accessory penalties [92 P.C.] and all other penal consequences of a conviction, regard shall be had to the separate offences in respect of which an offender is convicted, and to the principal punishment [90 P.C.] which would have been imposed in respect of each of them if there had not been a concurrence of offences.

Article 133: Limits of Increase of Principal Punishments

(1) Where there is a concurrence of offences referred to in article 128, the punishment to be imposed under that article shall not be more than five times the amount of the most serious of the joint punishments, and shall not for any reason exceed:

(a) thirty years, in case of imprisonment for crimes [96 P.C.];

(b) six years, in case of imprisonment for contraventions [98 P.C.];

(c) 150,000 Sh. So., in case of fine for crimes [97 P.C.], and 30,000 Sh. So., in case of fine of contravention [97 P.C.], and 400,000 in case of fine per crimes or 80,000 Sh. So. in case of fine for contraventions, where the judge avails himself of the power specified in the third paragraph of article 97 and the second paragraph of article 99.

(2) Where there is a concurrence of offences under the terms of article 129, the duration of the punishments to be imposed under that article shall not exceed thirty years. The portion of punishment in excess of such limit shall in every case be deducted from imprisonment for contraventions [98 P.C.].

(3) Where pecuniary punishments [91(2) P.C.] are converted into imprisonment [91(1) P.C.], owing to the insolvency of the offender, the total duration of such punishment shall not exceed four years in the case of imprisonment for crimes [96 P.C.] and three years in the case of imprisonment for contraventions [98 P.C.].

Article 134: Limits of Increase of Accessory Penalties

The maximum duration of the temporary accessory penalties shall not exceed, altogether, the following limits:

(a) ten years, in cases of interdiction from public offices [101 P.C.] or from a profession or craft [103 P.C.];

(b) five years, in cases of suspension, from the exercise of a profession or craft [107 P.C.].

Article 135: Punishments Imposed by Different Sentences

The provisions of the preceding articles shall also apply where, after a conviction, the same person has to be tried for another offence committed before or after the said conviction, or where more than one sentence have to be carried out against the same person.

The Somali Criminal Code has minimum and maximum limits set for fines. In cases involving crimes motivated by gain, an additional fine specified by law may be imposed by the court. The judge may increase a fine up to three times the amount prescribed by law if it appears to him that the imposed fine is inefficient by reason of the financial situation of the offender (Article 97).

A similar minimum and maximum limit is set for contraventions. The judge may increase the prescribed fine up to three times the amount whenever it appears to be ineffective because of the financial position of the contravener (Article 99).

The maximum limit for crimes and contraventions does not apply to cases for which the law prescribes a fine in proportion to the injury (Article 100).

If a fine imposed for a crime or for a contravention cannot be collected due to insolvency, the punishment shall be converted into imprisonment for not more than three years or two years respectively. Subsequent payment of the fine, reduced by the number of days served, will extinguish the punishment (Article 113).

In regard to the equivalence between fine and detentive punishment, the Criminal Code establishes a fixed amount, which is a "day fine" of 25 Somali Shillings (Sh. So.), established for conversion purposes (Article 112).

QUESTION 10

A mistake of fact as to the act constituting the offense precludes punishment. This rule does not apply if the mistake is a result of negligence and if the fact constitutes a crime committed with negligence.

Mistake of law other than the criminal law excludes liability to punishments (Article 28). This rule also applies if the mistake of fact is caused by deceit committed by another person (Article 29).

QUESTION 11

The Somali Penal Code does not contain provisions on the differentiation between crime and jurisdiction.

QUESTION 12

In regard to offenses committed abroad, the Somali Penal Code provides for their punishment without exception, when they are committed by nationals or foreigners, and when they involve (a) crimes against the personality of the State involving external and internal security, political rights, and foreign states and their heads and representatives (Articles 184–239); (b) crimes of counterfeiting the seal of the State or using such counterfeited seal (Article 360); (c) crimes of counterfeiting legal tender (Article 348); (d) crimes committed by public officers through abuse of power or violation of duties (Articles 240–262); and finally (e) any other offenses provided for by law or international conventions (Article 7).

In addition, the Somali Criminal Code provides for offenses committed abroad punishable under certain conditions. These provisions require that they involve (a) a crime which is also an offense in the country of commission, (b) that a complaint is made by the injured party when required by law, (c) that the accused is found in the territory of the State when the complaint is made or when the penal proceedings are instituted, (d) extradition has not been granted or agreed to, and (e) prosecution has been authorized when needed (Article 8).

Except for the cases specified in the above article 7, crimes committed abroad cannot be prosecuted again in Somali territory when the offender has been acquitted abroad or when he has been convicted and has served his sentence there (Article 9).

The Somali Criminal Code distinguishes between conspiracy by agreement (Article 232) and conspiracy by association (Article 233). In both cases, conspiracy must be based on a plan to commit crimes against the external security of the State (Articles 184–216) and against the internal security of the State (Articles 217–225).

Conspiracy by agreement is committed by two or more persons and is punished with imprisonment from one to six years. For promoters, punishment shall be increased up to one third. In all cases it is, however, limited to less than one half of the penalty prescribed for the consummated crime involved (Articles 232 and 118).

Conspiracy by association must involve three or more persons associated for the purpose of committing the illegal act. Those who promote, constitute, organize or direct the association are punished with imprisonment from five to twelve years. The sole act of participation in the association is punishable with imprisonment from two to eight years. When the association aims at two or more crimes, punishment must be increased by one third (Articles 233 and 118).

Exemption from punishment is granted in conspiracy cases to those promoters who have dissolved the agreement or the association prior to arrest or prior to the institution of criminal proceedings. Exemption is also granted to those participants who have withdrawn from the agreement or association under the same conditions (Article 235).

Should the act of conspiracy be considered by the judge "of slight importance," he can reduce the penalty (Article 238).

Foreigners sentenced to imprisonment for conspiracy shall be expelled after serving the sentence (Article 239).

QUESTION 14

The Somali Penal Code provides for felony murder in the case of preterintentional homicide, that is, homicide beyond intent, when death is caused in the process of committing assault and injury. Punishment ranges from ten to fifteen years (Articles 441, 439, & 440).

In all other cases of preterintentional death caused as a consequence of another crime committed with intent by law, the provisions governing death caused by negligence are applicable and punishment shall be increased but shall not exceed the aggregate of twelve years (Articles 447 and 445).

QUESTION 15

Since Somalia is not a federal state the problem of concurrent or exclusive jurisdiction does nor arise.

QUESTION 16

Para-Military activities are not sanctioned by a special text of the Code.

QUESTION 17

The Somali Penal Code contains several offenses without victims. The consent of the injured party is controlled by the general principle of the following text of Article 32:

Whoever injures or places in jeopardy a right, with the consent of the person who can legitimately dispose of it, shall not be liable to punishment.

There are, however, several exceptions provided for by other provisions, as indicated in the following cases.

QUESTION 17–A—DRUGS

Whoever services another person, with his consent, narcotics which deprive him of his consciousness or will, shall be punished with imprisonment from one to six months or with a fine, provided that the act results in danger to the victim. If this is done by a physician for scientific or curative purposes the offense is not considered a contravention (Article 563). If the result is death or injury, the act is considered death caused by negligence or injury caused by negligence (Articles 445 and 446).

Supplying poisonous or harmful substances to a minor under fourteen, with or without prescription, even by a person authorized to sell or trade in pharmaceutical products, is punishable with a fine (Article 565).

QUESTION 17–B ABORTION

Causing abortion, even with the consent of the victim, is considered a crime and is punished with imprisonment from one to five years. The same punishment is imposed on the victim (article 419).

Instigating to abortion by administering the appropriate means is punished with imprisonment from six months to two years (Article 420).

Death caused in cases of abortion with consent is punished with imprisonment from ten to fifteen years. When injury results, the same type of punishment ranges from three to eight years (Article 421).

Where abortion with consent is committed for reasons of honor of the victim or of a near relative, punishment shall be reduced by one half to two thirds (Article 422).

QUESTION 17–C—GAMBLING

Gambling is considered a contravention. Holding or facilitating the conduct of games of chance in a public place or a place open to the public, as well as in private clubs of any kind, attracts imprisonment from three months to one year and a fine (Article 553).

Punishment shall be doubled when the act is committed in a public establishment where there are heavy stakes in the game and where persons under fourteen participate (Article 554).

Persons participating in the game in public places or private clubs who are apprehended while taking part in the game are punished with imprisonment up to six months or with a fine. The punishment will be increased when the offense is detected by surprise inspection in a gambling house or in a public establishment where the game is played for high stakes (Article 555).

QUESTION 17–D—PROSTITUTION

The practice of prostitution in any form is considered as one of the crimes against morals and decency, and is punished with imprisonment from two months to five years and with a fine. If committed by a married woman the penalty is increased (Article 405).

QUESTION 17–E—HOMOSEXUALITY

Homosexuality as carnal intercourse with a person of the same sex is punished with imprisonment from three months to three years, provided that the act does not constitute a more serious crime (Article 409). The offense may also attract the imposition of an additional security measure consisting of police surveillance (Articles 410, 161 and 172).

QUESTION 17–F—OBSCENITY

The manufacture, possession, import, export, or putting into circulation of any obscene publication or object for commercial purposes, or distribution, or public exhibition, is punished with imprisonment from three months to three years and with a fine. The same penalty applies to secret trading, distribution and exhibition of such articles. Persons assisting by means of publicity are subject to the same punishment. Giving public theatrical or cinematographic performances or other public performances with an obscene character aggravate the above punishment (Article 403).

QUESTION 18

The unlawful manufacturing, possession, trade and transport of explosive materials and substances is considered a contravention against public safety and is punished with imprisonment up to six months and with a fine (Article

530). This subject is governed by the Public Order Law No. 21 of August 26, 1963. Therefore, this special law takes precedence over the general provisions of the Criminal Code (Articles 13 and 14).[1]

Failure to keep arms in custody, even by licensed persons, also constitutes a contravention and punished with fine up to 1,000 Somali Shillings when (a) delivered to minors under the age of fourteen, to incapable or inexperienced persons, (b) neglected to be kept in a safe place, and (c) carried loaded in public places (Article 539).

Failure by the holder to declare explosive materials is also punished with imprisonment up to four months or with a fine. Any person who has knowledge about such materials and fails to declare them is liable to a fine (Article 531).

The punishments shall be increased if the unlawful manufacturing or failure to declare was committed by persons barred from obtaining a license, or where such license was refused or withdrawn (Article 532).

QUESTION 19

Capital punishment is one of the principal penalties of the Somali Penal Code (Articles 90 & 94). It is limited in its application to twenty offenses involving the following categories: (a) serious crimes against the personality of the Somali State such as high treason (Article 184), bearing arms against the State (Article 185), favoring the enemy in time of war (Article 190), serious destruction or sabotage of military works (Article 196), suppression, falsification or purloining of papers or documents concerning the security of the State which seriously affects military preparation and operations (Article 198), procuring information regarding the security of the State which seriously affects the military preparation or operations (Article 199), political and military espionage in the interest of a state at war with Somalia, where the act seriously affects military preparation and operations (Article 200), espionage concerning information the disclosure of which has been prohibited, where the act has seriously affected military preparation and operations (Article 201), disclosure of State secrets for purposes of political or military espionage, where the act is committed in time or war or has seriously affected military preparation and operations (Article 204), disclosure of information the divulgation of which has been prohibited, where the act is committed for purposes of political or military espionage in time of war or has seriously affected military preparation and operations (Article 205), utilization of State secrets, such as scientific invention or discoveries of new industrial devices, where the act is committed in the interest of a state at war with Somalia, or where it seriously affected military preparation or operations (Article 206), armed insurrection against the powers of the State (Article 221), devastation, pillage and slaughter for political purposes (Article 222), civil war (Article 223), unlawfully taking and exercising political powers or military command in time of war, where the act has seriously affected the outcome of military operations (Article 224); (b) serious crimes against human life such as massacre (Article 329), causing an epidemic by diffusing noxious germs resulting in death (Article 334), pollution of water and food resulting in death (Article 335), murder (Article 434) except infanticide for reasons of honor (Articles 435 and 443), and, finally, death caused to a consenting person, when committed against a minor under the age of eighteen, against an insane person, and if consent has been obtained by violence, threat, suggestion, or fraud (Article 436).

No separate proceedings are provided for determining the sentence in capital cases nor are separate hearings authorized for that purpose by the Somali Criminal Code.

QUESTION 20

In the case of joinder of offenses, that is, if one person is charged with more than one offense and if the same offense was committed by more than one person, the competent court may, upon request of the prosecution, the defense, or on its own motion, order that the offense be tried separately for reasons of convenience (Article 6 of the Criminal Procedure Code).[2]

Prosecution is barred by a former prosecution which resulted in a final conviction or acquittal, or in a lawful order not to prosecute the case, provided that the charges involve the same person and the same facts, even if those facts can be regarded as constituting a different offense, except in the following cases.

(a) The accused can be charged again if the act constitutes a different and more serious crime than that for which he has already been found guilty and if this was not known to the court (Article 13 of the Criminal Procedure Code.)[1]

(b) Even if orders to close the case, which are by law equivalent to a judgment, have become irrevocable, penal action can be instituted again if the orders were based on death reported by error, on the lack of private complaint, or on lack of authorization to prosecute, which are subsequently granted (Article 77 of the Criminal Procedure Code).[2]

SECTION II—HEARING OF THE APPEAL

Article 230

Procedure of Court of First Instance to apply to Court of Appeal. Preliminaries to Hearing of Appeal

1. Insofar as applicable, the provisions relating to the hearing of a case in a Court of first instance shall be followed in the hearing of an appeal.

2. When an appeal has to be heard, the President of a Court of Appeal shall:

(a) fix the date of the hearing;

(b) order the appearance:

(i) of the accused who appeals, and

(ii) of an accused who has not appealed, if the appeal has been made by the Attorney General or is made with regard to one of the cases provided for in Article 217;

(c) appoint Counsel for the accused in the cases provided for in sub-paragraph b) of paragraph 2 of Article 14 of the Law on the Organization of the Judiciary, when the accused is without Counsel. The Court shall arrange to inform the accused and his Counsel of such appointment;

(d) order that the injured party be summoned to appear before the Court, if the injured party or the accused has appealed against the judgment concerning civil damages;

(e) order that the Attorney General be duly notified.

3. The date of the hearing shall be notified to the accused and brought to the notice of this Counsel and of the Attorney General at least 15 days before the hearing.

4. Insofar as applicable, the provisions of paragraph 5 of Article 80 and of Article 89 shall be observed.

Article 231

Hearing of the Appeal

1. After the opening of the hearing of the appeal, first the appellant shall explain the grounds for his appeal, then the other party shall be given the opportunity to reply. Both parties may make comments and observations, raising objections and presenting requests and petitions which they deem pertinent, and expressing their views on the points of fact and law, which in the opinion the Courts should accept. The right to reply shall be exercised only with the consent of the Court. If an appeal has been made in the same case by both the accused and the Attorney General, the appeal of the accused shall be heard last.

Insofar as applicable, the provisions of Article 119 shall apply.

[2] Ibid., p. 48.

2. If the appeal is against a conviction or an acquittal and the Court does not consider itself able to reach a decision upon the available evidence, the Court may, even on its own motion, order:

(a) the re-hearing before it, in whole or in part, of the trial;

(b) the examination of witnesses heard in the trial of first instance, who may testify even with respect to matters not previously considered;

(c) the taking of new evidence;

(d) the re-hearing of expert witnesses.

3. If the appeal is against an order that the proceedings be terminated and the Court of Appeal considers that there are valid grounds for the appeal, the Court of Appeal shall set aside the impugned order and shall either try the case itself, in accordance with the provisions of Book Two of this Code, or remand the case for trial to the Court which passed the impugned order.

CHAPTER III—APPEALS TO THE SUPREME COURT

Article 232

Matters against which Appeal may be made to the Supreme Court

1. In addition to cases established by special provision, and subject to the provisions of Chapter 1 of this Part, an appeal may be lodged with the Supreme Court:

(a) by the parties specified in paragraph 2 of Article 227 against any acts and decisions referred to therein when handed down by a Court of second instance;

(b) by the accused or by the Attorney General against any other decision handed down in an appellate proceedings, or against any other decision concerning which appeal to the Court of Appeal is not permissible.

2. An appeal shall be admissible only on the following questions of law:

(a) lack of jurisdiction or incompetence of the lower Court;

(b) violation or erroneous application of legal provisions;

(c) nullity of the judgment or the proceedings;

(d) omission, insufficiency or contradiction in the grounds on which the judgment is based, relating to a material point raised by either party or by the Court on its own motion.

Article 233

Decision by the Supreme Court

1. The Supreme Court, depending on the particular case, shall decide in one of the following ways:

(a) if the appeal is against a judgment, it shall, after a hearing in open Court, in accordance with Article 234:

(i) reject the appeal and make any necessary corrections in any errors of law in the grounds given and errors in the provisions of law referred to in the judgment, provided that such errors did not influence the dispositive part of the judgment;

(ii) set aside the judgment appealed against and remand the case to the competent court;

(iii) set aside the judgment appealed against without remanding the case to any other Court in those cases in which a sentence of conviction could not have been passed or in which no criminal proceedings could have been started or continued;

(iv) set aside in whole or in part the judgment appealed against; where no additional evidence is required, decide on the merits and where additional evidence is required, remand the case to the Court that pronounced the judgment appealed against;

(b) if an appeal is against an order issued during the trial that the proceedings be terminated, the Court shall, after a hearing in open Court, in accordance with Article 234:

(i) reject the appeal;

(ii) set aside the order appealed against, and insofar as applicable, observe the provisions of the preceding sub-paragraph;

(c) in every other case, it shall proceed in the manner laid down in the preceding sub-paragraph, reaching its decision in chambers, in accordance with paragraph 2 of Article 225.

2. Judgments of the Supreme Court shall be drawn up in writing by the President of the Court or by another member of the Bench.

3. The provisions of paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 229 shall apply, insofar as applicable.

Article 234

Hearing of the Appeal in Open Court

When the appeal is to be heard in open Court, the provisions of Article 230 and of paragraph 1 of Article 231 shall be observed, insofar as applicable.

Article 235

Appeal against Decisions given by a Court re-hearing a case remanded by the Supreme Court

1. The Court to which a case has been remanded for re-hearing shall comply with the findings of the Supreme Court with respect to all questions decided by it.

2. When a Court re-hears a case remanded to it by the Supreme Court, an appeal may be lodged against the new judgment only with respect to those parts which have not already been decided by the Supreme Court. But an appeal may also be lodged when the Court which re-hears the case fails to comply with the provisions of the preceding paragraph.

Article 236

No Appeal to lie against Decision of the Supreme Court

No appeal shall lie against any decision of the Supreme Court with regard to criminal matters.

CHAPTER IV—REVISION

Article 237

Cases Subject to Revision

When a conviction has become final, and even when the punishment has been served or has become extinct, revision may be allowed in favour of the convicted person at any time with regard to those cases coming within the provisions of Article 238.

Article 238

Instances in which a Case is subject to Revision

1. Revision may be sought:

(a) if after the conviction new facts or new evidence have occurred or been discovered, which either separately or in connection with facts or evidence already considered at the trial, clearly establish that the offense was not committed or that it was not the accused who committed it;

(b) if it is shown that the conviction was the result of some false act or document or the result of another act which the law considers an offense, provided that a final conviction has been pronounced as a result of such false acts or document or such other offense;

(c) if the findings on which the conviction is based are incompatible with those of another final penal conviction.

2. Every petition for re-trial shall be based on facts or evidence which, if established, demonstrate that:

(a) an offense was not committed, or that, if it was committed, it was not the accused who committed it, or

(b) there was no evidence whatsoever that an offense was committed or that, if it was committed, it was not the accused who committed it.

Otherwise the petition shall not be admissible.

Article 239

Persons who may seek Revision and Petition for Revision

1. Revision may be sought by:
(a) the convicted person;
(b) the Attorney General;
(c) the «descendants», «ascendants», or the spouse of the convicted person if the convicted person has died.
2. A petition for revision may be submitted in person or through a special representative and shall be presented, together with supporting documentation, to the Registrar of the Supreme Court.

Article 240

Preliminary Proceedings

1. The President of the Supreme Court, having received the petition and relevant documents, shall convene the Court in chambers, and decide as a preliminary matter whether the application for revision is admissible.
2. If the requisites for filing a petition are lacking or if the petition appears obviously unfounded, the Court shall declare the petition inadmissible. If the Court does consider the application to be admissible, it shall proceed in accordance with Article 241.

Article 241

Hearing in Open Court

1. If the Supreme Court allows the petition, the proceedings shall take place in open Court, in the manner provided in Article 234.
2. The Supreme Court:
(a) if it finds that the facts and evidence show that the petition is well-founded, shall set aside the conviction;
(b) if it finds that further investigations are necessary, shall provisionally set aside the conviction and refer the case to the competent Court which shall try the case in the normal way;
(c) in any other case, shall reject the petition.

Article 242

Procedure when Conviction is set aside

The Supreme Court, when it sets aside a conviction without remanding to a lower Court, or a Court to which a case has been remanded, when either Court gives judgment of acquittal, shall also order the restitution of the fines or damages paid as a consequence of the conviction.

Article 243

Damages

1. A convicted person who has been acquitted as a result of a revision proceedings may submit an application to the Supreme Court for the payment of damages by the State.
2. The Supreme Court shall decide in chambers on whether damages should be granted and on the amount. The Court shall take into account the material and moral damages suffered by the convicted person as a consequence of the judgment set aside.
3. The State may recover costs, within the limits of the law, from any person who with criminal intent caused the wrongful conviction.

Article 244

Appeal against Judgment in a Remanded Proceedings

1. The Attorney General may appeal against a judgment of acquittal given by a Court to which a case has been remanded.

2. There shall be no appeal against a judgment of conviction by the Court referred to in paragraph 1.

3. In all cases, a petition for another revision proceedings may be made if the application is based on different facts and evidence.

THAILAND

1. The Thai Penal Code consists of three books. Book I is on General Provisions; Book II on Specific Offenses; Book III on Petty Offenses. Sentences are dealt with as each offense is described.

2. The Code does not leave blank numbers for future sections. When amended, if such amendations necessitate additional sections, the Thai practice is to use bis, tres, quattuor, etc., after the number of the preceding section.

3. The Code establishes two kinds of criminal culpability:

Section 59.—A person shall be criminally liable only when he commits an act intentionally, except in the case where he is made liable by provisions of law for an act done by negligence, or except in the case where he is specifically made liable for an act done unintentionally.

To do an act intentionally is to do an act consciously, and at the same time the doer desired or could have foreseen the effect of such doing.

If the doer does not know the fact constituting an offense, it cannot be deemed that he desired or could have foreseen the effect of such doing.

To do an act by negligence is to commit an offense unintentionally but without exercising such care as might be expected from a person under such conditions and circumstances, and the doer could exercise such care but did not do so sufficiently.

5. The Thai Penal Code provides for an insanity defense to criminal charges. It states as below:

Section 65.—Whenever any person commits an offense at the time of not being able to appreciate the nature of illegality of his act or not being able to control himself on account of defective mind, mental disease or mental infirmity, such person shall not be punished for such offense.

But, if the offender is partially able to appreciate the nature of illegality of his act, or is partially able to control himself, he shall be punished for such offense, but the Court may inflict less punishment to any extent than that provided by the law for such offense.

Section 48 provides for hospitalization of a person raising insanity as a defense, whether or not he is found to be unpunishable. It states:

Section 48.—If the Court is of opinion that the liberation of any person having a defective mind, mental disease, or mental infirmity who is not punishable, or whose punishment is reduced according to Section 65 will not be safe for the public, the Court may give order to send him to be put under restraint in a hospital. This order may, however, be revoked at any time by the Court.

No information is available on the procedural aspects of the insanity defense, i.e. how the insanity is proved. The defendant, found not guilty by reason of insanity, is not automatically committed, as shown by Section 48 above.

6. Intoxication is dealt with below:

Section 66.—Intoxication on account of taking liquor or any other intoxicant may not be raised as an excuse under Section 65, except where such intoxication is caused without the knowledge or against the will of the offender, and he has committed the offense at the time of not being able to appreciate the nature or illegality of his act or not being able to control himself, he shall then be exempted from the punishment for such offense. But, if he is partially able to appreciate the nature or illegality of his act, or is partially able to control himself, the Court may inflict less punishment to any extent than that provided by the law for such offense.

Section 49 provides for both alcoholic and drug intoxication to be taken into consideration in suspending the determination of infliction of punishment provided he will not take the drink or harmful habit-forming drug within a period of two years.

7. On self-defense and the use of force, Sections 67, 68, 69, and 72 state:

Section 67.—A person shall not be punished for committing any offense on account of necessity:

(1) when such person is under compulsion or under the influence of a force such that he cannot avoid or resist; or

(2) when such person acts in order to avoid the infliction upon himself or any other person of an imminent and irreparable danger which could not be otherwise avoided and which he did not cause to exist through his own fault; provided that no more is done than is reasonably necessary under the circumstances.

Section 68.—Whenever any person is bound to commit any act for the defense of his own right or right of any other person against a danger occurring from act of violence which violates the law, and such danger is an imminent one, such act, if reasonable committed under the circumstances, is a lawful defense, and he shall not be guilty.

Section 69.—In the case provided in Sections 67 and 68, if the act committed is in excess of what is reasonable under the circumstances or in excess of what is necessary, or in excess of what is necessary for the defense, the Court may inflict less punishment to any extent than that provided by the law for such offense. But, if the act occurs out of excitement, fright or fear, the Court may not inflict any punishment at all.

Section 72.—Whenever any person commits any offense at the time of grave, injust and sudden provocation against the provoker, the Court may inflict upon such person less punishment to any extent than that provided by the law for such offense.

The Thai Code in its Section 68, like the U.S. Draft Code, permits the use of force to protect oneself from harm or danger which is imminent; also justified is an act committed through necessity. Even excessive force, according to Section 69, is excusable if provoked by excitement, fright or fear. The rules are far from being as detailed as those provided by the U.S. Draft.

8. Under the Thai Code, offenses are classified into only two categories: offenses, and petty offenses. The classification is for the purpose of sentencing, since a petty offense is defined in Section 102 as being one punishable with imprisonment of not exceeding one month or with fine of not exceeding one thousand baht, or with both imprisonment and fine as aforesaid together. Also, according to Sections 104, 105, 106, petty offenses are punishable, even though not committed intentionally, but attempts to commit a petty offense are not punishable, neither are supporters to a petty offense.

9. Under the U.S. Code, authorized sentences consist of imprisonment and fine, apart from civil penalties authorized by law. The Thai Code provides for a wider range of options, ranging from death, through imprisonment, confinement, and fine, to forfeiture of property. Five measures of safety are also imposable: relegation, prohibition from entering a specific area; execution of a bond with security for keeping the peace; restraint in a hospital; and prohibition from carrying on certain occupations.

Section 56 provides for suspension of imposition of sentence as well as for suspension of execution of sentence. The section reads thus:

Section 56.—Whenever the punishment to be inflicted in the case by the Court on any person committing an offense punishable with imprisonment does not exceed two years, if it does not appear that he has undergone the punishment of imprisonment previously, or it appears that he has undergone the punishment of imprisonment previously, but is the punishment for an offense committed by negligence or for a petty offense, the Court may, when taking into consideration the age, past record, behaviour, intelligence, education and training, health, condition of the mind, habit, occupation and environment of the offender or the nature of the offense, or other extenuating circumstances, pass judgment, if it thinks fit, that he is guilty, but the determination of the punishment is to be suspended, or the punishment is determined, but the infliction of the punishment is to be suspended, and he shall be released with or without conditions for controlling his behaviour so as to give him an opportunity to reform himself within a period of time to be determined by the Court, but it shall not exceed five years as from the day on which the Court passes judgment.

Regarding the conditions for controlling the behaviour of the offender, the Court may determine one or more conditions as follows:

(1) To report himself to the official specified by the Court from time to time so that the official may make inquiries, give advice, assistance or admonition on the behaviour and the carrying on of occupation as he thinks fit;

(2) To be trained or to carry on occupation substantially;

(3) To refrain from going into society or from any behaviour which may lead to the commission of the same offense again.

Regarding any conditions determined by the Court according to the foregoing paragraph, if, afterwards, it appears to the Court from the submission of the offender, his legal representative or guardian, the Public Prosecutor or the official that the circumstances relating to the control of the behaviour of the offender have changed, the Court may, if it thinks fit, modify or revoke any of the conditions, or it may determine in addition any of the conditions mentioned in the foregoing paragraph which is not yet determined.

The provision in the above section regarding conditions for controlling the behavior of the offender might be regarded as probation, i.e. it is a form of suspension of sentence. There are no provisions for supervision other than the requirement in (1) above for periodic reports to a specified official.

The Thai Criminal Procedure Code provides for suspension of execution of imprisonment:

Section 246.—Execution of imprisonment may be suspended until the cause of suspension has ceased, in the following cases:

(1) When the accused is insane;

(2) When it is feared that the life of the accused will be endangered by imprisonment;

(3) If the accused is pregnant for seven months or over;

(4) If the accused has given birth to a child and a period of one month has not yet elapsed.

Section 247.—In the case where the accused has been sentenced to death, the sentence shall not be executed until the provisions of this Code governing pardon have been complied with.

If a woman sentenced to death is found to be with child, execution of the sentence shall be suspended until after her delivery.

The execution shall take place at such time and place as the authorities think fit.

Section 248.—If a person sentenced to death becomes insane before being executed, the execution shall be suspended until such person has recovered. Pending the suspension, the Court may apply Section 46 paragraph 2 of the Penal Code.

If the insane person recovers after one year from the date when the judgment became final, the punishment of death shall be commuted to imprisonment for life.

Determinate sentences of imprisonment are imposed.

According to Section 41, any person who has been sentenced to relegation, or has been sentenced to imprisonment of not less than six months for not less than twice, for certain specified offences and, within ten years from the day of having passed the relegation or the punishment commits any of the specified offences again, may be regarded as a habitual criminal, and may be sentenced to relegation.

Prison sentences for a group of crimes, e.g. internal security (called national security under the U.S. Draft Code) compare as follows: Under the Thai Code (Sections 113-118) death is the penalty for using violence or threatening to use violence to overthrow or change the Constitution, to overthrow the legislative power, executive power, or the judicial power of the Constitution, or nullify it, or to separate the Kingdom or seize the power of administration in any part thereof, any of which is termed insurrection.

The next category, punishable with imprisonment of three to fifteen years, is the collection of forces or arms, or other preparations or conspiracy to commit insurrection, or any offence which part of a plot to commit, or instigating people to commit, or any act to assist in keeping secret any intention to commit, such offence.

Up to ten years imprisonment is prescribed for the instigation of any members of the armed forces or police force to desert or not to perform his duties, or to commit mutiny, if committed for the purpose of undermining the discipline and efficiency of the armed forces or police force. Without this purpose in mind, the offence carries a penalty of up to five years imprisonment only. Words or writing used to bring about a change in the laws of the country or the government by the use of force or violence (if not an act within the intention of the Constitution or an act made for expression of an honest opinion or criticism), or used to raise unrest and disaffection in a manner likely to cause disturbance, or to make people transgress the laws of the country, is punishable with imprisonment not exceeding seven years.

On comparing the above offences and penalties with the section in the U.S. Draft Code on armed insurrection, it has engaging in such insurrection classed as a Class B felony, while leading it is a Class A felony, and advocating it a Class C felony. Paramilitary activities constitute either a Class B or a Class C felony. Causing insubordination in the armed forces constitutes a Class B or a Class C felony. Advocating armed insurrection is a Class C felony.

Sentences under both the Codes are thus quite comparable, with the exception of the Thai Code penalty for armed insurrection, which is death, while under the U.S. Draft Code, leading such an insurrection is a Class A felony, but merely engaging in it will constitute only a Class B felony.

Mandatory minimum prison sentences are prescribed in some, not all, offences.

There is no equivalent to proposed Section 3007 in the U.S. Draft Code for organizations convicted of an offence.

Giving publicity to a conviction is not used as a sanction or sentence under the Thai Code.

The only equivalent would be the habitual criminal provision mentioned above, Section 41, but these are all serious crimes, not misdemeanors.

The Thai Criminal Procedure Code provides:

Section 183.—A judgment, order or dissenting opinion shall be made in writing and signed by the judges who sat in the case. Any such judge disagreeing with the judgment or order may give a dissenting opinion which shall be attached to the file.

Section 186.—A judgment or order shall contain at least the following essentials:

(1) the name of the Court and the date;
(2) the names of the parties in the case;
(3) the offence;
(4) the charge and the statement of defense.
(5) the facts as found in the trial;
(6) the grounds for decision both on questions of fact and of law;
(7) the provisions of law applying to the case;
(8) the decision dismissing the charge or convicting the accused;
(9) the decision of the Court as to the exhibits, or as to the civil claim.

Judgments relating to petty offences need not contain the essentials as provided in sub-sections 4, 5, and 6.

Sentences are subject to review on appeal to a higher court. The appeal court may enhance the punishment. Any party may appeal a sentence.

Two sections of the Penal Code treat multiple offences:

Section 90.—Whenever one and the same act is an offence violating several provisions of the law, the provision prescribing the severest punishment shall apply to inflict the punishment upon the offender.

Section 91.—When the Court is to pass judgment inflicting punishment upon any person, it appears that he has committed several distinct offences, the Court may inflict upon such person the punishment prescribed for the severest offence only, provided that, in no case, the aggregate term of imprisonment, unless it be imprisonment for life, shall exceed twenty years.

Regarding the collection of fines, the Thai Penal Code provides as below:

Section 29.—If a person inflicted with the punishment of fine fails to pay the fine within thirty days as from the day on which the judgment is passed, his property shall be seized to pay for the fine, or else he shall be confined in lieu of fine. But, if the Court has reasonable cause to suspect that he is likely to evade the payment of the fine, the Court may order him to find security, or it may order him to be confined in lieu of fine for the time being.

10. Mistake of law is no defense in Thai law. Mistake of fact is provided for in Section 62, which states:

Section 62.—Whenever any fact, if really existing, will cause the doing of any act not to be an offence or the doer not to be punishable, or to receive less punishment, or even though such fact does not really exist, but the doer understands mistakenly that it really exists, the doer, in such cases, shall not be guilty, or shall be exempted from the punishment, or shall receive less punishment, as the case may be.

If the ignorance of fact according to the third paragraph of Section 59, or the mistake as to the existence of fact according to the first paragraph occurs through the offender's negligence, he shall be liable for committing the offence by negligence in the case where the law specfically provides that the doer shall be criminally liable for the act though committed by negligence.

A person shall receive heavier punishment on account of any fact only when he must have known of such fact.

12. Section 8 of the Thai Penal Code has to do with offences committed outside the country. According to this section, if the offender is a Thai, there must be a request for punishment by the government of the country where the offence occurred or by the injured person: if the offender is an alien, the Thai government or a Thai must be injured, and there must be a request for punishment by the injured person. Also, the offence committed has to be one of a specified list, e.g. offences endangering public safety.

13. Section 209 and 210 deal with criminal conspiracy:

Section 209.—Whoever is a member of a body of persons the proceedings of which are secret and the aim of which is unlawful, is said to be a member of a secret society, and shall be punished with imprisonment not exceeding seven years and fine not exceeding fourteen thousand baht.

If the offender be the chief, manager or office-bearer in that body of persons, he shall be punished with imprisonment not exceeding ten years and fine not exceeding twenty thousand baht.

Section 210.—Whenever five persons upwards conspire to commit any offence provided in this Book II and punishable with maximum imprisonment of one year upwards, every such person is said to be a member of a criminal association, and shall be punished with imprisonment not exceeding five years or fine not exceeding ten housand baht, or both.

If it be a conspiracy to commit an offence punishable with death or imprisonment for life or imprisonment from ten years upwards, the offender shall be punished with imprisonment of two years to ten years and fine of four thousand baht to twenty thousand baht.

Sections 211 and 212 contain further provisions regarding those attending meetings of a secret society or criminal association, and those aiding such a body. Section 213 makes everyone present at the commission of the offence, or anyone present at any meeting where the commission of such offence was decided upon liable to the punishment for such offence.

14. The only provision similar to what is termed a "felony-murder" would be Section 289, which states inter alia that whoever commits murder on any other person for the purpose of preparing or facilitating the commission of any other offence shall be punished with death.

16. Section 114 deals with para-military activities, stating:

Whoever collects forces or arms, or otherwise makes preparations or conspires to commit insurrection, or commits any offence which is part of the plot to commit insurrection, or instigates the people to commit insurrection, or does any act to assist in keeping secret any intention to commit such offence shall be punished with imprisonment of three years to fifteen years.

17. Crimes relating to drugs are dealt with by the Dangerous Drugs Act, and not within the Penal Code itself.

Abortion is dealt with in Sections 301 through 305 of the Penal Code, as below:

Section 301.—Any woman who causes abortion for herself, or allows any other person to procure abortion for her shall be punished with imprisonment not exceeding three years or fine not exceeding six thousand baht, or both.

Section 302.—Whoever procures abortion for any women with her consent shall be punished with imprisonment not exceeding five years or fine not exceeding ten thousand baht, or both.

If such act causes other grievous bodily harm to the woman, the offender shall be punished with imprisonment not exceeding seven years or fine not exceeding fourteen thousand baht, or both.

If such act causes death to the woman, the offender shall be punished with imprisonment not exceeding ten years and fine not exceeding twenty thousand baht.

Section 303.—Whoever procures abortion for any woman without her consent shall be punished with imprisonment not exceeding seven years or fine not exceeding fourteen thousand baht, or both.

If such act causes other grievous bodily harm to the woman, the offender shall be punished with imprisonment of one year to ten years and fine of two thousand baht to twenty thousand baht.

If such act causes death to the woman, the offender shall be punished with imprisonment of five years to twenty years and fine of ten thousand baht to forty thousand baht.

Section 304.—Whoever attempts to commit the offence according to Section 301 or 302, first paragraph, shall not be punished.

Section 305.—If the offence mentioned in Section 301 and Section 302 be committed by a medical practitioner, and (1) it is necessary for the sake of the women's health or (2) the woman is pregnant of account of the offence mentioned in Section 276, Section 277, Section 282, Section 283, or Section 284 [the offences mentioned in these sections are those of rape, intercourse with a girl not over thirteen years of age, etc.] having been committed the offender is not guilty.

Prostitution: While prostitution itself is not an offence under the Code, Section 286 makes any man over sixteen years of age subsisting on the earnings of a prostitute punishable with imprisonment not exceeding three years or fine not exceeding six thousand baht or both.

Obscenity:

Section 287.—Whoever—

(1) for the purpose of trade or by trade, for public distribution or exhibition, makes, produces, possesses, brings or causes to be brought into the Kingdom, sends or causes to be sent out of the Kingdom, takes away or causes to be taken away, or circulates by any means whatever, any document, drawing, print, painting, printed matter, picture, poster, symbol, photograph, cinematograph film or any other thing which is obscene;

(2) carries on trade, or takes part or participates in the trade concerning the aforesaid obscene material or thing, or distributes or exhibits to the public, or hires out such material or thing;

(3) in order to assist in the circulation or trading of the aforesaid obscene material or thing, propagates or spreads the news by any means whatever that there is a person committing the act which is an offence according to this Section or propagates or spreads the news that the aforesaid obscene material or thing may be obtained from which person or by what means shall be punished with imprisonment not exceeding six months or fine not exceeding one thousand baht, or both.

18. The Thai Penal Code does not deal specifically with firearms and explosives. Section 114 (described under Question 9 above) makes illegal the collection of arms for the purpose of committing insurrection.

19. Capital punishment is provided for a number of offences:

Section 107: Causing death to the King, or attempts to cause death.

Section 108: Act of violence against the King or His liberty (death or imprisonment for life).

Section 109: causing death to the Queen, Heir-apparent, or Regent; also attempts.

Section 110: Act of violence against the Queen or Her liberty, against the Heir-apparent or His liberty, or against the Regent or his liberty if such act is likely to endanger life (death of imprisonment for life).

Section 113: Violence or the threat of violence used to overthrow or change the Consitution and other such offences against the internal security of the state (death or imprisonment for life)

Section 119: Act with intent to subject the country or any part of it to the sovereignty of a foreign State, or to deteriorate the independence of the State (death or imprisonment for life)

Section 121: A Thai bearing arms in battle against the country, or participating as an enemy of the country (death or imprisonment for life)

Section 132: Causing death, or attempts to cause death, to the Sovereign, Queen or Consort, Heir-apparent, Head of a friendly foreign state, or a foreign Representative accredited to the Court of Thailand (death or imprisonment for life).

Section 288: Murder (death, imprisonment for life, or imprisonment for fifteen to twenty years)

Section 289: Murder of an ascendant [an official excising his duties, persons assisting an official, of any person by pre-meditation, any person by employing torture or acts of cruelty; for the purpose of facilitating or preparing the commission of any other offence; or for the purpose of securing the benefit obtained through any other offence, or for concealing or escaping punishment for any other offence committed by him.

20. Section 24 of the Thai Criminal Procedure Code states:

When several offences are connected for any reason such as:

(1) if it appears that several offences have been committed by the same offender, or that several offenders are connected in the commission of one or more offences, whether as principals, accessories or receivers of stolen property;

(2) if it appears that several offences have been committed with the same aim, or that the several offenders have previously conspired;

(3) if it appears that an offence has been committed with the intent to cause an offender to escape punishment in respect of another offence which the latter has committed, then every criminal prosecution may be insituted in, or all the offenders may be charged before, the Court which is competent to try and adjudicate the case in respect of the offence for which a higher maximum punishment is provided.

If the connected offences are punishable with the same maximum punishment, the Court which is competent to try and adjudicate the cases shall be the Court before which criminal prosecution of any of the said offences has been instituted first.

Section 160 of the same Code provides:

Any number of distinct offences may be joined in the same charge, but they shall be separated and stated in consecutive order.

Each of such offences may be treated as distinct from other offences in the charge. If the Court thinks fit, it may direct that any one or several of such distinct offences be tried separately. Such order may be made either before or during trial.

Under Section 10 of the Penal Code, whoever does any act outside the Kingdom which is an offence under various sections (relating to counterfeiting and alternation, or relating to robbery or gang-robbery on the high seas) offences endangering public safety, relating to documents, relating to sexuality, against life, against body, etc.) shall not be punished in the Kingdom for the doing of such act again, if:

(1) there is a final judgment of any foreign Court acquitting him; or

(2) there be a judgment of any foreign Court convicting him, and he has already completed the punishment.

Criminal Code of Turkey

QUESTION 1

The present Turkish Penal Code was put into effect on July 1, 1926, as Law No. 765,[1] and has been amended several times up to September 28, 1971. It consists of three books: the First Book (Articles 1–124) contains the basic principles of criminal law common to all crimes; the Second Book (Articles 125–525) contains provisions concerning felonies; and the Third Book (Articles 525–592) deals with misdemeanors.

In the Turkish criminal system of codification, provisions related to sentencing are not under a special chapter, but are part of the First Book of the Penal Code or are added to the articles of the Code.

QUESTION 2

Consecutive numbering is used in the Turkish system of codification. Amendments or additions to any law are done on the same consecutive numbering, by modifying the paragraphs or by adding new articles or paragraphs to the existing articles.

QUESTION 3

Turkish criminal law follows the classical school concept of moral responsibility of the criminal. To be guilty of a crime a man must have criminal intent and criminal capacity. Article 45 of the Turkish Penal Code provides:

In felonies absence of criminal intent precludes punishment.

There is an exception for those cases where the law prescribes a punishment for consequences of the perpetrator's acts or omissions.

In misdemeanors, everyone is responsible for his act or omission in the absence of criminal intent.

Beside the four different kinds of culpability which the new Federal Code wants to establish, there is another kind of Turkish criminal law. This is inexperience in one's profession or trade. Article 455, Para. 1, of the Turkish Penal Code states:

Whoever causes the death of a person through negligence or carelessness or inexperience in his profession or trade or inobedience to regulations, orders or instructions shall be punished by imprisonment for two to five years and by a heavy fine of 250 to 2,500 [Turkish] liras.

Book I, Part 4 of the Turkish Penal Code prescribes criminal capacity and the matters which negate or reduce that capacity. In Article 46, Para. 1, mental disorder has a nullifying effect on criminal responsibility, and in Article 47, it has a diminishing effect.

Article 46, Para. 1:

Anybody afflicted with mental disease which causes a complete loss of consciousness or of freedom of action, at the time of commission of the act, shall not be punished.

Article 47:

The punishment to be imposed upon a person who, at the time of commission of the act, was afflicted with mental disease which diminished his consciousness or his freedom of action in a considerable degree, shall be reduced in the following manner:

(1) the punishment of death shall be reduced to heavy imprisonment of not less than fifteen years:

(2) life imprisonment shall be reduced to heavy imprisonment of ten to fifteen years;

(3) permanent disqualification to hold public office shall be reduced to temporary disqualification to hold public office.

Other punishments shall be reduced by one-third to one-half.

The provisions of Articles 46 and 47 also apply to temporary reasons causing complete or partial loss of consciousness or freedom of action. But acts committed under the influence of voluntary intoxication or under the influence of narcotics taken voluntarily are excluded from the provisions recognizing incapacity (TPC, Article 48).

QUESTION 4

Rules and principles governing the causal connection between the defendant's act and the result are not defined and specified in the Turkish Criminal Code, despite their existence as basic principles in Turkish law. And in most of the provisions describing felonies, there is no statement requiring the necessity to indicate the causal connection. The judge shall determine the causal relation as a fundamental motive for his decision.

QUESTION 5

There is insanity defense to criminal charges under Turkish law, and the insane defendant may not be found guilty. The test of mental responsibility under Turkish Penal Code seems to be similar to the test proposed by the American Law Institute. When the criminal is found not responsible for his criminal act, due to mental disease or defect, this does not mean his immediate freedom. He must be accorded medical treatment. The second and following paragraphs of Article 46 handle the procedural aspects of the insanity defense:

During the preparatory investigation, the decision subjecting such person (afflicted with mental disease) to custody and medical treatment must be rendered by the decision of the Justice of the Peace, during the preliminary investigation by the decision of the investigating judge, and during the final investigation by the decision of the competent court.

The custody and medical treatment continues until such person is cured. But a defendant accused of a crime entailing heavy imprisonment shall not be released prior to one year.

The person thus placed in custody and subjected to medical treatment shall be released by the competent court upon a hospital board report of the institution where the patient was kept in custody and for treatment, indicating that it is medically understood that the patient has recovered.

This report shall include a decision as to whether, in view of considerations of social safety, and considering the nature of the disease and the defendant's alleged crime, the person shall be subject to medical control and an examination, and if so, shall state the time and intervals for periodic examinations.

It is the delegation of the prosecuting attorney to insure that this medical control and examination is provided at the specified time, at the place of the defendant's residence, and if not there available, then at the nearest hospital which has competent specialists. If during this medical control and treatment the disease appears to recur, the person shall be placed in custody and subjected to medical treatment by decision of the judge or the court.

QUESTION 6

As it was said before, in Turkish law voluntary intoxication by alcohol or by drugs is not a defense to the criminal charge. But provisions of Articles 46 and 47 shall apply to anybody who, during the commission of a crime, was in a state of incapacity for extraneous reasons, such as involuntary intoxication by alcohol or by drugs. The treatment of this kind of intoxication is done according to the provisions of Article 46 of the Turkish Penal Code.

According to Articles 404 and 573 of the Turkish Penal Code, narcotic addicts and alcoholics shall be kept and treated in a hospital until it is medically ascertained that they have recovered. If such persons are in an area where there is no hospital for that kind of treatment, they shall be sent to a place where one exists.

QUESTION 7

The Turkish criminal system shows some criteria for the determination of the guilt of the accused person. These criteria, which are mentioned in Article 49 of the Turkish Penal Code, are the legitimate defense of self or of others, the necessity to react against danger, and the execution of a legal order. These situations are not specified but they are put as basic principles which mitigate or eliminate guilt.

Article 49:

No punishment shall be imposed if the perpetrator acted:

(1) in order to execute the provisions of a statute or an order given by a responsible authority, execution of which is the perpetrator's duty;

(2) in immediate necessity to repel an unjust assault against his own or another's person or chastity;

(3) in necessity, if there was no other way of protection, so as to protect himself or another person against a grave and certain danger not knowingly caused by himself.

In the case indicated in sub-paragraph 1, if the order issued is contrary to law, the punishment for the felony resulting from the violation of the law, shall be suffered by the person who has issued the order.

Article 461 of the Turkish Penal Code provides additional situations which have nullifying or mitigating effects on punishment, as follows. Whoever kills, causes bodily pain, injures the health, or causes mental disorder of another person, due to a necessary action, shall not be punished. Action may be taken in defense of one's property against plunderers or perpetrators during looting, plundering, highway robbery, and kidnapping. Action may also be taken against persons who climb, by means of ladder, into one's house or any kind of building and it's outhouses, or make a hole in the walls, or break the doors, or set fire to such buildings, provided that such offenses are committed during the night or, if committed during the day, against buildings which are in solitary locations, and provided that there is a reasonable danger or a serious fear for the personal security of those residing in such buildings. If the defender goes to extremes in his defense in the case prescribed above, his punishment shall be reduced by one-third to one-half.

QUESTION 8

In the Turkish Penal Code, crimes are classified as either felonies or misdemeanors. Nobody may be punished for an act which is not expressly defined by law as a crime, and no one can be subjected to a punishment not prescribed by law. (Nulla poena sine lege, nullem crimen sine lege). (TPC, Article 1). Individual offenses are defined and their penalties are prescribed in each article of the Code.

QUESTION 9

There are sections in the Turkish Penal Code which provide for suspension of execution of sentences. It is up to the discretion of the judge, after considering the past conduct and the moral attitude of the convicted and whether the good effect of the suspension will stop him from committing a felony in the future, to suspend the execution of the sentence. He may suspend the sentence if the defendant does not have previous convictions and if the sentence to be suspended is not for an imprisonment of more than six months.

Criminal institutions such as probation and parole do not exist in the Turkish Penal Code, due to the lack of qualified personnel and funds. However, there is a system of conditional release, which resembles parole. Prisoners who have served a special period of time required by law with good conduct may request their conditional release. All of the services are done by police officers instead of parole officers. The decision to grant the conditional release is given by the court instead of the parole board.

The Turkish Penal Code provides for determinate sentences of imprisonment, while provisions for extended term prison-sentence for dangerous special offenders are not mentioned.

Chapter 16 of the proposed Federal Code, "Offenses Involving Danger to the Person," corresponds to Part 9 of the Second Book of the Turkish Penal Code, which is entitled "Felonies Against Individuals." According to the Code, a person who intentionally murders another shall be punished by heavy imprisonment for twenty-four to thirty years (TPC, Article 448). In the proposed Federal Code the same crime is classified under Class A Felony, and its authorized term of imprisonment is not more than 30 years. In the Turkish Code the minimum term of imprisonment is unconditionally set and limited by law, while in the proposed Federal Code the minimum term of imprisonment is attached to some requirements.

The Turkish Penal Code states that if the homicide is committed against the wife, husband, brother, sister, adopted parents, adopted child, step-mother, step-father, step-son or -daughter, father-in-law, mother-in-law, son-in-law, daughter-in-law; or if the defendant has intentionally killed a government official during or due to the performance of his duty; or if he has murdered by means of poisoning, the defendant shall be punished by heavy imprisonment for life (TPC Article 449).

The offender shall suffer death if he has committed the murder against an ascendant or descendant; against a member of the Grand National Assembly; against more than one person; with premeditation; under a brutal feeling or with torture; through fire, flood and shipwreck; in order to prepare, facilitate or commit a separate crime, even if it cannot be consummated; in order to get the fruits of a crime, to conceal the preparation made for that purpose, or in the heat of anger resulting from failure to achieve the goal of a crime; in order to conceal a crime or to destroy the evidence and traces thereof; to enable himself or someone else to run away from punishment; or with the motive of vendetta (TPC, Article 450).

In the Turkish Penal Code, there is no provision requiring an organization convicted of an offense to give notice or appropriate publicity to the conviction, nor is there a provision for giving publicity to a conviction of a person, such as forcing persons convicted of drunken driving to use a special plate or sign.

Articles 81–88 of the Turkish Penal Code, concerning recidivism, talk about persistent criminals and find the solution in increasing the punishment. However, those provisions are not equivalent to the provisions mentioned in the proposed Federal Penal Code.

Article 81:

If a person commits a new crime within ten years of serving a sentence of more than five years, or after such a sentence is set aside, and within five years in case of other punishments, the punishment to be imposed for the new offense shall be increased by not more than one sixth.

If the new crime is of the same kind as the crime causing the previous conviction, the punishment shall be increased by one sixth to one third.

If the punishment of a second crime is increased because of recidivism, the increase may not exceed, in any event, the maximum punishment authorized for the previous crime.

If a fine or banishment has been imposed for either the former or the subsequent crimes, and a different type of punishment is imposed for the other, the rules about rates prescribed in Articles 19 and 40 shall be applied in determining the amount of addition to be made for recidivism.

Article 82:

If a person previously sentenced to heavy life imprisonment commits one or more felonies and the later felony or felonies are punishable by temporary heavy imprisonment, the period of the night and day solitary confinement shall be increased by one eighth of the total temporary imprisonment; and if they are punishable by imprisonment, the solitary confinement period shall be increased by one tenth of the total temporary imprisonment.

However, the additional solitary confinement period may not exceed three years in heavy imprisonment, and two years in imprisonment.

Where a convict who had previously been sentenced to heavy life imprisonment, is again so sentenced for his later felony, he shall be punished by death.

Article 83: Repealed [10–1–1936].

Article 84:

The duration of imprisonment to be served in accordance with Article 19, in lieu of heavy fine to be imposed in a case of recidivism, may not be more than five years.

Article 85:

If anybody who is sentenced twice or more to punishments restricting liberty for more than three months each time due to crimes he had committed, commits, within the periods specified in Article 81, another crime of the same kind punishable by a punishment restricting liberty, the punishment to which he will be sentenced, if less than thirty months, shall be increased by one half and in other cases by one third; provided that the periods for imprisonment and heavy imprisonment may not be more than thirty years.

Article 86:

Apart from the felonies to which the same Article of the law is applicable and which are included in the same Chapter of the Code, all the felonies specified below shall be considered to be of the same kind:

(1) felonies committed against the security of the state;

(2) felonies committed by government officials by violation of their duties respecting their office or by misusing their authorities;

(3) felonies involving religious or political liberty and misconduct by religious officials during performance of their duties;

(4) felonies committed against judges and government officials in connection with the performance of their duties and in violation of the State administration and public order;

(5) the felonies of false accusation, malicious prosecution, perjury, false swearing and misconduct of lawyers and solicitors;

(6) felonies committed against public welfare;

(7) felonies covered in Part 8;

(8) felonies in Chapters I and II of the Part respecting felonies against persons;

(9) all felonies specified in the Articles respecting larceny, robbery, procurement of benefits by threatening to disclose a secret, fraud, breach of confidence, purchasing and concealing items used in or which are products of a fenoly and fraudulent bankruptcy, and [some felonies committed against persons having official titles, stealing Government properties and other felonies against public confidence].

Article 87:

The following convictions shall not be taken as the basis for application of the foregoing provisions of recidivism:

(1) conviction of a misdemeanor in the case of the commission of a felony or vice versa;

(2) felonies committed by imprudence or carelessness or inexperience in a profession or a trade or disobedience to orders or regulations, after commission of other felonies; and vice versa;

(3) convictions of purely military felonies;

(4) sentences rendered by a foreign court, excepting those rendered for offenses [for counterfeiting of money, public bonds and valuable seals, and crimes related to narcotics].

According to Article 260 of the Turkish Code of Criminal Procedure,[1] the judge has to give reasons in writing for sentences imposed. Sentences rendered by criminal courts may be appealed. Sentences restricting liberty for fifteen or more years and death sentences are reviewed by the Court of Appeal on its own motion, without being subject to request, charges, or expenses. If the judgment is reversed, the Court of Appeal forwards the file to the originating court or to another nearby court having the same jurisdiction for review of its own decision and for a new judgment. However, in the following situations the Court of Appeal gives a final decision on the merits of the case in place of the originating court: if a decision for an acquittal or for the cessation of the investigation is necessary without further clarification of the facts; if the Court of Appeal concurs with the assertion of the Chief Public Prosecutor for the application of the minimum degree of punishment prescribed by law; and if the law has been erroneously applied (TCCP, Article 322). The right to appeal a judicial decision is open either to the Public Prosecutor or the accused. The Public Prosecutor may also appeal on behalf of the accused person (TCCP, Article 289).

With several exceptions, the cumulative system is accepted for the application of punishments for multiple offenses. The exceptions are:

(a) If a person, after a judgment, is convicted of another crime committed therebefore or thereafter, and if the person is sentenced to life imprisonment more than once, he shall be punished by death.

(b) If a person is sentenced to identical kinds of temporary punishments restricting liberty, the total of the punishments shall be applied. And if a person is sentenced to at least two heavy imprisonments of not less than twenty-four years each, life imprisonment shall be applied. In case of sentences to fines of the same kind, the person shall be subject to the total of the fines.

(c) If one of the punishments is life imprisonment and the other temporary punishment restricting liberty, life imprisonment shall be the punishment to be applied.

(d) If a person is sentenced to various kinds of temporary punishments restricting liberty, they shall be applied separately and completely. The punishments shall be executed in the following order: heavy imprisonment, imprisonment, light imprisonment, and banishment (TPC, Articles 68–74).

(e) The maximum punishments of the same category restricting liberty to which a defendant may be subject shall not exceed thirty-six years of heavy imprisonment, twenty-five years of imprisonment, ten years of light imprisonment, or fifteen years of banishment. The total of punishments of different categories restricting liberty may not exceed thirty years (TPC, Article 77).

(f) Whoever violates several provisions of the law by a single act shall be punished under the provisions of the article involving the most severe punishment (TPC, Article 79).

(g) During the trial of a case if a court perceives a connection between various cases before it, it may order them to be consolidated for purposes of joint investigation and decision (TCCP, Article 230). The Court of Appeal reviews the file as a whole, and if the judgment is reversed, this decision affects the consolidated file.

Under the Penal Code there are two types of punishment involving the imposing of fines: the heavy fine, which ranges from 10 to 25,000 Turkish liras; and the light fine, which consists of 3 to 1,000 Turkish liras, to be paid to the Treasury. There is no maximum limit for a fine based on proportion (TPC, Articles 19–24). For example, in the case of bribery, in addition to the principal punishment to be given to the bribee, a heavy fine of five times the amount of the money he has received or five times the value of the benefits promised shall also be imposed as fine (TPC, Article 225).

[1] Law No. 1412 of 4/4/29, T.C. Resmi Gazete (Turkish Official Gazette), No. 1172 of 4/20/29.

Fines are collected by the Treasury in accordance with the provisions of the Law on Enforcement of Punishments.[1] Because of the financial situation of the convicted, the court may order the payment to be made at intervals not exceeding the period of two years. In case of impossibility of payment, the convicted may be forced to work in a public service or in a job related to the municipality for a period not exceeding one year. If the payment is not made due to bad intention or as a result of negligence, up to one year of imprisonment shall be imposed.

According to Article 5 of the Law on Enforcement of Punishments, in order to determine the amount of a fine the court shall take into consideration the job, the profession, the financial situation and the resources of the defendant. Age and health also have their effect on determination of fines.

QUESTION 10

Ignorance or mistake of law is not a defense under the Turkish Penal System (TPC, Article 44). Mistake of law may only be a defense where knowledge of the law is an element of the offense.

Mistake of persons and facts is a defense in Turkish law. If a person commits a felony against a person other than he intended, as a result of a mistake or defect, the matters of aggravation arising from the situation of the injured party shall not be imputed to the perpetrator. Such cases may be dealt with as if the felony had been committed against the person intended, but the perpetrator shall benefit from any matter of mitigation applicable to the felony (TPC, Article 52).

If a man thinks he is shooting an animal, but in reality he kills a man, he is not guilty of intentional murder but of manslaughter with recklessness and carelessness (TPC, Article 455).

QUESTION 11

There is differentiation between crime and jurisdiction in Turkish law. This differentiation is among different types of courts having different jurisdictions. Turkey has a non-federal governmental system. Therefore, conflicts of jurisdiction between the federal and state courts do not exist.

QUESTION 12

The system of territoriality is a basic rule in Turkish Penal law. Whoever commits a crime in Turkey shall be punished in accordance with the Turkish law. A Turkish citizen, even if he is sentenced in a foreign country for a crime committed in Turkey, shall be retried in Turkey. A foreigner shall be tried in Turkey upon the request of the Minister of Justice.

In some cases mentioned in Articles 3–8 of the Turkish Penal Code, the systems of individuality and universality have been applied. For example, a Turkish citizen or a foreigner who commits a felony against the security of the State, or counterfeits the Turkish money, the bonds and valuable seals, or commits a felony against Turkey and Turkish citizens, shall be directly prosecuted and retried in Turkey upon the request of the Minister of Justice, even if the perpetrator was previously convicted in foreign countries. Whoever commits a felony during and in connection with the performance of an office or mission on behalf of Turkey in foreign countries shall be prosecuted and tried in Turkey.

QUESTION 13

The Turkish Penal Code defines conspiracy as "forming a society with five or more persons with the purpose of committing felonies." Each participant shall be punished by heavy imprisonment for not more than five years exclusively for forming such a society.

---

[1] Law No. 647 of 1965, T.C. Resmî Gazete (Turkish Official Gazette), No. 12050 of 7/16/65.

If the participants of this society wander on mountains, countryside or highways, or two or more of them carry arms on them or conceal arms at secure places, the punishment shall be heavy imprisonment for three to ten years.

Instigators and leaders of the society shall be punished, in the events described in the first paragraph of this section, with heavy imprisonment for three to eight years, and, for the events described in the second paragraph, for five to twelve years.

Whoever knowingly and willfully assists the participants of this type of society, through harboring the same, through procuring food, arms and ammunition, or in other manners, shall be imprisoned for not more than one year. The punishment shall be reduced by one half to two-thirds, if one who is assisting is a close relative (TPC, Articles 313-314).

QUESTION 14

The "felony-murder" rule does not have direct application in Turkish law. The Penal Code contains several provisions on participation in felonies and the degree of culpability of the participants. Of several persons participating in a felony, each one shall be subject to the punishment prescribed for that act (TPC, Article 64). In a case when a homicide has been committed by more than one person and if the killer cannot be identified, each of the participants shall be punished by one-third to one-half of the punishment prescribed for the offense committed. However, this provision is not applicable to persons who are known to have committed the act jointly.

QUESTION 15

Turkey has a centralized governmental system and one Penal Code which applies to the entire country.

QUESTION 16

Para-Military activities are defined in the Turkish Penal Code as "recruiting soldiers against any other country without the approval of the Turkish Government", and "enlisting or arming Turkish citizens within Turkey, to be engaged in the services of, or in favor of a foreigner (TPC, Articles 128 and 129).

QUESTION 17—A—DRUGS

Drugs in the Turkish Penal Code are divided into two groups for the purpose of criminal sanctions. Heroin, hashish, cocaine and morphine are in the first group, and all other narcotics are in the second group. The following articles of the Turkish Penal Code apply to drugs.

Article 403:

(1) Whoever manufactures, imports or exports narcotics or attempts to perpetrate such offenses without possession a license or contrary to the purpose of a license, shall be punished by heavy imprisonment for not less than ten years and in addition, by banishment for three to five years which will be executed in a county capital outside the production areas where there is a police organization and where he will be kept under police supervision during the period of banishment; and by a heavy fine of 10 liras for every gram of narcotic or fraction thereof. However, the fine so imposed shall not be less than 1,000 liras;

(2) if the narcotic indicated in the foregoing paragraph is either heroin, hashish, cocaine or morphine, the perpetrator shall be punished by life imprisonment;

(3) whoever sells, puts on sale, purchases, or keeps in his possession or in another place narcotics, or transfers or receives free of charge or ships or transports such items, or mediates in the sale, purchase, transfer or procurement in any way of such items, in Turkey, without a license, or contrary to a license, shall be punished by heavy imprisonment for not less than five years, and in addition by banishment for two to five years which will be executed in a county capital outside the production areas where there is a police organization and where he will be kept under police supervision during the period of banishment, and by a heavy fine of 10 liras for every gram of narcotic or fraction thereof. However, the fine so imposed shall not be less than 500 liras.

(4) where the offenses specified in the foregoing paragraph involve either heroin, cocaine, morphine or hashish, heavy imprisonment to be imposed shall not be less than ten years, nor the heavy fine less than 1,000 liras, nor the banishment for less than three years;

(5) whoever organizes societies with the purpose of committing the offenses prescribed in the foregoing paragraphs, or governs or participates in such societies, shall suffer heavy imprisonment for not less than five years.

Conspiracy of two or more persons to commit such offenses is considered organizing a society.

In case of a commission of the crime by those organizing or governing or participating in a society, the punishments prescribed in paragraphs 1, 3 and 4 shall be doubled. Under conditions described in the second paragraph the perpetrators shall be sentenced to death;

(6) where the crimes defined in paragraphs 1, 3 and 4 are committed jointly by two or more persons having no agreement or connection with persons who have made such crimes a profession, trade, or a means of making a living, the punishment for the perpetrators shall be increased by one half. Under the conditions indicated in paragraph 2 the punishment shall be death;

(7) whoever uses a minor or a person who has no criminal liability, in committing the offenses defined in paragraphs 1, 3 and 4, shall suffer the punishment prescribed for the principal increased by one sixth; and in the case of paragraph 2, the punishment shall be death.

In case an offender is sentenced to death according to paragraph 1, 2, 5, 6 or 7, or where this punishment is commuted to a lesser punishment, a decision for the confiscation of all personal and real properties of the offender shall also be rendered.

Article 404:

(1) Whoever facilitates the use of narcotics through summoning one or more persons by way of providing a special place or in other ways, and whoever gives such substances to minors or to overtly insane persons or to an addict, shall suffer the punishments prescribed in paragraphs 3 and 4 of Article 403 increased by one sixth;

(2) whoever uses narcotics or keeps them in his possession with the purpose of using them, shall be punished by imprisonment for three to five years and by a heavy fine of 100 to 1,000 liras.

Recidivists, apart from being imprisoned and fines, shall be banished for not less than one year, which will be executed in a county capital outside the production areas where there is a police organization and where he will be kept under police supervision during the banishment period.

Narcotic addicts shall be kept and treated in a hospital until it is medically ascertained that they have recovered. In locations where there is no hospital such persons will be sent to a place where there is a hospital.

A decision to keep and treat in a hospital a person who is medically ascertained to be addicted to narcotics may be rendered by the court of competent jurisdiction at every stage of the investigation. Persons addicted to narcotics shall also be put under police supervision for a period of six months to one year.

(3) whoever has participated in a crime defined in Article 403 or in this Article, and informs the competent authorities of the crime, the accomplices and the places where they keep and manufacture the narcotics, before official authorities are informed thereof, and thus facilitates their apprehension, shall be exempt from punishment involving his offense.

For a person having served or aided in the disclosure of the crime or in the apprehension of the criminals, after official authorities are informed of such crimes, capital punishment may be commuted to heavy imprisonment for not less than fifteen years and life imprisonment to heavy imprisonment for not less than ten years and other punishments may be reduced by one half.

Article 405:

Whoever purchases the substances specified in Article 403 with a false prescription, shall be imprisoned for not less than a year and a heavy fine of 100 to 1,000 liras shall be imposed.

Article 406:

(1) If the offenses defined in Article 403 are committed either by a physician, or a veterinarian, or a pharmacist, or a dentist, or a drugstore owner or the manager, or a civilian or military sanitation officer, or a midwife, or a nurse; heavy life imprisonment prescribed in that Article shall be changed to the punishment of death and the punishments of temporary heavy imprisonment, heavy fine and banishment shall be increased by one third to one half. The perpetrator shall also be disqualified for life from holding his office or exercising his profession:

(2) If the offenses defined in Article 403 and paragraph 1 of Article 404 are committed in any kind of transportation means or in public places by the owners or employees thereof or by government officers or employees through misusing their office or authority, heavy life imprisonment prescribed in the aforesaid Article or paragraph shall be changed to the punishment of death, and temporary heavy imprisonment, heavy fine and banishment shall be doubled. The perpetrator shall also be disqualified for life from holding his office or from exercising his trade or profession.

Article 407:

Where the offenses defined in the foregoing Articles result in an injury to the health of a person such as getting sick, injured or bruised, the punishments, with the exception of death and heavy life imprisonment, shall be increased by one third to one half. If the offense has resulted in an injury to the health of more than one person, said punishment shall not be less than doubled.

In case the offense has resulted in a person's death the offender shall be sentenced to death.

Article 408:

All properties existing in a place opened to facilitate the use of the substances indicated in Article 403 shall be confiscated and half the price of these properties shall be given to those having served in the disclosure of the crime.

QUESTION 17–B—ABORTION

Abortion is a crime in Turkey, and it is classified under "felonies against the integrity and the health of the race." The following articles apply to abortion.

Article 468:

Whoever procures miscarriage of a woman's child without her consent, shall be imprisoned for seven to twelve years.

A person procuring miscarriage with the woman's consent shall be confined for two to five years.

The woman giving consent for an abortion shall suffer the same punishment.

The provision of the first paragraph of this Article shall be applied in the following instances:

(1) where the woman is below the age of fourteen, or does not possess, in any manner, mental capacity.

(2) if her consent is obtained by the use of violence, threat, suggestion or fraud.

Where the act specified in the first paragraph has caused the woman's death, the punishment is heavy imprisonment for fifteen to twenty years; the punishment shall be heavy imprisonment from ten to fifteen years if such act has caused her only bodily injury.

If the act specified in the second paragraph has caused the woman's death, the offender shall be confined for five to twelve years, and if it caused her bodily injury, the punishment shall be confinement for three to eight years.

Article 469:

Any woman who wilfully causes an abortion on herself, shall be imprisoned for one to four years.

Any person who induces a pregnant woman to procure an abortion by obtaining the means of abortion, exclusive of participation in the crime mentioned in the foregoing paragraph, shall be imprisoned for six months to two years.

Article 470:

Whoever obtains a means of abortion for a woman who is thought to be pregnant or performs such acts on this woman so as to serve the same purpose and, as a result of these, causes death or bodily injury to the woman, shall be punished according to Articles 452 and 456.

If the woman has consented to the performance of the act, the punishment shall be reduced by one third.

Article 472:

If the offenses defined in this Chapter are committed in order to preserve the pride and reputation of one's own self or relative, the punishment shall be reduced by one half to two thirds; . . .

Where the one committing the offense defined in paragraphs 1, 2, 3, 5 and 6 of Article 468, in paragraph 2 of Article 469, [and] in Article 470 . . . is a person engaged in a medical profession, the punishment prescribed for the respective offense shall be increased by not less than one third.

QUESTION 17-C—GAMBLING

Gambling is an offense included in Chapter 1 of the Third Book of the Turkish Penal Code, which deals with misdemeanors related to public morals. The pertinent articles follow.

Article 567:

Whoever manages gambling in public places or in locations open to the public, or procures a place for gambling, shall suffer light imprisonment for one to six months and a light fine of 250 to 500 liras. Repeators shall suffer light imprisonment for two months to one year and a light fine of 500 to 1,000 liras.

All articles and devices of gambling existing at the place of gambling, and all properties and money which are exposed, shall be seized and confiscated.

Where the perpetrator has made a habit of such acts, or where he has acted as the croupier [house], he shall suffer double the foregoing punishments and shall be disqualified from performing his trade or profession for not more than three months.

Article 568:

Whoever, not having participated in the misdemeanour specified in the foregoing article, gambles in public places or places open to the public, shall be punished by light imprisonment for not more than one month and by a light fine of 500 to 100 liras. In case of repetition, the light imprisonment shall be for ten days to two months and the light fine shall be from 100 to 200 liras.

Article 569:

All games of chance played or managed lucri causa are gambling, according to the Turkish Criminal Code.

Article 570:

Those places, even if proper to private assemblages, where a fee is received for the use of gaming devices, or where games are customarily played or where any people desiring to play games are allowed to enter, are places open to the public in the sense used in relation to the misdemeanors specified in the foregoing Articles.

QUESTION 17-D—PROSTITUTION

Prostitution is not directly dealt with in the Turkish Penal Code. Provisions concerning prostitution are under the sub-title "Instigation to Prostitution," as follows.

Article 435:

Whoever entices and instigates a minor, who has not completed the age of fifteen, to prostitution and facilitates the ways thereof, shall be imprisoned for not less than two years and ordered to pay a heavy fine of 100 to 500 liras.

If the act of enticement is perpetrated by one of the ascendants, sisters or brothers, the adopter, the natural or appointed guardian, the teacher or tutor or the servants of the minor, or by another person authorized to supervise the minor, the perpetrator shall be imprisoned for not less than three years.

Where the act of enticement is perpetrated against a person who has completed the age of fifteen but not yet completed the age of twenty-one, the perpetrator shall be punished by imprisonment for six months to two years and by a heavy fine of 50 to 200 liras.

Where the act of enticement is perpetrated by one of the persons indicated in the second paragraph of this Article or by the husband, the perpetrator shall be imprisoned for not less than two years, and ordered to pay a heavy fine of 100 to 500 liras.

Where a girl or woman who has completed the age of twenty-one is enticed into prostitution by her husband, ascendant, ascendant by affinity, brother or sister, the perpetrator shall be punished by imprisonment for six months to two years.

Article 436:

Whoever, with the purpose of prostitution, seduces, provides or sends from one place to another for another person, a virgin girl or a woman who has not completed the age of twenty-one, even by obtaining her consent, or a virgin girl or a woman over twenty-one years of age by using force, violence, threat or applying influence or fraud, shall be imprisoned for one year to three years and ordered to pay a heavy fine of 50 to 500 liras.

Where the above mentioned wrongs are committed against a virgin girl or a woman who has not completed the age of twenty-one, by using force, violence, or threat or by applying influence, or where such wrongs are committed by the victim's brother or sister, ascendant, ascendant by affinity, husband, natural or appointed guardian, teacher, tutor, servant or supervisor, the offender shall be imprisoned for two to five years.

Whoever commits the preparatory actions of the offenses embraced in this Chapter, shall be punished by one sixth of the punishment prescribed for the main offense.

QUESTION 17–E—OBSCENITY

Obscenity is a felony against public decency because of its tendency to corrupt public morals.

Article 426:

Whoever exhibits obscene books, newspapers, pamphlets, magazines, documents, articles, advertisements, pictures, illustrations, photographs, movie films or other items; or who puts on stage or show these things in theaters, cinemas or other public places, or who knowingly distributes or sells or suffers them, or the phonograph records of the same nature, to be distributed or sold, or who in order to make profit or to distribute or exhibit such items, draws, illustrates, carves, manufactures, prints, or reproduces such items, or records them on phonograph records, or imports, exports or transports them from one locality to another in Turkey, or suffers the foregoing activities to be performed, or who performs any transaction respecting any of the foregoing objects, or performs any transaction to facilitate the trade thereof, or who, in any manner, makes publicly known the ways of procuring, directly or indirectly, these documents or items, shall be imprisoned for one month to two years and shall be sentenced to pay a heavy fine of 15 to 500 liras.

Article 427:

The provisions of the foregoing Article are applicable also to the writers of obscene books, articles, documents or advertisements and to those who have assumed administrative responsibility for newspapers or magazines containing such writings or pictures.

The documents and objects mentioned in the foregoing and in this Article, shall be confiscated and destroyed.

Article 428:

Whoever openly sings obscene songs, plays such phonograph records, or sells newspapers, pamphlets and other documents by way of pronouncing words which are against public decency or injurious to a person's or a group of persons' honor and dignity, shall be imprisoned for one to six months and shall be sentenced to pay a heavy fine of 30 to 50 liras.

Turkish law is silent on homosexual activity between consenting adults, as long as they are not engaged in sexual intercourse in public (TPC, Article 419).

Whoever, without obtaining permission from appropriate authority, manufactures dynamite, bombs, or similar destructive killing devices, gun powder and other combustible chemicals; or imports such items into Turkey or acts as intermediary for such importation; or carries, sends, or knowingly mediates for the carriage from one place to another of such items shall be punished by imprisonment of three to five years and by a heavy fine of 1,000 to 10,000 Turkish liras. Whoever organizes societies with the purpose of committing the abovementioned offenses, or whoever governs or participates in such societies shall be punished by imprisonment from seven to fifteen years. And, whoever carries, keeps, sells, or puts up for sale, or purchases such items without permission shall suffer imprisonment from one to two years and a fine of 500 to 2,000 Turkish liras (TPC, Article 264).

The preceding article (264) is the version as amended on 9/28/71. The old article also covered "weapons prohibited by law" and the ammunition for such weapons. Since Article 265, which was not amended or repealed, gives the definition of prohibited, or forbidden, weapons, this writer is under the impression that the part related to such weapons has been left out of this amended article by mistake.

Article 265 of the Turkish Penal Code states:

For the purpose of the provisions of this Code, "forbidden weapons" embraces the following:

(1) all kinds and models of old or new types rifles, light or heavy machine guns or bayonets or swords or spears or other kinds of war weapons, once used or still being used by the Armed Forces, or taken from the enemy or assigned to the military personnel or police force.

(2) pistols, regardless of their calibre, make or model, with barrels longer than fifteen centimeters including the chamber;

(3) all types of cutting tools with single or double blades which are pointed and twenty-five centimeters long exclusive of the handle.

Knives or tools appropriate for the performance of a profession or trade or which are household utensils, carried or used for this purpose, are not considered forbidden weapons.

Whoever carries weapons not forbidden by law, within cities and towns, without a license obtained from the proper authority, shall be punished by light imprisonment of fifteen days to three months, or a light fine of 30 to 500 Turkish liras (TPC, Article 549).

If a person makes, invents, transports, prepares, imports, conceals, or carries arms, ammunition, knives, bombs or similar destructive, combustible, or fatal instruments in order that a group of conspirators may accomplish its purpose, he shall be punished by one to twenty-four years of imprisonment (TPC, Article 150).

Weapons considered by the Turkish Penal Code as matters of aggravation are: firearms; explosives; all sorts of cutting, perforating or bruising tools used for defense or assault; burning, corroding, or wounding chemicals; all kinds of poisons; and choking and blinding gases (TPC, Article 189).

If a felony is committed by a group of persons and if one of the persons is armed, the felony is considered as being committed by arms (TPC, Article 190).

QUESTION 19

There is no jury system in Turkey. Capital punishment is recognized by law under the following circumstances:

(a) If the act committed is intended to put the entire or a part of the territory of Turkey under the sovereignty of a foreign State or to decrease the independence or to disrupt the union of the State or to separate a part of its territory from the Administration of Turkey (TPC, Article 125).

(b) If a Turkish citizen commands or conducts the forces of a foreign State, when that State is in war against Turkey (TPC, Article 126).

(c) In case of political and military spying when the act is committed in time of war or has jeopardized war preparation or war power and capability or military operations of Turkey (TPC, Articles 136 and 137).

(d) If a person conducts and administers societies having the goal to establish domination of a social class over other social classes, or exterminating a certain social class, or overthrowing any of the established basic economic or social orders of the country (TPC, Article 141).

(e) When someone attempts by force to alter, modify, or abolish, in whole or in part, the Constitution of the Turkish Republic, or attempts to overthrow the Grand National Assembly organized by the constitution or to prevent the Grand National Assembly from accomplishing its mission (TPC, Article 146).

(f) In cases when someone, by force, overthrows or prevents the performance of the duties of the Council of Ministers or incites others to commit these felonies.

(g) In cases where someone incites a revolt against the Government or incites Turkish people to kill one another (TPC, Article 149).

(h) When, without an official status conferred by the Government or without a valid reason, a person undertakes the command of a military unit; of Navy; of a war vessel, fort, harbor, or city; or disobeys, without a valid reason, a Government order to relinquish command, and continues to assume command (TPC, Article 152).

(i) When the President of Turkey is assassinated (TPC, Article 156).

(j) In some cases for narcotic offenses (see answer to question #17).

(k) For the felony of rape when the victim dies.

(l) If homicide is committed as described in Article #450 of the Turkish Penal Code (see answer to question #9).

(m) In case of kidnapping for political and social reasons, when the perpetrator attains his goal (TPC, Article 499).

Any offense involving capital punishment is under the jurisdiction of the Aggravated Felony Courts which have three-judge benches consisting of a chief justice and two associate justices. There is no special and separate proceeding to determine sentence in capital cases. Only sentences restricting liberty for fifteen or more years and death sentences are reviewed by the Court of Appeal on its own motion (TCCP, Article 305).

QUESTION 20

Whoever, while perpetrating a crime, commits with the same conduct another act punishable by law, shall be punished in accordance with the provisions related to multiplicity of crimes, if such acts or crimes are not, by provision of the law, elements of the main crime, or if they do not constitute grounds of aggravation of the main crime (TPC, Article 78). For example, threat is a crime by itself (TPC, Article 191), but it is one of the elements of the crime of plundering and looting (TPC, Article 495).

When the defendant is subject to punishment for a crime unrelated to one for which he has been previously convicted and punished or will be punished, the prosecution may be discontinued. The investigating judge may suspend the prosecution temporarily upon the request of the Public Prosecutor who initiated the proceedings. Any suspended prosecution may be renewed only if the statute of limitations has not run out during the suspension period (TTCP, Article 149).

Prosecution done in a foreign country by a Turk or a foreigner for a crime against or related to the security of the Turkish Government is not a bar to a subsequent prosecution in Turkey. Such perpetrators, even if previously convicted in foreign countries, are subject to prosecution and to retrial in Turkey upon the request of the Minister of Justice (TPC, Article 4).

U.S.S.R.

Soviet criminal law consists of the fundamental principles of criminal legislation of the U.S.S.R. and the union republics, which determine the general principles of criminal legislation and are binding upon the union republics, federal laws which define crimes against the state and military secrets, as well as some other crimes detrimental to the interests of the Soviet Union and, finally, the criminal codes of the union republics.

The present study, therefore, is based on the now-prevailing Fundamental Principles of Criminal Legislation of the U.S.S.R. and the Union Republics of December 25, 1958, as amended (hereinafter referred to as Principles) [1] and the Criminal Code of the RSFSR of October 27, 1960, as amended.[2] The criminal codes of the other union republics incorporate the provisions of the Principles and are patterned on the Criminal Code of the RSFSR.

QUESTION 1

The Criminal Code of the RSFSR is divided into two parts, the General Part and the Special Part, as follows:

General Part

Chapter 1. General Provisions.
Chapter 2. Limits on the Operation of the Criminal Code.
Chapter 3. Crime.
Chapter 4. Punishment.
Chapter 5. Assignment of Punishment and Relief from Punishment.
Chapter 6. Compulsory Medical and Educational Measures.

Special Part

Chapter 1. Crimes against the State.
Chapter 2. Crimes against Socialist Property.
Chapter 3. Crimes against Life, Health, Freedom, and Dignity of the Person.
Chapter 4. Crimes against Political and Labor Rights of Citizens.
Chapter 5. Crimes against Personal Property of Citizens.
Chapter 6. Economic Crimes.
Chapter 7. Official Crimes.
Chapter 8. Crimes against the Administration of Justice.
Chapter 9. Crimes against the System of Administration.
Chapter 10. Crimes against Public Security, Public Order and the Health of the Population.
Chapter 11. Crimes Constituting Relics of Local Customs.
Chapter 12. Military Crimes.
Appendix. List of Property not Subject to Confiscation by the Court Judgment.

Provisions dealing with sentences are incorporated in the General Part of the Code as Chapter 4. Punishment, and Chapter 5. Assignment of Punishment and Relief from Punishment. They are discussed in detail under Question 9.

QUESTION 2

In addition to the division into parts and chapters, the Code is divided into sections numbered consecutively from 1 to 269. No blank numbers are left for future enactments. If a new section is added, it is incorporated into the appropriate chapter of the Code and assigned the same number as the immediately preceding related section. For instance: Section 53. Conditional early release from punishment and replacement of punishment by milder punishment. Section 53_1. Non-applicability of conditional early release from punishment and replacement of punishment by milder punishment. Section 77. * * * Section 77^1. * * *

QUESTION 5

The basic conditions of criminal liability, as defined in Section 3 of the Principles, are as follows:

a. commission of a socially dangerous act (or omission to act) which is considered a crime by criminal law;

b. the crime must be committed either intentionally or negligently;

c. criminal punishment may be imposed only by a court judgment.

The definition of a crime is contained in Section 7 of the Principles which reads as follows:

Sec. 7. The concept of a crime. A socially dangerous act (an act or omission to act) provided for by criminal law which infringes upon the Soviet social order or system of government, the socialist system of economy, socialist property, the person, political, labor, property or other rights of citizens, as well as any other socially dangerous act provided for by criminal law, shall be a crime.

An act or omission to act shall not be a crime, in spite of the fact that it formally contains elements of any act provided for by criminal law if, by reason of its significance, it does not constitute a social danger.

According to the currently prevailing interpretation in the Soviet Union, the above definition of crime, which has been incorporated in the criminal codes of all the union republics:[1]

* * * is theoretically correct since it establishes the determining characteristics of a crime according to Soviet criminal law. These characteristics are the social danger of an act and its criminal illegality.

The social danger of an act is a characteristic (inner feature) of a crime disclosing its social essence and fixed in the law, and, consequently, having legal significance. By nature this characteristic is objective and unchangeable. Its presence or absence does not depend on the will of the legislator or the will of an organ applying the law.

This does not contradict the fact that the inclusion of a concrete act in the list of crimes depends on the legislator and the evaluation of a committed act as socially dangerous—on the organ applying the law.

Another authoritative Soviet source states that:[2]

Social danger of a crime consists in that it causes real harm to socialist social relations or, in some cases, creates the danger of causing such harm.

The question whether an act is socially dangerous is decided by the investigating authorities or by the court according to the circumstances under which the act was committed, the place or time of its commission, and finally, to a considerable decree, the personality of the perpetrator.[3] This applies specially in a decision of whether to recognize an act as insignificant and thus not socially dangerous. In such instances, the decision is made on the basis of the factual circumstances of the case (the nature of the act itself, the circumstances of its commission and the conditions under which it was committed, the harmful consequences, the insignificance of the damage caused, and other things).[4]

According to Section 3 of the Principles, a crime may be committed only by a guilty person, i.e., a person who intentionally or negligently commits a socially dangerous act provided for by the law.

The prevailing Soviet criminal law recognizes two forms of guilt—intent (Sec. 8, Principles) and negligence (Sec. 9, Principles).

Section 8 reads as follows:

Sec. 8. Intentional commission of a crime. A crime shall be regarded as committed intentionally when the person who commits it is conscious of the socially dangerous character of his act or omission to act, foresees its socially dangerous consequences, and desires those consequences or knowingly allows them to occur.

Thus this Section distinguishes between direct intent (dolus directus) and indirect intent (dolus indirectus, dolus eventualis).

In regard to direct intent Soviet legal writers discern three qualifying elements: (1) consciousness of the social danger of the act which is predetermined by the purely subjective qualities of the perpetrator such as experience, education, etc., (2) foreseeing the socially dangerous consequences, and (3) desiring the predetermined consequence to occur. This element characterizes the will of the perpetrator.

Elements (1) and (2) are the same for indirect intent as for direct intent, but element (3) requires that the consequences be consciously allowed (not desired) to occur. Consequently, in the case of indirect intent, the will (attitude) of the perpetrator is passive, not active as in direct intent.[5]

Negligence is dealt with in Section 9 of the Principles which reads as follows:

Sec. 9. Commission of a crime through negligence. A crime shall be considered committed through negligence if the person who commits it foresees the possibility of the occurrence of socially dangerous consequences of his act or omission to act but recklessly (lekkomyslenne) counts on their being prevented, or does not foresee the possibility of the occurrence of such consequences although he should and could have foreseen them.

[3] Supra note 1 at 161–162.
[4] Supra note 2 at 19.
[5] Supra note 1 at 412 ff.

There are two forms of negligence. The first is defined as recklessness (luxuria), i.e., when the person foresees the socially dangerous consequences of his act but recklessly (light-mindedly) expects that they will not occur. The second is defined as carelessness, i.e., when the person does not foresee the socially dangerous consequences though he should and could have foreseen them.

The characteristic feature of recklessness as a form of guilt is that the attitude of the perpetrator is directed only to the probable consequences of his act.

The difference between recklessness and intent is based on the element of volition. In the case of the former the perpetrator foresees only the probability of the occurrence of the consequences, while in the case of intent, he desires (direct intent) or allows (indirect intent) them to occur.[1]

Carelessness, as defined in Section 9 of the Principles, is characterized by the absence, on the part of the perpetrator, of foresight of the occurrence of socially dangerous consequences and his duty to foresee them as well as the subjective possibility to foresee them. These aspect distinguish carelessness from other forms of guilt.

The duty to foresee represents an objective aspect based on legal premises such as the duties of an employee or the perpetrator's experience and the possibility of foreseeing which is the subjective aspect of criminal carelessness, depending on the personal traits of the perpetrator, his age, education, maturity, and the like.[2]

QUESTION 4

Neither the Principles nor the criminal codes of the constituent republics contain provisions which define, as the Draft Codes does, the causal relationship between conduct and result. Therefore, the answer to this question should be sought in legal writing and in the judicial practice of the U.S.S.R. Supreme Court and the supreme courts of the constituent republics.

According to a Soviet authority on criminal law:[3]

* * * the essence of causal connection in criminal law consists in establishing the borderline which separates a relationship between conduct and result necessary and sufficient for the justification (on the objective side) of criminal responsibility, from a relationship which does not play such a role.

The first theory of a causal connection formulated by Soviet legal scholars was the theory of conditio sine qua non which maintained that any condition necessary for an event to occur is the cause of the event. This theory, based on the equality of all conditions, excludes the possibility of any differentiation of conditions. It was strongly criticized as being practically useless because of its demand for unlimited responsibility.[4] A majority of legal scholars think that each condition is the cause of the result but not each cause may be recognized as "juridically" valid, i.e., not just any causal connection may justify criminal responsibility.

Another theory formulated by Soviet writers is the theory of necessary cause based on the premise that the difference between necessity and accidentality as objective categories appears to be the basis of the solution of the question of causality in law. A further necessary result is the manifestation of the regularity of development of a given phenomenon. On the other hand, an accidental result does not regularly ensue from the phenomenon, although it is stipulated by the cause. Hence the question of responsibility for the result may be positively solved only when the result was the necessary regular result of the person's conduct.[5]

The theory of "necessary result" was also challenged mainly because it contradicted the Marxist-Leninist philosophy establishing the relativity of concepts of necessity and accidentality. Another argument against it is that the question of whether the relationship between conduct and result is necessary or accidental is of no significance for criminal law. As the accidental non-occurrence of the result excludes responsibility, likewise the responsibility for an accidental result should not be excluded.[1]

The concept of causal connection conforming with Leninist-Marxist philosophy is discussed by Prof. M. D. Durmanov.[2] According to him the problem of the presence or lack of a causal connection between the conduct (or lack of conduct) of a person and the harmful results which followed arises in all cases when the presence of harmful results constitutes an element characterizing the objective aspect of a crime. The establishment of the presence of a causal connection between a socially dangerous act (or omission to act) and the socially dangerous results which followed is important in instances when the law defines the occurrence of the specified harmful results as an objective element of the crime.

In discussing the problem of the results of a concrete socially dangerous act it should be established whether or not the result was caused, in objective reality, by this particular act.

The causal connection exists when harmful results are engendered objectively, although even independently of the perpetrator's will, by his particular action committed in the given, sometimes unique, circumstances.

A prerequisite of the causal connection is that the conduct must precede the harmful result. A simple sequence of events in time does not establish a causal connection if the result was not brought about by this particular conduct. There is no causal connection if only external cohesion, simple sequence, or coexistence of circumstances exist.

In cases where the criminal responsibility is connected with a violation of the rules which caused specified consequences, it is necessary to establish the rules which were violated, and whether the consequences were the result of this violation of these particular rules.

Method and/or means used for causing harmful results are important only if the law specifically connects criminal responsibility with the particular method or means.

In order to establish a causal connection between the lack of conduct and the result it is necessary to establish if:

(1) the perpetrator had the duty to perform the particular act,

(2) if he had the opportunity to perform the required act,

(3) if the omission to act caused or did not avert the consequences indicated by the appropriate section of the law.

If the act (or omission to act) which caused harmful results was performed by two or more persons who are not participants in crime, it is necessary to establish whether the act of each of them caused the results and the results were the consequence of failure to perform the act which each of these persons had the duty to perform.

Finally, the U.S.S.R. Supreme Court requires that direct, immediate, or close connection between conduct and result be established.[3]

QUESTION 5

According to Soviet legal doctrine insanity always constitutes a defense to criminal charges.

This rule is formulated in Section 11 of the Principles and incorporated as Section 11 into the Criminal Code of the RSFSR and pertinent sections of the criminal codes of all the other constituent republics.

Section 11 of the Principles reads as follows:[4]

A person shall not be subject to criminal responsibility who, at the time of committing a socially dangerous act, is in a state of nonimputability, that is, cannot realize the significance of his actions or control them because of a chronic mental illness, temporary mental derangement, mental deficiency, or other conditions of illness. Compulsory measures of a medical character may be applied to such a person by order of the court.

[4] Translation based on H. Berman and J. W. Spindler, Soviet Criminal Law and Procedure. The RSFSR Codes. Cambridge, Mass., 1966. p. 11.

Also, a person shall not be subject to punishment who commits a crime while in a state of imputability, but before the rendering of judgment by the court, contracts a mental illness which deprives him of the possibility of realizing the significance of his actions or of controlling them. Compulsory measures of a medical character may be applied to such person by order of the court, but upon recovery he may be subject to punishment.

The provisions of this section distinguish two groups of aspects on which the concept of nonimputability is based, namely, medical (biological, as some authors prefer) and juridical (psychological, according to some authors).[1]

Medical aspects are contained in a list of mental illnesses which include chronic mental illness, temporary mental derangement, mental deficiency (slaboumie), or other conditions of illness. The term "other conditions of illness" includes mental disturbances which may justify nonimputability only if they appear in acute forms, like some forms of psychosis, infectious diseases which cause mental derangement, mental states connected with deafness, and others.[2] Generally speaking, only such mental disturbances as are caused by illness may justify nonimputability. Emotional disturbances do not exclude criminal responsibility. They may be taken into account as extenuating circumstances.[3]

The juridical aspects of nonimputability characterize such a degree of disease as deprives a person of his ability to recognize the social significance of, or to consciously control, his conduct, and excludes criminal responsibility.[4]

The provisions of Section 11, paragraph 1 distinguish two juridical aspects, namely intellectual, i.e., inability to recognize the significance of actions (impairment of reasoning ability), and volitional, i.e., inability to control one's conduct. The latter implies that a person is more or less able to recognize the significance and social danger of his conduct but, because of the impairment of his will power, is unable to control his conduct.[5]

Section 11, paragraph 2 establishes rules for the treatment of persons who became mentally ill after committing a crime, but before the judgment was rendered.

Although these provisions mention only mental illness, judicial interpretation established that it had in mind both curable (temporary) and incurable (chronic, progressive) mental diseases.

In case of the former the court suspends court proceedings (even in its investigative phase) until the accused (or suspect) is declared cured and competent to stand trial, and decides on the compulsory measures of a medical character to be applied.

In case of the latter the court declares the accused (or suspect) nonimputable and decides on the necessity of applying, and the kind of compulsory measures to be applied, of a medical character.

The state of nonimputability eliminates the guilt of the accused which is the prerequisite of criminal responsibility. Therefore, under Soviet codes, once a person is found to be insane, proceedings are discontinued and he thus is accorded medical rather than penological treatment.

Compulsory measures of a medical character consist of commitment to a general psychiatric hospital or to a special psychiatric hospital.[6] To the latter must be committed a person who, by reason of his mental condition and the character of the socially dangerous act he has committed, is in need of hospitalization and compulsory treatment. Such a person must be kept under strict supervision.[7]

The final decision on the nonimputability and application of compulsory medical treatment of the defendant rests exclusively with the court. It must be, however, based on an expert examination which is mandatory when doubts arise with regard to the mental state of the defendant.[8] An expert examination may be initiated during the obligatory preliminary investigation by the investigators of the procuracy, of agencies of the Ministry of Internal Affairs, as well as of agencies of state security,[1] and finally by the court.[2] Referral of the defendant for examination by experts, appointed by an official in charge of the case, may take place only if there exist sufficient data that he committed a crime regarding which the criminal case has been initiated and the investigation is being conducted.[3]

Upon completion of the preliminary investigation the case is referred to the court if grounds for the application of compulsory medical treatment exist. The court must decide whether a crime has been committed and, if so, whether the defendant committed the crime, and whether he committed the act in a state of nonimputability and, finally, whether and what compulsory measure of a medical character is applicable.[4]

According to Section 22 of the Principles of Criminal Procedure of the Soviet Union and the Union Republics, as amended by the Decree of the Presidium of the Supreme Council of the U.S.S.R. of February 3, 1972,[5] the presence of the defense counsel is obligatory during the preliminary investigation and at the judicial examination from the moment of presentation of the accusation.

QUESTION 6

Section 12 of the Criminal Code states that a person who commits a crime in a state of intoxication shall not be freed from criminal responsibility.

The following interpretation of this provision has been commonly accepted by commentators and judicial practice:[6]

1. The term "state of intoxication" means intoxication caused by introducing into one's system both alcohol and narcotics.

2. Ordinary (obychnoe) intoxication (drunkenness), regardless of its intensity and the degree of loss, by a person, of the ability to control himself and guide his conduct, may not be considered in the light of nonimputability. It may be considered, at the discretion of the court, an aggravating circumstance.

3. Section 12 does not apply to (1) the mentally ill who committed a crime while in a state of intoxication if their mental illness excludes the imputability even if such illness is attributable to the abuse of alcohol, and (b) to pathological intoxication, i.e., a short-lasting, rare acute psychosis occurring suddenly in connection with the consumption of even a small amount of alcohol. Such persons are subject to compulsory medical treatment under Sections 11, 58–61 of the RSFSR Criminal Code (see Question 5).

4. In the case of drug addicts who committed a crime in a state of narcotic psychosis (morphine delirium, cocaine psychosis) such crime may be considered nonimputable.[7]

According to Section 62 of the RSFSR Criminal Code, alcoholics and drug addicts who are convicted of a crime may be subject to compulsory medical treatment in addition to the punishment for the crime committed.

Persons sentenced to deprivation of liberty undergo the compulsory medical treatment while serving the punishment and, if it is necessary to extend the treatment after release from prison, in a medical institution with a special therapeutic and work regimen. Those sentenced to measures of punishment other than deprivation of liberty are placed for compulsory medical teatment in medical institutions with a special therapeutic and work regimen.

Confinement in a medical institution is ordered by the court upon the petition of a social organization, comrade's court, public health agency, and upon the court's initiative. Termination of the compulsory medical treatment is ordered by the court on the basis of the opinion of the medical institution providing the treatment.

With regard to a person misusing alcoholic beverages or narcotic drugs, thereby putting his family in a difficult material situation, the court, in addition to applying a punishment other than deprivation of liberty for the crimes committed by him, may declare him partially incapable of entering into legal transactions. The decision in this respect is issued upon the request of the

The Soviet criminal codes do not contain, as does the Draft Federal Criminal Code, detailed provisions dealing separately with self-defense, the defense of others, or the defense of property. The subject is dealt with in general provisions under the heading "Necessary Defense."

Necessary defense is defined in Section 13 of the Principles as follows:

Sec. 13. Necessary defense. An act which, although containing the features of an act provided for by criminal law, shall not constitute a crime if it is committed in a state of necessary defense involving the protection of the interests of the Soviet state, social interests, the person or the rights of the defender, or of another person against a socially dangerous attack by causing harm to the attacker, provided that the limits of necessary defense are not exceeded.

The limits of necessary defense shall be considered exceeded if there is an obvious discrepancy between the defense and the character and danger of the attack.

This definition differs radically from that contained in the Basic Principles of Criminal Law of 1924 which merely stated that "measures of social defense [i.e., punishments] shall not be applied to persons who commit an act provided for by criminal law, in necessary defense."

The provisions of Section 13 were drafted on the premise that defense against a socially dangerous attack by harming the attacker, is one of the means of combating crime.[1] This was confirmed by the U.S.S.R. Supreme Court which, in addition, stated that necessary defense is an indefeasible right of a citizen.[2] According to other commentators "the repulsion of an attack may and should be considered only a moral duty of Soviet citizens if the attack threatens the interests of the state, social interests, or the interests of other people." [3]

According to the prevailing interpretation, the provisions of Section 13 of the Principles clearly define the requirements whose fulfillment justifies necessary defense. They are divided into two groups: requirements pertaining to the attack and requirements pertaining to the defensive action taken by the defender.[4]

The attack, in the first place, must be socially dangerous, i.e., the actions of the attacker must be intended to cause real harm to the social or lawful interests of individuals. Most often, the socially dangerous attack is effected by action, but in some cases failure to act may justify necessary defense.

Necessary defense is permissible not only against criminal acts but also against other dangerous conduct of individuals. For instance, it is permissible against acts committed by insane persons or minors whose actions, although dangerous in an objective sense, are not qualified as crimes.[5]

The right to necessary defense arises only if the attack is socially dangerous in an objective sense.[6]

The attack, in the second place, must be actual, i.e., the attacker must have started to cause harm to the interests protected by law, or constitute a direct and real threat that harm will be caused, exists, or is imminent.[7]

The state of necessary defense exists as long as the attack has not been completed, i.e., still remains actual.[8] It should be pointed out that the U.S.S.R. Supreme Court, in its ruling of December 4, 1969, established that "the state of necessary defense cannot be considered to have been removed when the act of self-defense directly followed the already completed attack, but because of the circumstances of the case, the moment of its completion was not clear to the defender."[1]

Soviet theory and judicial practice also deal with the concept of imaginary defense. Imaginary defense implies a mistake of fact and in such cases, provisions of the Criminal Code dealing with responsibility for criminal acts committed in error apply. According to the interpretation of the U.S.S.R. Supreme Court, "imaginary defense excludes criminal responsibility only when all circumstances of the incident gave the person who employed the means of defense reason to assume that a real attack was taking place and he did not realize that his assumption was erroneous."[2] If, however, a man who caused the harm in a state of imaginary defense did not realize, but in view of the circumstances should and could have realized, that the socially dangerous act was not taking place, his action should be considered a crime committed through negligence.[3]

Requirements pertaining to the action of the defender constituting necessary defense are: (1) the defense must be undertaken in order to protect the interests of the Soviet state (i.e., the Constitution, external security, socialist property, socialist order, etc.), social interests (i.e., the functioning of social organizations, social property, social order, etc.) and, finally, the person, rights and legal interests of the defender or another person; (2) defense is effected by causing harm to the attacker or his property; (3) the defensive actions must not exceed the limits of necessity.

For the last requirement, it should be pointed out that according to the interpretation of the provisions of Section 13 of the Principles established by legal scholars and judicial practice, "necessary defense implies active counteraction against the attack . . . and cannot be reduced to simple resistance to the attack or, in particular, to pushing the attacker away."[4] Hence, it is maintained that the determination of the limits of the necessity of defense should be made for each individual concrete case. For instance, it would be erroneous to establish a rule beforehand prohibiting the use of firearms against a person attacking with a knife.[5] Likewise, the reasonableness of the means and method of defense, or the extent of harm caused to the attacker, depend on the circumstances of the case. Therefore, in order to determine the legality of the defense, the following objective factors should be considered: the importance of the defended interest, the dangerousness of the attack and its intensity, the age and number of the attackers, the nature and method of attack, its imminence and suddenness, the real possibility of causing harm, the place, the circumstances, and the like.[6]

The defender has the right to choose the method of defense which, under the given circumstances, is the most effective and admissible.

Finally, the U.S.S.R. Court also stressed that because of the mental excitement brought about by the suddenness of the attack, the defender may not be able to select a commensurate means of defense, thus causing more serious consequences for which he cannot be held responsible.[7]

According to Section 13, the limits of necessary defense are exceeded if the defense is clearly disproportionate to the character and danger of the attack. The causing of harm in a case of exceeding the limits of defense constitutes a crime and the defender is brought to trial.

The criminal codes of the union republics provide for two instances of exceeding the limits of necessary defense as independent offenses. These are homicide (Sec. 105, RSFSR Criminal Code) and serious or less serious bodily harm (Sec. 111, RSFSR CRiminal Code). Other instances of excessive necessary defense are punishable under the relevant provisions of the Criminal Code dealing with offenses against persons or property. In such cases, however, excessive necessary defense should be treated as an extenuating circumstance (Sec. 33, Principles).

The question of whether the defense is clearly disproportionate is left to the decision of the court which should be based on the concrete circumstances of the case.

In the Soviet Union the traditional division of criminal offenses, for the purpose of sentencing, does not exist. Any act provided for by the Criminal Code is considered a crime punishable by penalties imposed by the courts.

However, it should be pointed out that the less important breaches of the law which are known in other legal systems as petty offenses and form a part of the criminal codes, in the Soviet Union belong to the sphere of administrative law and are dealt with in an administrative procedure. Administrative offenses are defined in laws, decrees, and regulations enacted by a legislative authority or by a government agency authorized by law. Penalties for these offenses are warnings, fines, corrective labor, and, in a few instances, preventive detention, or arrest, and do not entail a criminal record.

QUESTION 9

The Soviet criminal codes recognize three groups of penalties, namely (1) basic; (2) supplementary; and (3) mixed, i.e., which may be imposed either as basis or as supplementary penalties.[1]

Basic penalties are deprivation of liberty, correctional labor without deprivation of liberty, and social censure.

Supplementary penalties, i.e., those which may be applied in addition to another penalty, are confiscation of property and deprivation of military or special rank (applicable only to servicemen, members of state security, the militia, and the like).

Exile, banishment, deprivation of the right to occupy certain offices or engage in a certain activity, a fine, dismissal from office, imposition of duty to make amends for harm caused may be imposed either as basic or as supplementary penalties.

Sentence to deprivation of liberty, exile, banishment or correctional labor without deprivation of liberty is always for a specified term within the limits prescribed for a given kind of punishment and for a given offense.

The minimum and maximum terms are:

(1) for deprivation of liberty for from 3 months to 10 years the maximum limit is extended to 15 years in case of especially dangerous crimes or in case of an especially dangerous recidivist;

(2) for exile and banishment (both as a basic or supplementary penalty) for from 2 to 5 years.

(3) for correctional labor without deprivation of liberty for from one month up to one year.

In deserving instances justified by exceptional circumstances or by the personality of the defendant the court may assign a penalty lower than the minimum provided for the given crime or resort to another milder kind of penalty.[2]

The purpose of social censure as an independent penalty is to chastise the defendant by public expression by the court of the censure of his conduct and to bring it to public notice through the press or other means.[3]

According to the Principles (Sec. 32) the court determines the penalty within the limits provided for by law for the given crime in strict agreement with the provisions of the Principles and the criminal codes of the union republics. In imposing sentence the court must take into consideration the character and degree of social danger of the committed crime, personal traits of the accused, and mitigating and aggravating circumstances (Secs. 33 and 34, respectively). The court judgment must be "legal and reasoned" and in writing.[4]

The Soviet system provides for joint sentence rather than concurrent or consecutive sentences.

When multiple sentences of imprisonment are imposed on the defendant at the same time the court determines a final joint punishment by absorbing the less severe punishment in the severer one or by fully or partially cumulating the punishment within the limits provided for the severer punishment. The same rule applies if it is established, after the judgment is rendered in a case, that the convicted person is guilty of yet another crime committed by him before the sentence has been imposed in the first case. In such case the sentence fully or partially served under the first judgment shall be counted in the term of punishment.[1]

According to the Principles of Criminal Procedure of the U.S.S.R. and Union Republics of December 25, 1958 (hereinafter referred to as the Principles of CP) the sentence may be appealed by the defendant (his counsel or legal representative) and by a victim by way of cassational appeal. The prosecutor must lodge a cassational protest against any illegal or unsubstantiated sentence (Sec. 44).

The review by way of cassational appeal (protest) consists in examining the legality of the sentence and its substantiation in the light of supplementary material presented by the interested party. However, the higher court is not bound by the arguments of the cassational appeal or protest and considers the case as a whole with respect to all the persons concerned. The higher court decision may (1) leave the judgment unchanged, (2) vacate the judgment and refer the case for new investigation or a new judicial consideration, (3) vacate the judgment and terminate the case, or (4) change the judgment (Sec. 45).

In case of a cassational appeal on behalf of the defendant the court may not increase the punishment imposed by the court of first instance, or apply the law for a less serious crime. Increased punishment may be imposed or the law for a more serious crime may be applied only if the prosecutor has protested the sentence or the victim has submitted an appeal (Sec. 46).

The judgment of acquittal may be vacated by way of cassation only on the protest of a prosecutor or on appeal of a victim or of a person acquitted (Sec. 47).

Suspension of the execution of a sentence and probation are dealt with in the Soviet criminal codes under the heading conditional conviction.[2]

In case of a conditional conviction the court assigns the penalty, suspends its execution, and determines the duration of the probation period.

The application of a conditional conviction must be justified by the circumstances of the case, the personality of the defendant, and the conviction on the part of the court that the serving of the sentence by the defendant would be inappropriate.[3]

Conditional conviction may be applied only when the penalty of deprivation of liberty or correctional labor is assigned.

The probation period shall be set for a duration of from 1 to 5 years. However, upon the recommendation of the organization or person under whose supervision the person concerned has been placed, the court may reduce the probation period set by the judgment after the expiration of not less than half of such term.

The Soviet probation system does not have special probation officers. Their functions are exercised by social organizations of collectives of workers or of collective farm workers upon their petition, which must be approved by the court or, in the absence of such petition, by a social organization or a person appointed by the court with their consent. General control of the conduct of the person concerned belongs to the court which rendered the judgment.

Revocation of probation is ordered if the person concerned commits a new crime of the same kind or of equal gravity.

In the Soviet Union the equivalent of parole is conditional release from punishment.

Eligibility requirements for such release are:

(1) exemplary conduct and honorable attitude of the prisoner toward labor;

(2) a. actual serving of not less than half of the assigned term.

b. actual serving of not less than two thirds of the assigned term by prisoners serving a sentence of at least 3 years of imprisonment, or by persons with a previous unexpunged criminal record who were sentenced for another intentional crime and, finally, by prisoners who committed an intentional crime while serving the sentence.

[1] The Principles, Sec. 35.

[2] The Principles, Sec. 38; RSFSR Criminal Code, Sec. 43.

[3] According to commentators, conditional conviction is applied to persons who have committed less serious crimes.

Especially dangerous recidivists and person who have committed especially dangerous crimes against the state and other serious crimes, as well as those who have violated conditional early releases are not eligible for conditional release.

Revocation of conditional early release is mandatory if the person concerned is convicted of a new intentional crime committed during the remainder of the term of punishment.

Conditional early release is granted by the court upon a joint recommendation of a prison administration and a supervisory board of the executive committee of the local council of deputies of working people. The court may designate a collective of workers to supervise the conduct of the person concerned during the probation period.

It should be stressed that the submission of a recommendation for conditional early release is only the right of the recommending agencies, not their duty.[1]

A fine may be imposed in certain instances and within the limits prescribed by the appropriate provisions of the Criminal Code. The amount of the fine depends on the seriousness of the crime as well as on the financial circumstances of the defendant. If it is impossible to exact a fine it may be replaced by correctional labor without deprivation of liberty with 10 rubles of the fine to count as one month of correctional labor but not more than one year.[2] In case of hardship the payment of a fine may be deferred or arranged in installments for a period of up to 6 months.[3]

QUESTION 10

The Principles and criminal codes of the union republics do not contain provisions similar to Sections 303, 304 and 609 of the Draft Code.

However, Soviet theory and judicial practice recognize both mistake of law and mistake of fact.

Mistake of law may be based, on the one hand, on the belief that a certain conduct is socially dangerous and erroneously believed to be a crime (imaginary crime). Such mistake excludes criminal responsibility. On the other hand, the mistake of law may also be based on the erroneous belief of the perpetrator that his action is not socially dangerous and therefore not criminal. Lack of consciousness of the social danger of an action excludes the possibility of establishing the intent. If, however, it is established that the perpetrator could realize the social danger of his actions he may be held responsible for criminal negligence.[4]

Mistake of fact concerning factual circumstances constituting elements of a crime refers to (1) object of the criminal conduct; (2) objective side of an act (action or omission to act); and (3) development of a causal connection between conduct and socially dangerous consequences.

In all these instances the determination by the court that the mistake really took place may free the defendant from punishment for a lesser crime.[5]

This question is not applicable to the Soviet Union.

QUESTION 12

I. Pertinent Provisions

In the Soviet Union, the personality principle and the universality principle (universal repression principle) are the main principles upon which the applicability of Soviet criminal law[6] to crimes committed outside the boundaries of the Soviet Union is based. The former makes criminal law applicable to Soviet citizens and stateless persons, the latter, to aliens. The relevant provisions are contained in Section 5 of the Fundamental Principles of Criminal Legislation of the USSR and Union Republics (Ganovy ugolovnogo zakonodatel'stya Soiuza SSR i soiuznykh respublik) which reads as follows:[1]

[6] Soviet criminal legislation consists of the Fundamental Principles of Criminal Legislation which defines the principles and general provisions of criminal law, federal (obshchesoiuznye) criminal laws defining crimes against the state, military crimes, and if necessary, other crimes against the interests of the Soviet Union, and the criminal codes of the union republics.

See. 5. Applicability of the Criminal Laws of the USSR and the Union Republics to Acts Committed Outside the Boundaries of the USSR.

Citizens of the USSR who commit crimes abroad shall be subject to criminal responsibility according to the laws in force in a union republic on the territory of which criminal proceedings are instituted against them or they are arraigned before the court.

Persons without citizenship who are situated in the USSR and who have committed a crime outside the boundaries of the USSR shall be responsible on the same basis.

If the persons specified in the preceding paragraphs have been punished abroad for the crimes committed by them, the court may accordingly mitigate the punishment or completely relieve the guilty person from serving the punishment.

Aliens who have committed crimes outside the boundaries of the USSR shall be subject to responsibility according to the Soviet criminal laws in instances provided for by international agreements.

These provisions have been incorporated into the criminal codes of all the union republics. For the purpose of this report, the relevant section of the Criminal Code of the Russian Soviet Federative Socialist Republic of 1960 is quoted below:[2]

Art. 5. Operation of the present Code with respect to acts committed outside boundaries of USSR. Citizens of the USSR who commit crimes abroad shall be subject to responsibility in accordance with the present Code if criminal proceedings are instituted against them or they are brought to trial on the territory of the RSFSR.

Persons without citizenship who are situated in the RSFSR and who have committed crimes beyond the boundaries of the USSR shall bear responsibility on the same basis.

If the persons specified in paragraphs one and two of the present article have undergone punishment abroad for the crimes committed by them, a court may accordingly mitigate the assigned punishment or may completely relieve the guilty person from serving the punishment.

For crimes committed by them outside the boundaries of the USSR, foreigners shall be subject to responsibility in accordance with Soviet criminal laws in instances provided for by international agreements.

II. Comments and Interpretation

A. Soviet citizens and stateless persons.[3]

One of the leading authorities on criminal law, N. D. Durmanov, points out that a Soviet citizen and a stateless person:[4]

* * * is subject to criminal responsibility before the Soviet court according to Soviet criminal law irrespective of the place where he committed an act considered a punishable crime by Soviet law.

Section 5, paragraph 1 of the Fundamental Principles has in mind, of course, acts considered crimes by Soviet law. It is of no importance whether these acts are considered crimes by the state where they were committed.

B. Aliens.

According to the interpretation of Section 5, paragraph 4, of the Fundamental Principles prevailing in the Soviet Union, Soviet criminal law has no external application except when international treaties provide for the punishment of aliens for crimes committed abroad.[1] Such a view is expressed by M. I. Kovalev who states:[2]

Aliens who commit crimes outside the boundaries of the USSR are subject to criminal responsibility only in the cases provided for by international agreements.

However, it should be pointed out that the provisions of Section 5, paragraph 4, do not make an alien immune from prosecution in the Soviet Union for other acts committed abroad which are punishable under Soviet criminal laws but not punishable under foreign law.

According to the Soviet doctrine formulated in one of the commentaries:[3]

. . . a crime is deemed to be committed on the territory of the USSR if the criminal result occurs within the boundaries of the USSR. Therefore, aliens who commit an act whose criminal result occurs within the boundaries of the USSR may bear criminal responsibility under the Criminal Code of the RSFSR if the criminal result occurs in the territory of the RSFSR or under the criminal codes of the other union republics if the criminal result occurs in their territory.

This doctrine is, in the first place, applicable to crimes against the Soviet Union. An authority on Soviet criminal law states:[4]

An act which was begun outside the boundaries of the USSR but completed (the result has occurred or should have occurred) on our territory, is considered [an act] directed against the USSR and committed on the territory of the USSR. Thus, for instance, the planting of a delayed action bomb intended to go off on our territory should be considered a crime against the USSR.

Confirmation of this doctrine may be found in the decision of the Military Division of the Supreme Court of the USSR of May 19, 1960, which convicted Francis G. Powers, a pilot of the U-2 place, of espionage for which preparations had been made outside the boundaries of the USSR.[5] Powers was tried and convicted of espionage on the basis of Section 2 of the Law on Crimes Against the State of December 25, 1958, which reads as follows:[6]

Sec. 2. Espionage.

The transfer or stealing or obtainment for the purpose of transfer to a foreign state, a foreign organization or its intelligence service, of information constituting a state or military secret, as well as the transfer or obtainment on assignment from a foreign intelligence service of any other information to be used to the detriment of the USSR, if the espionage is committed by an alien or a stateless person, shall be punished by deprivation of liberty for from 7 to 15 years with confiscation of property and with or without exile for a term of 2 to 5 years, or by death with confiscation of property.

Other crimes against the state are treason, terrorist acts, diversion, sabotage, anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda, smuggling, currency violations, disclosure of state secrets, and others.

The Law of December 25, 1958, makes these federal crimes but since its provisions were incorporated in the criminal codes of the union republics, they are also republican offenses.

QUESTION 13

According to Soviet doctrine criminal conspiracy is one of the forms of complicity and is defined as criminal association.[7]

Criminal association is not merely an agreement of several persons to commit a crime in concert. It must be a cohesive organization established for the purpose of carrying on criminal activities.

However, only the organization of and participation in a criminal association for the purpose of committing certain crimes explicitly specified in the Criminal Code are punishable as the crime itself. These crimes constitute crimes against the state and include conspiracy for the purpose of seizing power, which is a form of treason (Sec. 64, Criminal Code of the RSFSR), organizational activity for the purpose of establishing an anti-Soviet organization and participation in such an organization (Sec. 72), banditry (Sec. 77), and the organization of criminal groups in institutions of confinement for the purpose of terrorizing the inmates (Sec. 771). The mere fact of the organization of and participation in criminal associations for the purpose of committing other crimes (such as speculation, counterfeiting money, theft of socialist property, and the life) does not constitute an offense and will be taken into account as an aggravating circumstance if a crime has actually been committed.

Section 17 of the Principles contains an exclusive list of the parties to complicity (conspiracies). They are the performer, who actually carried out the crime; the organizer, i.e., the person who directed the preparation and actual commission of the crime; the instigator who intentially caused another person to decide to commit the crime; the accomplice, i.e., a person who cooperated in the commission of the crime by advice, instruction, supplying means or removing obstacles; as well as any person who before the act promised to harbor the criminal or to conceal the instruments and means of committing the crime and the objects obtained through the crime.

The Soviet criminal codes do not contain provisions similar to the provisions of paragraph 1601 of the Draft Code.

It should be pointed out that the U.S.S.R. Supreme Court, in its decision of June 14, 1960, stated that "in case of intentional homicide committed by a group of persons, not only the persons whose actions directly caused the death [of the victim] should be considered the perpetrators, but also those who, by their actions directed towards the achieving of the indicated aim, intentionally participated in the process of committing the crime." [1]

A similar interpretation is contained in a provision of the RSFSR Criminal Code which states that although a participant did not inflict the blows which caused the victim's death, nevertheless his actions consisted of direct intentional participation in the process of killing the victim and, therefore, he should be considered a co-perpetrator of the given crime.[2]

Of course in case of a homicide committed by two or more persons the court should consider the role and degree of participation of each participant.[3]

Although the Soviet Union is a federal state, there are no separate federal and state courts in the lower levels of the judicial hierarchy. The only court that has federal jurisdiction is the Supreme Court of the U.S.S.R. which, in addition to appellate jurisdiction, also has original jurisdiction in civil and criminal cases of special significance provided by law,[4] and criminal cases against Soviet dignitaries and high officials.[5] Special provisions concerning cases of special importance are contained in the Law on Military Tribunals of December 25, 1958.[6] According to this Law one of the functions of military tribunals is to combat crimes against the security of the U.S.S.R. Section 16 provides that the Military Collegium of the Supreme Court of the U.S.S.R. shall have original jurisdiction over all criminal cases (regardless of whether against the military or civilians) of special significance.

Although ordinarily the offenses defined in paragraphs 1801 through 1804 of the Draft fall under the jurisdiction of the courts of the union republics, they may be tried by the Military Collegium of the Supreme Court of the U.S.S.R. if they are deemed to be of special significance.

QUESTION 16

Soviet criminal laws do not have a section similar to Section 1104 of the Draft Code dealing with para-military activities. Such activities may constitute the crimes defined in Sections 72 and 73 of the RSFSR Criminal Code which read as follows:

Sec. 72. An organizational activity directed toward the preparation or commission of an especially dangerous crime against the state or toward formation of an organization which has as its purpose the commission of such a crime, as well as participation in an anti-Soviet organization, shall be punished in accordance with Sections 64–71 of the present Code.[1]

Sec. 73. By virtue of the international solidarity of working peoples, especially dangerous crimes committed against another working people's state shall be punished in accordance with Sections 64–72 of the present Code.

Other provisions of the Criminal Code which may be applied to para-military activities are Section 79 dealing with the organization of mass disorders accompanied by pogroms, acts of destruction, arson and other similar actions such as armed resistance, etc., as well as Section 190$_3$ which deals with the organization of and active participation in group activities which violate the public order. The latter are actions of a lesser degree or illegality than the former.

The organization of mass disorders consists of taking steps to assemble a crowd, to incite it to commit crimes, etc.,[2] and the organization of group activities consist in preparing plans, and in the formation of a group of people for the purpose o carrying out illegal activities.[3]

According to a Soviet commentator, group activity means a joint and simultaneous action of two or more persons.[4]

QUESTION 17

Drugs

The Ministry of Health of the U.S.S.R. and its subordinate agencies have overall control of narcotic drugs. It approves the Soviet State Pharmacopeia which contains a list of narcotics and potent drugs which may be prescribed and prohibits the use of certain drugs for medical purposes and orders their removal from the Pharmacopeia. Further, it approves the rules and procedures for the storing, registering, and dispensing of toxic and potent drugs by pharmacies, pharmaceutical depositories and plants, analytical laboratories, scientific research institutions, and medical schools.

The penal provisions relating to violations of laws and regulations relating to drugs are contained in the criminal codes of all the constituent republics. They provide punishment for the following:

(1) a. making, supplying, keeping, and acquiring for the purpose of supplying narcotics and other virulent or poisonous substances which are not narcotics, without the required permit (Sec. 224, pars. 1 and 2, RSFSR Criminal Code):[5]

[1] Especially dangerous crimes against the state are treason, espionage, terrorist acts, sabotage and the like and are punishable by deprivation of liberty for from 5 to 15 year, or by death.

[5] "Making" means producing by any method and in any quantity, "supplying," disposing of a drug to another person by sale, gift, transfer, lease, and the like, "keeping" for the purpose of supplying means temporary possession with intent to dispose of to another person, and "acquiring for the purpose of supplying," obtaining by any means in order to further dispose thereof (Komentarii, p. 473–474).

b. violations of the rules established for producing, keeping, issuing, registering, transporting or dispatching narcotics and other poisonous drugs which are not narcotics (Sec. 224, par. 3, RSFSR Criminal Code);

(2) cultivating opium poppies, Indian, South Manchurian and South Chuisk hemp without the required permit (Sec. 225, RSFSR Criminal Code);

(3) smuggling narcotics, virulent and poisonous substances which constitutes a crime against the state (Sec. 78, RSFSR Criminal Code);

(4) keeping dens for the use of narcotics (Sec. 226, RSFSR Criminal Code);

(5) influencing minors to use narcotics (Sec. 210, RSFSR Criminal Code);

(6) use of narcotics. This is penalized only in the Kirghiz, Azerbaijan, Armenian, and Turkmen republics;

(7) theft of opium, penalized in the Kirghiz SSSR.

Gambling and Prostitution

In the Soviet Union gamblers and prostitutes are considered parasites[1] and if they willfully refuse to comply with a decision of the proper authority ordering them to work and stop their parasitic existence, they may be subject to criminal responsibility under the provisions of Section 209, of the RSFSR Criminal Code which reads as follows:

Sec. 209,. The willfull refusal, by a person leading an antisocial life, to comply with the decision of an executive committee of the district (city) council of the deputies of working people concerning the taking up of employment and stopping his parasitic existence, shall be punished by deprivation of liberty for a term not exceeding one year or correctional labor for the same term.

The same sactions committed by persons previously convicted on the basis of the first paragraph of this section shall be punished by deprivation of liberty for a term not exceeding two years.

The prosecution under Section 209, may be instituted only if a gambler or a prostitute was directed to an assigned employment and failed to report for work or, after reporting, was absent from work or left it without reason. Such actions are considered to be wilful and to justify prosecution.[2]

Promoting and facilitating gambling and prostitution are penalized under Section 226, RSFSR Criminal Code, which reads as follows:

Sec. 226. The operation of houses of prostitution and pandering for material gain as well as the operation of dens for the use of narcotics or for gambling shall be punished by deprivation of liberty for a term not exceeding 5 years, with or without exile, with or without confiscation of property, or with banishment for the same period, with or without confiscation of property.

According to the established interpretation, operating a house of prostitution means permitting a place to be used regularly for carrying on sexual relations by a man and a woman or a man and another man. Pandering includes soliciting a person to patronize a prostitute, procuring a prostitute for a patron, providing a meeting place and the like.[3]

Causing a minor to engage in gambling or prostitution is dealt with in Section 210 of the RSFSR Criminal Code. It can be accomplished by active behavior (suggestions, persuasion, threats, promises, deceit), psychological influence, or coercion.[4]

Homosexual Activities

According to Section 121 of the RSFSR Criminal Code, homosexual activities (i.e., sexual relations of a man with another man) regardless of whether between consenting or non-consenting adults, constitutes a crime and is punishable by deprivation of liberty for up to 5 years. The harsher penalty of deprivation of liberty is provided if physical force was used, if it was committed with a minor, or advantage was taken of a dependency relationship.[5]

Obscenity

Section 228 of the RSFSR Criminal Code provides penalties for the manufacture, dissemination, or advertising of pornographic writings, printed publi-

[1] A parasite is any able-bodied adult who for a prolonged period of time is not employed in a socially useful job and supports himself by engaging in activities which are prohibited by law or are in conflict with socialist morality. Gambling and prostitution belong to the latter category. (Kommentarii, p. 447)

cations, pornographic pictures or other obscene material, as well as dealing in or keeping for the purpose of selling or disseminating this material. This provision was included in the Criminal Code in accordance with the Geneva Convention of October 12, 1923, on the Suppression of Circulation of and Trading in Pornographic Materials.[1]

QUESTION 18

The acquisition and possession of firearms in the Soviet Union is strictly restricted and limited and requires a special license which may be granted by the proper authority (state security) if and when the public interest so requires and public order is not endangered thereby.

According to the basic law[2] concerning this matter which was enacted in 1924 and, notwithstanding some changes caused by the renaming of the agencies involved, still remains in force, the firearms and explosives which may be acquired and possessed by a licensed person are:

(1) explosives and detonating substances for blasting;

(2) certain types of revolvers and pistols which are not designed for exclusive use by the armed forces:

(3) hunting guns, including automatic ones: smoothbore, rifled-percussion, flintlocks, matchlocks and those with a recoiling barrel (carbine type); rifled guns with sliding, dropping or rising locks which cannot use rifle cartridges but can use revolver cartridges; double-barreled and multi-barreled guns for small shot and bullets, cartridges for guns listed in this paragraph;

(4) hunting gunpowder.

Penalties for violations of the gun control laws are provided in the criminal codes of the union republics. The relevant sections of the RSFSR Criminal Code read as follows:

Sec. 217. Violation of the rules for keeping, utilizing, registering or transporting explosive, radioactive materials and fireworks, as well as illegally sending such materials by mail or carrier, if such actions could result in grave consequences, shall be punished by deprivation of liberty for up to one year or correctional labor for the same term, or a fine of up to 100 rubles.

The same actions resulting in grave consequences shall be punished by deprivation of liberty for up to 7 years.

Sec. 218. par 1. The carrying, keeping, manufacturing, or marketing of firearms (except smoothbore hunting firearms),[3] munitions, or explosives without a proper license shall be punished by deprivation of liberty for up to 2 years, correctional labor for up to one year, or a fine of up to 100 rubles.

Sec. 218. (1) The stealing of firearms (except smoothbore hunting firearms), ammunition or explosive shall be punished by deprivation of liberty for up to 7 years.

If such act is committed repeatedly or by a group of persons acting in conspiracy, or by a person who was given firearms, ammunition or explosives for official use or to keep in custody, they shall be punished by deprivation of liberty for up to 10 years.

The stealing of firearms (except smoothbore firearms), ammunition, or explosives committed either by robbery or by an especially dangerous habitual criminal, shall be punished by deprivation of liberty for from 6 to 15 years.

Sec. 219. Carelessly keeping a firearm and thereby creating conditions for the use of such weapon by another person, resulting in grave consequences, shall be punished by deprivation of liberty for a term not to exceed one year or by correctional labor for the same term.

various acts involving firearms which are not serious enough to be punishable (in a judicial proceeding) according to the Criminal Code. The Decree includes such acts as the use of firearms by persons who possess a firearms permit in populated areas, the lending or sale of smoothbore hunting firearms to persons who have no hunting permit, etc.

QUESTION 19

Section 22 of the Fundamental Principles provided the death penalty for crimes against the state as defined in the Law on Criminal Responsibility for Crimes against the State of December 25, 1958,[1] as amended (hereinafter referred to as the 1958 Law), for intentional homicide under aggravating circumstances as specified in federal and union republic criminal laws establishing criminal responsibility for intentional homicide, as well as for some other especially grave crimes specified in special U.S.S.R. laws. The death penalty, considered by the Soviet legislator to be an exceptional penal measure, is not mandatory and the law always provides the alternative of imprisonment.

Crimes punishable by death according to the 1958 Law and/or, the RSFSR Criminal Code are as follows:

Crimes	Section of the 1958 law	Section of the RSFSR Code
Treason (applies only to Soviet citizens)*	1	64
Espionage (applies only to aliens and stateless persons)	2	65
Terrorist acts against the Soviet State or a social figure or representative of authority	3	66
Terrorist acts against representatives of a foreign state.	4	67.
Sabotage	5	68.
Organizational activity directed against the commission of especially dangerous crimes against the state and participation in an anti-Soviet organization.	9	72.
Especially dangerous crimes against the state committed against another working people's state.	10	73.
Banditry	14	77.
Making or passing counterfeit money or securities.	24, par. 2	87, par. 2.
Violation of regulations concerning currency transactions.	25, par. 2	88, par. 2.
Misappropriation of state or social property on an especially large scale.		93¹.
Intentional homicide under aggravating circumstances.		102.
Rape committed by a group of persons, or by an especially dangerous recidivist, or resulting in especially serious consequences, or the rape of minor.		103, par. 3.
Taking a bribe under especially aggravating circumstances.		173, par. 3.
Assault upon the life of a policeman or a people's guard.		191, par. 2.
Resisting a superior or forcing him to violate his official duties in conjunction with the intentional homicide of a superior (military crime).		240(c).
Evasion of call-up by mobilization and evasion of further calls in wartime.
Actions disrupting the functioning of corrective labor institutions.	14¹	77¹.

* Includes: going over to the side of the enemy, espionage, transmission of state or military secrets to a foreign state, flight abroad or refusal to return from abroad to the U.S.S.R., rendering assistance to a foreign power in carrying on hostile activities against the U.S.S.R., as well as conspiracy for the purpose of seizing power.

[1] 2 Sbornik zakonov SSR (Collection of U.S.S.R. Laws), 1938–1967. Moscow, 1968. p. 450 ff.

In addition, the Law on Military Crimes of December 25, 1958,[1] as well as the RSFSR Criminal Code, provides the death penalty for certain military crimes such as insubordination, forcible actions against a superior, desertion and willful abandonment of a unit, evasion of military service by self-maiming or any other method, abandonment of a sinking ship or a battlefield, voluntary surrender to the enemy, pillage and other crimes committed in wartime or in a combat situation.

The provisions of this Law apply to persons in active military service, to personnel of state security agencies, and other persons specified in the legislation of the U.S.S.R. Complicity in military crimes by persons other than those mentioned above entails responsibility according to relevant sections of the Law.

Section 22, paragraph 2 of the Principles excludes the possibility of the application of the death penalty to persons under eighteen, as well as to women who were pregnant at the moment of the commission of the crime or at the pronouncing of the sentence or at the moment of its execution.

According to Soviet legal authorities, in such cases an alternative penalty is imposed instead of the death penalty.[2]

Soviet criminal procedure does not provide for separate hearings to determine the sentence in a capital case. The sentence is determined according to the rules contained in the Code of Criminal Procedure applicable to all criminal cases (see Question 9, Sentencing).

Capital punishment is considered to be an exceptional measure and in this connection the Supreme Court of the U.S.S.R., in its Guiding Explanation Concerning Court Judgments of July 30, 1969, stated:

In deciding the question of the application of the extreme penal measure, i.e., the death penalty, courts should take into consideration that such penal measure may be applied in cases provided by law only if its imposition is inevitable because of the existence of particular circumstances which aggravate the responsibility and if the person who committed the crime is especially dangerous to society. The circumstances which were used as a basis for imposition of the death penalty should be indicated in the court judgment.[3]

A similar opinion was expressed earlier by the Supreme Court of the RSFSR which, in a decision of November 4, 1964, stated:

In applying the exceptional measure of punishment, i.e., the death penalty, courts should investigate and consider with particular care all the circumstances of the case and indicate in the sentence substantiated reasons for its decision.[4]

The answer to the question of when the imposition of the death penalty is mandatory is given by a Western writer on Soviet criminal law who states that "once . . . the existence of one or more aggravating circumstances has been established, the court is no longer at liberty to disregard them (barring the circumstance mentioned by point 1 of Art. 39 [of the RSFSR Criminal Code])."[5]

An exclusive list of aggravating circumstances is contained in Section 34 of the Fundamental Principles and Section 39 of the RSFSR Criminal Code (for details see Question 9, Sentencing).

QUESTION 20

There are two main characteristic features of the Soviet criminal law system. The first is that all-union (federal) criminal laws become, explicitly or implicitly, republican criminal laws.[6] The second is that, according to the Soviet judicial system, each constituent republic has its own hierarchy of courts with a supreme court at the top. The only federal courts are the Supreme Court of the U.S.S.R. and military tribunals set up within the military districts which do not coincide with the territories of the constituent republics.

Consequently, republican courts are competent to try any case under their jurisdiction.

The penalties for multiple related offenses are dealt with in Section 40, Assignment of Punishment where Several Crimes have been committed, and Section 41, Assignment of Punishment under Several Judgments, of the RSFSR Criminal Code. The provisions of these sections were discussed in the answer to Question 9.

Rules for multiple prosecution and trials are contained in the republican codes of criminal procedure.

The pertinent provisions of the RSFSR Code of Criminal Procedure read as follows: [1]

Article 26. Joinder and disjoinder of criminal cases. There may be joined in one proceeding only cases in which several persons are accused of complicity in committing one or several crimes, or cases in which one person is accused of commission of several crimes or of concealment of such crimes or failure to report them when not promised in advance.

The disjoinder of a case shall be permitted only in necessary instances, if it will not affect the thoroughness, completeness, and objectivity of the analysis and resolution of a case.

Joinder and disjoinder of cases shall be carried out by decree of a person conducting an inquiry, investigator, or procurator, or by ruling or decree of a court.

Article 42. Determination of Jurisdiction in combining criminal cases. When one person or a group of persons is accused of committing several crimes, the cases concerning which are within the jurisdiction of courts of different kinds, a case embracing all the crimes shall be considered by the highest of such courts.

If a case in which one person or a group of persons is accused of committing several crimes is within the jurisdiction of a military tribunal with respect to at least one person or one crime, a case embracing all the persons and crimes shall be considered by the military tribunal in conformity with Article 12 of the Statute on Military Tribunals.

A case which on these or any other grounds is within the jurisdiction simultaneously of several courts of the same kind shall be considered by the court of the district where the preliminary investigation or inquiry in the case is completed.

Article 232. Returning case for supplementary investigation. A court in administrative session shall refer a case for supplementary investigation in the event of:

(1) an insufficiency in the conduct of the inquiry or preliminary investigation.

(2) the substantial violation of criminal procedure law in the conduct of the inquiry or preliminary investigation:

(3) the existence of grounds for the presenting to the accused another accusation connected with the one previously presented, or for changing the accusation to a graver one or one differing substantially in factual circumstances from the accusation contained in the conclusion to indict.

(4) the existence of grounds for instituting criminal proceedings against other persons in a given case when it is impossible to separate the materials of the case concerning them:

(5) incorrect joinder or disjoinder of a case.

A case shall be referred to the procurator for supplementary investigation. In this connection the court shall be obliged to indicate in its ruling upon what grounds the case is returned and what circumstances must be elucidated supplementarily.

When referring a case for supplementary investigation, a court shall be obliged to resolve the question of a measure of restraint with respect to the accused.

Article 396. Disjoinder of case concerning minor into separate proceeding. If a minor has participated in the commission of a crime together with adults,

[1] Translation taken from H. J. Berman and J. W. Spindler, Soviet Law and Procedure. The RSFSR Codes, Harvard University Press, Cambridge, Mass., 1966.

the case concerning him must, when possible, be disjoined into a separate proceeding at the stage of the preliminary investigation.

In the event that disjoinder into a separate proceeding concerning the minor may create substantial obstacles to the thorough, complete, and objective analysis of the circumstances of the case, the rules of the present chapter shall be applicable to a minor prosecuted as an accused in the same case with adults.

SOUTH VIETNAM

This report is based on the provisions of the Draft Criminal Code and the Draft Criminal Procedure Code of the Republic of Vietnam, presently under consideration and expected to be promulgated in the near future.

1. The Criminal Code is in four parts. Part I, entitled Generalities, includes the provisions on penalties and defenses. Part II deals with crimes against national security, public administration, and public order. Part III covers crimes against person and property, and Part IV deals with petty offenses.

2. The articles in the Code are numbered straight through, from 1 to 492, with no blank numbers left for future legislation. In the past, South Vietnamese practice has been to insert new sub-sections or sub-articles under the article amended.

3. The various articles in the Code make explicit only two kinds of culpability: for acts done intentionally, and acts done negligently. Strict liability is therefore implied where neither requirements is specified, except where any of the listed defenses is applicable. "Intention" is called for, for example, in Article 116, relating to being an accessory to stolen property, and Article 208, on destruction of documents or objects under seal. "Negligence" is called for in Articles 206 and 207, inter alia, these articles relating to custodians of seals, judicial judgments, and documents, etc., under seal.

4. South Vietnam has an insanity defense to criminal charges, expressed in Article 76:

It shall not constitute an offense if in the commission of a crime the offender is insane.

No charge can be made against such an offender, therefore the question does not arise whether the insane defendant may be found guilty.

Article 54, however, provides that persons who commit a misdemeanor or a crime shall be excused or dismissed from prosecution if insane, but that he shall be required to stay in a particular hospital or convalescent center until completely treated, upon order of the criminal court. The same article provides that the procedure for retaining and releasing such persons is prescribed in the Criminal Code of Procedure.

Articles 141 through 153 of the Draft Criminal Procedure Code deal with Expert Appraisal. This includes examination of offenders by a medical expert. Selection is made from a list made by the court annually. Persons not on the list may also be chosen, but the reasons for this must be stated. After examination of the offender, a written report is made and given orally before the court, if necessary. (If several experts have been named, each will make a report.)

Article 55 of the Criminal Code states:

An alcoholic, an opium addict, or anyone mentally ill who commits a crime or delict shall, in addition to the principal penalty imposed, be required to stay in a hospital or convalescent center until such time as he is completely treated, if the court decides that such person may be a serious danger to public security and orders him to be retained.

If the principal penalty in the above paragraph is a detention, the person shall serve his sentence in a separate hospital until he has recovered.

The maximum period for his stay in a hospital is five years, but that period may be reduced according to procedures provided in the Criminal Procedure Code if his release is not prejudicial to himself or to public security and order.

5. The defendant who is intoxicated has no defense against criminal liability, under this Code. However, Article 55, quoted above, covers alcoholics and opium addicts in providing for treatment after sentencing, i.e. they are handled differently upon sentencing. Thus if the sentence is a prison sentence, it will be served in a hospital.

6. On self-defense and use of force, etc., the Criminal Code has the following four Articles:

Article 72.—Acts performed on behalf of the law and by order of the legal authorities shall not constitute an offense.

If the legal administrative official gives an unlawful order, the judge shall examine the criminal responsibility of the person who carried it out. This examination shall be in accordance with the particular case and without consideration of the penalties imposed against the person who gave such order.

Article 73.—Any action forcedly taken by a person to legitimately defend himself or another person from an immediate danger shall not be an offense, provided that such action does not exceed that which is necessary for such defense.

Article 74.—The following shall be considered as legitimate defense:

1. When an action is taken at night-time to repel anyone who gains entry by breaking through fences, walls or doors of an occupied house unless the occupant thereof knows there will be no danger to himself or other persons.

2. When the action is in self-defense, or in defense of others, against a burglar or robber using violence.

Article 75.—It shall not constitute a crime if during the commission thereof the person is under pressure which he is unable to resist.

It shall not constitute an offense if a person takes emergency action to safeguard himself or others against a danger which would definitely have occurred had such preventive action not been taken provided, however, that such action does not cause damage greater than would have resulted from the prevented danger.

It will be seen that no provision is made for the use of force by persons with parental, custodial or similar responsibilities. Otherwise, the same general ground is covered: execution of public duty, self-defense, defense of others, and use of force in defense of premises and property. The Vietnamese Code considers "any action" or "acts" or "emergency action" justifiable, with far less restriction and definition than is found in the U.S. Draft Code. Article 72 is equivalent to the U.S. Section 602 regarding execution of public duty. The U.S. Code extends the protection to persons directed by a public servant to assist him, unless the action is plainly unlawful. The Vietnamese Code leaves it up to the judge to consider on its own merits each such case of obeying an unlawful order.

Sections 603 and 604, covering self-defense and the defense of others, have Article 73 as their counterpart. Again, where the U.S. Code spells out what danger would justify the use of force upon another person, i.e. danger of imminent unlawful bodily injury, sexual assault, etc., the Vietnamese Code merely says "immediate danger." No provision is made in the Vietnamese Code for use of force by persons with parental or similar responsibilities. The use of force in defense of premises and property is limited and cannot expose the trespasser to substantial danger of serious bodily injury. Under the Vietnamese Code, action taken at night to repel a trespasser who has broken in, is justifiable unless it is known there will be no danger to the occupant or others. The same principle is enunciated in both Codes: that a person is not justified in using more force than is necessary and appropriate under the circumstances. Just as the U.S. Code explicitly states the circumstances in which deadly force is justified, the Vietnamese Code too, in its Articles 84 and 85, states as below:

Article 84.—A person shall be excused from penalty for any immediate reaction to a provocation, violation or threat against his body, property or honor, even if such reaction is not commensurate with the provocation.

Article 85.—A person shall be excused from penalty for any action taken during the daytime against anyone who breaks entry through fences, walls, gates or doors of any house or room which is occupied.

7. Crimes are classified for purposes of sentencing, into three categories as below:

Article 17.—According to the seriousness of the penalty provided, criminal offenses can be divided into three categories: petty offense, misdemeanor, and crime, or felony.

An offense for which the criminal law prescribed a police penalty is called a petty offense. If the criminal law provides a light penalty, it is called a misdemeanor. If the criminal law specifies a heavy penalty, it is called a crime, or felony.

S. Article 21 lists the penalties. For crimes, or felonies, they are death, hard labor for life, deportation, time-limited hard labor, solitary confinement and confinement. For misdemeanors, the penalities are imprisonment and fine. For petty offenses, the penalties are detention and fine.

Article 25 provides that time-limited hard labor is to be not less than five and not more than twenty years. Confinement is to be not less than five nor more than ten years. Deportation is permanent exile to a separate place in Vietnamese territory, to be determined by law. Solitary confinement is to be for not less than five and not more than twenty years.

Imprisonment in misdemeanor cases is for not less than eleven days and not more than five years. The minimum amount of fine is 601 piastres, the maximum to be determined by law according to the offense. Detention for petty offenses is to be not less than one and not more than ten days, while the fine is to be not less than 20 piastres and not more than 600. The Code also provides for auxiliary penalties, which can be an automatic consequence of some principal penalties as provided for in the Code. Complementary penalties may also be pronounced by the judge if deemed necessary.

The Vietnamese Criminal Code not only provides a comprehensive list of penalties, it also provides for penalties and fines against properties, damages, security measures, forfeiture of liberties as a security measure, restriction of freedom, and security measures on property.

Suspension of sentence is provided for by Article 611 of the Criminal Procedure Code:

In pronouncing an imprisonment or a fine, the court can, by issuing order stating the reasons therefor, authorize a suspended sentence if the convict has never been sentenced to imprisonment for criminal offense or a misdemeanor.

The Criminal Code has provisions for sentences of a form of probation:

Article 56.—Minors of the age of 13 [or over] who commit a crime can be required to stay, until they attain the age of 21, at the house of a trustworthy person, at a benevolent association, an educational headquarters, a vocational training center, or a juvenile protection center.

However, they may be released by the court which originally imposed their sentence, if the foregoing person or centers report that those minors have improved.

Article 57.—Hoodlums, vagrants, beggars, etc., after having served their sentence, shall automatically be required to stay for a period of three years in a re-education center or a vocational orientation center for three years at the most.

However, they may be released by the court which originally imposed their sentence if the director of the re-education or vocational training center reports that they have improved.

The Criminal Code provides for determinate sentences of imprisonment.

The Code contains special provisions for recidivists, somewhat similar to the U.S. provisions for dangerous special offenders.

Article 96.—Anyone who formerly received a punishment involving imprisonment and loss of civil rights and who has thereafter committed a second crime for which confinement is prescribed, shall be sentenced to limited hard labor.

If the second crime results in a sentence to solitary confinement, he shall receive the maximum penalty prescribed for solitary confinement, and such maximum can be doubled.

If the second crime results in deportation, he shall receive a penalty of life at hard labor.

One who had previously been sentenced for life at hard labor and who thereafter commits a second crime for which the penalty is the same, shall be sentenced to death.

Article 97.—Anyone who has been sentenced to more than one year of imprisonment and who, within five years after expiration of that sentence or after the penalty has been prescribed by time, commits another misdemeanor or crime which results in a sentence of imprisonment, shall be sentenced to the maximum degree of the stipulated penalty and that degree can be doubled.

Further, he may be subject to a prohibition of residence for from five to ten years.

Article 98.—The increase of penalty in the foregoing article shall also apply to any offender who was formerly sentenced to more than one year of imprisonment for a misdemeanor and who repeats the same offense within the same five-year period, or who commits a felony the penalty for which is imprisonment.

Anyone who was formerly sentenced to up to one year of imprisonment for a misdemeanor and who repeats the same offense within the same five-year period, shall be sentenced to an imprisonment penalty of double the penalty imposed for the previous offense, but such new penalty shall not exceed double the maximum penalty.

Sentences for crimes against national security under the two codes may be compared. In the U.S. Code, wartime participation in, or facilitation of, military activity of the enemy is a Class A felony. In the Vietnamese Code, colluding with another country in time of war or assisting in its hostile activities, according to Articles 108 and 111, is treason and punishable with death. Engaging in armed insurrection under the Code is a Class B felony, leading it is a Class A felony, and advocating it is a Class C felony. Under the Vietnamese Code, using weapons to struggle against Vietnam, without further distinction, is punishable with death. Inducing others to do so is also punishable with death. Sabotage in the U.S. Code is either a Class A or a Class B felony; in the Vietnamese Code intentionally destroying or damaging any ship, aircraft, material, supplies, etc., which can be used in the national defense is punishable with death. Espionage, a Class A or Class B felony under the U.S. Code, carries the death penalty under the Vietnamese one.

Other crimes in this category, such as maintaining liaison with an enemy country without authorization, negligent disclosure of a national defense secret, etc., are punishable with limited hard labor.

There are mandatory minimum prison sentences under the Vietnamese Draft Criminal Code.

The equivalent to proposed §3003 (Persistent Misdemeanant) would be Article 98, already cited above, providing that anyone sentenced previously to up to one year's imprisonment for a misdemeanor, and who repeats it within a five year period, will be liable to double the penalty imposed for the first offense, but not more than double the maximum.

Judges are not required to give written reasons for sentences imposed.

Regarding the review of sentences on appeal to a higher court, Article 439 of the Criminal Procedure Codes states as below:

If the appeal is made by the public prosecutor, the court of appeal can either approve the judgment of the court of first instance or reject all or part of such judgment, favorably or unfavorably to the defendant.

If only the defendant or his representative makes the appeal, the judgment of the appeal court cannot increase the penalty or prejudice the appellant.

If only the plaintiff makes the appeal, the judgment cannot be made in an unfavorable way to the plaintiff.

The plaintiff cannot submit new requests to the court of appeal. However, he can ask for an increase of the payment of damages which have increased since the date the judgment of first instance is pronounced.

The Vietnamese Draft Criminal Code provides for cumulation of offenses in the following articles:

Article 105.—A person who has committed several felonies and/or misdemeanors which are prosecuted at the same time or separately but no offense has been conclusively judged by the court shall be considered as coming within the meaning of cumulation.

Article 106.—In the above cases of cumulation of offenses, the offender shall only have to be subject to the most serious one.

However, he shall be subject to all auxiliary and complementary penalties, security measures, reimbursements, and payment for damages.

The Criminal Code's Article 141 is similar to the U.S. Draft Code's §3301 (2), reading as follows:

Article 141.—In situations stated in Articles 136 through 140, the offender shall always be fined an amount not exceeding double the amount to be reimbursed or paid as damages, but not less than 2,000$.

Articles 136 through 140 deal with embezzlement or removal of money, bonds or properties received by a publicly elected official, public servant, military personnel, etc., received by him for preservation because of his position, and the fine stipulated in Article 141 is in addition to the penalty prescribed in each section.

Article 591 of the Criminal Procedure Code provides for imprisonment for debt if fines are not paid. Article 592 gives the periods for such imprisonment, which are based on the amounts payable. Persons under 18 and over 65 are exempted from such imprisonment by Article 593, while persons over 55 at the time of sentencing will have the period reduced to one half. One half will also be reduced from the period of imprisonment, according to Article 594, if documents can be furnished certifying insolvency.

10. There are no provisions either for mistake of law or for mistake of fact.

12. The Draft Criminal Code contains the following provisions regarding extraterritorial jurisdiction:

Article 10.—Vietnamese citizens who commit crimes outside the territory of Viet-Nam and which crimes are subject to Vietnamese criminal laws, can be prosecuted and judged in Viet-Nam.

If a misdemeanor is committed, the offender shall only by prosecuted and tried in Viet-Nam when such offense is also punished by the law of the country where the offense is committed.

If it is not a crime or a misdeameanor as in Article 12 hereinunder, no prosecution can be made before the offender returns to Viet-Nam.

Crimes or misdemeanors committed outside the national territory can only be prosecuted upon request of the public prosecutor. Prior to the prosecution there must be a bill of complaint by the victim or an official denunciation by the foreign authorities to the Vietnamese authorities.

This law shall also apply to persons who have acquired Vietnamese citizenship after the commission of their crimes.

Article 11.—If, outside the territory of Viet-Nam, any Vietnamese or foreigner commits a violation of national security, forgery of documents, national seals, or currency and banknotes in circulation, he can be prosecuted and tried in Viet-Nam, whether primary culprit or accomplice.

Article 12.—Anyone, whether culprit of accomplice, can be prosecuted and tried in accordance with the provisions of Article 10 who commits at any place whatsoever robbery, terrorism, forgery of foreign exchange or bills, sale of slaves, recruitment of persons for purpose of debauching, or does business in stimulants or obscene publications.

Article 13.—Public servants, government officials working abroad who commit a felony or misdemeanor while carrying out their responsibilities or in the accomplishment of a mission can be prosecuted and tried in Viet-Nam.

Article 10 would make every crime punishable under the Code still prosecutable in Vietnam although committed outside Vietnamese territory, provided that there is a bill of complaint or an official denunciation by foreign authorities. Articles 11, 12 and 13 name specific types of crimes committed abroad which are per se prosecutable. The Vietnamese Code covers crimes committed by Vietnamese nationals, but does not include cases of crimes against such nationals committed abroad. No provision is made for crimes by or against nationals outside the jurisdiction of any nation.

Conspiracy is dealt with only insofar as it is aimed at specific crimes, such as overthrowing or changing the government, or at inducement of people to rise up against the government. Article 121 provides as below:

A conspiracy aimed at commission of the foregoing crime shall be punished by sentence to solitary confinement if no preparation had been made for execution of the crime.

If preparations have been made, the penalty shall be deportation.

A conspiracy exists when the intent to act is discussed and approved by one or more persons.

Article 123 makes persons guilty of conspiracy aimed at causing civil war by distribution of weapons, urging them to take up arms against one another, or by destruction, murder or looting, liable to the death penalty.

14. With regard to felony-murder, Article 329 provides as below:

Sentence of death shall be imposed upon any criminal who:

1. Commits murder prior to, during or after the commission of another crime.

WORKING PAPERS OF THE NATIONAL COMMISSION ON REFORM OF FEDERAL CRIMINAL LAWS

VOLUME III.—MISCELLANEOUS MEMORANDA AND GUIDELINES FOR CONFORMING TITLE 18, PARTS II–V, AND OTHER TITLES OF THE UNITED STATES CODE TO THE PROPOSALS FOR A NEW FEDERAL CRIMINAL CODE

COMMENT BY PROF. JOHANNES ANDENAES COMPARING STUDY DRAFT OF PROPOSED NEW FEDERAL CRIMINAL CODE TO EUROPEAN PENAL CODES

(Prof. Johannes Andenaes, University of Oslo, Oslo, Norway, August 31, 1970)

INTRODUCTION

The present Study Draft must be welcomed as a remarkable effort to make Federal criminal law coherent, rational and intelligible. The Commission has had the advantage of being able to build on the epoch-making work embodied in the Model Penal Code and some newer State Codes. Through these Codes and the present Study Draft, American draftsmanship in criminal law has reached a level far higher than previously. From a technical point of view the Study Draft compares well with modern Criminal Codes of the Continental breed. On many points, of course, different legal traditions and different social mores have resulted in different solutions, both in substance and in form. Sometimes, especially in the General Part, the draft is more detailed and explicit than most European Codes. The draftsmen have boldly chosen the statutory solution of questions which most European legislators have found it more cautious to leave to the courts and legal scholarship, for instance the definition of different types of culpability. The Draft deals with the general questions of criminal law more fully than any existing Code known to the author. This method has its obvious risks, since it is very difficult to forsee how well general provisions will cover the enormous variety of life situations, but the lack of a uniform tradition in the various Federal and State courts probably calls more strongly for a statutory solution than would be the case in most European states.

The systematization of criminal law in a comprehensive Code will facilitate international comparison and discussion. For foreign students of American criminal law the Study Draft will in the future be a primary source. The distinguishing between definition of offense and scope of Federal jurisdiction represents from a technical point of view a decisive step forward.

The following comments will primarily deal with points about which the author has doubts as to the solution chosen in the Study Draft. Some points are of a trivial and technical nature, others concern fundamentals. It goes without saying that it is a dangerous enterprise for a foreign scholar to comment on a national Code: lack of familiarity with the background may easily lead to misunderstanding or mistaken conclusions, the more so since the Working Papers have not been at my disposal. In the short time available for study of the draft it has of course been impossible to form an opinion on all matters. The shortness of time has led me to limit my remarks to the General Provisions and The Sentencing System, leaving out all questions of definitions of specific offenses.

I. THE ORGANIZATION OF THE CODE

The Code is divided into three parts: Part A. General Provisions; Part B. Specific Offenses; and Part C. The Sentencing System.

This organization differs from most European Codes, which place the provisions on penalties and principles of sentencing in the General Part. From a logical point of view this can be said to be most adequate. The provisions on sentencing are general provisions in so far as they apply to all offenses. It is, for example, technically somewhat unsatisfactory for the provisions on the various offenses in Part B to define the offenses as belonging to certain classes of felonies or misdemeanors, when the whole scheme of classification is not presented until section 3002 in Part C. Nevertheless I feel that much is to be said in favour of the organization of the draft. There is a fundamental difference between the provisions on jurisdiction and liability in Part A and the provisions on sentencing in Part C. Part A and Part B belong together in so far as they define the conditions of criminal liability, whereas the provisions in Part C become operative only where liability exists. It would, of course, be easy to let Part B and Part C change places.

It strikes me as somewhat surprising that the provisions on criminal attempt are placed in Part B, Specific Offenses. All European Codes known to the author deal with criminal attempt in the General Part. As I see it, it is artificial to look upon criminal attempt as a specific offense. The conviction should not be for criminal attempt, but for attempt of murder, attempt of larceny, and so on. The definition of criminal attempt represents an extension of the definitions of the specific offenses. Since there is a general definition of attempt, the provisions on specific offenses can be formulated with an eye only in the consummated offense.

I am inclined to think the whole of Chapter 10 would belong more naturally in Part A. To start the Part on "Specific Offenses" with a chapter on "Offenses of General Applicability" sounds almost to be a self contradiction.

II. General Provisions

A. voluntary conduct

In section 301(1) voluntary conduct is declared to be a necessary prerequisite of an offense, and voluntary conduct is defined as including "an act, an omission, or possession." [1]

Such declarations of principle are usually lacking in European Codes. And in legal literature on criminal law the concepts "act" and "omission" are considered to cover all kinds of punishable conduct.

I raise the question whether "voluntary conduct" is required in cases of self induced intoxication where the person violates a penal provision which is satisfied by recklessness, section 502(2). It is understood that such provisions are applicable even in cases where the person has been quite out of his mind because of the intoxication, and if this is correct, section 502(2) is hardly compatible with section 301(1) without giving "voluntary" a meaning so wide that it does not really signify anything. The Norwegian Criminal Code has the following provision as section 45: "Unconsciousness due to voluntary intoxication (produced by alcohol or other means) does not exclude punishment." Unconsciousness and voluntary conduct seem to be contradictory concepts. If drunkenness is excluded as an excuse, this seems to be an exception to the geenral principle of voluntary conduct.

Moreover, I tend to think that analytically it is not correct to list possession as a category separate from acts and omissions. To be punishable, the possession must be due to the culpable act of acquiring possession or the culpable omission of getting rid of it.

Consequently I should prefer to omit the somewhat textbook-like definition in section 301(1).

B. omissions

Section 301, subsection (2) provides that a person who omits to perform an act does not commit an offense "unless a statute provides that the omission is an offense or otherwise provides that he has a duty to perform the act." [2]

The first alternative, where the statute itself specifically makes the omission an offense, does not raise special difficulties. The second alternative is, I take it, meant to solve problems as to whether an omission can amount to violation of a penal statute which, on the face of it, seems to be directed against criminal actions, for instance homicide, burglary or perjury.

It seems to me that there must be a slip in the text. The Comment says that the subsection restates present Federal law: a person is not liable for an omission unless he has a duty to act. The proposed provision itself says something different: That a statute must provide that the person has a duy to perform the act. This can hardly be intended. More often the duty will arise out of administrative regulations (for example the duties of railway personnel), of a contractual relationship (the nursemaid must see to it that the child does not hurt itself) or of the creation of a dangerous situation (he who has made a fire has to extinguish it before leaving). Whether the duty has a statutory basis or not seems immaterial.

[1] In the Final Report, the word "voluntary" was deleted.
[2] In the Final Report this clause reads "unless he has a legal duty to perform the act".

The criminal liability for omissions is not specifically regulated in most European Codes. The Italian Code of 1930 has a provision in article 40, subsection (2) which comes close to the provision of the Study Draft: "Not to prevent an event which one has a legal obligation to prevent, is equivalent to causing it." The Greek Code of 1950 has a similar provision in article 15. The question has been thoroughly discussed during the preparations of a new German Code. By the Second Criminal Law Reform Act of 4 July 1969[3] the following provision was inserted in the Criminal Code as section 13: "Anybody who fails to avert the harm specified by a penal law, is only punishable under this Code, if it was his legal obligation to avert the harm, and if the omission is tantamount to perpetration by commission."

The intent of the last words in the German provision is that not every omission in breach of duty incurs liability as a perpetrator, but only an omission which could reasonably be equalized with the normal perpetration through an act. This restriction seems to be well founded. It does not seem justified that every legal duty, for example every contractual obligation to avert a harm, should lead to criminal responsibility for causing the harm in case of breach of the contract. Suppose X comes across a man with a broken leg in the woods in wintertime, far away from people, and accepts an amount of money to go to the nearest village for help. Later X changes his mind and continues his trip, letting the injured man freeze to death. This is certainly reprehensible conduct, and many European Codes have specific provisions against the omission of bringing assistance to a person in danger of death, but can nonfulfilment of a promise make a man a murderer?

On the other hand it is doubtful whether a legal duty, existing independently of the penal provision, should always be a prerequisite to criminal liability. There are cases in which a moral obligation arising out of a personal relationship should not be denied protection by criminal law.[4] Of course, if a court declares a man guilty on the basis of an omission, this implies that he has violated a legal duty. But it can be asked: Is there criminal responsibility because there is legal duty, or is there legal duty because there is responsibility. If the reference to a legal duty as a prerequisite for punishability shall have a tangible meaning, it must be that there shall exist such a duty independent of the penal provision in question.

To conclude: the proposed provision, even if the term "statutory duty" is replaced by "legal duty," seems to go both too far and not far enough to give an adequate solution of the complex problem of criminal omissions, and that this is a field where it would be wiser to abstain from a statutory solution.[5]

It is noted that under section 401(1)(b) on complicity a person is considered an accomplice if, with intent that an offense be committed, "having a legal duty to prevent its commission, he fails to make proper effort to do so." The requirement of intent in this case will exclude the harsh results to which the provision would otherwise have led. It is not to be seen from the comment whether any difference is contemplated between (statutory) "duty" in section 301(2) and "legal duty" in section 401(1).

C. KINDS OF CULPABILITY

Section 302(1) defines the different kinds of culpability: intentionally, knowingly, recklessly and negligently. "Willfully" comprises the first three kinds. According to subsection (2) the culpability required, if nothing else is stated in the specific statute, is willfully. This means that the most general line of division is between recklessly and negligently.

The Study Draft differs from the Continental tradition, which only has three main degrees of culpability: purposely, intentionally (broadly corresponding to knowingly in the draft) and negligently. Since intention (corresponding to "knowingly") is the kind of culpability ordinarily required, the most important

[3] The General Part of the German Criminal Code was totally revised by the Second Criminal Law Reform Act of 4 July 1969. This reform comes into force 1 October 1973. An intermediate and less thorough revision, coming into force partly 1 September 1969, partly 1 April 1970, was undertaken by the First Criminal Law Reform Act of 25 June 1969.

[4] See, e.g., R. v. Instan, 1 Q.B. 450, quoted in PAULSEN AND KADISH, CRIMINAL LAW AND ITS PROCESSES at 225.

[5] For a more detailed discussion I refer to my book, THE GENERAL PART OF THE CRIMINAL LAW OF NORWAY § 13 (1965).

line of demarcation goes between intention and negligence. Few Codes try to define the different kinds of culpability; normally this task is left to the courts and scholarly tradition. The German Drafts of 1960 and 1962 had definitions of purpose, intention and negligence, but they were omitted from the final text in the revision of the Code in 1969.

Negligence includes, in European systems, the conscious risktaking ("conscious negligence," roughly corresponding to the American "recklessness") as well as the inadvertent creating of a risk ("unconscious negligence"). It is conceded that the two forms of negligence are psychologically very different, but it is generally thought that it would be difficult in practice to distinguish between them. Sometimes specific penal provisions distinguish between gross negligence and ordinary negligence, but this distinction does not coincide with the distinction between conscious and unconscious negligence (see, for instance, section 18 of the German Draft 1960).

The solution of the draft simplifies the decision in some cases where European courts have difficulties in deciding whether the conduct is intentional or merely negligent, and where there has, perhaps, sometimes been a tendency to extend the concept of intention too far. On the other hand it seems that the distinction between recklessness and negligence must be difficult to draw in practice. As I read section 302 (2) (c) and (d), the objective deviation from the standard is the same for the two kinds of culpability: the conduct must represent "a gross deviation from acceptable standards of conduct." The difference lies in the degree of awareness in the actor. If A and B are driving equally wildly, and A is acutely aware of the risk he is taking whereas B trusts completely in his own competence and good luck, A could be convicted of manslaughter if somebody is killed, while B could be convicted of negligent homicide only. It seems that the court would be in great trouble making its decision about the state of mind of the offender, if it was not assisted by an admission from the defendant.

The draft requires a gross deviation from acceptable standards of conduct to establish negligence. European systems do not usually have this requirement, but in some—not all—countries it is accepted that there must be a greater deviation from the standard to incur criminal rather than civil liability. I sympathize with the solution of the draft with regard to offenses such as homicide, but I am more doubtful with regard to regulatory offenses. Here it seems to me that even a smaller deviation from the acceptable norm should incur liability. This is more appealing than to fall back on the traditional device of American law, strict liability. The definition in the draft seems to exclude such a flexibility of the negligence concept.

D. CASUAL RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN CONDUCT AND RESULT

In section 305 the draft gives a definition of casual relationship. Although the concept of causation has attracted great interest in European literature of criminal law, legislatures have normally abstained from giving it a definition. The Italian Code of 1930 is an exception. In section 41 it gives rather complicated rules on concurrent causes, distinguishing between preexisting, simultaneous and supervening causes—rules which it is suspected, have created more difficulties of interpretation than they have solved.

The comment in the Study Draft mentions that an alternative approach would be to have no specific provision on causation, leaving the matter of judge-made law, but that the proposed section is intended to be an aid to uniformity and clarification. It is doubted whether the provision will be of much help. Legal questions concerning causality occur rather rarely in criminal cases. When questions of causation arise they will most often be questions of a factual nature, pertaining to the competence of the expert. But, although infrequent in practice, the legal questions may be very complex and not easily solved through one short formula. The proposed provision deals only with a part of the problem of causation. Thus it does not deal with the solution of cases in which the chain of causation has been of an irregular kind (the question of "adequate causation" in Continental terminology).[6]

The meaning of the provision is, if I interpret it correctly, that in the case of concurrent causes, the "but for" test should not be applied to each single cause, but to the concurrent causes taken together. If A and B each independently administer one ounce of a poison to the victim, and one half ounce is the lethal dose, the death would have followed even if either A or B had not acted. According to a strict "but for" test, none of them could be said to have caused the death, but according to the proposed provision they will both be held responsible. If A administered one ounce and B one quarter ounce, A will be responsible, whereas B can only be punished for attempted murder. If A, B and C each administer one quarter ounce they will all be responsible. If two or more persons have acted in complicity it is not section 305, but section 401 (complicity) or section 1002 (criminal facilitation) that appiles.

I have no objection to these solutions, but have doubts about the application of the proposed rule when the unlawful act operates concurrently with a cause for which nobody is responsible, for instance a disease or defect, or an accident. A gives a sedative to a railroad signal man, with the effect that he is unconscious when he should have performed his duties. In the meantime a flood destroyed a bridge which he had to cross to perform his duties, so even without the sedative he would have been missing. Is A responsible if a railroad accident takes place? It seems doubtful whether in such cases responsibility for causation should be stated unless the unlawful act has led to a change (for instance with regard to the time or the circumstances of the result) which makes it natural to look upon the outcome as a different result from that which would otherwise have occurred.

I am inclined to think it would be wiser to delete the section and leave it to the courts to solve the problems.

E. COMPLICITY, FACILITATION, AND CONSPIRACY

Section 401(1) defines the liability for accomplices. I have had some difficulties with the interpretation of these provisions, which do not seem to be drafted with the same clarity as most other parts of the draft.

Subsection (1)(a) deals with the case where one person acts through an innocent or irresponsible person—in Continental terminology the responsible person is here spoken of as "indirect perpetrator."[7] Subsection (1)(b) is apparently intended to cover the ordinary type of complicity, but as the paragraph is drafted, it seems to deal with the same category as subsection (1)(a). The difficulty lies in the words "such other person,"[8] which refers to the "innocent or irresponsible person" who is mentioned in the preceding paragraph.

There are two differences in wording between paragraph (a) and paragraph (b), the justification for which seems dubious.

Subsection (1)(c) defines as a separate category of complicity the case where a person "is a co-conspirator and his association with the offense meets the requirements of either of the other paragraphs of this subsection." This seems redundant and confusing. If the conduct of the defendant is covered under paragraph (a) or (b) it is immaterial for the question of guilt whehter he is also a conspirator. The comment explains that subsection (1)(c) rejects the doctrine of Pinkerton v. United States, that mere membership in a conspiracy creates criminal liability for all specific offenses committed in furtherance of the conspiracy. If paragraph (c) is omitted it seems to follow from the principle of legality that liability as accomplice only exists when the requirements in paragraph (a) or paragraph (b) are met. Moreover, the intended result seems to follow explicitly from section 1004. If it is felt appropriate for the sake of clearness to mention the limited liability for conspirators also in section 401, it would be preferable to do it by a specific provision, rather than by listing the conspiracy cases as a separate category in addition to the categories mentioned in paragraphs (a) and (b).

In paragraph (a) the act of the accomplice is described as to cause or aid the innocent or irresponsible person to engage in the criminal conduct. In paragraph (b) the act is described as to command, induce, procure, or aid the other person to commit the offense. Is a difference intended between "causes" in paragraph (a) and the more detailed "commands, induces, procures" in paragraph (b), and if so, what should be the justification for this difference? The linguistic reasons which are given in comments to a similar provision in the Model Penal Code (Tentative Draft No. 1, at 16–17) are not perfectly convincing.

[7] In the Final Report, "an innocent or irresponsible person" was changed to "the other".
[8] In the Final Report, "such other person" was changed to "the other".

Secondly, the omission to prevent the commission of the offense is explicitly mentioned in paragraph (b), but not in paragraph (a). Is there any reason why the intentional omission, in breach of duty, to prevent the commission of an offense should be punished if the perpetrator himself is guilty, but not if he is innocent or irresponsible?

Several modern Codes have dropped the distinction between complicity to a guilty and to an innocent perpetrator, just stating in a general provision that the penalties provided in the specific provisions shall appiy not only to the one who committed the act but also to any who furthered it by instigation, advice or deed.[9] This seems a simple and logical solution, which seems to work well in practice.

I note that the Study Draft deals differently with the two categories insofar as "the kind of culpability required for the offense" is sufficient for the accomplice to an innocent or irresponsible person, whereas "intent that an offense be committed" is necessary for an accomplice to a guilty person. Aiding with knowledge that the other intends to commit a crime is punishable, if at all, as the lesser offense of facilitation (section 1002). This distinction is foreign to modern European Codes, where the general rule is that the requirement of guilt is the same for the accomplice as for the perpetrator. If it is felt that justice requires a limitation of the accomplice concept to cases in which there is intent that an offense be committed, and accordingly that special provisions on criminal facilitation are necessary the question is raised whether the same should not apply when the perpetrator is innocent or irresponsible.

It should be mentioned that in European Codes solicitation as well as participation in a conspiracy normally would be considered complicity if the offense is committed according to plans. If the offense is not committed, the soliciting or conspiring person could, according to most modern Codes, be punished for attempt, provided his activity has progressed beyond mere preparation which does not fall under the definition of criminal attempt. Conspiracy itself is only punishable with regard to offenses for which this is expressly provided.

F. MENTAL DISEASE OR DEFECT (SECTION 503)

The difficult problem of the effects of mental disease or defect is, as in the Model Penal Code, solved through the formula that responsibility is excluded if the person as a result of the disease or defect "lacks substantial capacity to appreciate the criminality of his conduct or to conform his conduct to the requirements of law." The formula comes close to the solutions chosen by several European Codes, for instance the German Code of 1871 (as amended in 1969) and the Swiss Code of 1937. The German Code has this wording (section 20) :

> Anybody who at the time of the act is incapable of appreciating the unlawfulness of his act or of acting in accordance with such an appreciation, by reason of a morbid mental disturbance, a serious disturbance of consciousness, mental deficiency, or other serious mental abnormality, acts without guilt.

As will be noted, the German Code uses the expression "is incapable of appreciating" whereas the Study Draft has the expression "lacks substantial capacity to appreciate. . . ." It is not clear to me whether this is a real difference or not.

It seems as if provisions of this type work reasonably well, and that psychiatrists feel competent to testify on the question whether the defendant was capable of appreciating the criminality of his conduct or of acting in accordance with such appreciation. In my opinion this is bound to be an illusion. When a mentally disturbed person does not conform to law I do not see how it could be decided whether this is because he was unable to conform or because he chose not to conform although he was able to. The test is of a metaphysical character. The law, by presupposing, in accordance with unreflected common sense, that the normal person has a power to act or not to act, builds upon an indeterministic hypothesis. Further is presupposes that the mentally disturbed person may lack this power, but it gives no real assistance to the determination of when this is the case. I therefore submit that when a court or a psychiatrist makes a decision on the basis of the test, what they really do is make a moral judgment : Was the man so deranged that it seems unreasonable or unjust to hold him criminally responsible? For this reason I find intellectually more satisfying the formula which was put forward as an alternative in the draft of the Model Penal Code: whether his capacity to appreciate the criminality of his conduct or to conform his conduct to the requirements of law "is so substantially impaired that he cannot justly be held responsible".[10]

Another way, which sticks closer to psychiatric diagnosis, is used by some of the Scandinavian Codes. The Norwegian Criminal Code states simply (section 44) that an act is not punishable if committed while the perpetrator was insane or unconscious. "Insane" here means psychotic according to psychiatric terminology. The law does not ask for a connection between the disease and the act; it is based on the view that such a connection must always be suspected when an insane person commits a crime, and that in any case the treatment of insane persons should be a matter of mental health, not of criminal justice. The Swedish Code has a more elaborate provision as chapter 33, section 2:

> For a crime which someone has committed under the influence of insanity, feeble-mindedness or other abnormality of such profound nature that it must be considered equivalent to insanity, no other sanction may be applied than surrender for special care or, in cases specified in the second paragraph, fine or probation.

As will be seen, this provision does not exclude responsibility altogether; some sanctions are prohibited, others allowed. Apart from this, the Swedish Code differs from the Norwegian Code on two points: it requires that the act has been committed under the influence of the mental abnormality; on the other hand the scope of the provision is extended to cover abnormality which cannot be diagnosed as insanity (psychosis), but must be considered equivalent thereto.

My personal preference would be a provision somewhat in between the Norwegian and the Swedish Codes: absolute exemption from criminal liability in the case of insanity (psychosis), but with an extension of this rule to cover mentally abnormal states which are profound enough to be considered equivalent to insanity. I realize, however, that the workability of the system may be highly correlated to the organization of forensic psychiatry. In the Scandinavian countries the dependent is always examined by court-appointed psychiatric experts whenever there is a suspicion of mental illness or defect, and organizational measures are taken in order to secure a uniform terminology and practice. Thus, in Norway there is established a Commission of Forensic Psychiatry which examines the written reports of the experts and makes the comments it may find appropriate. In the United States the situation is very different.

G. SELF-DEFENSE (SECTIONS 603–607)

One cannot but be struck by the difference in drafting techniques between European Codes and the Study Draft on this subject. European Codes tend to deal with the subject in short provisions in general terms, whereas the Study Draft has very detailed provisions, dealing separately with self-defense, defense of others, and defense of premises and property, and within each of these categories it makes distinctions between the use of deadly force and other force. The provision of the German Code (as amended by the Criminal Law Reform Act of 4 July 1969) on self-defense (including defense of others and defense of property), consists of 30 words only (section 32). In addition there is a section on marginal transgression of the limits of justification, consisting of 17 words (section 33). The Swedish Code deals with the subject in more detail (chapter 24, section 1), but is nevertheless very short as compared with the Study Draft. Contrariwise, the provisions of the German Code which correspond to the sections of the Study Draft on "conduct which avoids greater harm" (section 608) and "duress" (section 611)[11] are rather more elaborate than their American counterparts (see section 34–35 of the German Code).

I note these differences without drawing any conclusions. For the person engaged in defense of himself or others I do not think a detailed statutory regulation gives more guidance than a provision framed in general terms, leaving more to sound judgment and common sense. But for judge and jury the detailed statutory solution gives, of course, more stringent guidance than general formulations (compare the remarks of Professor Schwartz in the Study Draft at lxi–lxii. And it may well be that the situation in American Federal law, described as "non-statutory and chaotic" (Study Draft at lxi, and the reformative goals of the draft, make a highly detailed statutory regulation appropriate.

H. MISTAKE OF LAW (SECTION [12] 610)

The draft has a rather narrow description of circumstances under which mistake of law excuses from criminal liability. As far as the provision goes no objection could be made. Some European Codes have taken a bolder course. In Norway the rule, as worked out by the Supreme Court in interpretation of the relevant provision of the Criminal Code is that ignorance of law excludes liability when it is "excusable," which here means the opposite, not of "inexcusable," but of negligent. The ignorance of law exonerates if no blame or fault can be attributed to the offending person. Thus the principle of blameworthiness or fault as a prerequisite for criminal liability is upheld also in this connection. In Germany the same rule has been accepted by the Federal Supreme Court after World War II, and it is now given statutory force in the Criminal Code (section 17), as amended in 1969. The provision reads as follows:

> If the perpetrator in committing the act lacks the understanding to be acting unlawfully, he acts without guilt provided he was unable to avoid the mistake. If he could have avoided the mistake the punishment may be mitigated in accordance with § 49, subsection (1).

The well-known Swedish Professor Thornstedt in his remarkable monograph on mistake of law, after a thorough discussion of various solutions, comes to the conclusion that the solution thus embodied in Norwegian and German law—"the doctrine of fault"—is to be preferred "de lege ferenda." A person who has shown reasonable care in observing the law should not be declared guilty of a criminal offense, and Thornstedt does not think that law enforcement should have to suffer through this solution, provided the requirement of heedfulness is made relatively severe.[13] Experience from Norway and Germany would seem to support this view.

The comment of the Study Draft (at 47) explains that not even the limited defense defined in section 610 is available for infractions where proof of culpability is generally not required. It seems to me tough justice to inflict a fine or other sanction, be it called punishment or not, on a person who has acted in good faith on the words of a statute, a judicial decision, an administrative order, or an official interpretation by the appropriate public authority.

III. THE SENTENCING SYSTEM

A. GENERAL REMARKS

The sentencing system is a battlefield of differing ideologies and assumptions concerning the functions and possibilities of punishment. It is also a field in which American experiments have met with great interest and exerted a considerable influence in Europe. Of the proposals in the Study Draft some are in accord with the prevailing trend in European systems whereas others, especially the sections on indefinite sentences, run counter to them.

According to section 3001 the sentencing provisions of the draft are applicable to "every person convicted of an offense against the United States". I assume from the context that "offense against the United States" here means offense falling under Federal jurisdiction, and that the provision does not contain a substantive limitation as section 109 (ae)[14] might seem to indicate.

The draft does not contain a general statement on the purposes of sentencing, but inferences can be drawn both from the section on General Purposes of the Code (section 102, especially subsections (a) and (c)) and from the criteria mentioned for the applications of special sanctions, for example, section 3003 on persistent misdemeanants, section 3101 on probation and section 3202 on extended terms for felonies.[15] For comparison it might be interesting to quote the general statements on sentencing in two modern Codes, which represent very different philosophies of criminal law, the Swedish and the German.

The Swedish Code of 1962, chapter 1, section 7 provides:

> In the choice of sanctions, the court, with an eye to what is required to maintain general law obedience, shall keep particularly in mind that the sanction shall serve to foster the sentenced offender's adaptation to society.

The German Code, section 46, as amended by the Second Criminal Law Reform Act, 4 July 1969, provides:

> The guilt of the offender is the basis for the choice of punishment. The effects of the punishment which are to be expected on the future life of the offender in society, are to be taken into consideration.

Subsection (2) of the provision contains an enumeration of circumstances which the courts must take into consideration, for example, the motives and goals of the offender, his previous life and his conduct after the act, especially his endeavors to make amends for the harm.

B. CLASSIFICATION OF OFFENSES (SECTION 3002)

The draft classifies offenses into six categories: three classes of felonies, two classes of misdemeanors, and the category of infractions which is not further classified. Infractions are declared to be noncriminal.

This classification is much more detailed than the classifications which are found in European Codes. Most Codes only have two or three classes, for example, crimes, delits and contraventions in the French Code and Verbrechen, Vergehen and Übertretungen in the German Code. Some codes have no classification at all, but speak uniformly of crimes or offenses, for instance the Danish and the Swedish Code, or English law after the Criminal Law Act of 1967. German law has, in the post World War II period, in addition to the three categories of criminal offenses, created the noncriminal Ordnungswidrigkeit, which may be the closest parallel to the infractions of the Study Draft.

The classification in the draft has purposes different from those of the classifications in European Codes. The purpose of the latter classifications is threefold: (1) to have denominations which express the greater or lesser gravity of the offense, (2) to facilitate technically the restriction of some rules to one or two of the categories (for example, that only attempt of a crime, not attempt of a misdemeanor, is punished), (3) to work as demarcation line for procedural purposes. The classification in the draft, on the other hand, has its main purpose in defining the limits of punishment. The classes are primarily categories of maximum punishment. The classification of European Codes has no corresponding function, since each criminal provision contains the maximum, and sometimes the minimum, penalty. (For example, robbery is punished with imprisonment from 6 months to 10 years; larceny is punished with imprisonment up to 3 years.)

A direct comparison of the draft with the classification of European Codes therefore is of little interest. The classification of offenses in the draft is one aspect of the sentencing system, but an aspect which can be isolated and discussed apart. The question could be put thus: is it preferable to express the statutory maximum punishment directly in each criminal provision or through reference to one of a limited number of categories? I do not consider this a very important question, since the court will have a wide range of choices within each category. The choice of category therefore will not strongly restrict the choice of maximum term. Moreover, there will exist a possibility of reducing the category (section 3004).[16] The designation of an offense as felony or misdemeanor represents an exemption from this flexibility. The maximum term fixed by the court for a felony will be at least 5 years (3 years imprisonment and 2 years parole, see section 3201(3)), whereas the maximum term for a misdemeanor will be—dependent on further consideration of the draft—1 year, 6 months or 3 months (section 3204 and comment at pp. 286–7).[17] Especially if one of the two last terms are decided upon by the legislature there will be a gap between the most serious sentence for a misdemeanor and the most lenient sentence for a felony, and I understand that the draft purposely has tried to avoid an intermediate sentence—"one too short for rehabilitation but longer than necessary for shock purposes" (Study Draft at 290).

[15] In the Final Report, "Extended Terms" was changed to "Upper-Range Imprisonment".
[16] This section was deleted in the Final Report and appears only as bracketed subsection (6) of section 3001.

It appears from the comment that the draftees of the Study Draft felt little doubt about the advantages of the classification system, and that similar classifications have been provided in other modern American Code revisions (Study Draft at xxii, xxxiii and 268). Nevertheless I feel inclined to prefer the traditional European solution. It seems to be simpler, and I see no real advantage in confining the choice of the legislator to six defined steps on the ladder. The comment to the draft refers to and exemplifies the chaotic and inconsistent categories in present Federal law (Study Draft and xxxii–xxxiii and 268). But as indicated there this state of affairs is the result of historical accident, not of considered judgment. When sentencing maxima are contemplated in the setting of a systematic and comprehensive Code there is no reason to expect inconsistencies or chaos because the limits for judicial discretion are fixed in connection with each offense. And it may well be that there is greater need for judicial discretion in one type of offense than in another—that one type of offense covers a wider range of gravity than another. I am aware that the classification system has some terminological functions in formulating various rules (for example, sections 607, 3301 and 3105), but I do not think this is essential.

C. PROBATION AND UNCONDITIONAL DISCHARGE

Section 3101 gives the court wide discretion to sentence to probation (or unconditional discharge) for all categories of offenses, and, in subsection (2), restricts the application of prison sentences to cases in which such a sentence is called for by one of the reasons enunciated under subparagraphs (a), (b) or (c).

This regulation differs from traditional European Codes in several respects, but is, on the whole, in harmony with recent trends of law reform. I shall briefly comment on some points.

1. Form of Suspended Sentence. When suspended sentences were introduced on the European continent towards the end of last century it was in the form of suspension of execution of a fixed prison sentence. The sentence may or may not be combined with supervision by a probation officer. This is still the dominant form, but law revisions in several countries in the post World War II period have, inspired by English and American law, introduced suspension of sentence as an alternative. This is the case in Denmark, Norway, and Sweden. (In Germany, on the other hand, this alternative has been discussed, but not accepted.)

The difference between such modern legislation and the Study Draft is that the Study Draft does not give the court the possibility of measuring out a fixed prison term, the execution of which is suspended. I realize that this would not fit in well with the system of indefinite sentences which the draft establishes for felonies, but I am inclined to think it might be a useful alternative in the field of misdemeanors. I mention that English law introduced suspension of execution of sentence as an alternative through the Criminal Justice Act of 1967.

2. Choice Between Suspended and Unsuspended Sentences. In Continental Codes the unsuspended sentence has traditionally been considered as the rule, suspension of sentence as an exception which needs justification. In practice, however, the suspended sentence has in many countries become the normal sanction against first offenders who have committed less serious crimes. And newer Codes tend to accept suspension of sentence as a normal or even preferable choice for the judge.

3. Restrictions on the Use of Suspended Sentences. European Codes used to have rather strict limitations on the use of suspension of sentence. Suspended sentences were, for instance, excluded for serious crimes, for prison terms of more than 3 (or 6 or 12) months, and for persons who had previously served a prison sentence. The development in recent reforms goes towards the relaxation or abolishment of such restrictions. The formulation of Study Draft section 3101

[17] In the Final Report the maximum term for a felony does not have to be 5 years; it may be any term up to the statutory maximum. The statutory maximum fixed for a Class A misdemeanor by the Final Report is 1 year with 6 months in brackets. All statutory maxima are set forth in Final Report section 3201.

(2) seems to me very adequate. It could be asked whether the list of factors to be considered (subsection (3)) is very useful, but it certainly does no harm.

4. Supervision. It is not explicitly stated in the draft whether a sentence of probation always includes supervision by a probation officer or another fit person, but as far as I know this is traditionally considered an essential part of probation. Modern European Codes give the judge the choice of establishing supervision or not. In many cases where a suspended sentence is adequate, supervision of the offender seems quite useless, as for example, when a middle-aged housewife is convicted of shoplifting. Economy as well as the wish to avoid unnecessary humiliation of the offender seems to commend the possibility of a suspended sentence without supervision. In the Swedish Criminal Code, probation (chapter 28) is always combined with supervision, but if supervision seems unnecessary the court may hand out a suspended sentence without supervision (chapter 27, section 1).

5. Periods of Probation. Section 3102 fixes the period of probation at 5 years for felonies, 2 years for misdemeanors and 1 year for infractions. The comment to the provision says that the draft changes present law in denying the court the power to fix initially a shorter period of probation.

In Continental Codes the modern tendency has been to shorten the periods of probation. Thus the Norwegian Code in 1955 changed the normal period from 3 to 2 years but empowers the court to go up to 5 years in special cases. The Danish Code, as amended in 1961, provides "not more than 3 years", but under exceptional circumstances up to 5 years. The Swedish Code has a fixed period of 3 years. The German Code, as amended in 1969, authorizes a period of at least 2 and at most 5 years.

6. Unconditional Discharge. The power of the judge to grant unconditional discharge is unknown in most European Codes, and in most countries legislators would probably be hesitant to introduce this institution, because of fear that the public would not grasp clearly the distinction between acquittal and discharge. However, both the Swedish Code of 1962 and the German Second Criminal Law Reform Act of 1969 authorize unconditional discharge under certain circumstances. The Swedish Code, chapter 33, section 4(3), provides: "A sanction may be completely dispensed with, if because of special circumstances it is found obvious that no sanction for the crime is necessary." The German law (Criminal Code, section 60) has a more narrow scope. It authorizes an unconditional discharge only "when the consequences of the act, which have hit the offender, are so serious that the imposition of a penalty would obviously be out of place.")

Personally I do not feel strongly about the objections raised against the institution of unconditional discharge. On the other hand a suspended sentence which does not fix a penalty and does not impose supervision comes very close to serving the same function as an unconditional discharge.

D. DEFINITE AND INDEFINITE SENTENCES

The draft makes a fundamental distinction between felonies and misdemeanors with regard to the sentencing system. A sentence of imprisonment for a misdemeanor shall be for a definite term, fixed by the court. A sentence of imprisonment for a felony, on the other hand, shall be indefinite.[18] The maximum term is fixed by the court within certain limitations.

The ordinary maximum prison term for all categories of felonies is 3 years (in addition to a parole component of 5 years for Class A felonies, 3 years for Class B felonies and 2 years for Class C felonies).[19] Extended terms of up to 25 years' imprisonment for Class A felonies, 12 years for Class B felonies and 5 years for Class C felonies can be imposed under the conditions specified in section 3202(2), but the reasons must then be set forth in detail.[20] Normally the sentence has no minimum term, but for Class A and Class B felonies the court may under exceptional circumstances impose a minimum term. The release date will be determined by the Board of Parole.

[18] In the Final Report, a sentence of imprisonment of more than six months, whether for a felony or a misdemeanor, is indefinite. A shorter sentence is definite whether for a felony or a misdemeanor.

[19] There is no "ordinary maximum term" in the Final Report for all classes of felonies. Additionally, in the Final Report, the parole component is not statutorily fixed according to the class of felony, but rather, is generally one-third of the term actually imposed. See section 3201.

[20] In the Final Report, a hearing must be held.

In European Codes the prison sentence for all types of offenses is for a definite term, but with certain powers for the prison authorities to grant parole after the prisoner has served, for example, two thirds or one half of the term. Indefinite sentences are known in the form of measures of safety and rehabilitation, which may be imposed on special categories or offenders, for instance mental defectives or persistent recidivists, and which are not considered as punishments.

Up to World War II the principle of indefinite sentences was met with great interest among many European penal reformers. The idea that the offender should be kept in prison as long as necessary for his reform, not longer and not shorter, is easy to grasp and gives the penal system a seeming rationality which is felt lacking in the ordinary meting out of punishment. The trend has, however, definitely changed. Few European criminalists would, today, favor a system of indefinite prison sentences. In fact the indefinite sentences for certain categories of offenders (the measures of safety and rehabilitation) have come increasingly under attack.

The reasons for this change of trend might be summarized as follows: (1) There is a breakdown in the belief that a hospital analogy can be applied to a prison. Criminological research has shown that many beliefs have been based on wishful thinking, and has made us realize that we know little about how to reform offenders, and still less about the criteria for deciding that reform has been achieved. (2) It is felt that decisive decisions about a man's life should be taken by the courts, working in the light of publicity, not by administrative agencies, behind closed doors and without procedural safeguards. (3) An indefinite sentence is considered to be a harder strain on the prisoner than a sentence where he can calculate the day of his release. (4) Experience seems to show that the so-called measures for safety and rehabilitation have come to sweep in a great many petty recidivists, more a nuisance than a danger to society, thus violating the principle of a reasonable proportion between offense and sanction (although the measures, as previously mentioned, are not considered as punishment).

E. SENTENCING FOR MISDEMEANORS

The different principles applied for misdemeanors and felonies in the Study Draft is motivated by the different aims of punishment in the two categories.

For misdemeanors deterrence is the only end to be served, since neither the time available under misdemeanor sentences nor the place where such sentences are served, lend themselves to educational programs; for incapacitative purposes short sentences are inadequate. Since no reeducation or rehabilitation program is or can be undertaken in short terms, there is no occasion to measure the prisoner's progress towards reform with a view to early release. (Study Draft at xxxiv and 286-287.)

I have three comments; none of them contradicts the conclusion of the draft that a system of definite sentences is preferable for misdemeanors: (1) Deterrence refers both to the effect on the prisoner and on others who might be tempted to violate the law. This sometimes seems to be forgotten in the comments to the draft. It is stated that there "is growing awareness that misdemeanor sentences longer than six months, and even longer than three months, serve little, if any, penological purpose, may harm rather than help the prisoner, and thus impose unnecessary drains on the correctional system" (Study Draft at 286). Even if a three months' sentence has as good or better effects on the offender than a longer sentence, this does not preclude that the longer sentence may have a superior and useful general deterrent effect (as implicitly accepted at xxxiv). (2) Deterrence should not be taken in a narrow sense, comprising only the conscious fear, but should also include the moral effects of penalization—criminal law as a means of creating and strengthening moral inhibitions against socially reprehensible conduct.[21] The graduation of sentences may have a certain function in this direction. (3) It seems unduly defeatist when the comment to the draft categorically excludes the rehabilitative purpose of short sentences. As will be seen from the next section of this paper, I am not a strong believer in rehabilitative effects of imprisonment. However, penological literature gives examples of interesting therapeutic experiments in short term institutions. Certainly, many misdemeanants do not need any kind of "treatment" or "rehabilitation" plan—this will apply for many white collar offenders. In many other cases lack of time, resources and, above all, knowledge make possibilities small. But all this should not exclude an effort to do whatever possible. To deprive a man of his liberty for several weeks or months is such a far reaching infringement on his life that there seems to be a kind of duty for society to do whatever it can to help him solve the emotional and social problems which may have brought him to prison. This question may look somewhat different from, say a Scandinavian perspective, where only a small fraction of offenders are sentenced to more than one year of imprisonment, than in the United States which has relied so heavily on long prison sentences.[22]

The comments to the draft express the opinion that if the maximum for misdemeanors is fixed at 1 year, provisions permitting parole of a defendant after serving 6 months should be considered (see p. 287). I wholeheartedly agree with this suggestion. Scandinavian Codes authorize release on parole for considerably lower sentences. This question has been the subject of coordinated legislation in all the Scandinavian countries in recent years. In Denmark, Finland, Norway and Sweden the rule now is that a prisoner is eligible for parole when he has served two thirds of the sentence, but at least 4 months. The great majority of prisoners are released on this date; only when special circumstances make release inadvisable is the date of release postponed, and perhaps the whole term served. When special reasons so warrant the prisoner may be released after having served half of the sentence, at least 4 months. This rule is used rather restrictively, and has its most important field of application for long prison sentences. The German Code, section 57 (as amended in 1969) has rules similar to the Scandinavian laws, but the minimum term which has to be served before release is here fixed at only 2 months.

I note that the draft has no minimum for a prison sentence, and since the maximum for a Class B misdemeanor is 30 days, I take it that the great bulk of misdemeanor sentences will be of very short duration. The question of an absolute minimum is not mentioned in the comments (but is perhaps discussed in the Working Papers). Many modern European Codes try to avoid the very short prison sentences, which are thought to degrade the offender and expose him to undesirable prison acquaintances without having a great deterrent effect. The reasoning is that if the offense does not necessitate more than a few days of imprisonment a fine may be sufficient. The Swedish Criminal Code of 1962 establishes 1 month as a minimum, and the same applies for the German Code, as amended in 1969 (section 38). In Norway a minimum of 21 days was introduced through the Criminal Code of 1902, and I do not think there would be any sympathy for a change. It is difficult to say whether the reasons which have been invoked against the very short prison sentences are valid. I know of no research which could validate or negate them, but in any case the question seems worthy of serious consideration.

The German Code, section 47 (as amended in 1969) provides that imprisonment under 6 months shall be imposed only if it is considered necessary because of special circumstances concerning the commission of the act or the person of the defendant. I am inclined to think that this goes too far and is based on unsubstantiated beliefs in the superiority of long prison sentences as compared with short ones.

F. SENTENCING FOR FELONIES

For felonies the comment indicates that the draft takes rehabilitation as its point of departure. Thus the shortest maximum prison component for a felony is fixed by statute at 3 years, "because a useful rehabilitative program frequently takes several years, and the necessary period of confinement cannot be determined in advance" (comment, at 280).[23] The date of release will be determined by the Board of Parole "based on the prisoner's progress". The comment further speaks of the time when a prisoner is "ready for release", "the optimum term for release". Extended sentences (section 3202) mainly perform an incapacitative function.

---

[22] Thus, in Norway in 1968, 2,055 persons were sentenced to unconditional imprisonment for felonies, but only 157 sentences were for more than 1 year, and only 8 for more than 3 years. Of the more than 3,000 prison sentences for misdemeanors the great bulk were for less than 3 months.

[23] The Final Report does not fix a shortest maximum prison component for felonies.

These statements reflect the rehabilitative ideology which lies at the bottom of the system of indeterminate sentences. If the basic premise is acceped that the goal of prison reform, and that the prisoner should be kept there as long as necessary to achieve this goal, it inevitably leads to a system of indeterminate sentences, since it must be admitted that the prison administration, which has followed the development of the prisoner during the execution of the sentence, is in a better position to judge his future behavior than the judge at the trial stage.

Personally I am highly skeptical of a system basing release on the progress of the prisoner. An appraisal of the principle of indeterminacy involves both value judgments and empirical questions. Perhaps the main points could be summarized in the following three questions:

(1) Is the principle compatible with justice? An unqualified acceptance of the principle of indeterminacy could lead to the release of a murderer as soon as the necessary examination has been performed, whereas a petty offender might be kept for a lifetime. In fact, homicides are often committed under circumstances which make repetition of the crime seem very unlikely; on the other hand many petty thieves seem next to incorrigible.

(2) Is the principle compatible with considerations of general prevention, meaning both the purely deterrent and the educative functions of criminal law in the community? Is it not more important to deter serious crimes than more trivial ones, and therefore better to grade the community disapproval inherent in the sentence according to the gravity of the crime?

(3) Is it really possible to diagnose with any reliability when the offender is reformed and thus ought to be released under the rehabilitative theory? Research of recent years, both on the prison community and on the relative effectiveness of various sanctions, has created serious doubt about the rehabilitative possibilities of prison. The destructive influence of fellow inmates and the prison atmosphere works strongly against the efforts of the prison personnel. There is little evidence that a long prison sentence has a rehabilitating effect stronger than that of a short sentence. The traditional skepticism against short prison sentences seems as well founded against long sentences (exception made for the very long sentences which consume the active years of the prisoner). Still more important in this connection: there is little evidence that it is possible from the conduct of the prisoner to tell what real progress he has made and what is the bset moment for release. In some cases, especially those including a psychiatric aspect, there may be a reliable basis for determining the right moment for release. In other cases the whole ideology of reform and rehabilitation seems quite out of place, for instance when an officer or a scientist is convicted of delivering defense secrets to a foreign power. In some cases, for example murder out of unhappy marital relations, one may say with great certainty from the beginning that there is a very small risk of recidivism. In many other cases, for example cases of repeated larceny, it is equally clear that prospects for the future are bad whether the offender is kept for a long or a short period.

Modern techniques of prediction afford possibilities of giving a reasonably good prediction about the success rates of inmates, but this is a prediction irrespective of the term served. We have little basis for relating the chances of success to the length of time served. In the Scandinavian countries most prison staff, including prison psychiatrists, would agree with these propositions. It is possible that American prison staffs have more advanced methods of treatment and of assessing the effects of treatment. If this is so, it is the more admirable since American institutions normally are much bigger and have a more unfavorable staff-inmate ratio than Scandinavian institutions.

The preceding discussion refers to the principle of indeterminacy as stated in the comment to the draft, and does not have the same validity with regard to the draft itself. Through the grading of offenses, the draft has accepted that the length of the sentences of imprisonment must rest in part upon the seriousness of the crime, and thus the draft limits the degree of indeterminacy. And a scrutiny of the criteria for parole reveals that the system of the draft is not really based on the principle of an assessment of the progress of the prisoner, but on a more workable scheme.

After 1 year (or any minimum term) the prisoner is to be released unless the Board of Parole finds that his release should be deferred for one of the four reasons stated in section 3402. The first reason is that there is a substantial risk that he will not conform to reasonable conditions of parole. The most important condition is that the parolee not commit another crime during the period of parole (cf. § 3404). A substantial risk will in fact exist in the majority of cases.[24] As I read the draft, this does not in itself exclude release, but only when the Board is of the opinion that release ought to be deferred for this reason. If the Board finds that a prolonged stay in prison would be in disproportion to the gravity of the offense it may grant parole although the chances of success are not too bright. It is certainly not in the spirit of the draft to prolong the institutionalization of relatively minor offenders indefinitely because they are, and in all probability will continue to be poor risks.

The second reason stated in section 3402 for excluding release is that release at that time would unduly depreciate the seriousness of his crime or promote disrespect for the law. This refers to the general deterrent and, perhaps, retributive function of punishment. The question of a reasonable proportion between crime and punishment will here be in focus.

The third reason deals with the effect of the release on institutional discipline. Indeterminacy of sentence is, in this case, used as a means of discipline, which may be perfectly reasonable, but has little to do with the effects of the prison on the offender.

Only the last of the stated reasons is based on the idea of the rehabilitative effects of the treatment in prison. Release may be deferred if the Board finds that "his continued correctional treatment, medical care or vocational or other training in the institution will substantially enhance his capacity to lead a law-abiding life if he is released a a later date." As previously stated I am skeptical with regard to the possibiilty of making assessments of this kind, at least apart from special cases of personality disorders. It is, of course, difficult to foresee how the Parole Board will exercise its discretion. But from the text of the draft it seems reasonable to infer that release after 1 year (or the minimum period) will be standard procedure unless this is felt to be too lenient, considering the seriousness of the crime. And the same goes for later reconsiderations of the parole question, which are to take place at least once a year (cf. section 3401).

These somewhat loose speculations may or may not be correct. What seems undeniable is that the decision on release cannot be taken on the basis of the prisoner's progress alone, but will be the outcome of a compromise between different aims of punishment. The prevailing view in Europe, in any case in the Scandinavian states, would be that decisions of this kind ought to be made by the courts, not by administrative agencies. The difference between the system is mitigated by the power of prison authorities in Europe to grant parole after the prisoner has served part of his sentence, but the difference is still of great importance.

There are, however, two features of the penal system in the United States, which may make the indeterminate sentence, and the corresponding authority for the Board of Parole, more attractive than it would be in a European setting. The first is the great discrepancies in the sentencing policies of American courts (cf. infra. Under Apellate Review of Sentencing). In European states there are ample opportunities for judicial review of sentencing. This results in fairly uniform sentencing practices; to leave the decision of the length of imprisonment to a Parole Board would be felt to be a serious impairment of judicial safeguards. In the United States this is different. Under American conditions the transfer of authority from the courts to a Parole Board could mean more uniformity, not less.[25]

The second feature is the wide use of very long sentences by American courts, even for crimes which are not very serious. May it be that, historically, the in-

[24] The commentary to the Model Penal Code states that data on parole violation is unsatisfactory, but the data presented seems to indicate that about one-half of the paroles from State institutions are revoked during a period of 3 to 4 years. See MODEL PENAL CODE 118–120 (Tent. Draft No. 5). For the recidivist group the risk is of course considerably greater.

[25] "Indeed, the original purpose of the indeterminate sentence law of California was less to permit an 'individualization' of treatment by a central board than to 'equalize' sentences which under older legislation had been imposed by judges, each of whom used his own standard so that prisoners arrived from different courts with sentences of sometimes very different length for the same crime."

NOTE.—Thorsten Sellin, The Adult Authority of California as a Sentencing and Parole Board (a research paper prepared for The American Law Institute, not printed). The release practices which Sellin describes in his paper no doubt contribute strongly towards the end. Paradoxical as it may seem, the Adult Authority could be said to perform a function similar to that of an Appeal Court of Sentencing.

determinate sentence in the United States has functioned as a device to bring down the actual terms served in prison? Another device effectively serving the same end is the eligibility for parole after having served only a small part of a fixed sentence, for instance one third or one fourth of the sentence. The difference between a "fixed" sentence of this kind and an indeterminate sentence is purely formal.

G. SENTENCE OF DEATH OR LIFE IMPRISONMENT

The Study Draft has not made a definite decision whether to recommend retention of the death penalty, but chapter 36 has provisions for the eventuality that the answer is affirmative. In this case life imprisonment will be an alternative to the death penalty. If the death penalty is abolished the maximum penalty will be the 30 years prescribed in section 3201 (including 5 years as a parole component).[26]

(1) With regard to the death penalty I should only like to make one point. The animated discussions on the subject have mainly concentrated on capital punishment for murder. In my view there is a much stronger case for capital punishment for treason, espionage and sabotage. I mention three reasons: (a) The interests which the sanction is intended to protect may be much greater in the case of these political crimes than in the case of murder. Acts of treason, espionage or sabotage, committed by a trusted member of the civil or miiltary leadership, or on an organized, fifth column scale, may endanger vital national interests and the lives of thousands or even millions of citizens. (b) The deterrent effect of the death penalty for murder is reduced by the fact that the crime is often committed under exceptional circumstances of tension and excitement, or by people who are used to taking ultimate risks (gang murders and gang warfare). Acts of treason, espionage or sabotage usually represent well planned conduct, often committed by otherwise respectable, middle-class people. It seems reasonable to assume that the deterrent effect of the threat of the death penalty has greater possibility of making itself felt under these circumstances. (c) I take it for granted that the death penalty will be retained in martial law. In wartime, and in the preparation of war, acts of civilians may be as detrimental to the interests of defense as acts by members of the armed forces. The wisdom of making an absolute distinction with regard to punishment seems to me doubtful.

In Norway, capital punishment for ordinary crimes was abolished by the Criminal Code of 1902; in fact no death sentence had been executed since 1876. In the Military Criminal Code capital punishment was retained in time of war, and when the legislation on treason and other political crimes was revised in 1950 it was felt that, with a view to experience of modern warfare, the restriction to armed forces and wartime was no longer appropriate. Accordingly the law now authorizes the death penalty for "war treason"—a concept which comprises also espionage and sabotage—for civilians as well as for military personnel, and not only in time of war or military attack but also under certain specified conditions with a view to a future attack.

(2) European Codes usually have imprisonment for life as an alternative for the most serious crimes. On the other hand the upper limit of other prison sentences is often much lower than the 30 years of the draft, for example 10 (Sweden), 15 (Germany) and 20 (Norway). A sentence for life does not exclude parole or reprieve. In the Scandinavian countries in the last decades the average time served of life sentences has been around 11 years in Norway and Sweden, 13 in Finland and 14 to 15 in Denmark. Served times of more than 15 years are most exceptional. This means that the difference between a sentence for life and a sentence for a definite number of years is not as great as could be expected on the face of it. Whether there will, in actual practice, be a difference in time served between a 30-year sentence and a sentence of imprisonment for life will depend on the rules on parole for those sentenced to life. Nor do I think it has much bearing on the deterrent effect whether a sentence is for 30 years or for life, although the latter alternative may have a somewhat stronger psychologi-

[26] In the Final Report, abolition of the death penalty is recommended with life imprisonment as the maximum penalty for treason and intentional murder. The bracketed alternative would retain the death penalty for treason and intentional murder with life imprisonment or 30 years as the sentence if death were not imposed.

cal impact. Consequently, I do not consider it a very important question whether the maximum term of imprisonment is fixed at 30 years or at life, and if the last alternative is chosen, whether the maximum of sentence not for life is, say, 20 or 30 years. It may be only an effect of habit that I personally would prefer to retain the possibility of a sentence for life, and on the other hand have a limit shorter than 30 years for other sentences.

H. CONCURRENT AND CONSECUTIVE TERMS OF IMPROVEMENT (SECTION 3206)[27]

The section continues the authority of a Federal court to impose either concurrent or consecutive terms in the case of conviction for more than one offense, but tries to restrict the use of consecutive sentences and fixes an aggregate maximum of such sentences. The proposed provision will no doubt substantially reduce the irrational and sometimes harsh results of the present system. A more radical, and in my view more rational solution would be to abolish altogether the choice of the court between concurrent and consecutive terms, and ask it to fix a joint sentence for the several offenses. It is hard to understand how a judge can mete out the sentence for several offenses without taking into account whether they are to be served concurrently or consecutively. The fixing of a joint sentence is the solution, which has prevailed in the modern Scandinavian Codes. See, for instance, the Swedish Criminal Code, chapter 1, section 6:

> Unless otherwise provided, a joint sanction for the crimes shall be imposed when someone is to be sentenced for several crimes.
> If there are special reasons for it, a person may be sentenced for one or more crimes to pay a fine together with a sanction for additional criminality, or to imprisonment together with conditional sentence or probation for the rest of his criminality.

The same principle is adopted in German law. (See the German Criminal Code, sections 53–55, as amended in 1969.)

The statutory maximum term for multiple offenses is somewhat extended as compared with the term for one offense only. (See, for instance, the Norwegian Code, section 62 and the Swedish Code, chapter 26, section 2.)

I. FINES (CHAPTER 33)

Section 3302(1) prescribes that in determining the amount and the method of payment of a fine, the court shall, insofar as practicable, proportion the fine to the burden that payment will impose in view of the financial resources of an individual. This seems to be a just and reasonable principle, which is in accord with modern European Codes. I infer from section 3001(4) that the principle applies also to convicted organizations, and that here the financial resources of the organization will be decisive, but the use of the expression "financial resources of an individual" in section 3302(1) makes me feel some doubt about the meaning.[28]

The dollar limits in section 3301, which range from $10,000 for a Class A or Class B felony to $500 for a Class B misdemeanor or an infraction will, however, substantially restrict the application of the principle of subsection (1), in a way which might be attacked as a protection of the well-to-do offenders. Moreover it may be argued that a high maximum of fines may be ever more necessary for misdemeanors and infractions, sometimes consisting of sizeable economic dispositions, than for the crimes categorized as Class A and Class B felonies. Rather narrow limits of fines have been the tradition from a time with a different social organization than our own, but several modern Codes go further than does the draft in authorizing fines which make it possible to apply the principle of section 3302 also against a rich offender. Some Codes do it through the system of day fines, originally a Swedish device. The sentence of a fine falls, according to this system, in two parts: (1) the imposition of a number of day fines which expresses the seriousness of the offense, and (2) the amount of every day fine, which is proportioned to the financial resources of the offender. In the Swedish Code the maximum number of day fines is 120, and the maximum amount of each day fine is 500 Swedish kroner. The German Code, as amended in 1969, authorizes up to 360 day fines, with a maximum of 1,000 DM for each day fine, that is a compounded maximum of 360,000 DM. The Norwegian Criminal Code has not adopted the day fine system, but in 1946 abolished all maxima, on the grounds that minima and maxima for the fine are in contradiction to the idea that the fine shall be proportioned to the financial resources of the offender. It seems difficult to understand why it should be necessary to severely curtail the power of the courts with regard to the imposition of fines when they are entrusted with such broad discretion with regard to imprisonment.

It is true that in many cases much higher fines than those authorized under section 3301 (1) of the draft will be possible as alternative measure under subsection (2), but there may well be a need for higher limits also in cases which are not covered by subsection (2). Thus, under subsection (2) a person who has been convicted of an offense through which he derived pecuniary gain, may be sentenced to a fine up to twice the gain so derived. The comment mentions that subsection (2) will be particularly useful for economic offenses—offenses such as price fixing, tax evasion, currency smuggling, share pushing or other offenses which may represent tempting financial propositions come to mind. But the magnitude of the offense and the necessity of a stern economic sanction may be the same even if the plan has been thwarted, so that only a small gain or none at all has actually been achieved. The comment mentions that it might be desirable to set a separate and higher fine limit for organizations for use when subsection (2) is unsatisfactory. With the low fine limits in subsection (1) this seems a reasonable proposition. But I am inclined to think that the most rational solution would be to abolish all fine limits altogether or at least to fix them at a level which would make them suitable for corporations as well as for individuals.

Section 3302 (2) is intended, according to the comment, to discourage the use of fines, unless some affirmative reason indicates that a fine is peculiarly appropriate.[29] Fine is thus made a "second choice." The wording of the provision, which makes it a condition for using a fine as the sanction "that the fine alone will suffice for the protection of the public "leads one to think of the choice between fine and imprisonment. But section 3101(2) restricts the applicability of imprisonment, giving a certain priority to probation, and it is not clear to me what the effect of the two provisions taken together will be.

In at least several European countries it is considered a goal of penal reform to restrict the use of short prison sentences, inter alia by an extended use of fines (see for instance the German Code, section 47.2). The comment to section 3302 gives as reasons for the reserved attitude toward the use of fines that fines do not have affirmative rehabilitative value and that the impact of the imposition of a fine is uncertain, for example, it may hurt an offender's dependents more than the offender himself. This is not entirely convincing. It is true that a fine can work only as a deterrent, but this does not mean that it is ineffective. A great many of the offenders who may be eligible for a fine do not need rehabilitation, but a stern admonition. In research on the comparative effectiveness of various sanctions the fine fares well, not only in comparison with prison, but also in comparison with probation. Thus, the English criminologist Nigel Walker states that "it is worth noting that there is no direct evidence whatsoever to suggest that this (i.e., a fine) is less effective than a reformative measure such as probation; indeed, prima facie, the opposite seems to be the case." [30]

I am inclined to think it would be better to delete subsection (2) of section 3302, thus leaving the choice between a fine and other measures to the discretion of the court. The same applies for subsection (3) which deals with fines in combination with other sanctions.[31] In the Scandinavian countries a fine in combination with a suspended prison sentence has in recent years been frequently used where a suspended sentence alone is felt to be too lenient and an unsuspended sentence unnecessarily severe.

J. APPELLATE REVIEW OF SENTENCE

To a European observer it seems that perhaps the most serious weakness in present criminal justice in the United States lies in the lack of a consistent and uniform policy of sentencing. For similar crimes different courts give highly different sentences, perhaps based on different philosophies of punishment. Whereas appellate review of sentence is taken as a matter of course in European systems, the traditional American approach has been that sentencing belongs basically to the province of the trial court. Only recently has the question of appellate review of sentences attracted more widespread interest.

For these reasons the provision of the Study Draft (28 U.S.C. § 1291) is to be welcomed. It is, however, hard to understand why the power of the appellate court should be restricted to reducing the sentence given by the court below. The comment gives no reason for this restriction. In European systems it is taken for granted that the appellate court has power to correct errors both ways, except that many of the Codes of criminal procedure deny the court the power to increase sentence when only the defendant has appealed.

EXTRATERRITORIAL JURISDICTION — CRIMINAL LAW — Extraterritorial Reach of Proposed Federal Criminal Code — Government Employees Abroad — Conduct Endangering Certain Interests of the United States — Section 208 of the Proposed New Federal Criminal Code, National Commission on Reform of Federal Criminal Laws, Final Report at 21 (1970).

Although most crimes are of interest solely to the State in whose territory they are committed, situations often arise in which a State is interested in prosecuting individuals for illegal conduct outside its borders. For example, the accused offender may be one of its nationals, or the crime itself may be directed against the State or its government. In these two situations, and certain others of less importance, international law recognizes a State's right to prosecute under its own law even though the conduct asserted to be criminal has taken place outside its territory.[1] Virtually every nation in the world gives its courts jurisdic-

1. See Harvard Research in International Law: Jurisdiction with respect to Crime [hereinafter Harvard Research], 29 Am. J. Int'l L., Supp. 1, 435, 445 (1935). After exhaustive inquiry into the criminal laws and procedures of most of the nations of the world, the research committee discerned five general principles on which States have claimed penal jurisdiction:

1) the territorial principle, determining jurisdiction by reference to the place where the offense is committed,

2) the nationality principle, determining jurisdiction by reference to the nationality or national character of the person committing the offense, tion over some extraterritorial crimes, and many countries exercise jurisdiction over such crimes to the full extent permitted by international law.[2]

The United States, however, has rarely sought to prosecute for crimes committed outside its territorial jurisdiction.[3] The common law has traditionally emphasized the territorial principle as the basis for criminal jurisdiction, and this country's relative isolation from the rest of the world throughout its early history created little need to deviate from this pattern.[4] But, as the United States has developed into a major

---

3) the protective principle, determining jurisdiction by reference to the national interest injured by the offense,

4) the passive personality principle, determining jurisdiction by reference to the nationality or national character of the person injured by the offense, and

5) the universality principle, granting jurisdiction to whatever nation has custody of the offender.

The first two principles were found to have universal recognition, the third, nearly so. The fourth, though claimed by a considerable number of countries, is challenged by others. The fifth is generally accepted only in the case of recognized international crimes, such as piracy. See also Restatement (Second) of Foreign Relations Law of the United States [hereinafter Restatement] §§ 10–36 (1965).

Note that these authorities do not approve the prosecution of extraterritorial crimes outside the territorial jurisdiction of the prosecuting State. The Restatement sharply distinguishes between jurisdiction to prescribe a rule of law and jurisdiction to enforce it in §§ 6 and 7. While the sections noted above provide that a State may validly prescribe rules affecting the conduct of people outside its territorial limits, they indicate that it may only enforce those rules within its territory. Id. § 20.

2. See Harvard Research, supra note 1, for a thorough analysis of the extent to which different countries have relied upon each of the general principles. Civil-law states generally claim a far more extensive extraterritorial jurisdiction than the common-law countries. Sweden, for example, relies on all five principles in defining its criminal jurisdiction — perhaps to a greater extent than recognized in international law. As the passive personality principle has only questionable authority and as it is doubtful that the nationality concept includes alien residents, the Swedish Code also provides that "attention shall be paid to the limitations resulting from generally recognized principles of international law." The Penal Code of Sweden, ch. 2 (T. Sellin transl. 1965). Cf. The German Penal Code, §§ 3–7 (G. Mueller transl. 1961). Comparisons with the civil-law countries of Europe should also take into account varying formal procedural arrangements reflected in domestic law and extradition treaties. See, e.g., G. Stefani and G. Levasseur, Procédure Pénale 294 (4th ed. 1970) (France); Council of Europe, Legal Aspects of Extradition Among European States (1970).

3. The United States has, however, always considered its "territory" to include American vessels on the high seas (and, more recently, American planes in flight). See 18 U.S.C. § 7 (1970). The Supreme Court has justified this deviation from the strict territorial principle "on the pragmatic basis that there must be some law on shipboard, that it cannot change at every change of waters, and no experience shows a better rule than that of the state which owns [the vessel]." Lauritzen v. Larsen, 345 U.S. 571, 585 (1953).

4. The medieval English rule that a trial should be held in the "vicinage" of the crime was developed for the convenience of jurors at a time when the jury took an active role in the investigation of crime. See M. Radin, Anglo-American Legal History 204–12 (1936). It was never held to preclude the prosecution of extraterritorial crimes, but it probably did discourage the practice.

Following this tradition, the Sixth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution states that every accused criminal shall have the right to trial by "an impartial jury of the State world power, and as international trade, foreign travel, and the imperatives of American foreign policy have dispersed millions of Americans around the world,[5] the number of criminal activities in foreign countries which may affect United States interests has grown substantially. It would thus seem wise to reconsider our national policy concerning extraterritorial jurisdiction.

The extent to which present law gives United States courts jurisdiction to try extraterritorial crimes is unclear. Although the Supreme Court recognized the federal government's power to punish extraterritorial offenses as early as 1808,[6] Congress has only rarely indicated an express intent either to restrict the application of its criminal statutes to acts committed within United States territory or to authorize their application to acts committed abroad.[7] Consequently, the extraterritorial applicability of specific statutes must be determined by the courts on a and district wherein the crime shall have been committed," but the Supreme Court has not considered this to apply unless the crime is committed within the boundaries of a state. See United States v. Jackalow, 66 U.S. (1 Black) 484 (1861). Instead, as indicated in art. III, § 2 of the Constitution, "when not committed within any State, the Trial [of a federal crime] shall be at such Place or Places as the Congress may by law have directed." The present Congressional direction is that "the trial of all offenses begun or committed upon the high seas or elsewhere out of the jurisdiction of any particular State or district shall be in the district in which the offender . . . is arrested or is first brought." 18 U.S.C. § 3238 (1970).

Outside of the Sixth Amendment, the Constitution suggests no restriction of federal criminal jurisdiction to crimes committed in U.S. territory. The Supreme Court has twice upheld the exercise of extraterritorial jurisdiction over American nationals, but it has never considered the question of constitutional authority to exercise extraterritorial jurisdiction over aliens. See United States v. Bowman, 260 U.S. 94 (1922); Blackmer v. United States, 284 U.S. 421 (1932). Two Courts of Appeals have avoided searching the Constitution for any specific provision authorizing such jurisdiction. Instead, they upheld the exercise of jurisdiction according to the protective principle on the basis of the "inherent powers of external sovereignty," citing Justice Sutherland in United States v. Curtiss-Wright Export Corp., 299 U.S. 304 (1936). See Rocha v. United States, 288 F.2d 545 (9th Cir. 1961); United States v. Pizzarusso, 388 F.2d 8 (2d Cir. 1968). Rocha affirmed a district court decision which had found express authority for jurisdiction over an extraterritorial immigration offense in art. I, § 8, clause 10, which grants Congress the power "to define and punish . . . offenses against the law of nations," and in the necessary and proper clause. United States v. Rodriguez, 182 F. Supp. 479 (S.D. Cal. 1960), noted in 13 Stan. L. Rev. 155 (1960). Contra, United States v. Baker, 136 F. Supp. 546 (S.D.N.Y. 1955).

The Rodriguez decision stated that the Constitution leaves Congress free to assert extraterritorial criminal jurisdiction to the fullest extent permitted by international law. 182 F.Supp. at 491. Despite Baker, it appears that this conclusion is right — at least with respect to the nationality and protective principles.

5. Counting only federal employees, members of the armed forces, and their families, the 1970 Census found more than 1,737,000 Americans living abroad. Statistical Abstract of the United States 6, Table 3 (1971). A conservative estimate would put the number of Americans in foreign countries on private business or vacations at several hundred thousand at any given time.

case-by-case basis and, despite the effort of the Supreme Court in United States v. Bowman[8] to prescribe a general rule of statutory construction, disagreement among the lower courts regarding constitutional issues and congressional intent continues.[9]

A proposal now before Congress would end this uncertainty by specifying eight situations in which the government would be empowered to prosecute crimes committed outside American territory, including some which are clearly not covered by present law. These suggestions appear in Section 208 of the proposed New Federal Criminal Code, which was drafted by the National Commission on Reform of Federal Criminal Laws and released in February, 1971. The new Code would replace the present hodgepodge of criminal statutes now in Title 18 of the United States Code with a comprehensive criminal code, which would separately define substantive offenses and the situations in which federal jurisdiction could be exercised. Section 208 is the basic provision for determining the extraterritorial applicability of the substantive offenses defined elsewhere in the Code.[10]

8. 260 U.S. 64 (1922). Speaking for the Court, Chief Justice Taft suggested that when, as in the case before him, the federal statute makes no mention of extraterritorial applicability, a court should examine its purpose. If it is to protect private citizens from crimes disrupting the "good order" of the community, it should be assumed that Congress was interested only in applying strict territorial jurisdiction. But if the statutory purpose is to protect the government from obstruction or fraud, it should be construed to cover acts committed abroad, because not to do so would curb its effectiveness. 260 U.S. at 97. Bowman and his accomplices were accused of conspiracy to defraud a corporation in which the United States was a stockholder; as the statute had obviously been designed to protect the government, there was federal jurisdiction even though the crime had taken place in Brazil. While the opinion speaks only of statutory construction and not of constitutional or international law, and even though the case involved only American nationals, the Bowman rule seems to indicate approval of the protective principle.

This Note will consider the merits of the Commission's recommendations in the light of applicable rules of international law and considerations of national and international policy. The present draft of Section 208 will be compared both to the present state of the law and to other approaches that might be taken to deal with the problem of extraterritorial jurisdiction. In particular, it will be argued that the nationality principle should be used to apply federal criminal law to all citizens abroad rather than only to those who are closely connected to the government, as suggested by the Commission in subsection (f).

PROVISIONS OF SECTION 208

Most of the situations named in the Commission's proposal are those in which a court would probably exercise jurisdiction under present statutes. According to the rule of construction established in Bowman,[11] congressional intent to apply a statute to extraterritorial conduct would ordinarily be inferred in the case of a crime against the government or endangering national security. Subsections (a), (b), (c) and (e) of Section 208 refer to crimes of this type: violent crimes against high ranking federal officials, treason and espionage, counterfeiting federal documents or currency, smuggling and illegal immigration, and fraud against the United States. Subsection (b), which covers treason, espionage, and sabotage, and the general "obstruction or interference" clause of subsection (c) are limited in their effect to nationals or residents of the United States, but there is no reason that they need be. Under the protective principle, a nation may exercise extraterritorial jurisdiction over an alien as well as one of its own nationals when the crime threat-interest, or, if committed by a national or resident of the United States, any other obstruction of or interference with a United States government function;

(d) the accused participates outside the United States in a federal offense committed in whole or in part within the United States, or the offense constitutes an attempt, solicitation, or conspiracy to commit a federal offense within the United States;

(e) the offense is a federal offense involving entry of persons or property into the United States;

(f) the offense is committed by a federal public servant who is outside the territory of the United States because of his official duties or by a member of his household residing abroad or by a person accompanying the military forces of the United States;

(g) such jurisdiction is provided by treaty; or

(h) the offense is committed by or against a national of the United States outside the jurisdiction of any nation.

ens national security or the operation of its government.[12] Such a crime may be just as dangerous to the United States if committed abroad as it would be if committed at home. Thus, providing for extraterritorial jurisdiction over non-nationals in such cases is highly desirable.[13]

Subsection (d) would ensure that persons, whether nationals or aliens, who engage in conspiracies or attempts to commit crimes within the United States, could be prosecuted by the United States. This expanded view of territorial jurisdiction has been approved in judicial constructions of existing statutes[14] and does not violate international law.[15] Here too, provision for extraterritorial jurisdiction appears wise because the United States' interest in prosecuting those who participate in the planning or commission of crimes within American territory remains the same whether a particular offender is in or out of the country at the time of the offense.

The last three subsections of Section 208 would enlarge the scope of federal extraterritorial jurisdiction. Subsection (g) would give the 13. But cf. Garcia-Mora, Criminal Jurisdiction Over Foreigners for Treason and Offenses Against the Safety of the State Committed Upon Foreign Territory, 19 U. Pitt. L. Rev. 567 (1958), arguing that the "mischievous" protective principle might be used to restrict the legitimate right of aliens to express their political views, including opposition to foreign governments. The limitation in subsections (b) and (c) of jurisdiction over espionage, sabotage, and general "obstruction or interference" offenses to U.S. nationals might be defended on the ground that it protects aliens against abuse of the protective principle, although the National Commission explains it only on the basis of Anglo-American tradition. Working Papers, supra note 10, at 74. See also Ex Parte Quirin, 317 U.S. 1 (1942), where executive preemption of such jurisdiction over aliens in wartime was upheld by the Supreme Court. Another objection applicable to subsections (a) and (c) is that, through the use of vague language, they have failed to solve the Bowman problem of interpretation. The term "crime of violence" used in (a) should be defined by reference to specific substantive offenses in the Code. Subsection (c) clearly defines the situations in which extraterritorial conduct by nonresident aliens is a federal crime, but the "obstruction or interference" clause applied to American citizens and residents leaves wide latitude for judicial interpretation.

The omission of U.S. ambassadors and consuls from subsection (a) is curious. The national interest in punishing extraterritorial crimes against these officials would seem at least as great as in the case of a congressman or federal judge.

14. See Rivard v. United States, 375 F.2d 888 (5th Cir. 1967) (Canadian conspiracy to smuggle heroin into the U.S.). In the words of Justice Holmes:

It is open to question whether subsection (d) could validly provide jurisdiction in a case where the extraterritorial conspiracy or attempt did not actually cause a deleterious effect or involve some overt act committed within the United States. No such case has yet been decided.

federal courts jurisdiction in situations specifically agreed to by other nations in international agreements. This automatic provision for jurisdiction-by-treaty would give the President a new, potentially valuable negotiating tool. This subsection, however, may be objectionable on the grounds that it grants both too little power and too much: too little, because it is doubtful that many countries would choose to transfer or share significant jurisdictional power with the United States, and too much, because it would give the President full authority to extend United States extraterritorial jurisdiction subject only to the Senate's power of advice and consent. As it provides no standards to guide the President in determining what extensions of jurisdiction should be made, subsection (g) might also be an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power.[16] Congress would do better to provide for adjustments in jurisdiction as individual treaties are made.

Subsection (h) would extend the reach of federal criminal law to cover actions by or against American nationals in such places as Antarctica and the moon, which are outside the territorial jurisdiction of any nation — an extension that could be important in the future as polar and space exploration develop. It finds precedent in section 7(4) of title 18 of the United States Code, which provides that uninhabited guano islands may be deemed United States territory for purposes of criminal jurisdiction, and appears to be consistent with generally accepted principles of international law.[17] In the absence of international agreements governing conduct in such locations, the application of American law through this provision is necessary to fill a jurisdictional vacuum. In the case of space exploration, the United States may have a treaty obligation to provide for such jurisdiction as well.[18]

When Congress has given the President a clear standard to guide his discretion in expanding the scope of federal criminal law, the Supreme Court has upheld Presidential action. United States v. Curtiss-Wright Export Corp., 299 U.S. 304 (1936). Justice Sutherland's opinion in Curtiss-Wright suggests that the "plenary" powers of the President over foreign affairs may permit him to define crimes affecting foreign relations without Congresssional standards, but even if this view of the Constitution is correct, it would be an unwise abdication of political responsibility for Congress to allow the President the unfettered discretion of subsection (g).

17. Jurisdiction over crimes by Americans would rest on the unquestioned nationality principle. See note 1 supra. Jurisdiction over crimes against Americans would be based on the passive personality principle. Although such an extensive passive-personality jurisdiction as that claimed by Sweden (note 2 supra) would be subject to challenge if used to prosecute a crime committed by an alien in another country, the principle is generally accepted when applied to crimes committed outside the territory of any country. Harvard Research, supra note 1, at 589–591.

18. The United States is party to two international agreements concerning territories outside any national jurisdiction, but neither agreement resolves the problem of when a state may or may not exercise jurisdiction over a crime. See The Antarctica Treaty of December 1, 1959, [1961] 12 U.S.T. 794, T.I.A.S. No. 4780, 402 U.N.T.S. 71 [hereinafter Antarctica Treaty]; Treaty on Principles Governing the Activities of States

The most important innovation of Section 208 is in subsection (f), which deals with offenses committed by "federal public servants" and members of their households while serving abroad. As it would affect greater numbers of people than the other subsections, it raises the most important issues to be considered in deciding whether or not to provide for wide-ranging extraterritorial criminal jurisdiction. Consequently, it will be examined more closely than the other sections.

SUBSECTION (f)

As both the Commission's Comment to Section 208 and its Working Papers indicate,[19] subsection (f) was designed specifically to remedy three gaps in existing law. First, American diplomats and the members of their households generally enjoy immunity from prosecution in the States in which they serve.[20] At the present, their acts abroad are not generally subject to the jurisdiction of the United States. Consequently, they may escape all criminal liability in a significant number of cases.[21]

Second, dependents of American servicemen and other civilians accompanying the military abroad are also generally beyond the reach of present United States jurisdiction. And, although Status of Forces Agreements normally allow the host nation (receiving State) to prosecute these individuals for violations of local law,[22] in many cases,

Both treaties provide that the land in question be used only for peaceful purposes (Antarctica Treaty, art. I; Space Treaty, art. IV), and the exercise of U.S. jurisdiction over crimes committed there involving its nationals would seem to promote this goal. Moreover, with regard to crimes committed by Americans in outer space or on the moon, a provision in the Space Treaty suggests that the United States may have a duty to exercise jurisdiction:

> State Parties to the Treaty shall bear international responsibility for national activities in outer space, including the moon and other celestial bodies, whether such activities are carried on by government agencies or by non-governmental entities . . . The activities of non-governmental entities in outer space, including the moon and other celestial bodies, shall require authorization and continuing supervision by the appropriate State Party to the Treaty. Id. art. VI.

Even though a treaty requires the United States to punish certain conduct as criminal, the treaty alone cannot make it a crime; congressional legislation is required. See The Over the Top, 5 F.2d 838 (D. Conn. 1925).

But the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, Apr. 18, 1961, 500 U.N.T.S. 95, has not.

particularly when the victim is an American, no prosecution is pursued.[23] The United States does have military jurisdiction in countries where American forces are stationed,[24] and civilians accompanying the military were once subject to prosecution in overseas courts-martial under the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ).[25] The Supreme Court, however, put an end to this practice in a series of decisions holding that the subjection of civilians to military law in peacetime violated their constitutional rights under the Fifth and Sixth Amendments.[26]

Military law also once provided that servicemen would remain subject to court martial after their discharge for crimes committed while in service.[27] The Court, however, has held that this practice is prohibited by the Constitution.[28] Hence, the third problem is that, upon discharge from the military, a serviceman who has committed a crime outside United States territory is also completely free from American prosecu-

Testifying before a Senate Subcommittee in 1966, Maj. Gen. Guagliardo, 361 U.S. 281 (1960) (members of the civilian component of the armed forces). The Court found that the Fifth and Sixth Amendments guarantee a grand jury indictment and a trial by petty jury to all persons except those actually in the military service. These decisions followed the reasoning of the Toth case, note 28 infra.

Another provision of the UCMJ authorizes military jurisdiction over civilians accompanying military forces in the field in time of war. UCMJ art. 2(10), 10 U.S.C. § 802(10) (1970). This provision is apparently constitutional. See Reid v. Covert, 354 U.S. at 33. The Army attempted to use this provision to prosecute civilians for crimes committed in Viet Nam, but the Court of Military Appeals rejected this approach, construing the statute to apply only to wars declared by Congress. See United States v. Averette, 19 U.S.C.M.A. 363, 41 C.M.R. 363 (1970).

tion, even in cases where the United States has assumed an obligation to prosecute under international conventions.[29]

The draft proposal would remedy these problems by subjecting all federal employees and officials, both military and civilian, and the members of their households to the federal criminal laws while in government service outside United States territory,[30] thereby including Peace Corps members, A.I.D. officials, diplomats and military-connected civilians. Given the large number of people who would be affected by this provision[31] and the significant change from current practice that its enactment would cause, it becomes important to inquire into the legal and practical problems that would arise if federal extraterritorial jurisdiction were expanded in this manner.

LEGAL AND ADMINISTRATIVE OBSTACLES TO DOMESTIC TRIAL

The major difficulties with this proposal stem from the fact that Section 208 offenders, like all others under the Proposed Code, would be indicted and tried before federal courts within United States territory — probably thousands of miles from the scene of the crime. If the accused offender failed to return voluntarily to United States territory, it might be impossible to compel appearance for trial. Furthermore, 29. For a good analysis of the problems raised by Toth, see Note, 22 Case W. Res. L. Rev. 279 (1971); Metzger and McMahon, The Return of U.S. Servicemen for Offenses Committed Overseas, 22 Case W. Res. L. Rev. 617 (1971). The present inability of U.S. authorities to prosecute ex-servicemen for extraterritorial crimes in either a military or a civilian court is particularly frustrating with regard to possible war crimes committed in Viet Nam, for the Geneva Conventions for the Protection of War Victims may require the United States to prosecute them. See Note, 12 Harv. Int'l L.J. 345 (1971).

30. Specific offenses under the Proposed Code are defined in §§ 1001–1861 and cover the full range of crimes to be expected in a comprehensive penal code. Section 208(f) would extend jurisdiction over all these offenses to the persons named except as specifically provided otherwise.

31. In 1970 there were more than 1,737,000 federal employees, servicemen and members of their households residing abroad. Statistical Abstract, note 5 supra. At the same time there were 245,000 foreign nationals employed by the Defense Department who would also be subject to federal jurisdiction under § 208(f). See Working Papers, supra note 10, at 75.

Jurisdiction over aliens under paragraph (f) is predicated upon a corollary to the nationality principle which provides that a State may exercise extraterritorial jurisdiction with respect to crimes committed by an alien "in connection with the discharge of a public function which he was engaged to perform for that State." Harvard Research, supra note 1, at 539–42. Thus crimes committed off base by an alien Defense Department employee or by his dependents could probably not be prosecuted without a specific international agreement permitting it. This would, however, constitute only a minor restriction on the operation of the statute. Most alien federal employees (and their dependents) are nationals of the country in which they work, which would probably take jurisdiction over any crimes that they might commit.

even if the defendant were within the jurisdiction, it might be difficult to ensure that the trial would be fair and adequate in all respects.

In the case of an individual whose crime is discovered after his return to the United States, there would be no particular problem in securing his appearance before a district court. He could be arrested by federal authorities and tried at the place of arrest.[32] If the crime were discovered while the accused remained outside American territory, however, it would be difficult to secure his removal to the United States. International law would prevent the federal government from sending American authorities abroad to arrest the accused without the express consent of the foreign government involved.[33] Formal extradition would also be highly unlikely, for most extradition treaties to which the United States is a party apply only to crimes committed within the territory of the State seeking extradition.[34] Thus in most cases, removal of an extraterritorial offender to the United States would depend upon the voluntary cooperation of the foreign government.[35]

32. See 18 U.S.C. § 3238 (1970).

It is in this situation that U.S. extraterritorial jurisdiction would be most desirable because, if the offender is an American, he generally cannot be extradited to the State in whose territory the crime was committed. Most extradition treaties between the United States and other nations do not authorize either country to surrender its own nationals to the other. See I. Shearer, Extradition in International Law 94–97, 100–114 (1971). For European practice in this respect, see Symposium — Les Problèmes Actuels de l'Extradition, 39 Revue International de Droit Pénal 447 (1969) (German views).

33. In the words of the Permanent Court of International Justice:

> The first and foremost restriction imposed by international law upon a state is that — failing the existence of a permissive rule to the contrary — it may not exercise its power in any form in the territory of another state.

Case of the S.S. "Lotus," [1927] P.C.I.J., ser. A, No. 9, 18.

The NATO Agreement establishes a "permissive rule" with regard to the exercise of military jurisdiction, but not civilian jurisdiction:

> The military authorities of the sending State shall have the right to exercise within the receiving State all criminal and disciplinary jurisdiction conferred on them by the law of the sending State over all persons subject to the military law of that State.

NATO Status of Forces Agreement, supra note 22, art. vii(1)(a).

This would seem to permit arrests only by U.S. military authorities, and only of active servicemen, because civilians are no longer "subject to the military law" of the United States. But see text at note 45 and note 48 infra.

There is a federal statute which specifically authorizes the arrest and removal of Americans charged with federal crimes from foreign countries. 18 U.S.C. § 3042 (1970).

34. See Evans, The New Extradition Treaties of the United States, 59 Am. J. Int'l L. 351, 354 (1965). A few treaties permit extradition of nationals of the requesting State when the alleged crime has taken place in the requested State. See, e.g., Sweden, October 24, 1961, [1963] 14 U.S.T. 1845, T.I.A.S. 5496, 479 U.N.T.S. 358. Treaties with those countries in which the largest number of Americans are stationed, however, retain the territorial restriction. See, e.g., Germany, July 12, 1930, 47 Stat. 1862 (1931), T.S. No. 836.

35. See testimony of Edward S. Cogen and Lawrence Speiser on behalf of the American Civil Liberties Union, 1966 Hearings, supra note 23, pt. 1, at 343, 349–354. The Defense Department once opposed enactment of a bill similar to Section 208(f) because of the high travel expense it would cause. Id. pt. 2 at 640. By 1970 the Department

Even if the offender could be reached, there would be administrative difficulties in conducting his trial. Most of the witnesses for both sides would probably have to be transported to the trial from overseas. Special investigators might also have to be sent from the United States to the scene of the crime.[36] All of this travel would constitute a substantial expense. Consequent legal problems include the possibility that a defendant's Sixth Amendment right to compel the appearance of witnesses in his behalf might be impaired if an important witness chose to remain outside the United States.

The burden of limiting travel and administrative expenses in prosecuting offenses under subsection (f) — or any other part of Section 208 — would rest upon the government.[37] Because most prosecutions based on extraterritorial offenses would be more expensive than those in domestic cases, the Justice Department would probably not want to prosecute every crime committed by civilians or ex-servicemen abroad; in practice, only cases judged worth the cost of holding a trial in the United States are likely to be brought. Even though weighing administrative costs might result in proportionately fewer prosecutions of extraterritorial crimes than of domestic offenses, it would seem to be a legitimate exercise of prosecutorial discretion, for the same sort of weighing and balancing takes place in deciding whether or not to prosecute a domestic crime. While not every offender would be prosecuted, each one would run the risk of having his case found either important enough or easy enough to warrant prosecution.[38] One factor which might permit a greater number of extraterritorial prosecutions by re-had decided that, at least when serious crimes were involved, the expense would be tolerable. See note 38 infra.

36. An example of American-European police cooperation is offered by the U.S.-French narcotics enforcement agreement. For a discussion of problems with this agreement, see Note, p. 336 supra.

37. A substantial number of crimes are involved. In one recent year, the Defense Department reported that 2079 civilian employees and dependents were charged with criminal offenses by foreign States. See Hearing on the Operation of Article VII, NATO Status of Forces Treaty, Before a Subcomm. of the Senate Comm. on Armed Services [hereinafter 1970 Hearing], 91st Cong., 2d Sess. 28 (1970). Considering the reluctance of most foreign governments to prosecute American military-connected civilians, the actual number of crimes committed is probably substantially higher. Presently some administrative sanctions can be applied by the military command, but revocation of a driver's license and suspension or dismissal from employment are not adequate sanctions against serious crime. See 1966 Hearings, supra note 23, at 62, 65. Furthermore, these sanctions may be applied without giving the accused a real opportunity to refute the charges against him.

38. If Congress should have doubts that prosecutorial discretion would be used fairly and wisely, it could amend Section 208(f) to provide jurisdiction only in the case of more serious crimes. In July, 1970, the Defense Department proposed the establishment of extraterritorial jurisdiction for the federal district courts over military-connected civilians in the case of twelve serious crimes. See 1970 Hearing, supra note 37, at 4–12, 23.

ducing travel expense is the likelihood that many defendants will plead guilty before trial, as they do in domestic cases.[39]

Situations in which a defendant's right to obtain witnesses in his defense would be abridged would probably be rare. The Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure permit a defendant to substitute a deposition for live testimony when a necessary defense witness is out of the United States,[40] and the subpoena power can be used if necessary to compel American nationals to appear at trial, with the Government bearing the travel expense.[41] In some cases, the cooperation of the foreign government might be secured in encouraging or requiring aliens to appear. And, even if a particular witness should remain beyond the reach of a federal court, this fact alone would not deprive the defendant of his constitutional rights. In prosecutions based upon the territorial principle, it sometimes occurs that a witness cannot be found, but in the absence of bad faith on the part of the prosecution in preventing the appearance of a defense witness, convictions in such cases have been sustained.[42] The possibility of such an injustice occurring should not in itself prevent the much-needed expansion of jurisdiction provided by subsection (f). Cases in which the defendant would be prejudiced by the inability of compulsory process to reach an essential witness would probably be rare, and if a defendant's rights should be violated by any particular prosecution, he could still rely on the courts to protect them.[43]

As noted above, the inability of American authorities to arrest offenders abroad, however, would seriously limit the effectiveness of the statute.[44] Yet Status of Forces Agreements appear to offer a solution to this problem in countries to which they apply. According to an expert on the operation of these treaties, the power which they grant to American military authorities includes the right to arrest individuals and remove them to the United States for trial—in civilian as well as military courts.[45] If American military officers were given the authority to arrest civilians who committed federal crimes under subsection (f), then there would be no need to seek new international agreements to permit arrests by American civilian authorities.

The Constitution seems to present no obstacle to the arrest of civilians by the military so long as the ensuing prosecution is conducted by civilians.[46] In presenting its own recommendation that federal criminal jurisdiction be extended to cover military-connected civilians abroad,[47] the Department of Defense also urged Congress to authorize the military to arrest civilian offenders, explaining that the expansion of jurisdiction would be "a futile measure unless the Congress also provided the means to implement it."[48] The effectiveness of subsection (f) could only be enhanced by enactment of a statute authorizing extraterritorial arrest, and Congress would do well to consider such legislation as a complement to Section 208 of the Proposed Code.

POSSIBLE OVERSEAS FORUMS

Two alternative proposals have been suggested to avoid the difficulties presented by having to hold trial in the United States. First, to deal with the problems caused by the Toth[49] and Reid[50] cases, it has been suggested that the UCMJ be amended to provide for constitutional trials of civilians within the military court system.[51] If this feat could be accomplished, then military-connected civilians could be tried by American courts-martial without violating international law, for the present Status of Forces Agreements permit the military authorities of the sending State to exercise enforcement jurisdiction in the receiving State over "persons subject to the military law of the sending State."[52]

Although it might be possible to satisfy the requirements of a grand jury indictment and a trial by petty jury by selecting the members of such bodies from among other American civilians on a military base, it is doubtful that any change in court-martial procedure could meet the requirements of due process. All units in the armed forces

46. Justice Black's objections to the subjection of civilians to military justice in Toth, 350 U.S. 11 (1955), and Reid, 354 U.S. 1 (1957), (see note 54 infra) concerned the indictment and trial phases of the criminal process, where military procedure is substantially different from that in civilian courts. At the arrest stage, military procedure and civilian procedure are substantially the same; command influence affects civilian policemen as well as the military. The exclusionary rule could be employed just as in civilian cases to protect a defendant's rights under the Fourth and Fifth Amendments.

necessarily operate in a command structure and are ultimately subject to the direction of the President as Commander-in-Chief.[53] Despite efforts to reduce the likelihood of "command influence" in military courts, the Constitution may demand that civilians be tried with independent, tenured judges of the kind prescribed in article III.[54] If not, the reformed arrangement, unless also applied to servicemen, might be subject to attack by other parties to the Status of Forces Agreements on the ground that American civilians were not really subject to military law. And even if this alternative should prove acceptable, it would leave American diplomats and other civilian federal officials beyond the reach of federal criminal law. Hence, it cannot be considered a fully effective substitute for the jurisdiction provided by Section 208(f).

The second alternative proposed would create no constitutional problems, but would face formidable obstacles in international law. The suggestion is that Congress establish new federal courts stationed abroad to apply United States criminal law in the cases contemplated by subsection (f). While the number of cases would probably not warrant maintaining a court at every military base — certainly not at every diplomatic mission — "roving" courts could be established to sit in each location as needed. The crippling drawback to this proposal is the need to obtain the consent of every country in which the courts would operate.[55] Such a concession by a foreign power would be a major departure from current international practices.[56] Certainly at a time

53. U.S. Const., art. II, § 2, cl. 1.

At present, the UCMJ authorizes the President to change military judicial procedures when he so desires, so long as the changes are consistent with the general purposes of the Code. UCMJ, art. 36, 10 U.S.C. § 836 (1970).

54. "The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services a Compensation which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office." U.S. Const., art. III, § 1. In Toth, Justice Black wrote for the majority:

> We find nothing in the history or constitutional treatment of military tribunals which entitles them to rank with Article III courts as adjudicators of the guilt or innocence of people charged with offenses for which they can be deprived of their life, liberty, or property. And conceding to military personnel that high degree of honesty and sense of justice which nearly all of them undoubtedly have, it still remains true that military tribunals have not been and probably never can be constituted in such a way that they can have the same kind of qualifications that the Constitution has deemed essential for fair trials of civilians in federal courts. For instance, the Constitution does not provide life tenure for those performing judicial functions in military trials. They are appointed by military commanders and may be removed at will. Nor does the Constitution protect their salaries. Strides have been made toward making courts-martial less subject to the will of the executive department which appoints, supervises and ultimately controls them. But from the very nature of things, courts have more independence in passing on the life and liberty of people than do military tribunals.

55. See note 33 supra.

56. In the nineteenth century, the United States pressured Japan and China into permitting American tribunals to sit within their territories.

when public opinion in many countries is running against the continued presence of United States forces within their territories, few governments will be eager to authorize an expansion of American power within their borders. In nations where there are no United States servicemen stationed, the authorization of a roving federal court to sit on occasional cases involving diplomats or Peace Corps volunteers would probably face insurmountable diplomatic obstacles.

Since the other parties to Status of Forces Agreements did permit American jurisdiction over civilians when they were covered by the UCMJ, they might appear more likely than other countries to allow federal civilian courts the same privilege now.[57] Certainly in practice, receiving States have not shown a compelling desire to exercise their own jurisdiction. In one recent year, foreign authorities agreed, at the request of American military authorities, to terminate 24 per cent of the prosecutions they had initiated against American civilians, although the United States lacked jurisdiction to prosecute the alleged offenses. During the same period, foreign authorities waived jurisdiction in 81 per cent of the cases involving American servicemen who were subject to prosecution in American military courts but over whom the receiving States held primary authority to prosecute.[58]

Despite the acceptance of military courts on foreign territory, there are significant differences between military and civilian courts which may make the latter less acceptable. Military courts may be considered to be a necessary evil connected with the presence of foreign troops required for national defense, but civilian courts would appear to be an avoidable insult to national sovereignty.[59] Hence, even in receiving States, the United States cannot be sure that American extraterritorial courts would be accepted.

AN ALTERNATIVE GRANT OF GENERAL JURISDICTION

As presently written, subsection (f) would provide extraterritorial jurisdiction on the basis of the nationality principle only over federal employees and members of their households. Hundreds of thousands of other American citizens abroad would not be included. While there may be more compelling reasons for exercising jurisdiction over the former group than over the latter,[60] the anomalous situation that would result from extending jurisdiction over only one group should lead Congress to consider applying the federal criminal laws to all American nationals throughout the world. If the Commission's proposal should be adopted, the criminal liability of an American citizen in an American court for the extraterritorial murder of her husband would depend on whether or not her husband had been employed by the federal government. Such discrimination would raise questions of fundamental fairness in the application of federal criminal law.

57. Despite the Agreement's very clear language restricting the enforcement jurisdiction of the sending State to its military authorities (note 33 supra), both the Working Group and the Judicial Subcommittee which participated in drawing up the NATO Agreement indicated their willingness to allow civilian authorities to exercise some powers within the territory of the receiving State. S. Lazareff, supra note 22, at 134–35. However, it would seem reckless to rely on these statements as support for a construction of the Agreement which would permit the operation of federal civilian courts in the territory of the receiving State.

There are other important reasons for extending jurisdiction to all nationals. As the experience of American businessmen in foreign countries has shown, the actions of private citizens as well as of public officials may adversely affect the foreign policy interests of the United States. By requiring Americans traveling abroad to answer for their foreign crimes in American courts, the United States might be able to exercise somewhat better control over extraterritorial conduct which might impair the national interest. The possibility of holding trial in an American court rather than a foreign court would also offer the defendant the benefit of the procedural rights guaranteed him by the United States Constitution — some of which, at least, would almost certainly be lacking in a foreign proceeding. Despite this country's legal tradition of relying almost exclusively on the territorial principle of jurisdiction, a substantial proportion of the American public would prefer to see their countrymen tried at home, rather than at the locus of the crime,[61] and most foreign countries have shown that they will be less likely to prosecute an American offender if he is subject to prosecution by the United States than if he is not.[62] The number of Americans abroad who are not covered by subsection (f) is only a fraction of the number who are,[63] so that substituting a provision for jurisdiction over all nationals would not add unreasonably to the number of cases that the United States would prosecute under subsection

After the Supreme Court upheld the prosecution of an American serviceman by a Japanese court pursuant to concurrent jurisdiction provisions of the Status of Forces Agreement with Japan (see Wilson v. (f), while it would provide for an equal application of federal law to all Americans.

Jurisdiction based solely on nationality, does, however, have its dangers. Potentially, it might be used to punish extraterritorial conduct which, while criminal under United States law, is legal according to the law of the locus — for example, selling pornography in Denmark.[64] In these situations, the reasons for holding American citizens to the federal standard are no longer valid. The crime is unlikely to affect adversely the relations of the United States with the foreign country, because the latter does not consider it a crime, and because prosecution in a foreign court is impossible. Thus there is no need to provide the alternative of trial in the United States. In order not to restrict the acts of Americans more stringently than do the States to which they may travel, subsection (f) should also be changed to provide nationality jurisdiction only when the prohibited act is also a crime in the country in which it was committed. Many other nations exercising extraterritorial jurisdiction based on the nationality principle have this kind of restriction.[65] By amending subsection (f) in this manner, it should be noted, Congress would not be freeing nationals from prosecution for any act permitted by a foreign State, for jurisdiction based on the protective principle (in subsections (a), (b), (c), and (e)) and on the objective territorial principle (subsection (d)) would not be affected.

CONCLUSION

While the provisions for extraterritorial jurisdiction in the proposed New Federal Criminal Code represent a welcome step toward recognizing that the nation's interest in criminal activities extends beyond its borders, Section 208 as presently written does not deal with the problem as effectively and as fairly as it could.[66]

> 1. German criminal law applies to the deed of a German citizen, no matter whether it was committed within Germany or abroad.

> 2. German criminal law is not applicable to a deed committed but not punished abroad, if this deed is no offense abroad by reason of special considerations obtaining there. . . .

66. In a paper prepared especially for the use of the Commission, a Yugoslav jurist recommended the wide exercise of extraterritorial jurisdiction. Noting that present American law on this question is "opposed to the legislation of much of the rest of the world," he explained that "[c]ontinentals would consider traditional common law jurisdictional notions less rational than their own, disguising real policy issues by fictions." Subsection (g) merits outright rejection, not because the jurisdiction it contemplates would be unwise as a matter of international law or policy, but because it would offend the domestic principle of separation of powers within the federal government. Subsection (f) would close an important gap in existing law, but would discriminate unnecessarily and unfairly between public servants and private citizens; a statute providing for jurisdiction over all American nationals abroad would be a more equitable solution. In those countries where permission has been or can be obtained for American military authorities to apprehend extraterritorial offenders, a grant of arrest authority would substantially increase the effectiveness of the Code's provisions for extraterritorial jurisdiction.

By adopting Section 208 with the changes suggested above, Congress would help protect American interests throughout the world and enable the United States to fulfill international treaty obligations[67] which today are beyond its power.
